THE SPIRITUAL IMAGINATION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Your editorial of September 26, on "Rennan's Romance," leads me to a few reflections. "Romance of the Infinite" is a very French phrase, and unfortunate; nor do I defend the author of it. Yet even a "romance" may be something "founded on fact." And truths imagined—not imaginary—may be more than "created and contemplated" by the imagination, if it be the spiritual imagination. May they not be by it grasped, accepted, believed even to the soul's health? Comprehend, we may not; apprehend, we can. Are not spiritual things spiritually apprehended; and is not the reverent imagination the soul-faculty—a good and far-generous faculty—of classes of faculties which apprehend religious truth or truths?

Of course, the word "imagination" is liable to misdirection. At first glance, a careless reader might think me to mean imaginary. For example, a novel is an imaginary, or imagined story. But I use the word imagination in a different sense. I do not mean arbitrary. Imagination is essential to our life; to nearly all classes of thought even; certainly to many. For instance, without it, you can have no science of numbers. Without it, where were astronomy, and other useful sciences! Written language even depends on it, for words have only an arbitrary and imagined relation to ideas; yes, even to sound. You cannot add or subtract without the aid of this faculty—a faculty which, it will be perceived, is by no means, useful in poetry and fiction only.

Now, it is useful in religious affairs, too. In the Psalms, how useful; in the grand political sermons, so to speak, of the prophets; yes, even in the driest narratives and commentaries of religion, and the religious life; in the use of words in the different senses, primary, derivative, and figurative senses in which, in the paucity of human words, we are compelled to employ language.

Under the phrase "the religious imagination," I respectfully include Faith, Hope, Trust and all the intuitive faculties. We cannot conceive of God as He is. He is too high for thought; all that human thought can do is to conceive of Him as He seems to us—here is play for the greatest and most reverent imagination. As we cannot, by all our searching, find God unto perfection, so neither can we His ways, nor yet our relations to Him. We can, however, imperfectly; it is our right and privilege to attempt this; and it is through the intuitions and the gifts of hope, faith and trust, that we do so the most successfully and approximately. The telescope does not reveal everything to the eye, but it may a great deal. The spiritual imagination is a sort of lens system, and through it we may get, if not full, yet very encouraging views of the far-off things of the soul. God thus may be different to each of us, or, in the sense that we have "imagined" Him—as I may call it—more or less truly. Each one may thus "make his own Heaven," in that he may conceive of it according to his own best and highest ability! Through the lenses of hope and trust, we may gaze from the mount of our religious experience, and view the promised and with greater or less distinctness. By faith, the highest type, or, if you prefer, as of this "spiritual imagination," we may be led on and on, so that, inspired by it, nothing shall be impossible to us that is possible to man in the realm of Christian and godly things.

And so I group all the "gifts" of which I speak, under the head of the "spiritual imagination." Nothing spiritual is unreal! Spiritual things are the only "real" things. It is that careful sense, the "Presence" is real—not carnal, fleshy, but true, actual, indubitable, and though ever "spiritual," yet ever, and as fully—"real." It is no pun or play on words. Get the fullest idea of the word "real," and you have the highest conception and the most worthy of the phrase—"real presence." And so let one take in the fullest idea of my phrase "spiritual imagination," and he will be pleased to see how very much is meant by it. We cannot realize supernatural things, and our relations to them cannot fully do so, cannot realize how God, for instance, can be the Being He is, and yet bear to us the relations which we try, though all so feebly, to express by the human terms of Father, Friend, Love, "punishes," "it repented Him," "forgives," "is angry," and all the rest of it, while we cannot realize to the full, we can imagine them, picture them to ourselves, dwell upon them with a reverent faith and in a holy frame of mind, lean in a spirit of trustfulness towards them, and he that hath ears to hear will hear and he that will understand shall understand. As low in a family causes the members of it to understand each other, to imagine just the right thing of the other, and not jealous and spiteful things, so will our love and faith, and hope and trust, and all the better qualities of ourselves lead us to appreciate more fully and realize more nearly, the things that pertain to the eternal life and our future welfare.

Said Napoleon, "imagination rules the world;" he meant fancy; I classify under it, the intuitions, the soul-faculties, the antennae by which the spiritual nature of man reaches out and grasps the things of the Spirit, the things which belong to Him who is a Spirit, and whom, being such, we must worship in spirit and in truth. R. W. LOWRIE.

UNIFORMITY IN RE STOLES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Rev. Charles L. Newbold, in yours of September 19, introduces the question of Black Stole vs. Colored. It may seem to some a small question, seeing it has no doctrinal significance one way or the other, the black stole worn over both shoulders designating a priest as much as one of another color. But it has an objective significance and propriety in reference to the Church Year, and on that ground it ought to be considered worth one's while to discuss it. And I might say here that Bishop Cox, of whom no prolate has written more strongly and appreciatively of the Church Year, ought to see in this movement to use varied stoles a movement that should enlist his strong support. Verb. sap. But I would like to say a word or two by way of question suggested by the Rev. Mr. Newbold. He says that the only legislation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in reference to her priesthood and diaconate upon vestments is to the effect that whatever was the customary habits for the clergy in England at the time of the organization of the American Church—or should I say the Protestant Episcopal Church—is the law to it. It was a wise standard to go by; but, supposing it to be the fact, is there any way of knowing what the custom then was in this matter? It is assumed that the black stole or scarf was then worn, but is there any proof? It has been strongly asserted that the scarf was worn only by certain doctors in divinity of the universities and by chaplains to the nobility came into more general use in the times of Whitfield, Lady Huntingdon endowing all the preachers of her sect with the scarf, and declaring thereby that they were her domestic chaplains, and thereby to a large extent protecting them from interference on the part of bishops and rectors.

It has been decided by the privy council that stoles of any kind are inadmissible, not being any where prescribed—only being prohibition. Nevertheless, no wearer of a black scarf or stole (for whatever the shape, the latter has become the accepted term by the most ultra of the low Church school bishops) has dropped its use, to my knowledge. Therefore, as those who sought a ruling from that source have not seen fit to obey it in this one matter, others feel themselves more than justified in adopting the rule, founded on taste and ecclesiastical propriety and educational tendency, which prevails throughout Wesleyan Christendom, and having in itself nothing to do with doctrine, corrupt or incorrupt.

And certainly it is important that this matter be discussed. For if there seems a necessity to so enrich the present Prayer Book by making one festival more significant and joyous than another, it seems that it is equally imperative that the clergy should not on Mondays as Easter and Christmas be in mourning by wearing a long black stole that seems, even to the general or common mind, to be quite in keeping with a funeral, or Good Friday, but utterly out of harmony with not only great festivals, but with christenings, confirmations, or marriages. THE REV. HENRY VAN DYCK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The forthcoming memorial volume of the Seabury Centenary will contain a full account of this clergyman, from which it will be seen that the Rev. Dr. Hills erred in saying, in your last issue, that he was "rector of St. James' church, Newtown, L. I., till his death, in 1811." He died September 17, 1804, and was buried "from his house, No. 4 Cedar street, New York." E. E. BEARDSLEY.

NEW BOOKS.

CURST AND CHRISTIANITY. Studies of Christology, Creeds and Confessions, Protestantism and Romanism, Reformation Principles, Sunday Observance, Religious Freedom and Christian Unity. By Philip Schaff. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. 310. Price, $1.50.

Dr. Schaff is widely known to that part of the world which is interested in religious literature. A vigorous writer, a clear thinker, a learned scholar, whatever he may say is sure to command as it is to deserve, attention. This volume consists of lectures, papers and addresses delivered at different times and places, upon the topics indicated in the title. The earlier portion is devoted to Christology. We do not agree with Dr. Schaff in his interest in the later Christological questions which he here states as occupying the mind of Germany. We hold that it is wisest to leave the whole matter where the great General Council left it, viz., with the Creed a statement of facts, which were clearly of revelation. The mere physical reconciliation of these facts belongs to a dangerous domain. It is speculation by finite minds or infinite verities. The English and American Churches have stopped short at the true resting place, simply affirming the two natures in the One Person of Christ without dogmatizing on the subject. The "Kenotic" and "Gradual Incarnation" theories of Germany simply bewilder without edifying. But the reader will find in Dr. Schaff's pages a clear statement of the various views and a very excellent summary.

A less satisfactory part of the book is his dealing with the question of the Unity of Christendom. Dr. Schaff's idea is that the more important bodies who hold the orthodox faith should remain as they are and the minor sects disappear. It is an idea which seems to correspond to that of the political situation in Europe where the leading States are arranged to preserve the balance of power, while the petty States are mediolized. We do not see upon what principle this can be arranged. If the differences which sever the large communions are essential enough to warrant their remaining in schism—the differences which have created the small bodies may be equally essential. What is to decide? If outward dissimilarity is a good thing, it is as good for the small sect as it is for the large. If we understand Dr. Schaff rightly, he would have Episcopalians, though they should become convinced that parity was the normal policy of the Church, nevertheless remain Episcopalians, because it would be a pity, as he says, for any of the "historical Churches" to disappear. We, on the contrary hold, that if the Episcopal Church could be convinced that its theory of orders was wrong, it would be guilty of sin in still requiring episcopal ordination. It would have no right to put its preferences in the way of reunion. He would not wish the "Apostolic" dropped from the Nicene Creed, because having been, though wrongly, placed there, it is awkward to make an alteration. Yet Dr. Schaff would revise the English Scriptures, at least as important as the Nicene Creed, and where the result of revision is quite as inconsequential. There is but one really vital distinction between Protestant bodies, but that is very vital. It is the distinction between religion as received, and religion as constructed. It is between appealing to the Bible as the witness of a revelation which comprehends institutions as well as doctrines, and looking to the Bible as the origins of a revelation subject to the interpretation of every man's private judgment. On this latter ground every sect has equal right to its existence. Dr. Schaff speaks of "heretics," but there can be no heretics under this latter view. If a Protestant communion looks to the belief that it has the faith once delivered to the saints and the order established by the apostles, it cannot depart therefrom. The question is simply one of evidence, not of choice. If a scholar should say, "I believe the primitive Church was episcopal, but I think presbyterianism better adapted to the wants of the present day, and I can make out a sufficiently plausible case to warrant it," he is responsible for the schismatic posture in which he stands. If he says, "I believe presbyterianism the original state, and therefore hold fast to it," one may think he is wrong, but must respect his rights of conscience. The real difficulty in dealing with all men in Dr. Schaff's position is this: They insist upon a virtual recognition of their own orders, which must be on the part of those who recognize, a virtual denial of other orders. No bishop, Anglican or American, can admit Dr. Schaff's orders without logically denying his own consecration. This may seem a point of no consequence to Dr. Schaff, but his only way out of it is to admit the self-election of any person—man or woman—who claims to exercise the Christian ministry. In other words, to him the sole validity of a ministry lies in the fact that somebody recognizes it. If not, then there must be a line drawn somewhere, some power to confer, and, if so, then a ministry not so conferred is invalid.

It will not do to say that the right of choosing its own polity resides in any body of sufficient importance, because it is utterly impossible to say what degree of numbers will make a body of sufficient importance. That is the Methodist argument. "We are so many millions, therefore it is not fair that we should give up our orders. We do not claim to be right, but we claim to be many, and that settles it." But suppose the comparison to be made between three hundred thousand colored freedmen in the South, and three hundred Presbyterians in New York City. One would hardly say that numbers would make the former a body of more importance than the latter. The truth is that if there be any such thing as an ordination, it cannot be a matter of caprice. If there be any reality in it at all, its conditions must be settled. It may be only a matter of decent solemnity that the deacon to be ordained be clad in a white surplice, and the ordainer wear the robes of a bishop. But it is a matter of essential moment, if anything is conferred, that the one who bestows has the authority to bestow it. If parity or prelacy are indifferent, that can only come because one or the other is a usurpation. The one is claiming that to which it has no right, or the other is claiming a right which never existed. Now orders are an external fact, and so is intercommunion. We cannot see how the one can be admissible without the other, unless it be said that valid orders are not necessary to the administration of the sacrament. The truth is, Dr. Schaff's notion is the one of the Evangelical Alliance, viz.: an exceptional union, which separates at once and goes on to perpetuate differences. That says, in effect, "We are giving a great spectacle of Christian charity, but we mean nothing by it." It must be a pretence on the part of the one or the other of those who meet. People can "agree to differ" only on some point they hold non-essential to the matter in which they engage. Dr. Schaff's idea is that men of differing denominations can unite in matters of social and moral reform, and so they can; but they can do so only by keeping in abeyance their denominational status. If this be involved, one or the other must give way, and the tendency of this union is not to a union of "the Churches," but to a thrusting of the Churches to one side. The Congregationalists complain that the Young Men's Christian Association and other like organizations have had just this effect.

CHURCH LIFE IN COLONIAL MARYLAND. By the Rev. Theodore C. Gambrell, Baltimore. [George Lorett, 1885.] pp. 315.

Mr. Gambrell possessed some special qualifications for the preparations of this work, and it will be found full of interest to those who love to study the history and progress of the Church in this country. A native of Maryland, the rector of one of its earliest parishes, a diligent student with free access to old and original records, he has painted an accurate and attractive picture of colonial Church life upon both shores of that State. His work begins with its earliest settlement, and is brought down to the period of the completed organization of the Church in the country in 1792. Without claiming to be a history, and with only a general reference to authorities for its statements and facts—and we think it would have been better to cite chapter and verse—it is yet a valuable contribution to our ecclesiastical history. It is, as it were, the work of a pioneer—he has blazed the trees along the way and so lightened the labors of the road-makers who will follow. The work abounds with curious facts. Thus we learn that the colonists from the beginning were vexed with the question St. Paul discusses in the case of Philemon. "Does the baptism of a slave work his manumission?" it was asked, and when their baptism was by reason of this problem neglected, the Legislature—the Church was by law established—intervened and solved the question by legal enactment. We find, too, a Rev. Mr. Boucher seizing the leader of a party which was attempting to prevent his occupying his pulpit, and telling him, "with his pistol cocked, that if any one should dare attack him he would blow his, the leader's, brains out." But the belligerent parson lost the battle, and we are told that "they escorted him out of church and all the way home, and with music, too, though it was by the fife playing the rogue's march." But there are in the volume many graver facts of Church history in Maryland, of its relations with the State and of the important part it took in the promotion of that union of dioceses now represented by the General Convention. There is in the work a succinct narrative of these events, with a fuller history of St. James's Parish, Anne Arundel County, and the book will be gladly welcomed in these days of centennial and historical reminiscences.

DRIVEN BACK TO EDEN. By E. P. Roe. [New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.] pp. 260. Price $1.50.

"Driven Back to Eden" has appeared as a serial in St. Nicholas. Its illustrations are in the capital style which belongs to that periodical so dear to the hearts of the juveniles. It is the story of a family tired out from the hard life of tenement houses and taking refuge on a farm in the country just above the Hudson Highlands. They are successful in gaining a happy, comfortable, and healthful home, and the amount of labor needed to accomplish this does not seem to be understated. The point about which we are the most uncertain is whether the author has not pictured the maximum of success and the minimum of failure. The market, for instance, is unvaryingly good, and there are none of those awkward and unlooked-for expense items which actual life is so rarely free from. The theory is a very alluring one, and Mr. Roe professes to know the facts which sustain it. We do not in the least question the discomforts of the life from which these "dwellers in Eden" fled. It is one of the drawbacks of the usual life of American cities that it falls so hardly on the middle classes, on those who have only limited and fixed incomes. Those who would gladly live within easy distance of the cities are driven into its close confined streets by the presence of malaria. There must continue to be a majority who cannot hope to rise above the level at which they begin—clerks, salesmen, book-keepers, and the like, who are necessary to the great work of business. They cannot all gout and become happy and prosperous market-gardeners. It is not an increase of pay which these want; they know that they are getting fairly what they earn. It is that they should be able to get their money's worth for what they pay. This is the real problem.

THE WORLD'S WORKERS.—Dr. Guthrie, Father Matthew, Eliza Burritt, Joseph Livesey, By John William Kirton, LL.D., author of "Buy your own Chaises," etc. [Cassell & Company, Limited: London, Paris, New York and Melbourne.] pp. 128.

A biography may be of poor indeed not to be worth reading. It is evident from the names of three out of the four here given that the book is intended to glorify temperance workers. Total abstinence like misery has the power of bringing about strange companionship. A Scotch Presbyterian divine, an Irish Romish priest, an American blacksmith, and an English hand-loom weaver are grouped together by no other affinity than their opposition to the use of strong drink.

But we cannot say that this method of biography is very satisfactory. One wants to know more about Burritt's intellectual methods than the slight facts here given, what the result of this wondrous culture, and how much was real, and how much superficial.

If it is the idea of the book to show that temperance men have attained fame and position, it is a very dangerous argument, because it is at once open to the answer that people who were not total abstainers have done the same, and even to force on the comparison where men who were far from abstinent have also been eminent and esteemed. It is a pity that the best of causes should be marred by bad methods.

Joseph Livesey and Father Matthew are properly "temperance" biographies, that is lives of men who made that their chief cause of action. With the other two it was more an incident of their careers. As a Scotch divine, Dr. Guthrie was by no means the greatest; as a linguist Burritt fell far below Mezzofanti. The truth is, these "lives" are, after their kind, a sort of acta sanctorum, and that style of biography is the worst which is written.

AN ORIGINAL SKELT. By Edward F. Roe, Author of "Barriers Burned Away," etc. [New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.] pp. 382. Price $1.50.

There is no doubt of the great sales which Mr. Roe's novels obtain. There is no doubt also that books very much superior to them in literary value do not begin to rival them in public favor. We cannot stop here to analyze the reasons for this. We only feel the more free to utter our criticisms because we are morally certain that this book will have a pecuniary success which will not be affected by anything that we may say. We cannot, in the first place, complain that the characters are not pitched upon a sufficiently high ideal. They are too high, if anything. The intention of the book is excellent. Its idea is that of a young girl in the upper ranks of society, who is supposed to have great powers of fascinating her male friends. She is led to use these powers for the end of elevating and inspiring these friends, and making a set of heroes of them all. The Civil War furnishes the opportunity, and the hero-in-chief, being by circumstances cut off from that opening, is enabled to win his spurs in the draft-riots of New York. The trouble is that all the characters are made of wood and not of flesh and blood. They have the individuality of a set of chessmen.

We should like to praise this book, for its moral tone is unobjectionable, but we cannot find it interesting or anything but commonplace. Yet, as we say, the verdict of the community is undoubtedly against us.

BIRCHWOOD. By Jak. [New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.] pp. 215. Price $1.25.

This is a very fair "young folks" story. It is a sort of exemplification of the practical carrying out of the "Agassiz Association," which is so well known to the readers of St. Nicholas. It tells how some young people fitted up a country farm-house as a museum and public library, and one of its moralists, "There is a great deal more to be learned of the things immediately around one, than one supposes." Which is, we hold, a very good moral.

As much cannot be said of many books of this order—false religion, false sentiment, unreal incident, and unnatural development of character are the faults which mar at least one half of the works which well-meaning people write for the young.

THE WORLD'S WORKS. Sir Titus Salt and George Moore. By James Burnley. [New York: Cassell & Co., Limited.] pp. 128.

These are two well written sketches of two remarkable men, who made large fortunes and used them with a liberality and good judgment worthy to be recorded beside the deeds of George Peabody and Peter Cooper. Though these are brief, yet they are true to the principle of biographic writing, and give a fair outline of the lives of two "self-made" men, the way in which they made their money and the very noble way in which they spent it. Sir Titus Salt was the builder of "Salt-tairs," a model manufacturing village. George Moore was at the head of the relief movement for the starving Parisians after the close of the siege. Other and numberless good deeds were theirs, but these will serve for examples.

LITERATURE.

"SUCCESS IN LIFE," by Canon Farrar, with a brief biography, will be presently issued by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston.

The Century Company has published the Life and Times of William Lloyd Garrison in two volumes. It is a work that will find many readers.

Of the seven editorial notes in the Trinity Tablet for October 9, only three are devoted to athletics. The Tablet is handsomely printed and is full of interest for Trinity men and their friends.

S. C. GREGG & Co., Chicago, will issue "Natural Theology or Rational Theism," by Dr. M. Valentine, and "Hegel's Logic," by Dr. W. T. Harris. The latter work makes one of Griggs' Philosophical Classics.

The Young Churchmen Co., Milwaukee, have changed the Living Church Annual and Clergy List, Quarterly. Subscribers will have at the same cost not only the Annual as before, but a corrected clergy list every three months.

At the recent meeting of the British Association, at Aberdeen, Sir Lyon Playfair strongly urged the increased support in schools and colleges, by the State, of scientific education. To science the State was largely indebted for its knowledge of life and the improvement of industrial arts.

The colored plate in Art Interchange for October 8, is a design for cup and saucer decoration, with directions for treatment in mineral colors. The number contains many other designs, and a full page illustration of L. Kraft, "The First Rendezvous," in the salon of the present year.

THE DECORATOR AND FURNISHER for October contains many sketches and designs to illustrate its letter-press, and they cover almost every part of household decoration and furnishing. The columns of Hints and Notices are full of valuable information which, in every number, would more than repay the cost of subscription.

THE Crown Princess Stephanie of Austria has made sketches of the palace and grounds of Luxembourg for a work, "Oesterreich in Wort und Bild," which, assisted by Austrian and Hungarian writers and artists, is being prepared for publication. The princess was paid for her sketches, and has placed the money in a savings bank to the credit of her infant daughter, the Princess Elizabeth.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS announce new publications in science, education, medicine, general literature and for the holidays. Among them are "Expression of Humor in Animals," by Wm. H. Beard, "Evolution of Today," a summary of its theories, by H. W. Conn, "Problems in Philosophy," by John Bascom, "Poetry as a Representative Art," by Prof. Raymond, and "Brain Rest," by J. L. Corning, M.D.

SCIENCE, a very able weekly journal, has been removed from Boston to this city, and its editorial rooms are at 47 Lafayette Place, and its publication office at 743 Broadway. The number for October 9 shows a typography very much improved, and is accompanied with a supplement and a map of the regions affected by the revolution in Bulgaria. It has a varied table of contents, and is replete with instruction and interest.

MR. THOMAS WHITTAKER announces the tenth thousand of Shinn & Coan's Prayer Book and Hymnal for the Sunday-school, "Immortality"; a Clerical Symposium on What are the Foundations of the Belief in the Immortality of Man," by Rev. Canon Knox-Little, Prebendary Row, Principal Cairns and others, and the Rev. T. K. Cheyne's new translation of Isaiah, with commentary, two volumes in one, largely reduced in price.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

In selecting a Prayer Book either for use or a present, care should be taken not only to secure attractive binding, but attention should be paid to the type and the paper used. There is a great difference in the several editions published. The "OXFORD" editions are printed on an opaque paper made in their own paper mills from pure linen, and the plates from which the books are printed are kept in perfect repair, thus doing away with such defects as broken letters or battered lines. Ask your bookseller to show you the "OXFORD" edition, and compare it yourself with any other he may have.

IMMORTALITY.

A Symposium on "What are the Foundations of the Belief in the Immortality of Man." By the Rev. Prebendary Row, M. A., Rev. Canon Knox-Little, Principal JOHN CAIRNS, D.D., and others. 16mo., cloth, $1.50.

THE MASTER'S CALL.

BY GRACE C.

"Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile."—ST. MARK, VI. 31.

"Apart!" Dear Master, in that little word
How much of sadness and of mystery lies,
How darkly fall its shadows on our hearts,
How deep the bitterness that dims our eyes.

Yet thou hast said it! As in the days of old Thy chosen ones, who knew Thee "face to face"

Were called apart, so now we hear Thy voice
"Come ye—apart into a desert place."

That desert place, so desolate and lone,
How could we strive its thorny paths to trace,
Were not Thy presence promised to Thine own,
Their strength in weakness, Thine abundant grace!

But Thou art faithful, and to earnest hearts
Whose light is in the sunlight of Thy smile,
Thou speak'st at again, in loving, cheering tones,
"Come ye yourselves apart—and rest awhile."

Yes, rest! In lowly self-communings deep,
Seeking to know Thy will, our Saviour guide;
The voice of pride, ambition, discord hushed
In patient waiting by Thy pierced side.

For Thou art ever with us, and in Thee
Alone we find relief from toil and care,
Nor need we fear the barren desert waste
If but Thy will, dear Lord shall guide us there.

CHAPTER IV.

In the Darkness.

The two followed what they thought was the way by which the others had gone, or, rather, they did not think about it at all, or how long they had been detained. Till suddenly, simultaneously, before either could speak on the subject which was uppermost in their minds, both knew that they had missed their way and were alone in the Catacombs.

"Do you know where we are, Edward?" said Stella, as the taper burned on, very near its last "holdable" inch.

"No, dear. We must wait. There is no danger if we keep still. I don't think we are out of the way, really. When they get outside they will miss us and come back for us. Are you very cold? We have your taper still half unburned. And if by any chance we shall be left without light, if it be longer than I think—"

"I am with you, Edward. I am not afraid of the dark then, but—"

She quite broke down and burst into a fit of passionate weeping. Edward drew her closer and closer to him, and placing the tapers on the higher rock shelf that they might continue burning as long as they could, he supported her tenderly, not daring to speak, lest, man, Englishman though he was, he should follow her example. The perfect sympathy between them by which each seemed to know the thought of the other without need of speech, had been strangely increased as they looked into "the depths of parting."

For both knew what had been done, both knew that "necessity had been laid upon them," and that their own hands must inflict suffering upon themselves as the Christians of old suffered at the hands of others, pro ecclesia Dei.

Neither ever knew quite what they said then as they sat together in the darkness—the shadow of sacrifice on their spirits—the physical gloom growing murkier and more oppressive, till at length the one candle flickered out, and it had not lit the other nearly touching it.

The darkness was complete. But again Stella repeated:

"I am not afraid—with you."
Half broken sentences—half defined thoughts—passed between them—till at last Stella said:

"We are only unprofitable servants after all. But God knows we are giving our best to Him, and He can see that it is our best by what it costs us. Oh, Edward, I am so tired, and so ill. Will no one come to take us out? Can we do nothing?"

"Nothing. We can only wait. My darling! I do nothing but bring suffering upon you."

Stella tried to speak but she could not. She leaned against him, faint and exhausted.

"Stay, dearest, I will go—not out of sound of your voice—and see if I can find my way to any spot I recognize."

"Don't leave me alone here. Oh, I couldn't bear that."

"Very well, it is perhaps of no use."
"Yes, it is." She corrected herself. "Only call to me as you turn the corners, and when I can't hear come back—I mean come back before you can't bear."

He took off his overcoat in spite of her entreaties as she felt what he was doing, and arranged it around her.

"Stay," she said. "I will not call to you, I will sing. As long as you can hear me it will be all right."

And so, as he groped his way, hoping to find that they were near the chapel of St. Cecilia, he heard the sweet, low, well-trained and powerful voice, touching once more these darkened galleries with the music of "a hymn sung to Christ as God," by a Christian maiden.

By a thought awakened by their strange circumstances, and feeling that no secular words or melody were appropriate, Stella selected instantly Cardinal Newman's hymn.

Echoing, yet muffled, came the words and music to Edward's ear, reaching his heart, as he felt along the walls literally "amid the encircling gloom." Stella sung the hymn through once, and then the second verse again; and then the first verse:

"I do not ask to see the distant scene,
One step enough for me!"

And then Edward came back.
"I can find no landmark. Are you very weary and afraid?"

"Weary, not afraid," she replied, once more. "We are quite safe, and I am with you."

"Stella," he said, "just this once more let me kiss you, my darling. I will never ask it again till—"

"Without harm we may belong to each other," she interrupted him. That was their parting and the seal put to their broken engagement—for once more sacred in being broken off than in being kept.

"We ought to call occasionally, if they are looking for us; they will find us more readily."

"I can't sing any more. Besides, I shouldn't like to use hymns as a sign to any one but you, though I think just now that I was not singing only to you. You call."

At length the call was answered by voices talking, with sudden relief in their tones, above the shouts, "Are you there, Shelley?" And presently, one after another, the party trooped in with fresh supplies of tapers, and explanations began which were only notable on one side.

"We never missed you," said Dr. Lorton, "till we got out after our round, and then we searched for you everywhere. You aren't far off the track, but just enough to cause this delay in finding you."

"We kept quite still when we found you had gone while we were talking to an old acquaintance of mine," said Edward.

"Quite so, quite right—the best thing. I remember, twenty years ago, a friend of mine stayed away, and didn't keep quiet. She had nearly lost her reason when we found her. But there were two of you, and I suppose that you didn't think that you would be forgotten in your darkness."

"No," said Stella, with a meaning which Edward caught, "we didn't think that in our darkness we were forgotten."

But when the party turned into daylight again, Dr. Lorton looked at the girl who had been his ris-a-ris in the carriage with dismay.

"My dear Miss Grey, in spite of your pretence of bravery, you have had a great strain on your nerves. Why, you look an old woman! Mr.—er Shelley, you are Miss Grey's cousin, I believe. Let us take her home at once. I don't like Miss Grey's looks; she is in for fever," he added to the lady in whose charge Stella had been placed.

"Not already."

"Not a consequence of this shock to the nerves; nasty thing, though, it might be, mentally and physically, to be lost in these catacombs. But I am mistaken if she isn't already suffering from a touch of fever. Go on with your expedition. Shelley and I will take her home to her friends. If any lady, except Miss Toblett, likes to come, well and good."

"Nonsense," replied the lady, in the same under tone.

Now that Stella had been freed, she was much annoyed with the trouble caused.

"Let Miss Grey go back with Mr. Shelley. They are engaged to each other. Mr. Shelley won't want to have you. He was a priest, you know. And we really can't manage without you. I heard Mr. Shelley ask Miss Grey to stay behind, and if they have been punished by a little fright, they deserve it. Such bad taste of Mr. Shelley, parading his engagement, with you present!"

Wrapping her selfishness up a little more politely, the lady, much to Stella's relief, it must be owned, sent her home with Edward, while the rest of the party fulfilled the programme of having a picnic tea at the mouth of the catacombs. The behavior of the lady was remarked upon afterward, but at the moment, with relieved minds after their fright, every one turned to the task of unpacking the provisions.

And as Stella and Edward drove off, Dr. Lorton looked after them for a minute, and thought to himself what, in coarse language, the Dominican had announced, "The usual thing—what a pity it is! I had heard of the secession. 'Cherchez la femme!' " as usual. And I remember now my friend spoke of young Shelley as so promising, and so devoted to religion—of the stuff of which martyrs are made, that was his expression, I remember.

And such a pretty, charming girl to be a stumbling block!

"No, Miss Toblett, I do not consider that the catcombs are utterly fatal to the pretentious. Oh, thank you! Good English too! What a treat! A real banquet-table springing up in the desert, minus the table. I am never quite sure, do you know, that I should have been happy to recline in the old Roman fashion? I prefer modern times."

CHAPTER V.

The Valley of the Shades.

With emptied arms and treasure lost,
I thank thee while my days go on;
And having in thy life-depth thrown,
Being and suffering (which are one)
As a child drops its pebble small
Into some deep well and bears it fall, Smiling: so I. Thy days go on.

K. B. B.

The gaily colored drawing-room belonging to the Shelleys was filled with flowers as Stella had arranged them before her expedition. Bowls of sweet-scented carnations and nignonette, and roses, tall masses of iris, blossoms of peach and quince, with books, photographs and knick-knacks, gave the apartment such an air of comfort and refinement "as only English ladies," (by no means all of them!) "know how to impart to these poor rooms." We quote the manager of the hotel, whose prices were not in accordance with the manner in which he spoke of the suite after Mr. Shelley had taken it.

In the room the archaeologist was seated at his writing-table in a most despondent attitude as Stella pushed aside the heavy velvet curtains over the door with a slow hand, and walked rather stiffly, rather unsteadily, into the room. She felt so unwell and so giddy that she was not able to realize what she had done, as they two, Edward and herself had driven home.

Edward followed her to see her safely with her aunt. What he would do next he did not know. I think that just at this moment he, too, scarcely realized what had happened. The joy of sacrifice—just given to help us over the critical moment, though if pain be merit we lose nothing of that a little later—that was still lighting up his soul. The martyr's pang brought the martyr's raptures. Just for a little while, a modern sacrifice for the old cause of God's glory brought something of the old joy.

And so in the physical and in the mental fever of the two lovers, respectively, there was much high tension, much strain, but, for the moment, the dull, dead pain had not begun.

The archaeologist was feeling the destruction of his hopes with much more vivid consciousness, as he held out a thin letter with hieroglyphical foreign writing to the over wrought, highly excited young man. As Stella slowly went out of the room, Edward read—

"MOST HONORABLE SIR, GENTLEMAN!—I have not the necessity to make my assurances that something of more than ordinary happenings has to me caused the deception. It is to me not to be believable, but I invite you with pleasure, to make what you will please to the regard of that rhyton. I do beg you to receive my expressions of incredulity of what you do now affirm with all respect from the part of ———."

"What is this?" said Edward. "The rhyton a fraud?"

"Of course, of course. Made a fool of me! Can you make head or tail of that?"

"— seems to think that he has been deceived himself. It appears extraordinary that a man who knew his business could have been taken in. He is not like an amateur."

Mr. Shelley was insulted. "As if I couldn't see through an ordinary piece of deception! Look here. It is beautifully done. It is a genuine antique, but broken and a part of it wanting. Now it has been repaired all but a little bit, not to cause suspicion by its perfection, and painted by an artist. It was worth anything, dirt-cheap at a hundred and twenty pounds. If I had wanted to sell it I should have asked two hundred from the British Museum, and they'd have been glad to have capped their collection by giving me at least a hundred and fifty for it. Instead of that it is worth perhaps, five pounds. And of course when an antique is suspected —!" Mr. Shelley shrugged his shoulders in a manner which an Englishman, happily we think, never acquires without long practice abroad.

But it is expressive, and it gives other people a chance of getting in a word during the momentary pause.

But now Edward did not want to talk. He was glad that Mr. Shelley should go on, and Mr. Shelley did go on, till at length, having told Edward all about it, (though had a new listener come in that would not have interfered with the commencement of the story—rhyton, da capo, ad lib.) Mr. Shelley did pause and begin on the subject which Edward knew would have to be faced sometime, but, especially after the rhyton incident, did not expect to have to face then.

"By the way—just heard this morning. Forgot till now. Old Smith is dying really. Can't last out the week. Of course no haste. Want of delicacy. Still just as well your case is at an end. Glad it's all settled. We talk of going to Florence on Tuesday. Don't suppose you'll stay behind us, eh, Ned? And then, Paris and England! You'll go to the bishop, I should think, first thing. Don't suppose you have changed your mind."

The jerky character of these sentences was the result of the antiquarian's looking at his work as with a brush dipped in spirits of wine touch by touch he denuded his rhyton of its black paint, which should have been enamel, and exhibited the cracks and flaws and supplements beneath the outer coat. Next to getting hold of a genuine, your antiquarian loves unmasking a fraudulent article. With beaming good-temper—forgetting how dear it had cost him—Mr. Shelley was practically proving his fraud, and so returning in high glee to his plans. He actually chuckled about the absurdity of supposing that Edward could change his mind, and the forlorn appearance his rhyton. He expected an answering laugh from Edward. Instead of that the younger man came round the table, and standing with his back to the light looked down, tried to speak and hesitated.

"Hullo! what's wrong?" said the antiquarian. "Stand out of my light, my boy. I'll just get this done. And then I'll write two letters, one about it, the other about you—what I talked about yesterday, you know."

"Uncle Herbert," said Edward, "don't write about us—me, I mean. I have—we have changed our mind—our minds. Stella and I—"

The archaeologist burst out laughing. "My dear boy, all right, all right," he chuckled, "never you mind. Of course you and Stella were obliged to fall out some time; but you'll have enough time to make up your minds again before the answer comes from my lawyer. No occasion to stop that with Rome six days post, there and back, from England. Why, when I was young I'd have changed my mind twelve times over in that time for the pleasure of quarrelling and making it up with a pretty girl like Stella! But you see, you began love-making rather later than I did, and so you think that you know your own mind because you're no longer a boy. But it's all the same. As long as you're young enough to be in love, you're young enough to play the old tricks. And Miss Stella's as good a girl as girl ever was. But she's young and pretty, and likes to have her fun, too! The idea of coming to me with a grave face like that over a lover's quarrel! Why, Ned, I thought you were a man, in spite of your up-bringing! A B C, sir, A B C. You don't know the alphabet of love. Serious? ha! ha! ha!"

"I am serious," replied Edward. He could not explain what had influenced him, what had influenced Stella, to his uncle, and especially in this mood. How that good temper grated on him! "Stella and I cannot see our way to marrying yet," he blurted out lamely.

"See your way to marrying! Pack of nonsense! What do you mean? What do you mean, sir? Not yet? I'll have no shilly-shallying. Marry Stella, or don't marry her; you don't get the chance twice. My little girl isn't going to be worried for you, standing there with a wry face and a glum look, and a 'I'd like to see if I can find anything that would suit me better,' I say! No; don't talk to me, you young scoundrel, you! I might have known better than to trust you, you deceiver, you fickle, amenable painted rhyton—that's what you are!"

Mr. Shelley held up the remains of the vase, once "the finest specimen extant," which now, broken, pieced and unenamelled, looked the very metempsychosis of a detected hypocrite!

"I'll listen to nothing, to nothing, do you hear, sir? Do you hear?" went on the infuriated uncle, very quick to resent a slight offered to his darling. "And whatever do you want?" he added as a woman entered the room.

"Miss Grey seems very unwell, sir," answered the maid, "and Mrs. Shelley's out. And, sir, she's like Miss Baldwin when she sickened for the fever; it's been coming on for some days. Will you please send for the doctor, sir? I think he should come at once

A little later the two men, uncle and nephew, were once more alone, during that dread time of waiting for the doctor's verdict, which all of us have gone through, some of us frequently, with the heart-sickness increased by remembrances of former occasions and the renewal of pain. The men were silent. Mr. Shelley wanted to be talked to—to be told it would be all right—to hear all those platitudes which we don't believe in when they are spoken, and yet which we miss bitterly if we happen to be with any who are too strong-minded to offer us such poor comfort. Edward was very still. He felt as if he had been turned into stone externally, and that he could scarcely feel anything. He was now in the regions of pain, but in the icy regions. Mr. Shelley, having forgotten all he had said, but with a vague knowledge that he had quarrelled, and, with his temperament, not being able to understand silent grief, began nervously: "Beg your pardon, Ned. I never thought it might be poor Stella's doing, with the fever upon her. Sorry I spoke so roughly. We both feel this."

No answer.

"Can't you speak, Ned?"

No answer. Edward heard. He could not explain what he thought, but he would like to if he could find words, or could speak, but somehow he could not wake up; the room was getting dark; he was falling asleep, and the doctor would soon be here, and he must hear whether Stella had really fever. . . . And the next thing, before he could "wake" up properly, he heard two voices talking about him. He was lying down. A great buzzing was going on, and far away he heard his uncle say: "Poor young fellow! He's devotedly attached to my step-daughter. Shock, you know; and I fancy there had been a bit of a lover's quarrel."

Edward tried to move. But he had no power for a minute or two it seemed to him, and then he recovered from the faint brought on by the combined effects of the previous mental struggles between discipline and pleasure, which had made him sleepless and weary in all his new joy, and then of the scenes through which they had that day passed. He had been thoroughly exhausted before the bad news came.

"That's right," went on the antiquarian, "lie still or you'll be doing it again. And a woman's bad enough, but a man frightens you to death going off like that! And you knocked over the table with the rhyton when you fell, and it's smashed for good and all."

"How is she?" asked Edward. "Stella, Miss Grey, I mean," he added as he saw the doctor.

"I am afraid we are going to have fever, but Miss Grey is very young and the attack may be very slight," was the answer.

And so just then none of the quartette left Rome. Through days of brilliant sunshine the fever ran its course. Stella was always growing weaker. There were no dangerous complications, but the pretty, fair, young girl was very fragile; and, though the case was only a "moderate" one, all feared a relapse, even if she could without that maintain her strength. Those dark Roman days, with light and gladness and beauty around, but mocked the anxious watchers inside and outside of the sick-room! One day a message came for Edward.

He was in the drawing-room, waiting with sinking heart, not able to do anything, to know, to feel anything, but that Stella was passing away from all who loved her. He had paced up and down the drawing-room till he had sunk down exhausted in a chair by the table where her work-basket with the unfinished work still lay as she left it. He felt a hand on his shoulder. It was Mrs. Shelley, changed and saddened, and now very grave.

"Stella is asking for you, Edward. She is better—Oh, no, Edward, it is only for the moment! Nothing can save her now, the doctors say. She has been removed into another bedroom because it could not hurt her, and it is a great thing to break the associations. She is so weak; you oughtn't to see her; but she is fretting so. You must stay only a minute. She must not be excited. Can you be brave?"

It needed all his courage—another kind of courage here—to follow Mrs. Shelley to the sick room where Stella lay, so changed, so ill.

Her great eyes sought his, and she knew him, though all her strength was gone. She could not even put out her hand to him.

"Edward is here, dear," said Mrs. Shelley, speaking very distinctly. Stella was almost dead now from the effects of quinine.

"Tell him—Edward—it wasn't that day made me ill," she said feebly. "I am very glad. It is your motto. We did it for God. I wanted to tell you not to be sorry when I am gone. That's all. Good-bye, Edward."

She could not speak any more. Her last words had been very indistinct, but she shut her eyes and seemed content. She had wanted him to know that he had nothing to reproach himself for, and that their sacrifice was deliberate.

Edward rose mechanically from his kneeling position and followed his aunt out of her room without a word. She had to go back to Stella, and she left him alone in the drawing room, in silence with his sorrow, watching for the coming of the Awful Presence.

Yet, after all, Stella did not die.

Day after day she lingered on, but gradually strength seemed first not to fail, and then to increase, and at length, quite suddenly, the quartette was ordered to move up to the hills. Stella was taken from her bed to an invalid-carriage and driven across the Campagna to the hill-side village of Albano, and very soon then she knew the bright keen pleasure of the convalescent patient in her new delight that "everything was so beautiful."

Mr. and Mrs. Shelley could not understand it at all; but the resolution taken by Edward and Stella never wavered. At first both hoped that after some years, when Edward had quite proved his motives to be pure and had provided this "honest in the sight of men," he might retire, as it were, to a position in which marriage would not stultify his work, or at least, as in some cases, it would not greatly hinder it. But, whatever were the issue, this is what they said to each other two years after the vow had been spoken, when, for a brief time they were able to speak to each other. They were then still firm in their resolve, though how acutely they felt the sacrifice only themselves knew. Stella had said: "I wonder if Dr. Lorton begins to believe now in one reformer?"

"I don't know that I could have done this only to gain his opinion, Stella," replied Edward. "It seems harder each day. 'Lawful, but not expedient.'"

"Dr. Lorton only represents what others rightly think," said Stella. "It is hard that what is our right should be in such a case only wrong."

"Hush, dear! we may not judge others, even though we know now how dearest costs dearest. Very imperfectly, very feebly, you and I know something of the nature of self-sacrifice. It is the best thing man has, reverently given to be united to the best thing God gives. That great voluntary sacrifice was the giving of all to win all. Ours is indeed little."

"And yet it was our all—our best!" said Stella.

They were alone. And it had cost them so much that just for a minute or two they might dwell on it. She was not thinking of their action in any self-complacent spirit, only touched with the joy of having found something to give, as she added suddenly:

"Edward, I found this in a book I took up the other day: 'Not God Himself can do His best without man's best to help him.' Is it truth or is it irreverence?"

"In one sense the deepest truth, dear. God's best will be done—I am sure of that, even when all seems darkest—but no man may help who does not give his best, whatever that best may be, or for whatever end it may be given," added the man, "unto whom much had been given," and "from whom much had been required."⁹

"Ad majorem Dei gloriam."

THE END.

THE WELL-DRESSING.

"Blessing the crops" is not the only relic of ancient ceremonial which still lingers here and there throughout the Church of England. Recently the Guardian gave an account of the "well-dressing" (an expression of the primal sense of the sacredness of Wells) at Tixington, Derbyshire, where it has been celebrated in unbroken continuity for hundreds of years. The village, with graystone cottages, nesting in the wooded dell on the crest of one of the bleak limestone hills which stretch northward and eastward from the far-famed valley of the Dove, and the long-fronted, mullion-windowed, terrace-gardened hall, in which, or its predecessors, the ancient family of the FitzHerberts have resided without a break from the time of Henry IV., and have decked its pannelled walls with their portraits—and the tiny Norman church perched on its high green sycamore-shadowed bank above the village green, preserving its rude south door, and still ruder chancel arch, and its low, sturdy tower, kept from running down the steep slope by massive Early English buttresses, memorials of a time long anterior to its first grant as one of the chaperies of Bradbourne, by Sir Geoffrey de Caucis in 1205, to the far distant Priory of Dunstable

⁹ As has already been hinted, this was a peculiar case. Edward had to choose between one particular kind of work, which he was specially suited for and apparently called to, and his marriage. The latter would have made it impossible to do the former with any effect.

THE TRUE GENTLEMAN.

Cardinal Newman says the true gentleman carefully avoids whatever may cause a jar or jolt in the minds of those with whom he is cast—all clashing of opinion or collision of feeling, all restraint, or suspicion, or gloom, or resentment, his great concern being to make every one at his ease and at home. He has his eyes on all his company; he is tender toward the bashful, gentle toward the distant, and merciful toward the absurd; he can recollect to whom he is speaking; he guards against unreasonable allusions or topics which may irritate; he is seldom prominent in conversation, and never wearsome. He makes light of favors while he does them, and seems to be receiving when he is conferring. He never speaks of himself except when compelled, never defends himself by a mere retort; he has no ears for slander or gossip, is scrupulous in imputing motives to those who interfere with him, and interprets everything for the best. He is never mean or little in his disputes, never takes an unfair advantage, never mistakes personalities or sharp sayings for arguments, or insinuates evil which he dare not say out. From a long-sighted prudence he observes the maxim of the ancient sage—that we should ever conduct ourselves toward our enemy as if he were one day to be our friend. He has too much sense to be affronted at insults, he is too well employed to remember injuries, and too indolent to bear malice; he is patient, forbearing, and resigned on philosophical principles; he submits to pain because it is inevitable, to bereavement because it is irremediable, and to death because it is destiny. If he engages in controversy of any kind his disciplined intellect preserves him from the blundering discourtesy of better, perhaps, but less educated minds, who, like blunt weapons, tear and hack, instead of cutting clean, who mistake the point in the argument, waste their strength on trifles, misconceive their adversary, and leave the question more involved than they find it.

BOOKS FOR THE GUEST CHAMBER.

At one time I was staying in a house where the guest chamber contained among the furniture a little shelf of books. I have often thought of them since, with a wonder that more careful hostesses did not provide the same. Nights when I could not sleep, and mornings when I waited in my room for the breakfast-bell, I dipped into the contents—a volume or two of poems, some short stories, and interesting travels comprised the whole—and I found not the least pleasant part of my visit in those quiet moments by the window which overlooked the great old-fashioned garden. Any housekeeper could spare six or eight books from her library, and almost any guest would bless her for the thought. A little workbasket fully stocked, pen, ink, and paper ready to hand—the visitor cares nearly as much for these as for fresh towels and extra coverings. The Golden Rule, which is a guide to all branches of good housekeeping as to all branches of all business, comes to one's aid here, and what we care most for in another's home we should endeavor to give the owner in our own.—Ruth Hall, in Good Housekeeping.

—and its five wells, whose annual benediction gathers together a large and reverent throng as often as Holy Thursday comes round—seem to belong to the past rather than the present age, combining to form a picture of quiet beauty, which carries us back to England's youth, especially in this delicious springtime, when even at that great altitude—some eight hundred feet above the sea level—the banks are spangled with flowers, and the trees are putting on their fresh green livery, and the air is vocal with birds.

This interesting ceremonial, the origin of which we may hesitatingly carry back to pre-Christian times, having been adopted and hallowed in the spirit of Pope Gregory's wise counsels to St. Augustine by the teachers of the true faith, survived the shock of the Reformation, when it assumed a new dress in accordance with the change of ritual, which it still wears little changed. The proceedings of the day commenced with morning service in the little low-browed village sanctuary. The clergy engaged in it were the Rev. James FitzHerbert, vicar of Tissington, the Rev. Richard FitzHerbert, rector of Warsop, and Canon Gray, vicar of Blyth. The hymns and canticles were lustily sung by the village choir, with added strength from the crowded congregation. A very appropriate sermon was preached by Canon Gray, from Ps. xlii. 1, "Like as the hart," etc., enlarging on the symbolism of water as expressive of the longing of man's spirit for the knowledge of God and communion with God, "with joy drawing water out of the wells of Salvation." The preacher last year was the Bishop of Lichfield, from whose diocese Tissington has now passed into that of Southwell. At the conclusion of the service, from which, according to immemorial custom, the Psalms of the day, as well as the Epistle and Gospel, were omitted, to be said at the wells, the officiating clergy, in surplice and stole, followed by the congregation and the still larger number who had been unable to find a place in church, commenced the circuit of the wells, five in number. Each of these, with the exception of the third, the "coffin well," which was wisely left to the natural adornment of a luxuriant bank of primroses, rising from the long stone-lined basin from which the well takes its name, was embellished with the traditional form of decoration in floral mosaic, the work of the villagers, with whom it is an hereditary art of which they are not a little proud. At the back of the basin from which the water flows is erected a tall wooden framework, which, being daubed over with moist clay, is covered with blossoms arranged according to their colors, so as to form an architectural design, framing a picture, and surmounted with texts of Scripture, flowers and leaves alone being employed. It is difficult to estimate the number of thousands of double daisies, white and red, primroses, pansies, marsh-marigolds, geraniums, and other flowers absorbed in the pictures. The first halt of the procession was at the "Hall Well." The architectural facade, marked out in flowers, was surmounted with the text, "Thou hast crowned Him with glory and honour." Here Ps. viii., "Domine, Dominus noster," was recited, and the hymn, "As pans the hart for cooling streams," was sung. The procession then moved a short distance to the "Hands Well," where Ps. xv., "Domine, quis habitabit," was recited, and hymn 445 H.A.M., "Palms of glory, raiment bright," was sung. The architectural framework of this well, which was surmounted by the cross, bore the text, "I am the good Shepherd," and contained a landscape with the Shepherd and His sheep skilfully wrought in different colored flowers. At the third, or "Coffin Well," "unadorned, adorned the most," to utilize Milton, no artificial decorations were attempted. Here the Psalm was "Domine, in virtute Tuâ," Ps. xxi., and the hymn, H.A.M. 183, "When wounded sore the stricken heart." At the fourth, or "Town Well," at the head of the little triangular village green, the Epistle for the day was read, and "O God, our Help in Ages Past," H.A.M. 165, was sung. Here the design included the Agnus Dei, backed with a spray of purple passion flowers, worked in pansies, and the texts, "Behold the Lamb," "Let the Heavens rejoice." The ceremonial concluded at the fifth or "Goodwin's Well," on the rising ground above the green, where the Gospel was read, and the Old Hundredth Psalm sung. The design here, which was one of the most elaborate, embraced the cross, with the ladder, nails, and other instruments of the Crucifixion, and above it the text, "Peace be unto you." The benediction having been given, the procession separated, a large number being hospitably entertained at luncheon by Sir W. FitzHerbert in the panelled hall of his ancient mansion. So ended this most curious and interesting ceremony, a legacy from the far off ages, when, as Canon Gray remarked in his sermon, "the primitive tribes which ranged over the bleak hills of Derbyshire took this mode of expressing their dim idea of God, as the author and giver of all good things, and especially of water, the purest, brightest, most necessary of all His gifts."

IN MEMORIAM.—S. D., 1884.

BY KATHARINE INOMIRE.

At rest in the Lord | with the Lord glorified;
At rest in green pastures, still waters beside,
In the joy of His presence, the light of His smile
Who drew her apart from earth's friendships awhile.
By faith she had walked with Him here on the earth Through sunshine and shadow, through anguish and mirth.
Without Him life held not the fulness of joy,
And with Him grief held not the power to destroy.
Unseen, she had loved Him, and loved Him so well
Her tongue had no need of her loving to tell.
The power that constrained her alone forth from her face,
And filled her whole life with a beautiful grace;
For the dear loving Lord is faithful and true,
And daily more near to His own image drew Her strong trusting soul, till the word went around—
"She hath stood with the Master on holy ground."
Then the veil of frail flesh that so long hung between The things of this world and her Saviour unseen
Was rent, and her spirit went forth at His word
To dwell in His presence; to rest in the Lord.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH TRAVEL.

BY M. MEDLICOTT.

Durham.

The city of Durham is beautifully located on the river Wear, which winds picturesquely around and through the town till you can scarcely tell which way the stream flows or whether it is one stream or more. Alighting at the station, and crossing over the Framwellgate Bridge, as it is called, built originally in 1120, but rebuilt some four centuries later, we quickly find ourselves in the heart of the town. Naturally our first visit is to the cathedral, and there is no difficulty in finding it. There is fugitives became safe within the sanctuary of St. Cuthbert, to whom the cathedral was originally dedicated. History tells us how St. Cuthbert, prior and afterwards Bishop of Lindisfarne, but known and revered through all the north, dying in the solitude of Farne Island, a favorite retreat of his, found his final resting place on this hill. Legend, attendant of history, further describes how miraculously this spot was pointed out to his followers, wandering over the country seeking an abiding place and carrying the body of their master with them. At all events, on this lovely spot, so well guarded and fortified by nature, the pilgrims laid to rest with holy care the mortal remains of Cuthbert, building at

As we approach it from the north, on which side is the principal entrance, we are at once struck by the grandeur and massiveness of the building. It is so stately and majestic, yet so well proportioned that the details are almost lost in the general effect of majesty, and we feel how worthy it is of the lordly rank held by the diocese to which it belongs. Entering by the Norman doorway facing us, we pause a moment to notice the rich carving of the deeply recessed arch, and to examine the curious old iron knocker called St. Cuthbert's knocker. This in old times gained fugitives entrance to the sanctuary, and as it is hollow, with openings for eyes, a grotesque face, 'tis said that at night a scarcely another in England or in Great Britain so beautifully situated, or so commanding in appearance. The windings of the river form a peninsula of a high hill, richly wooded down to the water's edge, and, crowning the summit of this hill, stands the cathedral, the central feature of our vision, overlooking the town and country beyond. A steep path leads almost directly from the bridge up to the top of the hill, and the cathedral itself standing close upon the brow, almost overhangs the river below. A magnificent building it is!

On the north side a railing or fence separates the surrounding churchyard from the green beyond, interesting as forming the boundary line, which once passed, first a chapel of boughs merely. Upon this lordly site in time a "cathedral huge and vast" looked down upon the winding Wear, and was dedicated September 4, 999. And "all men rejoicing and praising God, the uncorrupted body of the most holy father Cuthbert was translated with due honor into the place prepared for it." About a century later the cathedral was rebuilt by Bishop William de St. Carilef, in great part unchanged till the present day, though somewhat added to and restored. Well is it described as "a church which for stately grandeur and beauty of proportion may perhaps be matched, but cannot be exceeded anywhere." "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole land is Mount Zion."

light was placed inside it to point out the way.

Grand is the view presented to us on entering, of the nave with its Norman architecture so well preserved. The heavy, massive columns are alternately ornamented with fluted, zigzag or diamond-shaped furrows, peculiar in their effect and very beautiful. A very fine but modern screen separates nave from choir. The carved oak stalls of choir are beautiful. The "bishop's throne," a lofty, canopied seat on the south side, is said to be surpassed in height only by the papal throne at Rome. The magnificent altar-screen, commemorative of the Neville family, terminates the east end of the choir, with doorways each side leading to the feretory behind, in centre of which St. Cuthbert was buried, and the site of his shrine is still pointed out. East of this again is the Chapel of the Nine Altars, said to be the largest chapel of its kind in the kingdom, traces yet remaining of the altars which stood around the sides and in front of the windows, thus giving the chapel its beyond which females were not permitted to advance, the good saint being very strict in his rules as to the "weaker sex." (Might not this be taken to mean that he feared their influence?)

The great west window is similar in its tracery to the one at York, and very beautiful. On either side are modern stained is on the west end of the cathedral, taking the place indeed of the western entrance, and entered only through the cathedral. Steps lead down to it from the nave, and as we enter we notice first the peculiar effect of the rows of columns and arches. There are four rows of these, Norman in style, with the heavy "dog-tooth" carving to the name. Returning now to the nave we spend some time looking at the massive pillars and arches, the grandest specimen we have yet seen of Norman architecture, looking also at the various monuments of interest. At the west end of nave is the beautiful font, carved on sides with scenes from the life of St. Cuthbert. Near this, too, on the floor, is the "boundary cross" of blue marble, glass windows, very fine, representing St. Cuthbert and Bede. Below these are doorways leading to the Galliee, the part of almost the greatest interest to us in the whole building. This chapel fairly overhangs the cliff below, its walls being almost a continuation of the wall of rock, so that when a little doorway is opened in the west wall we look down into the river below. It arches, so characteristic of Norman work. The effect of all this is to give you a curious impression of interlacing of columns and arches—if one may so speak—as there are three rows of these columns, besides the columns against the wall, forming four rows of arches instead of three, as we ordinarily find them. The altar stone of blue marble, with five crosses on top, marked in the marble, stands on one side; and towards the south-east corner of the chapel is a large altar-tomb, with a slab of blue marble covering it, and clearly to be read the inscription, "Hæc sunt in fossa, Bedæ venerabilis ossa." This tomb was erected during the Reformation, and the remains of the good and "venerable" man placed in it, and here centres the chief interest of our visit to this grand cathedral. A plain, unpretentious tomb, is not it?—different from shrines erected to saints and kings! Yet is not the name of Bede worthy of honored remembrance, and could stately shrine or lordly monument add greater dignity to his name? Methinks not. And his grandest title is the name by which he is always denoted, Venerable Bede, and the sweetest memory we could have of him is that of his fighting bravely against his last great enemy and holding in check his failing senses till his scholar and amanuensis could take down from his dying lips the last words of the Gospel of St. John, which he was engaged in translating. Not here at Durham did he live and die, but a few miles off, at Jarrow, in the little monastery that owes its chief fame to his connection with it. Well would we have liked to pay a visit here also had time permitted.

In the library of the cathedral, opening off the cloisters, and upstairs, we were shown some MSS. of Bede's time, one of them said to have been written with his own hand. Here, also, we saw the original bills for removing the bodies and making the graves of Cuthbert and Bede. Curious documents they were. Other MSS. with beautiful illuminations are to be seen here, and in the new library, a room leading to the old library, where these MSS. are kept, are many Roman and Saxon stones, parts of altars and monuments, etc., the Saxon stones, especially, being curiously carved. The cloisters are very fine, and many doorways and arches are worthy of notice. Passing from the cloisters, through an arched stone passage underneath the new library, we come out upon a beautiful walk leading along the bank of the river, so thickly wooded, till we come to the Prebend's Bridge, as it is still called, leading across the river Wear. From this bridge what a lovely view! Here on our right, high up, overtopping the trees with their rich luxuriance of green, rises the stately cathedral. Down below rushes and sparkles the little river, the beautiful woods on either hand adding to the harmony of the scene. Nor must we forget the view, so extended and beautiful, from the summit of the central tower, well repaying us for the toilsome climb. Here, as nowhere else, we realized the many windings of the Wear, and how the cathedral, from her seat lofty and vast, looked down upon her children dwelling around.

To the north lies the old castle built by William the Conqueror, but added to and rebuilt in part since then. It now belongs to the University of Durham, and is well worthy of a visit. Entering through the old Norman arch of the twelfth century, we can but notice the massiveness and curious carving of the work. Indeed, there is a great deal of this Norman work to be seen inside the building; the Norman gallery, with its curious old arches and zigzag carving on them; the "black staircase," of veritable black oak, erected in 1665; the curious collection of pictures, bishops and apostles, the latter brought from Spain; the old rooms, still hung with tapestry and furnished with rich old furniture, occupied by judges during the assizes; and last, the Norman chapel, with curiously ornamented round columns. In the chapel of the University are some of the misereere seats brought from the cathedral during its restoration, all curiously carved, one representing a man driving a woman in a wheelbarrow. The altar and some carved panels in the chapel embody portions of the old pulpit in the cathedral. So the two buildings are curiously interlinked in history. The castle is finely situated, though on ground a little lower than the cathedral, and originally built for its defence.

One peculiar feature in the history of Durham seems doubly interesting as we survey the grandeur and position of its cathedral. We have before alluded to its lordly rank. Its bishops were "prince bishops," the County of Durham was "the bishoprick," and the bishop was the temporal ruler of the same. The term "diocese" referred to the whole territory under the bishop's spiritual jurisdiction, in distinction from the term "bishoprick," which applied only to the County of Durham, under his temporal control. This palatine power gave many and extensive rights to the bishops, making them more independent of all temporal control or jurisdiction, almost wholly independent, indeed, of the king. Naturally, the more ambitious sovereigns were jealous of this power, and under Henry VIII., who abolished similar rights in the See of Ely, many of the privileges of the palatinate were curtailed, and in 1836 they were at last wholly vested in the crown.

Strange it seems now to us to think of the customs and habits of those far-off days, when the ecclesiastical power was so dependent upon, or synonymous with, not merely temporal power, but military force, when the chief officers of the Church of Christ, instead of being "men of peace," were often the contrary, men of war, military leaders, lords of the realm; yet often, let us not forget, seeking power and wealth, not for themselves alone, but for the increase and aggrandizement of the Church, to which they devoted their best energies. May we not say truly that those times needed a different system from these—an influence that should add dignity and power in the eyes of the people, who were impressed by what they saw, who were appealed to through the senses? With changed times come changed systems and modes of thought, and who of us would wish now to go back to those early days, dearly as we love to hear and read of them?

As we rapidly speed away from the city, on our course northward, almost our last, as our first view, is the grand building with its three noble towers, still keeping, as for centuries past, its watch and ward over the busy toilers of men.

SOCIETY is neither my master nor my servant, neither my father nor my sister, and so long as she does not bar my way to the kingdom of heaven, which is the only society worth getting into, I feel no right to complain of how she treats me.—George Macdonald.

WHAT AN OLD CHRISTIAN THOUGHT OF LIFE.

The Epitaph of Abercius of Hierapoia.

BY ARCHDEACON FARRAR, D.D.

"We are His people and the sheep of His pasture,"—PSALM c. 2.

I mentioned last month the inscription on the tomb of the old Bishop Saint Abercius, recently discovered by Mr. Ramsay, near the town of Synnada, in Asia Minor. There ought to be for us a deep interest in anything which brings these latter years into nearer contact with the days when Christianity was still in its purple dawn. I am far from thinking that the Church of even the earliest days was perfect, or that it was in any respect more divinely enlightened than our own may be; but I think that most of its members in those times of trouble and persecution, when as yet religion did not walk in silver slippers, were far sincerer and less worldly than we are in these days of conventionality and compromise. They could still breathe the pure air which swept from the plains of Gennesareth; still catch from nearer echoes the divine accents of the Sermon on the Mount. In the second century after Christ the doctrine of the Church was far less corrupted than it soon became by influxes of false interpretation, of ecclesiastical tradition, of priestly assumption, of elaborate dogma, of monastic gloom. In those days, golden priests used chalices of wood; in days of greater wealth and less holiness, wooden priests used chalices of gold. It is good for us, I think, amid the universal recrudescence of ceremonialism and of sacerdotal claims, to look to the rock whence we were hewn, and the hole of the pit whence we were digged. That was why, not long ago, I called attention to the newly-discovered book—so simple, so primitive, so interesting—called "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," which is perhaps the earliest of extant Christian writings, and has in it, I believe, purer and truer lessons for us than many are at present willing to learn. I now invite you to think with me over some of the lessons suggested by this inscription on the tomb of a Christian Bishop in Phrygia in the second century—one of the oldest, and quite the most interesting which we possess.

1. It is not often that inscriptions on tombs are very edifying. They are generally empty; often vulgar, sometimes grotesque. With their fulsome eulogies and pomposity of titles, and pride of small successes, the taint of the world is too often upon them. Wander round our great Abbey, and among its hundreds of monumental inscriptions you will find scarcely half-a-dozen which are good. Sometimes they point a bitter reflection on the world's insincerity, like that of Samuel Butler, which records that it was placed there "lest he who in life often wanted bread, in death should want a stone." Sometimes they are shockingly cynical, like that very evil one chosen for himself by the poet Gay:

"Life is a jest, and all things show it;
"I thought so once, and now I know it."

Sometimes they are a sigh over human misery like that in the cathedral of Chester:

"Death, the great monitor, often comes to prove "Thou dost we dole on, when 'tis man we love."

or that simple, bare, blank word "Miserrimus," "most wretched," the frozen epiterrimus.

of some disastrous life, which, as it were, appears in anguish to an unanswering heaven from the cold cloisters at Worcester.

Perhaps we might expect more edification from bishops' epitaphs: but those in the Abbey, at any rate, are for the most part mere pomp and vanity, with ostentatious emblems of croziers and mitres, and boastings of the consummate virtues of very ordinary men.

The only episcopal epitaph that ever struck me was one which I read as a boy on the brass tablet of good Bishop Hildesley, in the Isle of Man—"Siste, viator, vide et ride palatium Episcopi"—Stay, passer-by, see and smile at the palace of a bishop! But when we talk of these early pastors, or bishops, we must discard all modern notions which, for good or for evil, and as I think mainly for evil, cluster round the office.

Abercius was not a peer of the realm. He was not called "My Lord." He did not live in a palace. He had no status, entourage, worldly circumstance.

His position was far more like that of the vicar of some poor city parish. Probably his whole diocese did not contain anything like so many nominal Christians as the Parish of St. Margaret's or St. John's, though it may have contained far more real ones.

The bishops of those days were humble officers of a struggling and persecuted Church. Surely it should be of some interest to us to know what such men, in such an age, thought of human life; what were their hopes, their helps, their view of this mortal coil. Let me read you, with the omission only of three unimportant lines, the inscription, restored from its recently discovered fragments on the old Phrygian altar tomb. I will explain its meaning afterward.

"I, the citizen of the elect city, wrote these lines while living, that in due time I might have here a resting-place for my body. My name is Abercius. I am a disciple of the pure shepherd who feeds his flocks on the mountains and the plains, and has great eyes which gaze down in all directions. For He taught me faithful writings, who sent me to Rome to see my kingdom, and to see a queen golden-robed, golden-sandalled; and there I saw a people having a bright real. And I saw the plain of Syria, and all its cities; and crossing the Euphrates I saw Nisibis; and everywhere I had comrades. Faith led me everywhere, and I followed, having Paul with me. And she everywhere set food before me, a fish from the fountain, very large and clean, which a pure virgin grasped. And everywhere she gave this to her friends to eat, having excellent wine, and giving a mingled drink with bread. Standing by, I, Abercius, bade this inscription to be made. I was passing faithfully my seventy-second year, and let every one of like mind who reads this pray for me."

Doubtless, as you hear it, much seems to you obscure and fantastic, because Eastern Christians had a habit of expressing themselves in a highly metaphorical manner. But the meanings which lie beneath the metaphors are full of beauty and instructiveness.

2. Notice first, in passing, how, in each new discovery of students and travellers, we acquire a fresh evidence of Christianity. We live in an age of scepticism, and yet in every old coin, or Monbie stone, or Phrygian inscription, or recovered writing, or broken slab, or crumbling tomb in Asia Minor, in Palestine, even on the far-off banks of the Tigris or the Euphrates, the Great Head of the Church is ever supplying us with fresh historic confirmations of the facts which we have historically received.

If the New Testament were taken from us to-morrow, it is hardly too much to say that from medals, and catacombs, and the ruins of long-forgotten cities, and relics and writings of days within two generations of the death of Christ, we could reconstruct and demonstrate every essential fact of "Those ancient years, which breathed beneath the Syrian blue."

3. Abercius begins by telling us that he is the citizen of a chosen city. What city does he mean? Not, assuredly, the obscure Hieropolis, of which he was bishop. No, but that city of which St. Paul wrote to the Philippians, "our citizenship is in heaven;" of that city which the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews meant when he says that the old patriarchs "looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God;" of that city, the New Jerusalem, which St. John saw coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride, adorned for her husband, having the glory of God, and her light like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal. But how simply is this truth shadowed forth! To Abercius this world was not a home. The only thing which seemed a reality, which seemed worth recording, to him, was that he was a freeman in the city of God. A modern Christian might tell us in his epitaph that he was born in London or York. To Abercius such a fact seemed an accident, or a triviality. The one important thing to him was that he was a citizen of that elect city, the Church of Christ, which the Good Shepherd had called forth from a guilty and selfish world.

4. To describe himself further it does not occur to him to mention that he was a bishop or overseer, but he only calls himself a disciple of the pure Shepherd, who feeds his flocks of sheep on the mountains and the plains, and whose great eyes gaze down on all. This emblem of Christ, as Bishop Lightfoot conjectures, may be derived from some picture which St. Abercius had seen in the catacombs at Rome. In those subterranean corridors for worship and for burial "the fair Shepherd" is the favorite symbol of the Lord. To those early Christians, loving, joyous, uncorrupted, Christ was not either the wrathful avenger, hurling before Him ten thousand thunders, of Michael Angelo's picture of the Judgment Day; nor was He the convulsed, emaciated, agonized, dying Christ of the ghastly crucifixes presented by a corrupt Christianity to the groaning worship of mankind. No; but He was a living Christ; He was an ascended, divine, glorified Christ, Christ who, having once died, dieth no more: Christ who, alike in lofty and lowly places, feeds and loves and seeks His wandering sheep, and whose eyes beam light upon His suffering world. Our poet says:

"All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my great Taskmaster's eye."

But the old bishop's conception of Christ is truer and sweeter. He thinks of Christ, not of "a great taskmaster," but as of Him "who shall feed His flock like a shepherd, and gather the lambs in His bosom, and gently lead those that are with young." My brethren, more depends than you may think on our emblems of the Lord. The conception of mediæval monks, of self-torturing ascetics, of the Romish papacy, presents to us always a Christ either of fury and terror or of agony and blood, under whose feet they paint a hell, into whose hideous glare His elect look down with eternal self-satisfaction and seraphic psalms. And this is orthodoxy! It may be the orthodoxy of sects and of Pharisees, of priestcraft and of ignorance; it was not the orthodoxy of the apostles and evangelists; it was not the orthodoxy of the earliest centuries; it was not the orthodoxy of the pupils of St. John.

THE RECOVERY OF HEZEKIAH.

BY THE REV. WM. KIRKCU.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the narrative in the xxxviii. chapter of Isaiah and in the parallel passage in II. Kings, is intended to be the record of a divine interposition. It is meant to be the account of a miracle, not of a mere surgical operation or medical prescription. Part of it is quite obscure, as, for instance, what it contains about the step-clock and the ascending and declining shadows, all reference to which is singularly omitted from Hezekiah's Song of Praise. Nevertheless the historian intends obviously to convey the impression that the king's recovery was by a special interference of the divine goodness, in answer to prayer, and supernaturally revealed and promised through the ministry of the prophet.

To any consistent theist the mere miraculousness of the king's recovery would present no serious difficulty. But the narrative in II. Kings and in Isaiah is admirably adapted to set in the clearest light precisely the place where the supernatural makes its appearance, and at the same time to enable us to perceive the reasonableness of the intervention, and how widely it differs from any capricious disturbance of natural laws and processes. In fact, leaving out the "sign that the king should go up to the house of Jehovah," the exact nature of which is perhaps no longer ascertainable, a very few omissions—nay, scarcely more than a slightly different "way of putting" the case—would bring it within the most ordinary occurrences of common experience. Here is a godly king, afflicted with a dangerous boil or carbuncle. It becomes more and more certain that unless he can obtain relief he must die in a very few days. His religious adviser and trusted friend comes to visit him, and sees at once the seriousness of his danger. It is no time for formal compliments, not even for that reticence with which we so habitually endeavor to spare the feelings of those who are dear to us. A king, more perhaps than many other men, may well desire to have an opportunity granted him to make his last arrangements, give his last commands, perhaps to undo some wrong, or hasten the fulfilment of some yet unaccomplished purpose. So his faithful adviser warns him that he has no time to lose, he must set his house in order, because he must die and not live. But even as he is passing away from the palace, before he is gone out into the middle court, a possible means of cure flashes across his mind. He bethinks himself of a cake or plaster of figs. He orders this to be applied to the boil, and so confident is he of the efficacy of this remedy, that he goes back forthwith to encourage and cheer the king, and to assure him that within three days he shall be able to present himself in the house of Jehovah.

Now it is plain enough that a case like that might occur any day, that, in fact, such cases are exceedingly common. They involve no difficulty whatever, and are not in the slightest degree incredible. But let us just a very little vary the circumstances. Let us suppose that the thought of the plaster of figs did not present itself to the mind of the prophet in that spontaneous way, which is none the less mysterious because it is so familiar. Let us suppose that the king's danger was widely known and that his subjects were greatly distressed by the apprehension of his approaching death. As the prophet is coming away from the palace a friend hurries up and accosts him thus: "You have access to the king, and I know what will cure him. It is perfectly simple and harmless; it is merely a plaster of figs. But it will certainly relieve him. Go and use your influence to have it immediately applied. Cheer the king's spirits, and confidently promise him that in three days he shall be able to present himself in the house of Jehovah." The prophet hurries back accordingly, applies the figs, gives the king the cheering assurance, and in three days the king is cured.

Now this again would involve no difficulty; it would be entirely credible. Such a case might happen any day, and might happen to anybody. Wherein does it differ from the previous case? Simply in this: that whereas, in the first case, the thought of the plaster of figs arose spontaneously in the prophet's mind, that is to say, in a way for which we cannot account; in the second case it was suggested to him by a friend. There is nothing whatever intervening in the nature of a new material antecedent, nothing that can be weighed or measured, nothing that can be detected by chemical analysis, or by light, or by any physical test, however subtle. The thought of one mind has been communicated to another mind, and thus, though the laws of nature remain exactly what they were before, they have been subordinated to the needs and desires of a particular individual. We are so perfectly familiar with this mode of moving freely about in the midst of the most rigid physical conditions, we are so used to exercise this royal prerogative that we do not realize how wonderful it is. And yet, strangely enough, when we learn that Almighty God does this very thing, that He moves freely in the interspaces of His own arrangements, that He communicates with those whom He has made in His own image, that He suggests to a prophet the curative virtue of a plaster of figs, and bids him cheer a sick man with the confident assurance of a speedy recovery—when we are told all this, we are inclined to disbelieve that it is possible for God, though we are doing the like ourselves every day of our lives.

There is no proof from experience of the absolute uniformity of nature; it is accepted by the most thorough going "scientists" only as a most fruitful working hypothesis—one, moreover, the truth of which is rendered more nearly certain by every new experiment. There is, scientifically, no reason in the world why the "laws of nature" should remain to-morrow what they are to-day, though there is an enormous probability that they will. If we want to find a reason for the order of nature, for the permanence of nature's "laws," we must leave science and seek our answer from metaphysics and ethics. The first of these will give us cause, as distinguished from mere invariable antecedence, and the other will give us right and wrong, and the obligations of a promise, express or implied. The theist will find no insuperable difficulty in believing that God may vary the means by which He brings to pass what He desires; but, inasmuch as His perfect will and wise purpose may be expected, by reason of their perfection, to be well-nigh invariable, so we may look for a permanent law and a general uniformity, to which the exceptions shall be so few that they may be well described as miracles. Moreover, as our conduct depends largely upon the uniformity of nature, we may, on ethical grounds, trust the promise of permanence which is implied in those very rules which require from us stability of character. But beyond these limits we have no more reason to expect uniformity in the Divine operations than to expect change. In fact, there must have been change—the change which is implied in creation; nay, the change that is called evolution. For, come how or whence it might, when life appeared the created universe was so much the richer.

And nothing is more certain than that the miracles of Christ, for instance, are in no kind of conflict with the perfection of the Divine wisdom or the promises implied in the uniformity of nature. If Peter walked on the sea without sinking, that highly exceptional power could have, and did have, no effect whatever upon the ordinary duties of mankind. It did not supersede the art of ship-building, or make navigation more dangerous. It neither lessened our duties, nor robbed them of their reward. We are very often told that the removal of a grain of sand from one planet to another would alter in some real degree, though too minute for our detection, the attractions of the whole planetary system, and that the miracles of Christ involve physical changes which would disturb the balance of the whole physical universe. But this kind of argument may very easily be pushed into caricature and absurdity. When Jesus anointed a blind man's eyes with spittle and restored him to sight, what disturbing change did He produce in the physical properties or arrangements of matter? The saliva and the clay, even after they had been set apart, by a determination of the will, to a benevolent use, weighed exactly what they had weighed before. When Lazarus was raised from the dead there was neither creation nor annihilation of any material substance, and to the Divine Chemist the recombination of elements that had begun to decompose and disperse must be at least as easy as was their first production. Even in the multiplication of the loaves and the fishes it is not at all certain that there was any increase in the actual matter of the world. The miracle may have consisted in the superhuman wisdom of the operation, and is not more wonderful than what we call the natural multiplication of corn and fishes, which is equally beyond the reach of the largest human resources.

The narrative of the recovery of Hezekiah attributes it to the goodness of God, in answer to Hezekiah's prayers. Thus saith Jehovah, I have heard thy prayers, I have seen thy tears. It cannot be denied that the very atmosphere of scepticism which we are all compelled to breathe is, likewise of the most useful drugs, at once stimulating and narcotic. We scarcely know how stimulating and beneficial it is until we find ourselves, perhaps during a summer vacation, in some stratum of what seems like antediluvian life and thought. In that stagnant air all poisonous superstitions grow rank, just as cholera prevails in those Spanish towns where the inhabitants kill their physicians, and look for safety in tawdry images and dead men's canonized bones. But, again, we scarcely realize how narcotic this air of scepticism is until we read the Divine promises, and come into communion with some godly man or woman who simply believes and lives by them. We are constantly reducing the value of prayer to a minimum. We scarcely like to speak of its effects, excepting so far as they are reflex. And there is good reason to remind both ourselves and other people that all wishes and all requests are not necessarily Christian prayers. But there is no reason whatever to suppose that the attitude of our minds toward God makes no difference whatever in God's treatment of us. It may well be that He bestows blessings upon us, at least, who have full light of Christian revelation, only on condition that we ask Him for them. Nothing can be more absurd than simply to take for granted the uninterrupted gifts of the Almighty, and yet this is the very folly to which we are especially liable. We fancy that God is, not to speak profanely, too good-natured to say no, and at last we lose the habit of even going through the form of asking Him, till we cease in any real way to believe even that He is.

Therefore, if for no other reason, at least for our own good, that we may not sink into that mere oblivion of God which is almost more dangerous than active misbelief, God insists that we shall keep our religion awake. We are to watch upon prayer. He never binds Himself to give us more than He has expressly promised, but He assuredly warns us that we can claim no more. Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. And if anybody wants to know how God can answer prayer, we may boldly answer easily enough. Do you wish, and ask submissively, to be healed when you are sick? Then, if it is better for you to live longer in this world, why should it not be as easy for the Almighty to suggest the plaster of figs, or what not, to the physician, as for the physician to tell your wife or your nurse how to put the plaster on? What, after all, are what we call the spontaneous suggestions and impulses which arise within our souls? What mysterious intercommunication there often seems to be between friends far apart! What mysterious intercommunication there unquestionably is by means of language, written or spoken! There is scarcely a difficulty which can be suggested as to the efficacy of prayer which does not at once vanish if we assume no more than this: that God can communicate with us as really and as easily as we can communicate with each other.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

MISS PHOEBE'S SCHOLARS

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

II.

Margie Nicholson began to go to Miss Phoebe Glover's school about the same time that Ernest Mathews did. Margie's own home was many miles away. She had come to spend some months with her grandmother, and her grandmother very soon decided that it would be a very good thing for the little girl to go to Miss Phoebe's school.

Not that Margie was a troublesome child about the house; by no means. Her grandpa often said she was as quiet as a kitten at her play—more so, in fact; for when Kitty was playing with a spool or wooden ball she made much more noise than Margie did with her dolls. But, for several reasons, Grandma Nicholson was very wise in deciding as she did.

Margie had two faults which her grandma wanted to see her overcome—she was too shy and timid, and she was not very fond of hard work. When I tell you this you will not be surprised to hear that Margie did not very much like the idea of being sent to school.

Almost every night for some time after she came to Redfield the little girl complained of "such a lump in her throat" when sent to bed, and the trouble was often so serious that grandma would lie down beside her to comfort her, although grandpa laughed at her for indulging the child in such a way.

So when Margie heard about the school plan she looked very sober, and presently said: "Grandma, I'm afraid I shall have a lump in my throat if I go to school—I know I shall!"

Grandma laughed, and said:

"Well, dearie, shall you want me to come and sit by you to cure it? How I would look with my cap and spectacles among Miss Phoebe's scholars! You must not mind if the lump comes, dear. Just be brave, and it will soon go away."

Margie sighed, though she was forced to smile at the idea of her grandma being one of the scholars.

"Shall I have to learn long, hard lessons, grandma?" she asked.

Debby?" she asked, and Margie liked the idea very much.

Aunt Debby was grandma's sister, and lived with her; she was a good deal older than Grandma Nicholson; but she was very fond of "the childie," as she called Margie.

When grandma set up the garter, and began it, Margie laughed: "Oh, that is such a little piece to knit across! why, I can do that all to-day, I guess!"

"No dear: for you will have to knit across a good many times; but if you knit a piece every day, as I shall want you to do, you will soon finish the pair."

Margie began very zealously, but she soon found that it was something like work. She came to grandma several times, saying: "Please knit across once, to make it easy for me!" And before her own little fingers had carried the thread across more than half a dozen times she was ready to put it away for another day.

The next day grandma had to remind her of it, and the next; and not only remind her, but insist upon the work being done, for Margie was quite tired of it, and wanted to throw it aside.

One morning grandma said: "Now dearie, I want you to be really industrious, and do a good piece on your knitting. See! I want you to make it reach across the end of the lounge before dinner. My little girl must not be so idle!"

So Margie knitted two or three times across; then she stopped to measure her work on the end of the lounge. She did a good deal more measuring than knitting; and she stretched and pulled the poor garter to make it reach across, and sighed deeply when obliged to take up her needles again.

Grandma was very grave about it; and when dinner was ready she told Margie she must not come to the table until she had finished her stint.

Margie cried, but grandma was firm. So at last the little girl went to work in earnest, and then she very soon exclaimed: "It reaches now, grandma! It really does!"

Margie cried, but grandma was firm. So at last the little girl went to work in earnest, and then she very soon exclaimed: "It reaches now, grandma! It really does!"

"AS SHE SAT WAITING A VERY UNEASY FEELING CAME OVER HER.

When the first day of school arrived, amid all her troubled thoughts Margie was very glad of one thing: that Ernest was one of the scholars. Ernest had begun going just a week before, and he felt quite like an old scholar. So he promised to stop for Margie that morning, and he did.

"Why, Margie, you needn't be afraid!" he said, consoling. "Miss Phoebe isn't cross a bit—not ever! It's real nice at school!"

Margie soon concluded that Ernest was right. To be sure the tears came to her eyes, and a little lump in her throat, when Miss Phoebe began to ask her questions to find out how far she had got on in her studies; but the questions were put so pleasantly that the bad feelings soon passed off.

The lessons, too, were very easy that first week; but by the end of that time Miss Phoebe found out that Margie had a quick bright mind, if she chose to use it, and she began to put her forward a little.

But, alas! Every lesson which required any real effort caused so many sighs and tears and distressing "lumps," that if Miss Phoebe had not been a very faithful teacher she would have been glad to put the child back into the baby class and let her stay there.

One thing which Miss Phoebe wished Margie to do was to use her slate in learning arithmetic. Margie was very quick in answering questions and learning tables, but to do sums on her slate she was sure would be dreadfully hard. Only to think how the big boys and girls puzzled and frowned over their slates!

"But my dear," said Miss Phoebe, when Margie tearfully spoke of this, "I don't expect you to do the same lessons as the older class. You can easily do what I want you to if you will listen to me, and try!"

I don't know but Margie's tears would have blotted out her first attempts if Ernest and Susie Mott had not been waiting to begin with her, and they were both so well pleased and eager to try that they made her feel a little ashamed. So she tried, and to her surprise got on very well that day.

But, as one might guess, indolent little Margie was often in trouble over her slate.

One day Miss Phoebe had promised her children a ride into the woods after school. She had engaged Ben Brown to come for them with his big four-horse wagon, and school was to be dismissed an hour earlier than usual.

The children were delighted, and buzzed away at their lessons like so many bees, to get through in time. But Margie's anticipation of the treat only made her more impatient with her stupid sum, and she sighed over it very dismally. At last a good-natured thoughtless girl, who sat near her, beckoned to Margie to hand her the slate.

"I'll show you," she whispered, and quickly set down the answer, nodding cheerfully as she passed it back.

Margie felt greatly relieved, and turned round on her seat, holding the slate ready to show Miss Phoebe. But as she sat waiting for her teacher to be at leisure, a very uneasy feeling came over her. Was not this naughty? Was she going to deceive her teacher, and act a lie?

When at last Miss Phoebe's class had finished she turned and held out her hand for Margie's slate, saying very kindly: "Well, my dear?"

A very large lump swelled in Margie's throat, and she was silent a moment; but in her heart she asked the Lord to help her to be truthful.

"It's done teacher—but somebody did it for me!" she said.

Miss Phoebe looked glad, and drew the child towards her and kissed her.

"I am glad you told me," she answered. "And now, Margie, if you are to go with us after school, you must do another sum, without any help: will you try?"

"Yes ma'am," Margie said, very humbly and gratefully, for she felt that she hardly deserved to go at all. But she did try faithfully. The sum was soon done, and a very happy little girl nestled close by Miss Phoebe's side on the wagon seat.

PREPARING CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

Now is the time when thoughtful people begin to prepare for the holidays.

"It not the amount a gift costs in money which makes it beautiful and valuable. It is the loving thought of which it speaks which constitutes its claim to our regard. If you really wish to show your family and acquaintances that you love and would like to please them, you will suit your gifts thoughtfully to each of them, studying their necessities and tastes. You will not give grandma a gay neck ribbon, and Angie a pair of spectacles, nor present the cook with a volume of Tennyson, and brother Theodore with a pair of slippers, when he already has three pairs not worn out.

"Gifts which little fingers themselves make are always especially prized by mamma and aunts. There is a great deal of fun and pleasure in preparing for Christmas, and half of it comes from the difficulty of making peoples' presents when the people are always popping in at the wrong moment. Let me suggest two or three pretty things which the girls may make without much trouble and with little expense.

"A chintz bag to contain the weekly stockings until they are mended is a gift to be prized by a busy mother. Let it be of any size you please, and gather it on either side to a square of pasteboard, the corners rounded a little at the lower edge. These squares must be covered, and on one of them may be gathered a little outside bag to hold darning cottons and thimbles, while the other must have some bits of gay flannel attached for a needle-book.

"A set of table napkins may be worked with a tiny design in each corner. Beautiful hair-receivers are made of tiny Japanese parasols, opened half way, and looped up with ribbon. A baby's rattle may be easily made. Set up twenty-four stitches with scarlet single zephyr, knit across plain twenty-two times, bind off, and leave an end long enough to sew up the sides. Run strong thread through every stitch on one end, draw up tightly, and fasten; then stuff it with cotton, and when nearly full put in a twisted cord. Then make two more pieces of other colors, stuff in the same way, and fasten little bells to each, attaching all three to a rubber ring.

"The little fan-shaped shells which are gathered on the beach in summer make lovely emery needle-cushions. Stuff the cushion with emery sand, and glue it fast to the shells, the large rounding ends apart. Tie with a loop of narrow satin ribbon.

"A very beautiful afghan for grandpa can be made without much labor if the whole family will join in knitting it. Take Germantown wool; you will need six banks of black, three of white, three of pink, three of blue, and three of yellow. Set up fifty stitches for each strip, and make the strips each a yard and a half long. Crochet together with black, and finish with a deep fringe.

"A small photograph on an easel, a growing plant, an album filled with stamps, a handkerchief case made of crocheted worsted over silesia or muslin, a scrap-book filled with selections—any little thing, in fact, which says, 'I love you,' is a fit and graceful Christmas gift."—Harper's Young People.

ART.

E. P. DETTON & Co. are offering some photographic copies of celebrated old pictures, which are very attractive.

A Boston young woman, Miss Caroline W. Hall, recently took the second prize in oil painting in the Academy of Fine Arts at Milan, Italy.

THE choir of St. John's chapel, under the direction of Mr. Le Jeune, has the honor of inaugurating the monthly "solemn music," as Milton has it, for the season. The success of this movement, which began with the same director, choir and chapel, perhaps four years ago, is not readily estimated; for it has, long ago, overthrown its parochial bounds and made itself felt far and wide, until dozens of city churches and congregations of other beliefs have, per force, fallen into line in this musical mission, which seeks and attempts to hold the masses within religious influences at least on the Lord's Day.

It is common enough now to read announcements of similar services placarded on different church porticoes, especially where the pulpit fails in stirring the masses, and these may legitimately be counted in as offspring of the St. John's and St. Chrysostom monthlies. It is true some such pious art is demanded of the Church if she is to resist successfully the insidious fascinations of Sunday evening secular amusements. For the Sunday concert, afternoon and evening, has made a root-hold in New York which will gain strength year by year. The foreign, Hebrew and openly irreligious elements in our vast population is the congenial soil which provides sustenance, while there is a painful weakening in the religious community in favor of an easier and less stringent interpretation of Sunday duty. The Sunday park concerts given every summer, have accelerated this tendency, and people, not a few, who by no means throw aside their allegiance to the churches, may be found taking their pleasure in those Sunday evening resorts.

The churches, therefore, in self protection, are pressed into the exercise of their best musical art. On Sunday last there were three or four choral or musical services announced for afternoon and evening in different churches and denominations, and the number and attractiveness is likely to increase.

The evening was discouraging, yet the accustomed multitude filled every sitting before the opening of the service. The choir was somewhat re-inforced, as is usual on these occasions. The professional was, "Hark! Hark! My Soul!" with a new setting by Mr. Le Jeune. It is easy and fluent in rhythm, rich in harmonic color, and kindled with the writer's felicitous melody. It seemed to float into the church without accompaniment, until the choir were well gathered in the chancel, where the organ found them in perfect pitch, an achievement beyond the ability of many thoroughly trained choirs. The concerted opening of Evensong, Rev. Mr. Cook, precentor, to Mr. Le Jeune's family setting, seemed especially reverent in quality, and was delivered with delicacy and fervor, the voices, unaccompanied, rendering the refined and subtle harmonies with seemingly spontaneous and unconscious ease and purity of tone.

The psalm Laudate Dominum was chanted antiphonally by choir and congregation to an Anglicized Gregorian in quality of genuine heartiness. The Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, by Mann, with the lovely past passages and resonant unisons, although generally known, came out with singular freshness, deserving the fine intelligence and exquisite tonality of the choir. Indeed, the old maxim ars est celare artem is illustrated in the culture of this choir, with whom perfect intonation and faultless delivery have become an intuition or second nature.

The selection of an entire oratorio, "The Creation," for an anthem, seemed a stretch of audacity for any church choir. Barring the single accident of its inordinate length, however, the interest was sustained, and indeed cumulative to the final Hallelujah. The recitatives and arias were admirably sung, Dr. Martin taking the part of Raphael, Mr. Mockridge as Uriel, while the long role of Gabriel was divided between two choir boys, soloists, who gave the ornate and exacting airs, the marvellous works, "With Verdure Clad," and "On Mighty Pans," with the ripe grace and technical elegance of professional artists. The last, especially, one of the most trying of all the great Haydn songs, would at another time and place be welcomed with storms of applause.

In the delightful trio-chorus numbers the same high artistic traits were noticeable; these lads hardly in their teens fairly holding their own with the tenor and bass. In the choruses, and particularly the last, "Achieved is the Glorious Work," there was the volume and impressiveness of a hundred voices.

After a few effective remarks by Dr. Weston, who enters into these occasions with characteristic enthusiasm, the choir and congregation sang "Abide With Me," as it is sung nowhere else, and with the recessional, "Daily, Daily, Sing the Praises," the first "monthly" in this dear old church came to a rapturous conclusion.

For the first Sunday evening in November the anthem is Weber's "Harvest Festival Cantata."

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1885.

The original Committee on the Mission for New York City was appointed June 4, 1883, and the same day this committee decided that the great prerequisite of a mission was the preparation of the clergy. It was conceded that due preparation consisted in more than one thing; but, while this fact was freely recognized, it was unanimously held that the main thing required was an accession of spiritual power. Hence it was resolved to observe a series of "Quiet Days," otherwise known as a "Retreat," before entering upon the actual work of the mission. The "Retreat"—for the word is now divested of a certain something with which at first it stood connected—was held at Garrison's, in the Highlands, during three days of the week just passed, the occasion proving a memorable one, and indicating the opening of a new epoch in Church life. Those who have had a practical experience of the Diocese of New York during the last twenty-five years will appreciate very fully the deep significance of this event. Old things have passed away, and men of widely different theological views are now able, and even glad, to associate themselves together with such a common object in view as the quickening and deepening of spiritual life. It was a large and representative assembly. The scene in the little church where the exercises took place was every way remarkable. The burning bush, glowing here and there on the hill-sides, amidst the rich autumnal foliage, was simply a type of that heavenly flame which, as the days wore on, shone with an increasing beauty and radiance in the midst of that throng of priests. Men felt that it was good to be there. Partly lines faded out. Differences were reconciled. Hearts, once estranged, were touched by the fire of divine love and fused into one. But this is not all. Neglected truths essential to a successful ministry were recognized and rescued from the desuetude into which they were in danger of falling, and men of different schools of thought saw how much all held in common. In a word, a work was done that can never be undone, and in the future the great body of our clergy will hardly feel satisfied without a series of Quiet Days every year.

The investigation of the Excise Department of New York City, which a committee of the State Senate has lately been carrying on, has brought to light a state of affairs which deserves to be seriously pondered. It is not merely that the Excise Board appears to have granted licenses to persons of the worst character, and for places which are the habitual resorts of the criminal classes; but it is the fact that for the doing of this knowingly there are advocates and apologists among those whose duty it is to administer and enforce the laws, which demands to be now considered. Whether the traffic in intoxicating liquors ought to be licensed at all is a question sufficiently grave. Large numbers of thoughtful people find it impossible to approve of such sanction. And though there is no doubt that a still larger number of people, no less thoughtful and conscientious, believe that a well considered and thoroughly administered license system is the best method of controlling and lessening drunkenness and its attending evils, yet the only ground on which they can base their contention is that under such a system licenses will not be granted either to profligate people, or for disreputable places. When it is seriously argued that no discrimination against such should be made, because licensed vice and wickedness are better than unlicensed vice and wickedness, it is easy to see that the whole case in favor of the existing excise law is abandoned. The policy, moreover, of licensing places of resort, where the vicious and dangerous may congregate and ply their trade, for the purpose of getting them off the streets and placing them under certain supervision, cannot be justified under any theory of the persistence of evil. Such meeting-places are just what the vicious most desiderate; and when the authorities legalize or wink at the opportunities that are thus afforded to the wicked, they are already committed to an allowance of the evil consequences, and are responsible for them.

The large and enthusiastic audiences which attended the sessions of the American Board of Foreign Missions in Boston last week were a welcome evidence that interest in Christian work is not declining in busy American life. The success of this annual meeting of the Congregationalists was no doubt enhanced by the circumstance that it was held in Boston, the historical headquarters of Independence, and where modernized and secularized Puritanism is still a well entrenched power, spite of the inroads of Unitarianism and the still more remarkable growth of the Church. In Boston, moreover, there are excellent facilities for the accession of great crowds of people from the neighboring regions, and for the easy handling of them when they arrive. Indeed, there are few cities in the world where the conveniences of travel and entertainment are better organized and administered, and where the visitor or sojourner finds himself more thoroughly comfortable than in Boston. The success, which is evidenced by large and characteristic audiences, was a thing easily attainable, therefore, provided a sufficient motive were supplied; and it is only fair to believe, as we do, that the motive in this case was a genuine interest in the aggressive work of Christianity in foreign lands. No doubt that interest has been kept alive in the past, and at the Boston meeting was further fostered and ministered to, in the exceedingly interesting reports of the foreign work, made in many cases by the missionaries themselves. Nothing could have been more admirable, apparently, than the programme of subjects and speakers, and the whole management of the meeting. It is not impossible that an intelligent study of the methods of the American Board meetings might be of benefit to our own work. Beyond all question such annual gatherings for the consideration of missionary interests, for the discussion of methods, for gathering up and diffusing missionary intelligence, and arousing enthusiasm for missionary work, are most useful to the Congregationalists, and would be most helpful to us.

It remains true, however, even after the Boston meeting of the American Board, that nothing in this world has ever been as perfect as one would wish to have it. One distinguished Congregationalist there was at least who publicly arraigned the Board's financial and other management, and who declined to be appeased in advance by the prospective interchange of amenities between the Prudential Committee and the secretaries, and the secretaries and the Prudential Committee. Of the causes which led him to make this impeachment, or the motives which controlled it, we of course are ignorant. What private griefs, if any, the distinguished complainant had we know not. We only note the fact and the publicity of the whole proceeding, in order to say that when grievances are had it is much better that they should be publicly stated and exhaustively investigated, if worthy of notice, than that they should be silently or secretly cherished. Half the grievances in things ecclesiastical and civil would perish if resolutely brought to light, and a large proportion of the remainder would shrivel into insignificance or become otherwise unlovely even to their possessors in the mere act of making them public. For the rest, all real evils can in no wise be so well corrected or removed as by a frank statement of them at the proper time and before the proper tribunal in the most public way.

It is reported from Washington that an official communication has been received by the Secretary of State from the United States Consul at Canton, complaining of the persecution of Christians in China, and asking that some provision be made by the Western powers for their protection. The catalogue of offenses includes the robbing and destruction of chapels, beating, hacking and boycotting of native Christians, and the refusal of the authorities to punish the offenders, to protect the Christians, or to take measures to secure restitution. It is much to be hoped that something may be done to enforce treaty stipulations, at least, and extend due protection to the persons and the work of the brave missionaries who are laboring in that heathen land. But while this is being done it might be well for our authorities at home to set a good example to the heathen, and prevent such persecution of Chinamen as has lately been going on in this Christian land. It is possible that our government is justified in not allowing large numbers of the Chinese to come to these shores. But those who are here ought to be treated with fairness and justice, to say the least; and until they are, we need not be greatly surprised if our people are persecuted in China.

The persistence and malignancy of Mormonism have had a fresh illustration in the perversion to that superstition of a number of Methodists and Presbyterians in Illinois. It is reported that eight adults and four children, people of respectable standing, and in comfortable circumstances, recently left Bridgeport, in that State, for Payson, Utah, to become active members of the Mormon Church. Two of them, we are told, are young women; and it is further said that the females among the perverts were the most stringent advocates of polygamy. These people were converted and baptized last spring by Mormon missionaries, who have been very active of late in that region. Such a perversion in an intelligent community, and of people who have hitherto been under the care of the Methodist and Presbyterian bodies, is calculated to set us thinking; and while we are thinking it may not be amiss for us to be reminded that Illinois is not the only State by a good many where such things are going on. Christianity is at this moment in sharp conflict with Mormonism, through the press and on the platform, in more than one community where the school-master has been long at work, and in States a long way east of the Mississippi. In one region, where it more than held its own a few years ago, it has been driven to the wall by the Church's quiet and elevating influence; but before the Church entered the field it had not been worsted or at all discouraged by polemical controversy. Beyond all doubt the Mormon question demands something more than the attention of politicians, and craves a treatment more serious and more profound than has yet been accorded to it.

In a certain parish in the vigorous Diocese of Massachusetts, a prominent member of the vestry has been doing a series of good deeds that may well stimulate others to like activity.

He had always been a generous helper, but realizing that he was growing old he made provision in his will whereby the parish was to receive something from his estate after his death. But it occurred to him that he might as well use his money now for the parish and be his own executor, so the first of his benefactions was a chime of bells, then came the complete decoration of the interior of the church edifice at his expense, and now, only a few days ago, he informed the parish that he had purchased a rectory.

May there be many more like him to do good while they have time.

Bismarck's leading of the pope into the position of a mediator is the most telling blow lately given to the papal pretensions to the temporal power. No greater kindness could have been done to Italy. It will help immensely that small, but honest and enlightened, party in the Roman Church who believe that moral, and not material, power should be the great aim of the Church. Accepting this mediation, the pope cannot much longer keep up the farce of playing "prisoner in the Vatican." It is a question yet whether the pope has fallen in consciously with a scheme of the great German statesman looking to a yielding up of his claims as a civil ruler, or whether he has unwittingly swallowed a glittering bait, which may land the Vatican party high and dry. The idea of being recognized by the greatest Protestant power of Europe as a mediator is, of course, most captivating to a pope who dreams of making the papacy again the arbiter of the world, and this in any case has led him to place himself in an exceedingly difficult position. The object of the dispute between Germany and Spain is really of no value worth caring for. But Bismarck may choose to account it as of great importance, and the Spanish populace is wildly excited with the feeling that the Spanish honor is at stake. But Leo XIII. is very clever, and a consummate strategist, if not a profound statesman, and may find some way to escape the danger of offending the German chancellor or alienating the Spanish populace.

At a meeting of the United States Naval Institute at Annapolis, the other day, there was discussed a recent paper of Lieut. Danenhower, on "North Polar Researches," in which, after advancing the opinion that there is no continent of land but only a few undiscovered islands in the North Polar Basin, he goes on to say that the scientific knowledge yet to be obtained by polar adventure is not worth the loss of life and treasure that will be required for future expeditions. Undoubtedly Lieut. Danenhower has earned the right to hold and advance even this pessimistic and discouraging opinion; and it is not to be wondered at that other naval officers who have ventured less did not quarrel with his conclusions. One officer there was, however, who, if he has not adventured more has certainly suffered more; and in virtue of this, no one can deny the force of Lieut. Greely's rejoinder to Lieut. Danenhower. The former contended for the immense advantage to the navy itself of North Polar expeditions of research and discovery, in cultivating those qualities of courageous seamanship, indomitable energy, and prudent daring on which the highest efficiency of the service must depend. Certainly there is much to be said for the view which the gallant Arctic explorer urges. More, perhaps, might be said of the necessity to a nation's greatness of those impulses and aspirations towards the undiscovered and unattained which continually urge men to assail whatever difficulties confront them, and that, too, not so much for the sake of the result, as for the gaudium certaminis, and the joy of triumph over obstacles. When there shall no longer be men of this race of ours who eagerly desire to go to the North Pole, and willingly fare thitherward as far as they can, then indeed we may bid farewell to all our greatness. The decay of the race will have begun.

Lord Lansdowne, the Canadian Viceroy, has been making a progress into British Columbia, and, after the manner of his country and his kind, has been making a significant political utterance in the form of an after-dinner speech in that very distant quarter of the Dominion. After an appropriate reference to the milder climate and better weather of that occidental region, he proceeded to discuss at great length the relation of the colonies to the mother country. In taking strong ground in favor of maintaining the existing colonial system, and in opposition to what has come to be known as Imperial Federation, his Lordship spoke more as a Canadian, apparently, than as an Englishman. The chief grounds of his contention were the impossibility of formulating and maintaining a financial system that would be suited to the various requirements of peoples so widely scattered; the hardship of imposing upon all the colonies alike the necessity of maintaining and upholding the same treaty obligations; and the impracticability of an imperial organization for the common defense. The ground of remoteness and separation, however, upon which the Governor-General based his argument, had a curious refutation in the fact that within an hour after his words were uttered, they were read in London, and were replied to in the English papers of the next day. The telegraph and steam-engine have eliminated mere distance from the problem which his Lordship has been considering; while the other causes of diversity and separateness have been almost equally removed by the movements of commerce and the distributions of trade. It may be now said that far-off British Columbia is really nearer to London than Limerick was when the Governor-General was born; and that there is really less diversity of thought and interest between the farmers of Kent and the settlers of the Pacific coast than there is even now between the crofters of Skye and the yeomen of Devon.

It is a remarkable illustration of the way in which philosophy usually opens the path for all new movements in politics, and men of thought clear the way for men of action, that it was a Cambridge professor, speaking in his lecture-room and in the line of his professional work, who first gave shape and form to what may now be called the imperial policy of England. In a remarkable course of lectures delivered some years ago, the Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge discussed in a masterly way the great question of holding the English colonies together, and with the instinct of a genuine statesman pointed out the only course by which the disintegration of "Greater Britain" could be prevented. This initiative of Professor Seeley has been followed up with increasing insistence by various writers and statesmen, notably by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Forster in an able paper in the Nineteenth Century. All these contend with much favor for the virtual or formal federation of the colonial dependencies of the English crown and nation, and point out the vitality of some of the bonds which unite them all to the mother land. There are yet other bonds, however, the strength of which is hardly realized by any thinkers or writers in England; and they are the bonds of a common speech, furnishing by means of its literature, a common mould for the thoughts of men; and a common religion, by which there is enforced throughout the English-speaking world a common measure and standard of duty. The inviolability of these bonds is discoverable in the fact that English-speaking men, the world over, commonly refuse to learn any other speech than their own, and so impose their language with its modes of thought, upon all other peoples with whom they are in contact; and in the further fact that the same English-speaking races wherever distributed, cling with great pertinacity or revert with unerring certainty, to the typical religion of the race, which is that religion of conscience and duty, at once reverent and free, which has been known in the world ever since the See of Canterbury was fixed, as Anglo-Saxon Christianity.

The project of founding a national university at Washington, which was proposed by the recent Roman Catholic Plenary Council at Baltimore, has taken definite form, and will, doubtless, be carried forward with vigor. It is announced that sixty-five acres of land have been secured as a site, at the head of Lincoln Avenue, Washington, directly opposite the eastern gate of the Soldiers' Home; and that work on the buildings will be begun as soon as the architect can prepare acceptable plans. No doubt the enterprise will be made as conspicuous as may be, and will challenge notice in all practicable ways. And, indeed, it is not to be regretted that this significant and monumental undertaking should secure the largest possible amount of publicity. The policy which it stands for should be kept constantly in the view of the American people. It is well that we should never be allowed to forget that Rome will be satisfied with nothing less than the absolute control of the whole educational system of the country; and the ostentatiousness of this enterprise is simply an outward sign of the arrogance of Roman pretensions, which will not be misunderstood. Nor need we fear the result of the competition with more enlightened institutions which is thus conspicuously inaugurated. Just as Roman Catholic countries cannot keep pace with Protestant countries in the vigorous and beneficent progress of civilization, so it has been found, and will continue to be seen that the men of this land who are trained under the influence of Roman Catholic traditions, are at a disadvantage which is precisely commensurate with the extent and reality of that influence. Just in so far, therefore, as the education to be furnished by this Roman Catholic University shall be pervaded by the spirit and favorable to the ascendancy of that alien communion, it will be found unequal to the competitions in which it must engage in our free American life; and we feel no regret that its pretensions and its failure should be as conspicuous as possible.

Not long ago a certain Mormon dignity, named "Bishop" Sharp, we believe, on being arraigned for polygamous practices in Utah, under the Edmunds Law, pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the mercy of the court, proclaiming his respect for the law of the land, and promising to observe its requirements in the future. From the account that was given, the judge and the prosecuting officer were so moved by this unprecedented and amiable condescension, that the penalty of imprisonment was altogether remitted, as much of the pecuniary fine as possible was forgiven, and the complainant "saint" was dismissed with something like a blessing. It is true that he was careful to explain that his plea of guilty and his promise of obedience did not imply any change of moral or religious conviction on his part. His submission was too welcome and too graceful to be coldly criticised, and it was fondly hoped that his gracious example would be widely followed. Such hopes, however, have already been completely dashed. The next batch of offenders who were arraigned at the same bar, turned out to be as defiant and truculent a lot as the authorities have yet had to deal with, and it was found necessary to inflict the utmost penalty of the law. It is to be feared, however, that severity is likely to be but little more efficacious than clemency; for there is much evidence of a disposition to treat the last convicts as martyrs, and to glory in their constancy and their bonds. Indeed, it may be doubted whether any external or legal remedy alone, no matter how wisely and firmly applied, is going to be effective in dealing with Mormonism. Nor will it do to decri its power because of its contemptible origin and the despicable ignorance and superstition upon which it is based. Its strength lies in its condescension as a religion to one of the common infirmities of human nature, to the most insidious of all the weaknesses of the unregenerate heart. It was precisely this condescension to the natural depravity of man that made, and still makes, Mahometanism the most popular of all the religions that have ever confronted the pure and chaste religion of the Christ; and the same fanaticism that has always characterized the followers of Islam may be expected, when occasion serves, to arm the not less misguided "Latter Day Saints." Something more, therefore, than the enforcement of legislative enactments is going to be necessary in dealing with this most minatory evil. More than any other problem that has yet arisen in our history, it calls for profound metaphysical study. That the difficulties which it presents are to be overcome, and that this plague-spot on our civilization will be healed or exterminated, we do not for a moment doubt; but it will be by statesmanship of a more transcendent quality and transcendental kind than has yet been applied to its solution.

It is stated in the daily press that Mr. Herbert Gladstone has publicly declared, in an address, that his father is in favor of excluding the bishops from the House of Lords. It is difficult to believe that such a declaration could have been made, much less authorized. On a matter of such importance it is to be supposed that the distinguished leader of the Liberal party would prefer to make his own announcement to the country, and in his own way. It is more than likely, however, that it is even to this complexion that the ex-premier's thoughts must come at last, driven as he is by the exigencies of his party. It is simply one of the phases of the movement in favor of disestablishment, for which Mr. Gladstone's party is responsible, and which it is now too late for him to control. To remove the spiritual peers from the Upper House, moreover, would be in the nature of a concession to the fierce and growing opposition to the House of Lords, which is getting to be a menacing feature of the English political situation. The successful stand made by the peers in favor of the submission of the plan for the distribution of seats by the late government, before they would approve of the extension of the franchise, has raised the question as to whether popular government can tolerate such obstruction by a branch of the legislature that is in no degree amenable to the will of the people. Added to this is the irritation caused in certain quarters by the stand which the bishops have occasionally ventured to make on such questions as the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill. If it should be true that the exclusion of the bishops from the Upper House is to be a part of the Liberal programme, it will not be the first time that the spoliation or humiliation of the Church has been made a Liberal tub to the Radical whale.

That some reform of the House of Lords is necessary in order to save it from being abolished, seems to be conceded by thoughtful men of all parties in England. It is interesting to note, however, that the removal of the bishops from that House would be not in accordance with, but in direct opposition to, the movement of reform that is most commended. In a thoughtful paper recently published, the Earl of Pembroke urges with much force the plan of largely increasing the number of peers for life only, such as the bishops are, and in this way introducing a salutary check upon the influence and power of the hereditary peers. For this purpose he would give all the judges of the higher courts, and representative men of letters and science, seats for life in the House of Lords; and he points out with much acuteness that the presence of such a body of men would not only add a much needed element of strength to the Upper House, but would give the commonality of England an interest in it, and a pride in its influence, such as would be the best guarantee of its preservation. In this connection it is to be noted that at present the bishops are almost the only peers who are the representatives of popular government in the House of Lords; since it is the prime minister of the government, who is himself the creature and the minister of the popular will, who places the bishops in the chamber of peers. To remove them, therefore, would be to eliminate the only really popular element from that House, and to surrender a coordinate branch of the legislature entirely to the control of the hereditary nobility of the realm. It is quite clear, even on the grounds that are here considered, that the exclusion of the spiritual peers from the House of Lords would be a movement towards despotism instead of away from it.

Archdeacon Paley, in one of his charges, gently insinuated that, though he did not like to interfere with the social enjoyments of his clergy, he did not think it looked well that the parson of the parish should "lounge about the door of a public house with a pipe in his mouth." If this was the "former state of the clergy," let us be thankful that it is not the latter, and that year by year the Church may, with increasing pride, point to a body of men whose influence will compare as favorably with that of any other body, as she herself may in the zeal and energy with which she addresses herself to all the living questions, whether religious or only partly so, of the day.

"Conscience, guided by intelligence," thought the late Bishop Lay, "defers gladly to all religious authority." This was the bishop's idea of what he termed "intellectual humility." And he not only advocated this, but practised that which he taught. Loyal to the Church at once religiously and intellectually, he was, at the same time, and conscientiously, an exponent of the humility which he inculcated. His humbleness thus was at once a mental and a Christian grace. He had no pride of intellect, while he was endowed with an intellectualness of which any one might be proud. His was "conscience guided by intelligence;" and right gladly did he ever defer to all due "religious authority." Loyalty, humility, and intelligence were exemplified in his teaching and in his public and private life.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.*

Deuteronomy.

II.

Those who deny the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy allege that it contains so many differences from the other books of the Pentateuch, that it is impossible to refer them to a common author. The most important of such alleged discrepancies will now be considered.

Num. xxxv. compared with Deut. xix. has been mentioned as a good example of the fundamental difference in legal style between the two codes. In the former chapter the asylums are called "cities of refuge," and the homicide is described as one who "killeth any person at unawares," while in the latter the asylums are referred to as cities to which "every slayer may flee" who had killed "his neighbor ignorantly." A child can see that these differences are merely verbal, and do not constitute a discrepancy. In Numbers, the laws in question are given at great length, in Deuteronomy, they are only briefly named, and this fact surely is sufficient to explain why the detailed provisions of the former are not rehearsed in a popular and recapitulatory charge. May not the author of any work dwell on a matter he has in hand with great fulness in one part of his work, and refer to it cursorily in another? Is his authorship to be questioned because he fails to repeat verbatim his former statement? This is an exact statement of the alleged discrepancy. The objection is not only puerile, but absurd.

The spies, according to Num. xiii. 1, 3, were sent by Divine command, while in Deut. i. 22 sq. the measure originated with the people. This is not a discrepancy, but an additional feature.

The comparison of Num. xx. 12 and xxvii. 14 with Deut. i. 37, iii. 26, iv. 21 harmonizes the apparent difference, for the rebelliousness of the people was doubtless the cause of that of Moses, and of his want of faith.

The alleged discrepancy between the precept that sacrifices shall be offered only in one place, Deut. xii. 5, and that a plurality of sanctuaries is contemplated in Ex. xx. 24, 25, xxii. 30, rests on a misunderstanding of the last-named places, in which provision is made only for the establishment of worship at different stages of the journey through the wilderness, not for the simultaneous existence of rival sanctuaries.

Comparison of Num. xviii. 20-32 with Deut. xiv. 22-29, reduces the alleged discrepancy to the supplemental enactment of the second tithe, which undiscerning critics have confounded with the abrogation of the first legislation on the subject.

The alleged contradiction of Num. xviii. 15-18 and Deut. xii. 17, 18, is disposed of by the fact that the former passage no more appropriates the whole of the firstlings to the priests than that the latter prescribes its entire consumption by the people.

The designation of the priests as the "sons of Aaron," in the earlier books of the Pentateuch, and as "Levites," or "sons of Levi," in Deuteronomy, has been instanced as proof that this book is the product of a post-Mosaic period; but while the former designation was strictly accurate as long as the priesthood was restricted to his family, its accuracy ceased after the whole tribe, to which the family of Aaron belonged, had been consecrated to the priesthood, and the later designations were more correct expressions. The functions of the several orders of the priesthood having been minutely described in the earlier portions of the Pentateuch, their repetition was superfluous in the Book of Deuteronomy, which, nevertheless, clearly recognizes the distinction of priest and Levite, ch. xviii. 1. It may be added that the apparent confusion of terms is due to the congenitally and incurably, or the voluntarily and intentionally confused perception of the critics rather than to the language of the Book of Deuteronomy, and that the author of the whole Pentateuch would feel perfectly at liberty to use general terms and introduce bare allusions, which a literary forger would have carefully avoided.

It is argued also that the phrase "beyond the Jordan," ch. i. 1, 3, must have been written by one on the west side of that river, and therefore after the death of Moses; but that phrase was the current geographical name of the district, and the argument is as convincing as that a person writing in Louisiana of South Carolina must be at a point north of the latter State, and posthumous to himself.

Deut. ii. 12, the words, "Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them," are cited in proof that they must have been written after the days of Moses, but as they do not necessarily relate to Canaan, (for we may restrict them to the district already held by the two and a half tribes, cf. iii. 18, 20,) the objection lacks point and force. Some regard the passage and certain others in this chapter (cf. 10-12, 20-23, 34) as interpolations. This might be admitted without prejudice to the remainder of the book.

The objection urged against ch. xxiii. 12, 13, is set aside by the indubitable fact that the enactment is a sanitary regulation relating to military camps. The prohibition, ch. xvi. 2, "Neither shalt thou set thee up any image which the Lord thy God hateth," is referred to as one of the clearest proofs that Deuteronomy was unknown till long after the days of Moses. How could Joshua, if he had known such a law, have erected a mappeba, or sacred pillar of unhewn stone, under the sacred tree by the sanctuary at Schechem? * Mappebas, it is alleged, were set up in spite of the prohibition, and Josh. xxiv. 26, I. Sam. vi. 14, vii. 12, II. Sam. xx. 8, I. Kings 19, vii. 21, and Hos. iii. 4 are cited in proof of the allegation. Examination shows that in all these passages, except the last, the word mappeba is not used, the reference being simply to stones of monumental, not of idolatrous significance. The passage in Hosea is irrelevant, for it alludes to the well-known historical fact that idolatrous usages had been in Israel, but that did not make them lawful.

The nature of these objections, the want of scholarship they reveal, and their general irrelevancy or exaggeration cannot upset the strong argument in favor of the Mosaic origin of the Book of Deuteronomy.

We have still to answer the question whether the whole book, as it stands in the Bible, is the work of Moses. Ch. xxxiii., containing the account of his death and burial, of course must, and is admitted to have been written by one who had survived him. The other parts designated as interpolations are: ch. i. 1-5; ii. 10-12, 20-23; iv. 41-43; xxiii. 1-43; and xxxiii. 1-29.

Ch. i. 1-5 not only do not contain anything to warrant the conclusion that they were not written by him, but are just such a title and introduction which a writer like Moses would have composed.

The ethnographical notices in ch. ii. may be due to a later hand, but as there are really cogent reasons for their introduction by Moses, which a subsequent editor could not have had, their Mosaic origin may be maintained, although their surrender would not touch the integrity of our book.

There is no good reason for treating ch. iv. 41-43 as an interpolation, but an excellent one for considering the passage as written by Moses. It stands between the first and second addresses, and the employment of the pause for the separation of the cities of refuge in the newly-acquired district east of Jordan was an impressive example of scrupulous care in the observance of a divine injunction (see Num. xxxv. 6, 14), which the wise legislator set for their imitation.

The Song of Moses, ch. xxxii., cannot be surrendered as a non-Mosaic composition: it is animated through and through with the mind and heart of Moses, who here rises from the dry details of historical notices and legal forms to the impassioned strains of sublime poetry. While this song does not contain anything inconsistent with the language and thought of the rest of the book, many coincidences in both respects supply strong proof that the book and the song were written by the same author.*

It is also proper to refer here to the coincidences between this ode and Ps. xc. (compare Deut. xxxii. 7, 18, 36 with Ps. xc. 1, 13, 15, 16), and to remind the reader that that psalm is also attributed to Moses†.

The objections raised to the Mosaic authorship of the Blessing of Moses, ch. xxxiii., remain to be noticed. The Blessing and the Song appear to supplement each other; for while the latter dwells on the calamitous results of the fall of Israel, the Blessing expatiates on the happy results of their fidelity. Both are poetic and prophetic, and II, p. 3, says that the contents and diction of Ps. xc. are strictly Mosaic, and testify that this Psalm, the Song (Deut. xxxii.) and the Blessing (Deut. xxxiii.) are due to the same author.

* Robertson Smith I. c. p. 354. This rash writer further cites Is. xiv. 19: "In that day there shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord," in proof that "this law (Deut. vii. 29) was unknown to Isaiah, who attacks idolatry, but recognizes monoth and altar as the marks of the sanctuary of Jehovah." This is utterly irrelevant, for Isaiah speaks of a monumental pillar or terminal idol set up at the border of Egypt, and not of a pillar erected at the sanctuary of Jehovah. "Stone monuments to commemorate God's goodness or to mark signal events were repeatedly erected in post-Mosaic times. When this was done with no view to sacrifice or adoration, it was no violation of the Pentateuchal statute." (Professor W. H. Green on "Professor Robertson Smith on the Pentateuch," in "Presbyterian Review," vol. III., p. 148.)

marked by the same literary peculiarities. In these respects they stand or fall together. As to the subject matter of the Blessing, we may note that it meets every requirement of time and place, and exhibits a perfect consonance in thought and language not only with the Book of Deuteronomy, but with the entire Pentateuch. The correspondence of the Blessing of Moses to that of Jacob (Gen. xlix.) is striking, especially in its expansions and modifications.

The phrase "Moses, the man of God," which occurs in the title, may show that the Blessing was set down in writing by one charged with that duty, but cannot be regarded as evidence that it was uttered by another than Moses. We know that Moses "wrote" the Song (ch. xxxi. 21). The Blessing appears to have been dictated.

The topographical allusions in vv. 19, 23-25, urged as proofs of a post-Mosaic origin of the poem, appear to be perfectly compatible with the division of the land recorded in Num. xxxiv., and the general knowledge of the country which Moses must have acquired during his prolonged stay on its borders from intercourse with the inhabitants.

The alleged references to a monarchical form of government in v. 5, to an aspiration for a reunion of the nation after the secession of the ten tribes in v. 7, and to the Temple in v. 12, are due to misinterpretations of the text; for v. 5 does not refer to an earthly king, but to Jehovah; v. 7 advert to Judah as a tribe, and not to the kingdom of Judah, and v. 12 to Benjamin only. To interpret "to bring unto his people," v. 7, as "to bring back the tribes," and "he shall dwell between his shoulders," v. 12, as "to have the Temple within the territory of Benjamin," is to pervert the sense of Scripture and to insult the intelligence of Bible readers. The objections, however, are good examples of the arbitrary and harsh methods resorted to by skeptical writers to batter down the fair fabric of Holy Scripture.*

The Blessing then, the title excepted, must be claimed as the genuine utterance and farewell of Moses.

I claim the privilege of subjoining to the foregoing arguments, for which I am chiefly indebted to the labors of others, a strictly subjective testimony. In the preparation of an important literary work I had to transcribe with my own hand the entire Pentateuch, and to study it in the original as well as in some of the oldest and later versions.† This occupation, spread without intermission over many months, has induced a familiarity with the five books of Moses, which the constant reading at one time of large portions in print has only deepened. I give it as my conviction, at the conclusion of this exceptional labor, that the Pentateuch is a unit, that the hand, the mind, and the heart of Moses are reflected on almost every page, and that those who will peruse those books, say in five consecutive readings, unhampered by artificial arrangement, and without consulting a commentary, can hardly fail to reach the same conclusion. The language of the Pentateuch, the diversity of its contents as to topics and treatment, impress the thoughtful reader that he is under the spell of a master mind who commands his respect, when he narrates history, by his scrupulous and guarded statements, when he enacts laws, by the wisdom, equity, breadth and strength of their provisions, and when he speaks to the people, by the earnestness and warmth of his address, but when he rises to the lofty realms of inspired instruction he carries him away by the impassioned fervor of his oratory to the far distant past at the foot of Sinai, in the valley between Ebal and Gerizim, and in the plains of Moab, where he seems to hear the awan song and the farewell benediction of the dying Leader, Historian; Lawgiver, and Prophet, until his majestic form fades from his observation in the dim blue of lofty Nebo of the Pisgah range. If these five books are not the work of one man, and if that man is not Moses, all appeal to internal evidence as sustaining an unbroken chain of the most weighty external evidence of every other book must be abandoned, for both kinds of evidence are greater in the case of the Pentateuch than in any ancient writing which has descended to our time.

From the copious literature on the Book of Deuteronomy separately, or on the entire Pentateuch, the subjoined list will be found to represent every school of theological thought since the Reformation:

ENGLAND.

A CURIOUS SPEECH ON EPISCOPAL ELECTIONS.—From the report of the Salisbury Journal of the election of Canon Wordsworth as Bishop of Salisbury, it appears that the chancellor of the cathedral (Canon Swaine) in opening the proceedings, said: "My reverend brethren—in the absence of the dean, which we all regret, the duty of presiding over this chapter has devolved upon me, and with your permission I will make one or two brief remarks as to the object for which we meet. The first will be, that we are not met to choose a bishop, but to elect one already chosen; our part is to affirm that choice—to testify by our assent to it that the person chosen is, to the best of our belief, duly qualified, canonically ordained, a man of irreproachable moral character, and sound in the faith. For the impression which commonly prevails that we not only meet to choose a bishop—i. e., to go through the form of choosing one—but that we ask for divine guidance to direct us in our choice, there is absolutely no foundation whatever in the 'order of proceedings' which you hold in your hands. Again, not only is the action which we are about to take not an obsolete and unmeaning, and so worthless, form, but it is an integral part of the appointment of a bishop, as borne witness to by primitive times. I will not insist upon the point (which is not without interest) that the Prime Minister, by whom the choice is made, represents under our present constitution both the crown and the people; but, at any rate, our action now is the formal assent of the clergy, without which no election would be valid, on any conceivable theory. Once more, if we are met together to-day to assent to a choice, with regard to which only one feeling can exist, that of intense satisfaction and deep thankfulness, I need scarcely point out how this implies necessarily both the right and the duty of withholding our assent, when the required conditions of canonical ordination, blameless life, and soundness of belief are not fulfilled in the person chosen. I have only to add that I ask you to join with me in prayer for a blessing on the act we are about to perform, as well as on the person who shall ultimately be set over us as the bishop of this ancient see."

DISESTABLISHMENT IN THE COMING ELECTIONS.—The cause of disestablishment does not seem to be as popular as its advocates imagined. The Record's publication of a tabulated list of how candidates for Parliament stand on the question, has created some feeling which has made itself felt among the Liberal candidates. Already many whom the Record had classed as favorable to disestablishment are disavowing such views, and some who were classed as doubtful have come out against disestablishment. It is beginning to be believed that the open agitation will do the establishment more good than harm.

The Morning Post, speaking of the attacks on the Church, says that the "tide of assent is a little overrid itself. The detractors reckoned too hastily. They did not sufficiently allow for the results of actual experience. Much of their fierce invective has been answered by the workingmen themselves, who have spoken with no uncertain voice upon the subject. The most notable convert to postponement is Mr. Chamberlain. He was very hot in the cause at one time, but he has found out his mistake, so he now takes refuge in an abstraction. In theory he is against any Church establishment; therefore, necessarily, against the Established Church of England and Scotland; but in practice it is really a people's affair, and till the people speak he is not prepared to move. This is quite a change of front. But a few months ago he was all for lashing the people upon to the required pitch of eagerness, now he is for leaving them alone. Before, he was for leading them; now, he is for following. The resulting probability is that the Church is likely to have rest for some time to come. But while there is good reason to believe that the Church of England is in no immediate danger,

* Concise accounts of the absurdities of skeptical exegesis, and satisfactory replies, may be seen in the "Speaker's Commentary," vol. 1, p. 965 sq., 464 in "The Pulpit Commentary" Introduction to Deuteronomy, p. 1212 sq. My paper on "The Higher Criticism," printed in THE CHURCHMAN, deals with the same subject.

† I refer to my edition of "William Tyndale's Five Books of Moses, called the Pentateuch," New York and London, 1885.

there is no reason for saying that there is no danger at all. The opponents will return to the charge at the first opportunity, and it is of the last importance that the Church should be fully prepared to meet the attack. Happily, the warnings which have recently sounded throughout the country have aroused a noble spirit of self-defence, and now the whole population is being instructed in the history of their Church, the duties of her members, and the designs of her enemies; and they are rallying to her defence with an energy which promises well for their ultimate success, and leads us to hope and believe that the grand historical Church of the past will still flourish and abide through ages yet to come."

Several other prominent papers speak in a similar tone. The London correspondent of a Scottish paper says that the disestablishment agitation is not gaining strength. "On the contrary," he adds, "I have received fresh and remarkable confirmation of the statement I made a few days ago that the better class of Nonconformists are getting sick of it. The Liberatorists are pushing the question to the front in every constituency where they have any sort of hold, and candidates have in many instances been deluded into the belief that the party are much stronger than they really are. The great object is to win a Radical majority next November, and then to carry disestablishment in Scotland, with a resolution affirming its abstract desirability in England also. If this object is defeated, the Liberatorists themselves—at least such of them as take a reasonable and practicable view of the situation—are ready to acknowledge that the question will be shelved for a long time to come; indefinitely postponed, in fact."

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS ON THE LATE LORD SHAFTESBURY.—The John Bull, of October 3, says of the late Earl of Shaftesbury:

"Full of years and honors, Lord Shaftesbury has passed away. His life has been one devoted to the achievement of a lofty ideal of activity, and his career of practical philanthropy has been crowned with a full measure of success. For more than half a century he has been foremost in every good work. Little has been attempted or accomplished to raise the condition of the English people, to promote their social welfare, to improve their moral status, in which Lord Shaftesbury has not taken a leading part. The school of religious opinion to which Lord Shaftesbury belonged is not one which enlists at the present time any considerable degree of public sympathy, and it is to be owned that Lord Shaftesbury too often gave painful evidences of the degree to which he was influenced by the intolerance of his evangelical views. But the honesty of his convictions, the sincerity of his faith, and the excellence of his intentions, won for Lord Shaftesbury's public conduct invariable sympathy and indulgence. A life such as his offers in these days, when philanthropy is too often a device of political intrigue, lessons that the English people are scarcely likely to neglect."

The Record says:

"We feel that on this occasion the ordinary expressions of regret are entirely out of place. The noble career that is now closed leaves an indelible mark on the history of the nation and the condition of its people. It has made men glorify our Father in heaven, and will doubtless be even more influential for good as its features come out more grandly, if less vividly, in the sober light of history."

AN INTERESTING RELIC.—The Bishop of Southwell reopened on September 25 the historic church of Blythe, founded in 1088. The removal of whitewash from the wall at the east end has laid bare a grand fresco of fifteenth century work, the subject being "The Last Judgment."

THE DEAN OF LICHFIELD ON THE ENGLISH CHURCH.—Preaching at the reopening of St. George's, Edgbaston, the Dean of Lichfield, Dr. Bickersteth, concluded his sermon as follows:—"I am bold to affirm that there is no Church on the face of the earth that enjoys greater freedom than the Church of England; and that you could not strike a heavier blow at the liberties both of the Church and of the nation than by severing the sacred bonds which now unite the Church, the Throne and the State in one. And I believe that, when I say this, I am expressing the mind, not only of the great body of Churchmen, but also of vast numbers of our Nonconformist brethren, who feel that under the shadow of a comprehensive and tolerant National Church like our own, they enjoy a freedom and tranquillity such as they could not enjoy in an equal degree if the Church were disestablished. The Church of England has a wholesome moderating influence upon the various religious bodies around us. She sets up a standard to which they can look with respect; and by her sober and primitive teaching, as set forth in our Prayer Book, she keeps them in the path of orthodoxy. No; if there is danger to the Church of England, it is rather to be feared from within than from without. We want more unity amongst ourselves. We want more charity towards those who differ from us. Let us then at this time make it our earnest prayer that God will be pleased to bestow upon us these graces in larger measure. Then may we hope that in these days of sifting and trial our Church may prove herself to be more and more the 'home' of our people, and exhibit herself more and more as the defence, the light, and the glory of our country."

CARDINAL NEWMAN ON THE ENGLISH CHURCH.—In an address on October 16, Cardinal Newman said that the Church of England is the great bulwark in that country against atheism, that he wishes all success to those defending that Church, and that he and his friends will join in defending it.

CHURCH STATISTICS.—The Journal of the General Synod for the year 1884-5, contains some interesting items of Church news for the past year. At the several ordinations of 1884 fifty priests and fifty-two deacons were ordained as compared with thirty-seven and forty-two respectively for the preceding year. The total number of confirmation candidates was 5,197; but four of the more important dioceses sent in no return under this head. Twenty-two churches were either built or restored; here again five dioceses sent in no returns. The sum of $68,430 was contributed last year toward foreign missions. The total number of Church members is declared to be 638,935.

SCOTLAND.

HEALTH OF THE BISHOP OF EDINBURGH.—The Bishop of Edinburgh (Dr. Cotterill) was reported on October 2 to be seriously ill, and all hope of his recovery was said to be abandoned.

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

DAYS FOR OFFERINGS.—At a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, held in New York, on Tuesday, October 13, the Board of Managers recommended to the Church the observance of the following days for offerings for the different departments of missionary work during the present fiscal year: the First Sunday in Advent (November 20), Domestic Missions; the Second Sunday after Epiphany (January 17), Foreign Missions; the Third Sunday after Easter (May 16), Indian Missions and Missions to Colored People. It is to be understood, however, that in making this designation, it is not intended to interfere with the customs of parishes that have their own time of making offerings for mission work.

The Board of Managers recommend that all Sunday-schools unite in observing the custom of directing the Lenten offerings of the children to the general missionary work, under the care of the Missionary Society.

In future the Spirit of Missions will be published monthly throughout the year, and the annual reports which have hitherto occupied the double number for November and December, will be published as a separate pamphlet.

MASSACHUSETTS.

VESTED CHOIRS.—A few years ago there were but few parishes in this diocese where vested choirs were employed, but the number has steadily increased, and the probability seems to be that they will become as general as the quartette choirs were formerly.

The parishes in which they have been introduced speak of the impetus which has been given to congregational singing, the people finding it easier to sing with them, and gaining confidence by the increased volume of tone.

Some of the clergy think the vested choir helps to solve the problem of keeping growing boys interested in the Church services.

BOSTON—Church Rooms.—A circular has been issued by a committee of the Clerical Association, announcing that they have arranged for a series of Monday meetings of the clergy to begin November 2, and to continue through the winter and spring.

SOMERVILLE—Convocation.—The Eastern Convocation met in this parish on Wednesday and Thursday, October 14 and 15.

On the evening of Wednesday the vested choir of Christ Church, Cambridge, led the singing in a very spirited manner. The addresses were by Prof. Wm. Lawrence, the Rev. Dr. G. W. Shin, and the Rev. C. C. Grafton, upon "The Inward and Outward Manifestations of the Christian Life." On Thursday morning the Holy Communion was celebrated by the bishop, the sermon being delivered by the Rev. Dr. A. St. J. Chambré. In the afternoon a most valuable paper was read by the Rev. J. F. Spalding on "The Teachings and Influence of St. Augustine." It was the result of the most careful study, and was listened to with deepest interest. One of its most important points was the distinction between Augustinianism and Lutheranism and Calvinism, the essayist showing that the latter two were exaggerations of the exaggerated statements of Augustine.

A resolution was adopted pledging the convocation to assist the Board of Missions in its new plan of holding missionary meetings in as many parishes as possible during the year.

SOUTH FRAMINGHAM—Mission.—A Mission at this place has been in charge of the Rev. F. S. Harraden, who has also under his charge the work at Framingham Centre and Natick. Recently Mr. R. M. Every, of New Haven, Conn., offered to give the Mission a lot for a chapel, and the people are now considering the erection of a building to cost about $6,000.

CONNECTICUT.

NEW HAVEN—Christ Church.—The first Harvest Festival was held in this parish (the Rev. E. Van Deerlin, rector) on Sunday, October 11. The church was handsomely and tastefully decorated, the altar especially presenting a very bright and festive appearance. The altar was vested in white, and on the re-table stood beside the cross and vases two small sheaves of wheat, and clusters of grapes. The church was decorated with grain, flowers, fruits and vegetables.

There was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 8 A. M., Morning Prayer and Sermon at 10.30 A. M., Litany at 3 P. M., and Choral Evensong at 7.30 P. M. The anthem "While the Earth Remaineth," (Tours) was sung after the third collect, and was well rendered. At the close of the service the Te Deum was read as a special Act of Thanksgiving.

NORWALK—Woman's Auxiliary.—The Connecticut Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary held its annual meeting at Norwalk, on Thursday, October 15. The meeting was one of great interest and was attended by delegates from all parts of the diocese. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which the bishop was the celebrant, in St. Paul's church at 9.30 A. M., after which the business meeting was held. The reports of officers showed no lessening of interest or of contributions, notwithstanding the financial depression of the past year. The meeting was addressed by Mrs. Brewer, the wife of the Missionary Bishop of Montana, who gave a brief account of Church work in Montana, speaking especially of the need of hospitals and schools. Miss Sybil Carter also made an address which the bishop and several other clergy were invited to hear. The bishop afterwards expressed the wish that Miss Carter might address the people of Connecticut in every parish.

A missionary service was held in the afternoon, at which addresses were made by the bishop, the Rev. Drs. G. Williamson Smith, and W. S. Langford. The pledges for the coming year are for the following purposes: Scholarships for Girls in Seguin, Texas, Reno, Nevada, and the Hill Memorial School, Athens, Greece. Work in Montana; an Indian church in South Dakota; Freedmen in Virginia, under Mrs. Payne, Mrs. Buford, Mrs. Brent and Mrs. Burgwin; and St. Mary's Orphanage in China.

ALBANY.

HOOSAC—All Saints' Church.—On Saturday, October 11, in this church (the Rev. J. B. Tibbits, rector), the bishop of the diocese admitted to deacon's orders, Mr. Edward Dudley Tibbits, the son of the rector. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. J. I. Tucker, and the sermon was preached by the bishop. The bishop also confirmed four persons.

SCHRECKTADY—St. George's Church.—Two organizations for assisting in the parochial work here have been started, and have been very successful so far in enlisting the interest of the people. St. Mary's Guild, for women, started with a membership of sixty-five, and St. Agnes's Guild, for young girls of from twelve to fifteen years of age, has about twenty members. These two guilds embrace all kinds of Church work, and as the members only sustain the rector in the plan which he has devised, the parish must shortly become a very busy one. The Sunday-school has undertaken the support of a scholarship in St. John's School, Logan, Utah, and at the suggestion of the rector, will call it the "William Payne" scholarship, in memory of the late rector, who served the parish so faithfully for thirty-six years. The bishop of the diocese visited the parish on the Nineteenth Sunday after Trinity, October 11, and confirmed twenty-one.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—St. Mark's Chapel.—It has been definitely decided that in conducting the Advent Mission to be held in this chapel the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton is to be assisted by his son, the Rev. W. W. Newton. The chapel is situated amid a dense foreign population, on the east side of the city, and not far distant from the parent church. The mission will take the form of a children's crusade, a special effort being made to reach the young. The neighborhood swarms with the American-born children and grown-up offspring of Germans who are living here in such numbers that the region has sometimes been called "Little Germany." While it is difficult to reach the parents, on account of their ignorance of the English language or indifference to religion, it is very easy to reach them through their children, who no longer wish to be called Germans.

St. Mark's parish has nearly two hundred scholars, and the intention is to have a procession, with banners flying, march each night through some street or around Tompkins Square, back to the chapel, where the services will be held. In this way it is hoped to draw in the "rabble," both old and young.

GARRISON—Clerical Retreat.—A retreat of the clergy, preparatory to the Advent Mission in New York, was held at Garrisons, on Tuesday, October 13, and the three following days, under the direction of the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, who is the chief missioner of the Advent Mission. About eighty of the clergy were present. The exercises began at 4.30 on Tuesday afternoon with a short service, and an introductory address on the objects of the retreat, followed by silent prayer. At 7.30 P. M. there was Evensong and sermon. From this time to the end there was a steady advance in interest and power. The services for Wednesday and Thursday consisted of an early celebration at 8 A. M.; Matins followed by silent prayer at 10; hymns, prayers and address, at 11; Meditation from 2.30 to 4.30 P. M., and Evensong and sermon at 7.30 P. M. The subject of the address at the early celebration on Wednesday was "The Divine Presence—our Retreat;" on Thursday, "Our Own Vineyard." The address at 11 A. M. Wednesday was "The Shepherd Going Before His Flock;" on Thursday, "Walking with God." The subject of Wednesday's Meditation was "Some of the Characteristics of the Good Shepherd;" Thursday's, "Definiteness in Work and Experience: Especially in Experience of Forgiveness of Sin." The sermon on Thursday evening was a powerful demonstration of the doctrine of Assurance. On Friday the closing service was at 7 A. M., consisting of a Celebration of the Holy Communion and address on "Polished Shafts."

Mr. Aitken is an exceedingly strong speaker. He preaches rather than meditates. He is perfectly natural, and in the end commands assent. He had a difficult task before him, considering the widely divergent minds with which he dealt, yet he conducted the exercise with great skill. His appeals were very direct, and his exposures unsparring, while he showed a rare gift for bringing men face to face with the real issue, thus rendering decisions imperative.

STAATSBURG—Dutchess County Convocation.—This convocation met in St. Margaret's Church, Staatsburg, on Thursday, October 8. The assistant bishop was present, and a good representation both of clergy and laity. Missionary reports were made by the Rev. Messrs. J. C. S. Wells and Duncan McCallish. The convocation occurred in the suggestions of the report presented by the Rev. Dr. Sattelle at the late diocesan convention. An effort is to be made to raise the salary of every clergyman within the bonds of the convocation to $1,000 a minimum. Resolutions favoring the employment of itinerant missionaries were unanimously passed. A paper was read by the Rev. H. L. Zeigenfuss, on "Phases of Thought within the Anglican Communion;" a discussion followed in which many of the clergy present took part. The Rev. Professor George B. Hoxson was asked to prepare a paper for the next meeting of the convocation. The clergy and laity were entertained at the rectory.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—St. Mark's Church.—On the Nineteenth Sunday after Trinity, October 11, the rector of this parish, the Rev. Dr. Samuel M. Haskins, celebrated the forty-sixth anniversary of his rectorship. The sermon at the morning service contained especial reference to this interesting event. The text was from II. Corinthians ii. 16: "Who is sufficient for these things?" In the course of it he said: "When the Christian minister remembers whereunto he has been called, to what high office in the Church of God—an evangelist, a priest to administer the sacraments of spiritual life, a preacher unto God's people, a shepherd of His flock, a watcher over His souls, an ambassador and steward of God's mysteries, and an example to the flock over which the Great Shepherd of the sheep has made him ever overseer—when he remembers the great duties laid upon him through these holy offices, when he surveys the largeness of the charge, the difficulties of the work, and the awful responsibilities attached to them, he cannot but cry out with St. Paul, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' . . . All that he can do is to humble himself before God and plead for mercy and forgiveness as an unprofitable servant in God's husbandry. And it is with such a plea that I have bowed my knees before the Great Shepherd and Bishop of our souls this morning, in the review of forty-six years of an imperfect ministry over this parish. But, however humiliating and discouraging this personal review, because of its neglect of duties, its sins of omission and commission, yet there is also much to cheer, to encourage and to stimulate for the future. I think I may call you to record this day that I have preached some other doctrine to you than that which St. Paul preached, and which he charged Timothy to preach. My preaching has not been of man's wisdom, nor the vain philosophies of the day, nor the new developments of man's gospel, nor smooth things to please men's ears, nor the current topics of the hour, nor the Gospel with all its self-denials and warnings of a judgment left out; but I have endeavored to declare unto you the whole counsel of God, I have endeavored to reach unto you Christ and Him crucified, I have adhered closely to the faith once delivered to the saints. The faithful minister knows well that it is not in his popularity, nor upon the vast crowds that attend upon his ministry, that his success depends. Such crowds as often impede as set forward the Kingdom of Christ; they as often blind the eyes of God's servants and turn them to popular and worldly opinions and aside from God's truth. Through all the changes of near half a century, through all the removal of residences in the vicinity of the church because of the influx of business, through all the fluctuations of a city parish, where the population is ever coming and going, this parish has held its own, and gradually increased its number of communicants. About 2,300 have been added to the Church by Holy Baptism, 1,071 have been confirmed. The number of communicants is at present 460. Of these 2,300 that have been added to the Church by Holy Baptism, more than 1,000—1,071—have here renewed and ratified their baptismal vows. Now, when we remember that this multitude of the young, beside many more that have not been baptised here, have been every Lord's Day instructed in the way of God's commandments, and have by pastoral teachings been prepared for the holy rite of the Laying on of Hands and for Holy Communion, there is cause for thankfulness for such numbers added to Christ's Church and for seed sown in young and tender hearts."

Dr. Haskins, in closing, spoke gratefully of the kind appreciation of his people through these many years, and their sympathy with him in his sore bereavements. The review taken shows forcibly the value of an earnest and consecrated ministry, and the sure result of a steady prosecution of work in one field.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—The Mission to begin in this parish (the Rev. G. R. Vandewater, rector,) on Saturday, October 31, is attracting a wide interest. The programme of the services, published this week, will be useful not only to many in Brooklyn, but to many of the clergy who wish to study this phase of Church work.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

ORISKANY—St. Peter's Church.—The bishop of the diocese advanced to the priesthood in this church on Friday, October 2, the Rev. G. A. Ottman. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. H. Gardner, and the Rev. Messrs. J. S. Lemow, C. J. Clausen, Horace Gates, C. E. Gardner and L. A. Arthur assisted. Both within and without the church everything was made attractive and hospitable by faithful Churchwomen. Mrs. Ottman's state of health obliges her husband, much to the regret of his people, to reside for the present at the South. He takes a parish in South Carolina. The Rev. James Kellogg Parker succeeds to his cure at Oriskany and Whitestown.

CLINTON—St. James's Church.—On Saturday, October 3, in this church, the bishop ordained to the diaconate, Mr. Charles Anson Potter. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Joseph A. Russell, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. D. Wilson. Several of the clergy were present, and a large congregation, including the boys of Kirkland Hall school. Mr. Potter is a graduate of Cornell University, and continues for this academic year at his post of instruction in Kirkland Hall school. He intends to take a thorough theological course for the priesthood.

ITHACA—St. John's Church.—On Wednesday, October 7, in this church, the bishop ordained to the diaconate, Mr. Channey Vibbard, Jr. The candidate was presented by the Rev. W. H. Casey, and the bishop preached the ordination sermon. The ordination was in connection with the fall meeting of the Sixth District Convocation.

SPEEDSVILLE—St. John's Church.—In this church, on Friday, October 9, the bishop advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Louis H. Burch, who has served a full term both as lay-reader and deacon of this parish. The candidate was presented by the Rev. J. A. Robinson, who preached.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

CLYDE—St. John's Church.—On Sunday, September 13, St. John's Church (the Rev. Hobart B. Whitney, rector,) had the happiness of worshipping for the first time in their new church.

Just two years before, this church building of wood of about forty-three years' standing was burned. It contained the old organ originally given by Queen Ann to old Trinity church, New York City, and afterwards transferred to Hobart College, Geneva, and later as above, where it was in constant use. This organ was hastily taken to pieces (as it still remains,) and preserved from destruction, together with all the movable fixtures of the building.

Just one year from the date of the burning, the cornerstone of the new church was laid by Bishop Coxe, which eventuated in the beautiful church of to-day. It is of Medina stone, gothic in architecture, with windows of rolled cathedral glass—several being memorial—beside two mural tablets in marble, all of beautiful and appropriate design. In brief the building, consisting of nave and deep, broad chancel, with chapel opening at right angles, is a very gem, while in such a setting the chancel window appears a jewel indeed. It is in the best style of the Messrs. Lamb, and the design is the two central figures—the Lord and St. John—of Da Vinci's "Last Supper," with paten and chalice in view on the table, and the towers of Jerusalem by moonlight in the distance, all surrounded by a border of passion flowers, jeweled at the angles.

The bishop warmly congratulated the rector and people on the great achievement, in which their devoted sacrifices had called out much glad encouragement and aid from the friends of both, and called attention to the fact that the cunning handiwork of the rector had produced entire the altar, stalls, pincia and credence, surrounded by a finely carved gothic tabernacle, etc. The chancel window is a memorial to the late Rev. Dr. Van Ingen, sometime rector of the parish, as was previously Bishop Paret, of Maryland.

The music of this church is by a mixed choir in the stalls, and includes what is usually assigned to a choir in the full choral service, under the instruction and voice control of the rector.

The services incident to the occasion occupied nearly the whole day—including the confirmation of ten persons and the baptism of several infants—a festival long to be remembered by the parish and visitors from neighboring towns.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Grace Church.—This parish (the Rev. Dr. R. F. Alsop, rector,) has purchased a house on Cherry street, above 12th, for its workmen's club, which is now thoroughly organized. The building is undergoing the necessary alterations to adapt it to the uses of the club, and will soon be formally opened.

PHILADELPHIA—Southwest Convocation.—The regular quarterly meeting of this convocation was held in the parish building of the Church of the Holy Trinity on Monday afternoon October 12. The Rev. Stewart Stone, representing the Committee on the Establishment of Missions within the convocation limits, presented a map of several sites, one of which he specially favored, and which seemed to meet with general approval, but as more money would be required than could be expected from the Board of Missions, it was resolved to lay the matter before the Southeast Convocation at its next meeting, that the two convocations might establish and carry it on. To this end a committee of conference was appointed, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. Henry S. Getz and Stewart Stone, and Mr. Alexander Brown. Another mission was suggested to be under the charge of the Rev. Dr. Charles D. Cooper, rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles. As the representatives of this parish reported that they were ready to begin work immediately, somewhere in the vicinity of Gray's Ferry Road and Ellsworth street, $300 was voted them.

The president of the Convocation, the Rev. Dr. William N. McVicker, then called attention to the colored work which had been begun by the Church of the Holy Trinity in a hall at the corner of 17th and South streets, and Mr. William Games, a colored man, described the work in detail and spoke of its needs. He showed that they had an average attendance on Sunday morning of 130, and that about 100 other colored people were waiting to join them as soon as they should organize into a regular congregation; that they had a surplused choir of twenty boys; and that they desired to have the Rev. Mr. Morgan of St. Phillips, New York City, as their minister. Two hundred and fifty dollars was voted to them.

PHILADELPHIA—Southeast Convocation.—The quarterly meeting of this convocation, the Rev. C. George Currie, president, was held at St. Luke's Church on Tuesday, October 18. The Holy Communion was celebrated in the morning by the Rev. A. D. Heffern, assisted by the Rev. Henry L. Phillips. At the business meeting the Rev. W. S. Heaton was elected missionary for the district south of Washington avenue. A committee was appointed to confer with a similar one from the Southwest Convocation of Philadelphia concerning the establishment of a new mission on the line between the two convocations. Parish boundaries were agreed upon in the lower section of the convocation, and St. Peter's Church chosen as the place for the meeting in January.

Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. J. W. Kaye and the Rev. F. H. Bushnell, after which addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Rose F. Alsop, and the venerable Archbishop Kirby.

WEST PHILADELPHIA—Home of the Merciful Saviour.—This home for crippled children is the memorial of a bright, healthy boy, whose chief interest in life was to minister to sick children, and who was suddenly called away.

The first child came under the care of the home before the institution was opened. A house was taken without furniture; and the furniture has come piece by piece. When the home was opened applications for admission poured in, and each bed found an occupant. Many needy cases have had to be refused for want of room. The home takes the poorest, those whom the hospitals discharge, and for whom there is no place. It takes these sick and helpless children, without entrance fee, or payment for board, and cares for them, body and soul.

The children are under the care of a sister, whose unwearying devotion is like that of a mother. The household is composed of boys and girls, the sister in charge, two nurses and a cook, making a family of twenty-one persons. It is never known whose hand is to deal out the daily bread; the home depends on voluntary contributions.

Two of the boys, both very lame, have learned to print very well; they take orders, and their work has given satisfaction. The home is greatly hampered in this department of its work, for want of room; a workshop is greatly needed. Some of the children can learn to make brushes. One of the girls, who never leaves her bed, has learned to embroider. It is the intention to give a trade to each child that can take it. Those who improve in health sufficiently to go out and earn a living, will be encouraged to do so; and those whose health cannot improve, will remain in the institution.

The home has been in existence three years. During that time thirty children have been warmed, clothed, housed and fed by this venture of faith. During the same period $10,000 has been collected to build a suitable home, a lot of land given valued at $3,000, and $5,000 been secured to build a chapel. The buildings will be finished before March, and the notes will be given of their opening.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

STRETLTON—Trinity Mission.—The assistant-bishop visited this mission on Tuesday evening, October 6th. He preached and confirmed six persons.

Although the mission has been in charge of the Rev. James Stoddard but a brief time, there are many indications of awakening interest in the services. With a united and vigorous congregation and a growing Sunday-school, the mission will soon prove itself well worthy of the attention and care that has been paid it by its friends and the diocesan authorities.

PITTSBURGH.

ETRE—St. Paul's Church.—The recently-formed nuptial choir of this parish (the Rev. G. A. Carstensen, rector,) sang for the first time on Sunday, October 11, and produced a favorable impression. It consists of twenty-eight members, ten of whom are men and eighteen boys. The assistant, the Rev. G. W. Lay, is entitled to special credit for the organization and training of the choir, and both he and the rector are gratified with its success. At the morning service the rector preached an eloquent discourse on the subject of Church music.

MARYLAND.

COLLINGTON—Holy Trinity Parish.—This parish (the Rev. W. G. Davenport, rector) is one of the oldest in the diocese. The original church building was erected in 1734, during the rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Henderson. One of his successors was the late Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, who served the parish from 1825 to 1829. He kept up his interest in the parish to the last, and was present and assisting at the consecration of St. George's chapel, Glenn Dale, a chapel connected with the parish. The present rectory was built for and first occupied by Dr. Tyng.

Shortly after Dr. Tyng's removal the old church, a plain wooden structure, was removed, and the present church erected on the site. It is a brick building, seating more than three hundred, situated on a commanding eminence, and covered with a luxuriant growth of English ivy.

Among Dr. Tyng's successors have been the Rev. Messrs. Macanheimer, Keppeler, and Thacker, and the Rev. Dr. Harvey Stanley, all but one of whom are now no more. Dr. Stanley died in February last, at an advanced age, but still at his post, after a rectorship of more than thirty years. The parish remained vacant after his death for some months, and the present rector entered on his duties in July, having come from Tennessee. Although but a short time has elapsed since his coming, and he has been laboring under many disadvantages, much good work has been already accomplished, the congregation are increasing, and much interest is manifested in the two parishes of Holy Trinity and St. George's. A Sunday-school and Bible class has been organized in both parishes, and nearly all the children in the neighborhood attend. The grounds surrounding the church and rectory have been much improved, the rectory has been thoroughly repaired, and many repairs and improvements put upon the church itself.

WEST VIRGINIA.

WESTON—Mission Work.—From a letter of the Rev. James D. Keeble, the missionary in this part of the diocese, we gather the following particulars:

Weston is the centre of the work. Here there is a church building with a comfortable rectory, and there are about fifty communicants. The Sunday-school is a very interesting one, with over one hundred names on the roll, and about eighty regular attendants, some of whom have not missed a Sunday in five years. About twenty-five colored children and adults attend the school. Seven of these were recently baptized, one a deaf-mute woman, who, spite of her infirmity never misses the Sunday-school nor the night services. She expects to be confirmed at the bishop's visitation. At the same visitation, will be presented for confirmation two ladies, who were baptized in Virginia over sixty years ago.

At Buckhannon, fifteen miles from Weston, the missionary holds services regularly once a month, on Sundays, and occasionally on week days. The number of communicants is small. Buckhannon is a growing place, and had the missionary means to erect a small church, it would probably be filled at every service, and the Church would grow.

Brownsville, a small village, lies twenty miles from Weston in another direction, and over a mountainous road. Its industry is saw-milling, and furniture and carriage making. There is but one place of worship in the village, which is free to all. The missionary held a service here in August, which was crowded, and he was invited to come as often as he could. He went a fortnight later, and again had a large congregation. The bishop will hold a confirmation here also.

Twenty miles further on is Sutton, the county seat of Braxton County. The missionary was here in August, and found a small number of communicants. A large congregation attended his services, and he hopes to present a number for confirmation. Had the bishop the funds to place a good missionary here, a growing parish could easily be built up.

A short walk from Weston is the insane asylum with six hundred and fifty patients besides officers and attendants. Mr. Keeble holds service in the chapel on Sunday afternoon, alternating with the Methodist minister.

When the weather is good he frequently goes seven or eight miles in the country on Sunday afternoon to hold service in some one of the Methodist chapels, and always has good congregations.

Of all the mission fields West of the Alleghenies there is not a more interesting or needy one than West Virginia; interesting for its work, and needy, because indifference and error abound there.

During his first year in Weston, Mr. Keeble seeing the great need of Christian education for the young, made an effort for a parish school. Some friends coming to his aid he built in the rectory yard a school chapel, and had in constant attendance nearly fifty children. Some of the patrons of the school objected to the parish feature, and as they owned the larger interest in the building, he felt compelled to give way. For two years the school has been a select one. He needs about $300 to buy out all the interests and then carry on the work of Church education so much needed where the public schools are in a lamentable spiritual condition. The bishop of the diocese added to the letter from which we quote. "Mr. Keeble has my full sympathy and endorsement in the work of his school, and in all his missionary labors in this part of the diocese."

OHIO.

CLEVELAND—Woman's Auxiliary.—A meeting of the Ohio Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in St. Paul's church, Cleveland, (the Rev. Dr. C. S. Bates, rector,) on Wednesday, October 7. After divine service, the rector made a brief address of welcome. The Rev. A. B. Nicholas, general missionary of the diocese, then spoke of the condition of diocesan missions, and the importance of the more flourishing parishes giving them a liberal support. The bishop then announced the officers for the ensuing year, as follows: President, Mrs. D. P. Rhodes; vice-president, Mrs. Theodore Berry; secretary and treasurer, Mrs. C. S. Bates. The bishop read the resignation of the retiring secretary, Mrs. A. W. Armstrong, and then made an address on the work conducted by the auxiliary. The secretary, Mrs. Armstrong, presented her annual report, which indicated a substantial growth and an increasing interest in the society.

In the evening there was a largely-attended general meeting, at which the bishop presided. Addresses were made by the bishop, the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford, General Secretary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, and the Bishop of Huron (Dr. Baldwin).

CLEVELAND—Convocation.—The Convocation of Cleveland met in Grace church, Cleveland, (the Rev. F. M. Clendenin, rector,) on Wednesday, October 7. There was a large attendance, the bishop of the diocese and the Bishop of Huron (Dr. Baldwin) being also present. The convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Duncan. At the business meeting the following officers were elected: The Rev. Dr. C. S. Bates, dean, the Rev. E. L. Kemp, secretary, and the Rev. R. L. Chittenden, treasurer. The Rev. Dr. Y. Peyton Morgan made an address on "Impressions of the English Church, the Secret of Success in Endowment, and Sources of Weakness."

On Thursday evening a meeting was held in St. Paul's church, in connection with the convocation, in the interest of the Church Temperance Society. The Very Rev. James Carmichael, Dean of Montreal, and Mr. Robert Graham, Secretary of the Church Temperance Society, were expected to be present and make addresses, but both were unavoidably absent. The bishop of the diocese presided, and made the opening address, in which he stated that Dean Carmichael was unable to be present, as he thought the unhappy state of Montreal made it his duty to remain there. He regretted, also, the absence of Mr. Graham, being particularly anxious to hear him, for the reason that a year ago he had in that city expressed an opinion that did not harmonize with the speaker's views. For himself, he always felt that nothing was safe but abstinence; he had signed the pledge while at college, and had never had cause to regret it.

The Rev. Dr. C. S. Bates made an address, in which the duty of the State on the subject of the liquor traffic was ably discussed. He believed in the possibility of greatly restricting the traffic, and in such a manner that, while its evils will be decreased, there will be means of securing reparation for the evils resulting from it. He also spoke of reformation in its broadest sense, the power of the Spirit of God over man.

The Bishop of Huron made a very interesting address. He treated the subject from the standpoint of a child of God. He stated that while some persons indulged in liquor not to exceed moderation, they sometimes served as examples that lead weaker ones to ruin. The passion for strong drink was the great desecrator of homes. It could be conquered only through the Gospel of Christ. It was only the Redeemer of this troubled world that could pick up a fallen drunkard and make him know the joy of perfect peace.

TIFFIN—Convocation.—The Northwestern Convocation met in Trinity church, Tiffin, on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 13 and 14. Able sermons were preached by the Rev. Messrs. C. T. Stout and C. M. Sturges. The Rev. G. S. May read an essay on "Church Abstinence."

At the public evening meeting on Wednesday, the general subject was "Church Going." The Rev. W. M. Brown spoke on "Reasons Why the Pews are Not Filled;" the Rev. E. H. Wellman on "Why the Pews Should be Filled with Hearers;" the Rev. A. B. Nicholas on "Why the Pews Should be Filled with Worshipers;" and the dean, the Rev. E. R. Atwill, concluded with a brief address. Reports of missions showed the few clergy in this region to be laboring devotedly.

In a brief discussion of "The Book Anaxed," the speakers all expressed themselves strongly opposed to its adoption.

SPRINGFIELD.

CARLYLE—The Rev. D. F. Hutchinson.—The Rev. Daniel Falloon Hutchinson, rector of Christ church, died, after a week's illness, on Monday, August 24th, St. Bartholomew's Day. Mr. Hutchinson was born in Ireland in 1819, removed to Canada in early life, and there took Holy Orders. Three years ago he was transferred from the Diocese of Ontario to that of Pittsburgh, and assumed charge of the parishes of Mercer and Greenville, where he remained two years, when he removed to Carlyle.

The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. J. B. Harrison, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. J. N. Chestnutt, P. McKim, and J. G. Wright.

On Wednesday, September 16, a special meeting of the dean and chapter was held in Christ church for memorial services for the late rector. The Rev. W. T. Whitmarsh celebrated the Holy Eucharist, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. M. S. Taylor and G. C. Betts, the Rev. J. B. Harrison preaching the memorial sermon. The clergy, family, and parishioners visited the grave, and the lot in the cemetery was consecrated by the Rev. W. T. Whitmarsh. In the evening, after Evening Prayer, addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. Whitmarsh, Betts, and Taylor.

IOWA.

FARLEY and DYERSVILLE—Christ and St. Paul's Churches.—The bishop visited these parishes (the Rev. F. Duncan Jaudon, rector,) on Sunday, October 11. In the morning he confirmed at Christ church, Farley, seven persons, and in the evening, at St. Paul's, Dyersville, he confirmed two. In sixteen months thirty persons have been confirmed in the two parishes. Large congregations were present on both occasions. The offerings, amounting to $13.17, were devoted to Domestic Missions.

WYOMING.

RAWLINS—St. Thomas's Church.—The missionary bishop visited this church on Sunday, September 13, celebrated the Holy Communion in the morning, and administered confirmation in the evening, preaching at both services. On Monday, in company with the Rev. Amos Bannister, the bishop visited the military post of Fort Steele, where he held service and preached that evening, and on Tuesday morning celebrated the Holy Communion, fourteen persons receiving. He returned to Rawlins on Tuesday evening, and the following morning took the stage for Lander and Shoshone Agency.

The church at Rawlins is being beautified with two coats of paint. A handsome set of green altar hangings was used for the first time on the occasion of the bishop's visit.

The Rev. Amos Bannister, who has labored here for nearly three years, effecting the building, consecration and furnishing of St. Thomas's church has tendered his resignation as minister in charge, to take effect December 1.

SHOSHONE AGENCY—Episcopal Visitation.—The Missionary Bishop of Colorado and Wyoming has been making his annual visitation to this remote corner of his diocese. He arrived on Thursday, September 17, after a stage journey of two days and a night over a rough and uneven road. On Friday he went to see the house now building for the Rev. Sherman Coolidge, missionary to the Arapahoes, and in the evening of the same day held service and preached in the theatre building, Fort Washburn. On Sunday he preached three times at the agency, at North Fork, and at Lander, driving thirty miles for the purpose. The Church is making good progress in these places. The new church at the agency was consecrated by the bishop. The new church at Lander will be opened in two or three weeks. On Monday the bishop, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. J. Roberts, Sherman Coolidge and William Jones, drove sixty miles on a visit to the Arapahoe Indians, who were holding their great social festival of the year, consisting of mutual visits, singing and dancing. Here the bishop met Little Wolf, the chief medicine-man, or high priest of the tribe, who, as well as Black Coal, the chief, gave him a cordial reception. The visitation closed on Tuesday, when the bishop preached and celebrated the Holy Eucharist at Lander, as well as meeting the Ladies' Church Aid Society, and the Church Building Committee.

LITERATURE.

MR. T. COLB for two years has been making engravings of the old masters in some of the principal galleries in Europe for publication in the Century.

LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, have in press a Japanese story, entitled, "A Captive of Love," by Edward Greer, author of "Young Americans in Japan," etc.

ANSON D. F. RANDOLPH & Co. will bring out immediately "A Woman's Work; or, Memoirs of Eliza Fletcher," by the Rev. C. A. Salmon of Glasgow. The subject of the work was a remarkable woman, and the volume cannot help possessing a deep interest for many readers.

A second edition of Canon Liddon's sermon, "A Father in Christ," preached at the consecration of the Bishops of Lincoln and Exeter, with a notice of the Rev. Dr. Hatch's unchurchly article in the June Contemporary, has been published by the Rivingtons and is imported by Mr. Whittaker.

Suddenly, at his residence, on Thursday, October 1, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, BRUNO MAXIMILIAN TOWLER, the first and only senior warder of St. Mark's church, Geneva, Ill.

Though called suddenly, the summons found him not unprepared; for the service of his Father's House was the joy of his life. Faithful to death, he has entered into the joy of his Lord. His loss to the parish is well felt.

In New Haven, Conn., at Trinity church rectory, on October 18, 1885, ALIDA VAN SCHIEB, daughter of Edwin and Marion Eckford Harwood.

At Baltimore, on October 17, HANNAH, widow of the Right Rev. W. B. Whittingham, late Bishop of Maryland, aged 95 years and 4 days.

COMPLIMENTARY RESOLUTIONS.

THE REV. MR. FLICHTNER.

At the meeting of the Board of Managers on Tuesday, October 13, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, under the reorganization which took place on the 1st day of September, the duties of the Secretary of the Domestic Committee ceased, but the Secretary of the Board, the Rev. Mr. FLICHTNER, was asked by resolution of the board to continue to act as Secretary of the Domestic Committee, which request was assented to for the month of September, which request was renewed on the 15th of October, by the committee of eight. Therefore, be it Resolved, That inasmuch as the work of the Rev. Mr. FLICHTNER, as Secretary, will cease within a few days, the Board of Managers, in parting with him, desire to express and put on record its thanks for his long and faithful service, which during his whole term of office, he has rendered the cause of missions, and for the excellent labors in the domestic department of missions, and in the domestic department, which, with much labor, he has recently rendered, and which now give, and will continue to give, to the cause of missions, in the future, a glance, to the condition of the domestic branch of our work.

Resolved, That we tender to him our best wishes for his further usefulness in such duties as he may be called upon to assume in behalf of the Church.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"ORDAIN" OR "APPOINT."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Will you please insert the following letter on the Revised Version, taken by me from the Guardian (London) and the Church Times?

The writer, the Rev. James Wayland Joyce, is a most distinguished clergyman of the English Church, especially well known in the department of ecclesiastical law.

Nashotah.

WILLIAM ADAMS.

THE REVISED VERSION OF ACTS XV. 23.

Sir—All who have a regard for the integrity of the Church of England may well feel grateful for one of your leading articles in the John Bull of August 15. You have with great reason called attention to the method of dealing with Acts xv. 23 by the Revisers of the New Testament, who have introduced "Elder Brethren"—that is, in plain English, "Lay Elders"—into the Superscription of the Encyclical Letter of the First Christian Council, and have excluded Presbyters therefrom. It is not now needful to dwell at length on the forcible arguments which have been adduced against the Revisers' method, or to insist farther than you have done—to use your own well chosen words—on the intense gravity of introducing this novelty, or the mischief and danger of sanctioning such a notion. But perhaps you will allow me to supplement what you have so well written, and first, to call attention to one or two special points touching the translation of Acts xv. 23; then, secondly, to notice two other occurrences which the Revisers have made in the same direction.

I. As regards Acts xv. 23, reference has been already made to the fact that the word πρεσβυτερος has been four times in this very chapter used as a substantive, but that now, on its fifth appearance, when used in the same connection, the Revisers have turned it into an adjective. Of course, the word signifies more anon; but meanwhile it is observable that the translation of the Revisers in no way accords well with their own translation of Acts xv. 2 and 6, nor with their own translation of Acts xvi. 4; and further still, that it is diametrically contradictory to their own translation of Acts xxi. 18 and 25, where their own rendering affirms that the Presbyters were among those who wrote the Encyclical Letter of the Jerusalem Council.

But, sir, there is a graver matter here involved which seriously affects the integrity of the Revisers' scholarship. It would, of course, be idle to reason with them unless there was an agreement as to the Greek Text. But now (wholly abstaining from venturing on any opinion whatever on the comparative value of the various texts of this passage), for the sake of argument, let us take the text as adopted by the Revisers themselves. It now lies before me, οἱ Ἀποστολοι και οι πρεσβυτεροι ἀδελφοι, and, admitting their text with all submission, I affirm that they construe wrong. Not to insist on the fact that the Revisers, by using πρεσβυτερος here as an adjective, have thereby the authority of scholars—as Irenaeus and Origen in ancient times, Wordsworth, Jacobson, and Alford in modern ones—and of concurrent testimony in all times, it must be added that this word πρεσβυτερος cannot be used as an adjective in the Revisers' way: In the Greek of the Septuagint and of the New Testament πρεσβυτερος will not continue as an adjective immediately antecedent to its connective substantive. In that Greek (classical) Greek is not at this moment invoked, though something might be said on a proper occasion on that head) πρεσβυτερος, if adopted as an adjective, must be used as a predicate in a proposition, or else combined in some other idiomatic form, as ἄριστος πρεσβυτερος, Gen. xxi. 1, or ὁ ἀρχαιος πρεσβυτερος, 28, Luke xv. 23. And in the latter case it is observable that this idiomatic peculiarity of the word is incisively marked, because just above—v. 13—we have ὁ ἀρχαιος υἱος. Further, this peculiarity of the word πρεσβυτερος in its adjectival sense may be traced in Gen. xvii. 2; Ezek. xvi. 46, xxiii. 4; 2 Kings (LXX. 4 Kings) xix. 2; Is. xxxvii. 2. And, not to burden your columns with further references, it may be added that between forty and fifty instances in Hellenistic Greek have been lately referred to, but in no one case can πρεσβυτερος be found as an adjective immediately antecedent to its connective substantive. If one might venture on a surmise as to this peculiarity in the word, it may perchance be accounted for by the fact that πρεσβυτερος in the comparative word πρεσβυτος, a word commonly itself used as a substantive.

The fact is, that the words πρεσβυτερος ἀδελφοι in this passage are apposition nominatives: "Elders-Brethren." It is a form of speech abundantly common. In truth, there are two instances of such a form in this very chapter, ἀδελφοι ἀδελφοι, vv. 7 and 14. The like form may be seen in I. Cor. xv. 20-23; Heb. xii. 9; I. Joh. iv. 14; St. Clem. ad Cor. xv. xxviii. xliii.; St. Ign. ad Rom. ix. And in classical Greek this idiom is familiar to the simplest scholar as constantly recurring. In fine, the Revisers, by excluding Presbyters from the Superscription to the Encyclical Letter of the Jerusalem Council, and by substituting Elder Brethren—i. e. Lay Elders—in their place, have not only contravened all authority and contradicted all Church history but have stumbled sadly in their scholarship.

II. But to come to a second and an even more fatal excursion of the Revisers in a like direction. We find in every single instance in the New Testament where the word ordain occurs in reference to an entrance on the ministry of Christ, that the Revisers have changed the word ordain of the Authorized Translation into the novel word appoint. In truth, in this sense the word ordain is absolutely banished from the pages of the Revised New Testament. And further still, the Revisers have accomplished this surprising feat in scholarship—that they have translated five severally distinct Greek words—(1) κατα (2) τιθημι (3) καταριθμα, (4) προχειρισμαι, and (5) χειροτονειν, by this one single English word appoint.

Now, being somewhat anxious to discover why this word appoint was, as one may say, hugged with such parental devotion by the Revisers, I have made some investigation respecting it. And I find that the word appoint is the word chosen by that fiery controversialist John Knox, in his first Book of Discipline, A. D. 1560, for designating "Readers" to their office, where he abolished Ordination by laying on of hands. Also that the second Book of Discipline, A. D. 1578, when supplementing on Ben's magnifying, absolutely revels in this word appoint as signifying the designation of preachers to their offices by congregational patronage. His own one may see by consulting Collier's Ecc. Hist. vol. vi., pp. 304-6. And, still further, in the trust deeds inaugurated by John Wesley for the establishment of schismatical congregations, this word appoint is universally used to signify the designation of a preacher to his place and office. (See Carter's Bampton Lect. Appx. pp. 393-4, ed. 1872.)

This substitution by the Revisers of the word appoint for the word ordain in the Authorized Version is specially notable at Acts xv. 23, considering that the Authorized Version there accords exactly with Wiclif's, Tyndall's, Cranmer's, the Geneva, and the Bishops'; and considering further that the Revisers have there discovered a novel and surprising method of translating καταριθματες, a word in Hellenistic Greek notoriously signifying ordain, as may be learned from Justin Martyr, Quæst. et Respons. xiv. Can. Apost. 3-28 (al. 30)—67, Can. Nic. 4-19.

III. There is a third excursion of the Revisers still in the same direction which is equally by no means escape notice. At Acts xv. 28, where St. Paul is represented as addressing the Presbyters of Ephesus, the Revisers have in their text newly denominated the Presbyters as Bishops, by substituting the word "Bishops" for the word "overseers" as now appearing in the Authorized Version, and have thereby contravened two distinct and important testimonies of the Christian Ministry. Thus it is manifestly clear that the Revisers are blind to the fact that ἐπισκοπος, in the language of the Greek Testament, is a generic word signifying "overseer," "over-looker," or "inspector," and is not synonymous with our specific English word "Bishop."

To sum up the result of these excursions of the Revisers in different parts of the New Testament as they have translated it, the following is the outcome:

- 1. Lay Elders authoritative in Synod.
- 2. Presbyters excluded from subscription to Synodical Acts.
- 3. The word appoint universally substituted for ordain.
- 4. Bishops and Presbyters reduced to one order.

And all this by an application of scholarship as questionable as can be imagined—some people may be inclined to say, absolutely intolerable.

It would be exceedingly interesting to be informed what influences in the English Revision Company have led to the above results, all tending in one direction; and it would be more interesting still to learn how those members of the Church of England who belonged to that Company were inveigled into these unchristianly measures. The work seems patent enough. But clearly the net in this case has not been spread "in vain," though one would have thought plainly enough "in sight."

It is, however, satisfactory to write that a petition against the adoption of any of these singularities of the Revisers has been presented on behalf of forty-six clergy of the Diocese of Hereford to the Convocation of Canterbury; and, further, that their petition in reference has been recorded on the minutes of the Upper House there. Moreover, unless I have been much misled and am laboring under very serious error, a good deal more will be heard of the above matter when the Convocation of York next assemblies for business.

"N. OR M." ONCE MORE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

On August 29 you inserted an article from my pen making a reference to Bishop Christ Wordsworth's suggestion, in his Catechism, that the above letters might stand for Nicholas and Mary. Afterward the Rev. Mr. Metcalf's article appeared, in which he suggested that Bishop St. Andrews on the subject, and enclosed a reply. S. F. HORCAJUN.

IN THE CATECHISM—"N. OR M."

DEAR SIR—The matter about which you write, under date September 14, and ask for an answer (which I am sorry I have been unable to send you), is one of interest to several of our associations both old and new. When I first went as a master to Winchester College, some forty years ago, and had occasion to prepare a class of boys for confirmation, I determined to make myself thoroughly acquainted at all points with the Church Catechism. And acting on this resolve, I was not a little mortified to find myself checked in Historia, inasmuch as among all the books which I had collected as useful to be read or consulted upon the subject, numerous and various as they were, while most of them took no notice at all of the answer to the very first question, "N. OR M." (though it struck me at once that there was something curious in the choice, and still more in the collection or inverted order of the letters), and one afforded what appeared to me a satisfactory solution of the obvious difficulty. It so happened that while I was in this state of doubt and perplexity I received a letter from one of the Eton masters, dated "December 6, Founder's Day," and, wishing to discover whether there might be any special reason for that association of time in connection with the foundation of our most distinguished public school, I turned to the calendar, and there I saw that December 6 and December 8, the two first festal, or quasi-festal, days in the Church's year, after Advent Sunday, were marked, the former as the day of "Nicholas, Bishop of Myra," the latter as the day of "The Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary." It struck me at once that I had found the difficulty which I had been unable to solve in the catechetical problem. I knew something about St. Nicholas, "the Boy Bishop," the Patron Saint of Education, and I soon discovered more. No saint's name was more familiar before and at the time of the Reformation. See, for instance, in the Book of Homilies, the third part of the sermon against Peril of Idolatry: "Every artificer and profession hath his special saint, as a peculiar God. As, for example, scholars have St. Nicholas and St. Gregory." And again, ibid: "God and St. Nicholas be my speed!" There was good reason, therefore, why "N.," the initial of Nicholas, should be chosen to represent the name of an indefinite boy; and of course a boy's name must naturally stand first. There was equally good, or even still better, reason why "M.," the initial of Mary, "our Lady, the Blessed Virgin, should be chosen to represent the name of an indefinite girl; and of course the girl's name must come second. This would account not only for the choice, but for the inverted order of the letters "N. or M."

So far I seemed to have discovered a more satisfactory solution of the matter than any I had met with. And this solution was confirmed when it further occurred to me to examine the original statutes of our own college, Winchester, founded five hundred years ago. In those statutes it is not a little remarkable that when an indefinite boy is referred to the letter "N." is used, and from this I inferred that even at that early date in catechisms and other such formulae "N." had already taken possession to denote a boy, and "M." to denote a girl.

And now for associations of a more recent time. In the Teachers' Prayer Book, published three years ago by Dr. Barry (now Bishop and Metropolitan of Sydney), the following passage occurs at p. 234: "The answer 'N. or M.' appears to be a corruption of the 'N. or N. N.' (nomen or nomina of the Latin." Having noticed this, I wrote to Dr. R., an old friend and colleague as sub-warden at Trinity College, Glenalmond, to ask whether he had ever heard of my explanation, and if so, what he thought of it. He replied: "I had known it is used, and from this I inferred your theory, though I did not know to whom it was due" (I have little doubt he had heard of it from me in former days, and had forgotten the fact); "but what puzzles me on this and on any hypothesis is the conversion of the 'M.' for the man, and the 'N.' for the woman, in the marriage service." To this I made answer as follows: "I had considered the objection from the marriage service, and satisfied myself that nothing more was to be inferred from the use of the letters there than the fact that those two letters, from their use in the Catechism, had come to be adopted generally for indefinite persons, and that this was the case first with 'N.', and for both sexes. Are you aware that in the original copies of all the six revisions of the 'Prayer Book' (see Pickering's Fac-similes) the true reading is, 'I, N., take thee, N., etc.'? When the present reading of 'M.' for the man and 'N.' for the woman began to be introduced I cannot say, but it is plainly due to the fancy or the carelessness of the printer."

One objection to your interpretation (which I first saw, I think, in an American Church journal many years ago) is, that double Christian names, supposed in the explanation of M. for N. N., though common now, were rarely, if ever, known in the older time, when the inverted alphabetical order, 'N. or M.' was first introduced into the ante Reformation catechisms.

To observe that Mr. H. A. Metcalf, in his letter to THE CHURCHMAN, concurs with me in more than one of these latter remarks.

I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,
C. WORDSWORTH,
Bishop of St. Andrews.

Bishopshill, St. Andrews, Oct. 2.
P. S.—In Dr. Laing's edition of Knox's Works, vol. 1, p. 5, the following note occurs:

"The letter N. was an abbreviation of Nomen, or nomina, or some body, mode adopted from the Canon Law, where the name of a person was not ascertained." Valent quantum.

If my own theory is not accepted, the next best explanation appears to be that N. or M. represents the two components of the word Nomen.

GEORGE L. HARRISON.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

It cannot yet be too late for me, a life-long friend, to lay my tribute of affectionate respect on the grave of one whom the community has acknowledged and mourned as a public benefactor. Many others may have hurried past the saddening event, and become absorbed in other associations, but I must linger, for his death is still very fresh and his loss very present and engrossing to me. When one and another drop from the ranks of old and loving comrades on the field, the survivors cannot close up the gaps and march on as if nothing had happened. The step will falter, the tears come unbidden, and the lips with tremulous accents whisper "Farewell."

My friend was too much identified with the people among whom he lived, to have passed away without honorable mention. The record of his public life as a merchant, and as a philanthropist I need not repeat. The conspicuous facts of his career are well known. His hidden springs of action, the inner depths of his character, are worthy of notice, and demand for him a more profound respect. Of those personal traits which gave color to his outward life let me presume to say something. No word of commendation of his life and services has been written, which was not deserved. His acts of wisdom and of mercy have been well and truly rehearsed—let us hope they will be remembered and imitated.

The report of his bequests to charitable institutions has more recently transpired, and some who supposed him to be immensely rich, because they had known him in life to give with princely liberality, may have been surprised that the aggregate of his benefactions at death was no greater. Many men by their last wills have given larger sums for public purposes; very few, we venture to say, have bequeathed for beneficent uses a larger proportion of all that God has given to them. And it may be noted that every one of the eight objects provided for by Mr. Harrison is an institution for the relief of the distressed. Yet he did not endow any museum of art. He appreciated liberal learning, yet no college or university is the richer by his bounty. He loved the Church with an ardor of devotion not often witnessed, and to its uses in lifetime he was a most generous contributor; but by his last will and provision did he supply means to build, adorn or endow a sanctuary. His compassionate nature was engrossed, more and more as years advanced, with care for the relief of the distressed. He accepted public trusts in the execution of which he could become more thoroughly informed as to the sources, degrees, preventives or palliatives of human misery, and most effectually labor for its relief. His mind was concerned with errands of mercy; and his will is witness to the forms in which he saw and pitied most the miseries of his fellow creatures.

My friend was a man of earnest thought, and strong, yet well considered convictions. He not only knew what his opinions were, but he knew also why he held them.

His vigor of purpose was irresistibly strong. Whatever he believed ought to be done, he believed could be done. And if Providence seemed to have laid the task on him, he applied himself to the undertaking with no thought of failure. No measure of time, no amount of money, no stress of endeavor was esteemed too great to be expended for the accomplishment of a deliberate purpose. Yet, in the things which he will which seemed so stern and inexorable, there was a tenderness of heart, a sensibility to the rights and even the desires of others which was almost feminine. Any who may have felt it useless to resist, would have found it very effectual to appeal.

He was one of the most affectionate of men. He yearned over those whom Providence had entrusted to his keeping, with an intensity of devotion and solicitude exhausting to himself, and repressive of what might have been an innocent freedom in others.

He was as true in his friendships as in his religion. Like his Divine Master, whom he loved, he loved unto the end.

Loyal to the conclusions which his own sagacious mind had elaborated, he had a self-reliance and an accuracy in his views, not over other men. He was not supple under the drift of social forces that bear too many on aimless and uncertain ways. He was a man among men. But before God he was humble as a little child, distrusting his own goodness, and clinging to the Cross of Christ as his only refuge.

I have been intimately associated with him in the service of God and man through many years and in various departments of the Church's work, and can bear the most unequivocal testimony to his intelligence, his liberality, his unstinted devotion of time, thought and influence to whatever errand of piety or mercy he was commissioned to fulfill. In the memory of his eminent virtues and noble deeds, I ought not to ignore the fact that these distinctions were evolved out of sufferings which would have paralyzed the spiritual life of many. Days of active beneficence were followed by nights of sleepless exhaustion, not occasionally, and at long intervals, but constantly, through weary months. "He learned to do good by the things which he suffered," and as a trusty disciple and imitator of the compassionate Saviour, he was "made perfect through suffering."

The removal of one so exemplary from offices of beneficence, in which too few are found to follow, and fewer still are competent and willing to lead, is a public calamity. But to those who knew the departed, his translation from toilsome service to perpetual repose brings the soothing thought:

"Th' hushed! the mortal strife is o'er,
The sufferer is at rest,
And now he sleeps in calmness,
Upon his saviour's breast."

NEW BOOKS.

THE PERIOD OF THE REFORMATION, 1517 to 1648. By Ludwig Hölsler. Edited by Wilhelm Gieseler, Professor of History at the University of Göttingen. Translated by Mrs. G. Sturge. New edition, complete in one volume. (New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.) pp. 702. Price $2.50.

This volume is the result of a series of lectures delivered at the University of Heidelberg. This will serve to account for the form in which it appears. The Reformation is taken up as it took place in the different countries, so that the history is continually going back to the starting point, now in Germany, now in France, and now in England and the Scandinavian nations. The form of lectures naturally also pre-supposes a certain acquaintance with the leading facts of the times treated of, and induces a dogmatic assurance of statement not common in other histories. But this arrangement gives a broad, bird's-eye view of the subject which is, we think, one of the chief merits of this work. Another feature of it is that it gives full as much attention to the political as to the religious side of the Reformation. With the continental part of it we are disposed to find very little fault. While it is less philosophical than such a history ought to be, in its highest development, and less picturesque than it might be made by a great master in the art of description, it is nevertheless and gives a general outline of events which the student will accept as more satisfactory than the deep or brilliant work of another. It possesses the one requisite wanting, which all historical writing fails,—grasp of the subject, the power to see the relation and proportion of events. The space given to political history brings forcibly out the fact that the Reformation was largely swayed, at least in Germany, by political causes, and fruitful in political results.

The account of the Reformation in England, is the least satisfactory. It is manifest from the start that the past relations of the English Church to the Papacy are not understood or felt, and consequently the entire position of the English reformers is misapprehended. As a rule it may safely be said that no nation can easily comprehend the thoughts and feelings and situation of another people lying beyond its Western Meridian. The German professor is no exception to this rule. He regards Luther as the moving spirit of the English Reformation, whereas its great and pressing causes were quite distinct from those of the continental uprising. No one can, in fact, understand the English Reformation who cannot understand the attitude of men like More and Cranmer, Gardiner and Falkland, men who saw abuses, and desired their removal, but were not on that account ready to be swept away in the headlong tide of revolution—men who would pass over to the conservative side without being bigoted partisans. It has always been the characteristic of English history that it has had men like Falkland and Halifax, as well as the Straffords and Cromwells, whose motto was "Thorough." The conditions of the German Reformation were essentially different from those of the English. There was from the very constitution of the German Empire an almost entire absence of the feeling of nationality and of loyalty to the sovereign which prevailed in England. The political revolutions both preceded and followed the religious. The Wars of the Roses left the English people in a state of intense devotion to the House of Tudor. The English Church had become endeared to the English people, before the great civil war came to work out the problem of Parliamentary government. Both Church and State had their times of severest trial; but these trials were not contemporaneous. The Church came back at once into the heart of the nation, when Charles II. landed to put on his father's crown, but the arbitrary government of the Stuarts could not be set up again in its old place. Not even the flush of returning loyalty would suffer the people to forget the lessons they had learned in the Tory Parliament. Had Mary Tudor lived to reign fifteen years instead of five, had she left a son inheriting the blood of Philip and the principles of Henry VIII., the course of English history might have been utterly different.

The movement on the continent was a Reformation. The Protestant body, whether Lutheran or Calvinistic, took on essentially the condition and character of a new Church. Its members seceded from the old Order and reorganized a new. In England the movement was a purification of the Church, without destroying its identity.

It is this which the German professor and his editor both either fail to perceive, or purposefully ignore.

We think that in the main the accuracy of the details of the writer is worthy of German care and research. There are, however, a few errors which an English translator ought not to have permitted. Page 499 "Sazony" is put for "Sroy" and page 630, Thomas Cromwell, for Oliver Cromwell. Also (but this is a blunder of the author), it is said that the English Church has a number of seats in the House of Commons, evidently a confusion in his mind between Convocation and Parliament.

We have given an extended notice to this book, because on the whole we have found it one of the most satisfactory in giving an extended and general idea of the Reformation period. It stands to other histories and biographies in the position which a map occupies in a collection of landscape pictures. Its careful study will prepare the way for a better appreciation and enjoyment of far more fascinating volumes. It brings back to the memory and arranges in succinct order the manifold incidents of general literature; it may not be brilliant itself, but it throws an illuminating ray upon the most valuable and delightful of historical studies.

THE STRANGERS OF HER YOUTH. By Sarah Dowdney. Author of "Strangers Yet," "Sleeping Stones," etc. [New York: Thomas Whitaker.] pp. 225. Price $1.25.

There must be stories provided, we suppose, for Sunday-school libraries. The demand being as it is, it is as well that the supply should be of books of this class, fresh, reasonable, and with the moral on the right side, but not too much of it. One thing we like much in this novelle is that there is a good deal of allusion to and quotation from the best sort of English literature.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

137TH THOUSAND.

Sunday-School Hymnal and Service Book.

Edited by the Rev. C. L. HUTCHINS.

The sale of this Hymnal during the past year has been larger than in any preceding year, amounting to more than 20,000 copies.

Approved by all the American and Canadian Bishops, it is now used in nearly 2,000 SCHOOLS.

In many dioceses more than one-half of the schools use this Hymnal.

The reasons for this general adoption are, its Completeness, Convenience, Cheapness.

It contains all of Morning and Evening Prayer and Litany, all the Morning and Evening Canticles, 100 Chants, 4 versions for opening and closing school, all the Prayer Book Colicles, the 10th Selections of Psalms, pointed, and with Chant, 144 1st Chants, 200 Hymns for the Church, 500 Songs, 5 Litany Hymns, 12 Processional Hymns, more than 50 Carols. No book could be more complete.

Its convenience is marked. The children can be taught the use of the Prayer Book by it, for it contains more from the Prayer Book than any other Sunday-school service book. The pointing of the text is the same as that in the Church Hymnal, and the tunes of all the Hymns from the Church Hymnal are the same as those used in the Church—a great help in teaching children the music of the Church.

And its cheapness is remarkable. Though containing almost twice as much as any other similar book, its price is very low.

Edition "A," with music, 50c; Edition "B," without music, 25c, with a discount of 20 per cent. to schools.

50 will buy 50 of "A" and 150 of "B." 75 will buy 100 of "A" and 250 of "B." 125 will buy 150 of "A" and 400 of "B."

In using a Sunday-School Hymnal, it is well to select one that the school will not tire of—one that will meet every need for many years. This the Sunday-School Hymnal, with its large and varied contents, will do. It is thus the cheapest book.

For sale by Whitaker, Post & Co., E. & J. B. Young & Co., New York; Crippen, Upham & Co., Boston; Hammond, Philadelphia; James, H. & Co., Chicago; Young Churchman Company, Milwaukee, and the leading bookstores in every country; copies may be obtained directly of the Editor, Medford, Mass.

Of Mr. Roe's stories three-quarters of a million volumes have been sold.

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY

have just published a first edition of twenty-five thousand copies of AN ORIGINAL BELLE; a novel by Edward F. Roe. 12mo, cloth, $1.50. The scenes of this story are laid in New York during the time of the Civil War, and the plot reaches its culminating point during the stirring events of the New York riots, where the hero makes heady life to the music of "the wild mob's" million feet."

At the same time was published DRIVEN BACK TO EDEN, by Mr. Roe. 12mo, cloth, $1.50. This purports to be a book for young people, but will be read with equal interest by those of older years. It narrates the affairs of a family who give up life in a city, and take a farm. As they are obliged to earn their living, the book is largely practical. The volume contains many beautiful illustrations, and is issued uniform in size, etc., with the other books by this author.

"Professor Kellogg disposes effectually of the 'Light of Asia,' vindicates 'The Light of the World,' and ought to put an end to the attempts to bring Buddhism into favor with men possessing the light of Christianity. The book is timely, concise, tells us clearly all we need to know on the subject, and is written in a spirit that commands admiration."—Christian Intelligencer.

"Professor Kellogg affords them an opportunity of learning what Buddhism really is, from one who has actually seen it. There is no other book in the English language which fills exactly the place of this book, and the American reader will appreciate Professor Kellogg's work none the less because it comes from an American scholar rather than from a German or an English one."—Sunday-Evening Times.

"We earnestly commend this masterly volume. It will be to them a new revelation as to the real Buddhism."—Christian Union.

"Dr. Kellogg has done a good service to the cause of Christianity in the preparation of this work, and one that will be highly appreciated by the Christian public."—Herald and Freeholder.

SAKOONTALA; or, THE LOST RING

From the Sanscrit of Kalidasa. By MONIER WILLIAMS, Professor of Sanscrit at the East India College. Octavo, cloth, $2.50.

"The Hindus possess a distinguishing treasure in their drama. The most charming specimen of this kind to us, at yet, is Sakoontala, an episode drawn from the Mahabharata, and constructed by Kalidasa. Goethe paid this play the following magnificent compliment:

"'Wouldst thou the blossoms of the spring, the autumn's fruits, Wouldst thou what charms and thrills, wouldst thou what woes and feuds, Wouldst thou the heaven, the earth, in one sole word compress,
I made Sakoontala, and so have said it all.'"

ON THE PICTURE, "LOVE AND LIFE," IN THE WATTS COLLECTION.

BY SUSAN G. LUDLUM.

So frail our life, so full of doubt and fear—
How may our feet this rugged path ascend?
Tho', dim in distance, pastures green appear,
Shall we not perish ere we reach the end?

Lo, at our side Immortal Love is seen With bright wings duly furled; His grasp is strong

Upon our trembling hands; His steadfast mien

Quiets the fluttering heart; and so, ere long,
We follow, step by step where He doth lead,
Asking not whither. On the rocky ways Small fragrant flowers spring beneath His tread,

But lie unheeded as on Him we gaze,
And, knowing we are weak and helpless, still,

Trusting, go on; our only thought—His will.

THE INVALID'S PORTION OF PEACE.

BY THE REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

"He certainly did leave peace behind him." It was thus an invalid (since gathered to her fathers) spoke to her daughter after I had left her, as it proved, never to see her in this life again. Yea, verily; for the Son of Peace was there.

It occurs to me to pen some thoughts, in reply to your last, which may, I hope, leave behind them, as my spoken words did, some of that same Peace which passeth understanding.

Say to your sick friend what I here say to you. Read the suitable portions of my letter at the sick-bed, stop, give a rest, then resume. The sick cannot go to church—the Church must go to them. And thinking how many thousands of such there may be to-day, I shall send my words where they may, perhaps, reach them, as well as your friend. Are we not all brethren, and if one member suffer, suffer not the others with it? One body, one Lord, one faith, one hope, one peace and comfort.

I am glad so many find the Office for the Sick "words of comfort." All do who enter into the spirit of it. It has soled many a heart. Fatigue has become rest by it. Hope and joy have flowed from it as streams from far-off mountain springs.
And those opening sentences. You intimate that the minatory tone of "whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth," might seem to some a blemish. But would we not be bastards, we must submit to a Father, and what a showing can we make when He calls on us for it?

Smeared and blotted copy-books, after all —at any rate, only more or less such—is about all any of us will have to carry up to the Master's desk as our names are called out. Children are we all, not yet out of school—idle to-day, truants yesterday, God only knows what to-morrow. If it were mischievous only that we were in, we need not care, or negligence; but alas for some, for many, do they not break the rules willfully, and almost take pleasure in wearing the patience of the Master?

Nothing have we to boast of—but little to point to. Yet we hope for favor, and, at the end of the term, for honor and advancement. The Law was a school-master, yet, brought to Christ by it, we are still on the lower forms, and not yet ready to be called no longer servants and learners, but sons and friends. Must He discipline us and chastise us? He will if we go on so and need it, for whom He loveth, He chastiseth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth.

And so I find myself back at the office in which you and others take "so great comfort."

* * * You say some one has asked you, "What answer shall I give God in that day for my shortcomings?" I do not, of course, think the judgment will be a literal one. Where would the millions stand? Our voices would be lost in space. But it may be real, all the same. Conscience even now is a seat of justice. But in "that day" we cannot be special pleaders—no pettifogging at that bar. What answer will we make? Have it ready—study our plea —plead sin, plead human nature, plead Satan. There is but one, and none other can any one make, and that the Saviour.
Put all thy trust in Him now, and He will let you put it all in Him then; so that, whether literal, or only real, the account we shall render, even now in the lower Court of Conscience, shall make Him our Plea, our Attorney, and our Refuge. He shall answer for us. He is your "answer," as the lawyers might term it, if I forget not.

* * * You plead your intentions, and "take comfort" in them. Well and good.
While, doubtless, those "certain brethren" do carry the doctrine of intention a little far, there is much in good motives and a holy intent. If a man loads his gun, and only fails to kill his foe because he could not find him, he is in heart a murderer.
Even he that hateth his brother is. And so, if you try to do well, you, in a sense, do it. "A desire for holiness is holiness—in the germ thereof." Still, even motive is of the earth, earthy, and intention human, and therefore imperfect, and often of a very mixed nature. We may take comfort in them only to a degree.

* * * There are those of the world, worldly, who glory in their shame. But there is an honest and a dishonest shame.
Who is there who, though he have done his best, is not ashamed even of that best. To long that he had done better, to hope that he will so do, and to strive that he may—this is to have shame of which one need not be ashamed, even in "that day." The worldling knows it not, neither can know it; but in this kind of shame can the humble Christian rejoice—yea, does rejoice.

* * * There is such a thing as what you call "constitutional piety." Some are born good, not absolutely good—relatively so, better than others. I know of men with whom really an ounce of religion goes farther, and does more good, than a hundred-weight with other people. They are to be envied; if envy be right at all I had rather be jealous of that in them than of all their gold were they as rich as Croesus. All the mines of Golconda were, with all their yield, not half the patrimony that this one gift is.

Blessed they who have "natural piety." We who have it not must cultivate it—yea, covetously.

* * * Doing and trusting are not "incompatible." If you do all, and trust none—i.e., do without a spirit of trustfulness, in other words, take things into your own hand to that extent, be sure that God will let you. He is a jealous God, jealous of His own honor, and if you wrench yourself away from Him as you may have seen a petulant child do, and start out to do wholly for yourself, ten to one you will find it lonely business, and wish that God had not let you go so willingly to try on armor too big for you. Remember David all dressed up and tricked out in Saul's—a pretty figure the young man cut, and heartily ashamed was he of himself—with no doubt, his fair countenance blushing crimson at his youthful folly, as perhaps older eyes were shaded with shields and older heads hung low, yet in respectful silence, as the young stripling stripped him of the graves, and laid aside the iron spear, and took him modestly to his little sling and the smooth stones from the brook, and then going out, doing and trusting, touched the brazen forehead of the giant as it had been with a finger from the vengeance of the skies. God often "lets" us. He lets us do foolishness that we may learn wisdom. He plays with our leading-strings, which, in our confidence, we take to be a strong harness that we can "do" wonders in, as parents do with knitted reins around the necks of prancing boys playing horse, only to let us think it is we who are doing it all, while His own kind and loving hand is guiding after all. And so I trust and yet do, do and still trust.
The eagle tries her young on her own back and wings first. No doubt the venturesome eaglets would like to strike out on their own wings, and a pretty muss would they make of it. They must wait—waiting is trusting.
God knows when the wing-joints of the soul are strong and waxen firm, and we can be "let" go, out on the clear air, and our own soaring. And, even then, doing and trusting. The wing is ours, but the air His.
He must surround and uphold us, or our poor flying and wretched flapping would, indeed be in vain, and down the crippled things into the snare of the hunter.

* * * God's machinery is never at rest: night and day goes the great shuttle back and forth, noiselessly, yet ceaselessly. "The mills of God grind slowly; and they grind exceeding small." A friend lost her only son; she wrote me: "Ah, well, God never makes a mistake." Though He smote, yet would she trust Him. Human needles drop stitches, and human workmen patch their blunders up as best they can; but who shall dare affirm of Him that He has no plan to go by, and carries on His providences by the haphazard inspirations of the moment? God is no such apprentice hand, oh, my friend.

* * * Forgive the injury you have received of . . . and give him a receipt in full by going and doing him a kindness, it will sting like a nettle. If you really want revenge, pour coals of fire on his head. We have a perfect right to get even with people in that way. . . . Resisting evil and having it flee from us is well; but to keep out of the way of it has always seemed to me better. Try it, and don't be ashamed of your stratagem; such cowardice is bravery. Don't coquette with sin: it may not only flirt you in return but betray you, and do its worst.

* * * And may that Physician who advertises to forgive all our sin and heal all our infirmities visit by His Spirit of Truth and His Comforter each of all these our sick in this chamber, and give unto him the blessing of His peace, for it is He only who giveth medicine to heal his sickness, and who only maketh all his bed in his trouble. And pray thus: "Oh, my Father, take my heart. For I cannot give it Thee. And when Thou hast it keep it. For I cannot keep it for Thee. And save me in spite of myself. For Thy Son's sake. Amen."

REMEMBER.

BY GEORGE ROSE.

Saith the Rose,

Life hath more than piercing thorns—

Remember!

Life hath sweetness, life hath beauty to its close

Sweetness—beauty—O remember!

Saith the Sun,

Life hath more than low'ring clouds—

Remember!

Life hath gladness, life hath glory for each one:

Gladness—glory—O remember!

Saith the Dove,

Life hath more than hateful strife—

Remember!

Life hath love, and it is, O, so sweet with love!

Life hath love—hath love—remember!

THE ADVENT MISSIONS IN NEW YORK.

This somewhat unfamiliar type of evangelic ministrations was inaugurated in the Mother Church about fifteen years ago, when the Rev. Dr. Benson, founder of the Brotherhood of St. John the Evangelist, at Cowley, Dr. Wilkinson, present Bishop of Truro, and the Rev. J. M. Aitken, deceased, undertook the delicate and difficult task of a parochial mission work, which, while it should find welcome in parishes ripe for a special and searching ministration, should effectually protect both parish and clergy from the perilous accidents of what is known as Protestant Revivalism.

Dr. Benson perpetuated and continues the movement in the training at Cowley, whose clergy are identified, not only in England and America, but in the East Indies, with systematized and untiring labors in the promotion of a deeper religious life. The American branch of the brotherhood located in Boston, has been chiefly instrumental in the introduction of parochial mission activities in the American Church. In England, the results of this work were so impressive that a society was afterward formed under the title, "The Church of England Parochial Missions Society," of which the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, son of the Rev. J. M. Aitken, was invited to become chairman—for this purpose surrendering, the important vicarage of St. Saviour's, Liverpool. There are ten associated clergy, who are devoted exclusively to the holding of missions. Besides, the society nominates five additional men to curacies, granting them £150 annual stipend, and reserving the privilege of assigning each of them to five missions yearly.

The inception of this movement in New York is already thoroughly understood, and has undergone the comments of current journalism, secular as well as ecclesiastical. As the result of deliberate and protracted conferences with the reverend leaders of this new mission effort, we reach the following conclusions:

There is no little spiritual significance in the fact that more than twenty rectors in the city have come together, drawn by a common solicitude to inaugurate a simultaneous mission in their respective parishes. It becomes yet more significant when it is borne in mind that many others heartily favor a movement in which they cannot personally engage at this present. It is confined to no line of Churchmanship. It has no theologic undertone. It is nothing else than the expression of a profounder interest in Christian work and living throughout the city. For the city rector works in the face of terrible disadvantages. The season is clipped at both ends. Parishioners are continually dropping out in early spring, and dropping in until the holidays. The actual congregation remains hardly four or five months together. Meanwhile, social distractions challenge ministerial work at every step, and amusements of all conceivable flavors crowd day and night.

The Parochial Mission, then, is like a trumpet call to arms, an imperative reveillé sounded, until every ear shall catch the signal of warning. It undertakes to quicken and refresh the baptismal ideal of the Christ-life, to stir up the personal conscience to a quick sense of stewardship, to push back the incoming tides of materialism and worldliness—in short, to verify and energize the regular ministrations of the parishes so skilfully and persistently that they may become soluble, and enter actively into the spiritual consciousness of the people. And first: The work of the missionary, therefore, is confessedly, quite unlike stated pastoral work. And the missionary himself firmly insists upon this distinction. It is strictly supplemented. It seeks to build on existing foundations. It is not another rectorship, substituted for the time being. The missionary works in a congenial field; and it is his work to individualize and specialize the pastoral seed-sowing. He is skilled in hand-to-hand dealings with souls. He is a Nathan among the prophets. He uproots and unsettles nothing of pastoral planting. He digs about the vines and does hard husbandry to make the field fruitful. His season is short. His labors are multiplied and he works under a steady, unflinching enthusiasm of purpose which would shortly burn or wear out the strongest.

Secondly, the missionary undergoes a special training for his line of ministry. Added to a strongly religious sensibility and temperament, under habits of systematized devotion, he thoroughly establishes himself for every good word and work by disciplines, instructions, hardships, and schooling under men who have well learned this wayside and house-to-house ministry. In England some of these brothers are "set apart" for this work and give themselves wholly to it.

Thirdly, where the movement is thoroughly understood, the spiritual care of the flock is handed over without reservation to the missioner during the continuance of his work. Not that the rector is ignored, or superseded—only that he stands aside from the immediate struggle, helping by his prayers, sympathy and ghostly support his fellow worker, for the time. Thorough work and permanent results are practicable under no other relations. The rector himself learns new wisdom in plain dealings with individuals, gathers fresh courage in presence of the mission fruits, and starts anew, newly equipped for the longer, larger battle.

And fourthly, it is strongly urged by the missionaries that their work bears no affiliation with what is known as popular revivalism. The modern evangelist lives and labors on excitement. He belabors and stimulates the emotions with almost malicious ingenuity. He knows and in turn wrenches and tortures every nerve of sensibility. He is an incendiary. His course is often marked by devastation, charred remains and desolated experiences, beyond reach of resuscitation or recognition. In only one significant particular has this school of workers found recognition; and that is—be it spoken in all gentleness—in the remarkable "hymnal," specially compiled and published for this occasion, where is found much of the inarticulate, rhapsodic extravagance of Moody and Sankeyism—words and music (?)—to the displacement of universally accepted hymns and tunes already dear to all Church people: Twenty hymns and tunes will "carry" any mission—if well selected—the fewer indeed, the better. But as each missionary is master of his field for the time being, little harm may follow this freaky infiltration of coarser elements.

Again, our missionaries protest against emotionalism and give explicit cautions, like danger signals, against excitements and pietistic stimulation. They take pains to state that in their experience, the measure of spiritual gains is determined by the absence or repression of merely sympathetic disturbances. They seek for tranquillity, soberness of thought and a supreme sense of religious duty.

Naturally enough much interest attaches to the Reverend Clergy of the English Church who have somewhat heroically undertaken to cross the Atlantic in response to the Macedonian appeal of their American brethren.

The Rev. Mr. Aitken, already mentioned, undertakes the mission at St. George's, Stuyvesant Square, assisted by the Rev. James Stevens. Mr. Aitken, in his sermons, on Sunday last, as well as in the conduct of the Retreat for the Clergy, at Garrison's, has already given explicit tokens of what may be hoped for from his labors.

At the Church of the Heavenly Rest the missionary will be the Rev. Francis Pigou, D. D., Vicar of Halifax, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. He is mentioned by an appreciative yet discriminating friend as an admirable example of the best clergy of the Established Church, experienced in mission duty, for which he has exceptional spiritual ripeness.

The Rev. Dr. Watkins has secured for the work at the Holy Trinity the Rev. W. H. Warren, M. A., Vicar of Holy Trinity, Lambeth, London. He has large experience in this special work, and is mentioned as a very eloquent and forcible preacher. He is a son of the well-known author of "The Diary of a Physician," and "Ten Thousand a Year." The Rev. Aaron Bell—of whom fewer particulars have reached us, officiates at the Church of the Holy Spirit. The missionaries from our own clergy are already well-known to our readers.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BY THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND.

II.

Helps and Advantages.

In her Home Missionary work the Church has had certain helps and advantages which deserve thoughtful attention at this time. These have arisen from her characteristic gifts and endowments—some of them as old as her Divine charter, and some of them the product of providential circumstances.

(1) She has been helped by her historic descent, her definite hold on the visible organic continuity through eighteen centuries of the Kingdom of Christ. She traces her lineage back to the Day of Pentecost. She has always, and well-nigh everywhere that she has set up her altars in this land, claimed to be more than a voluntary fellowship or sect brought into being by any one man or school of men. When asked for her founder, she has not been obliged to stop with Luther or Calvin, with Zwingle or Wesley, but has pointed at once to Christ and His apostles. This she has done with a persistent emphasis that no faded ideal dignity arising from mere association with a venerable past could have induced. The historic sense has wrought upon her life, shaped her attitude, toned her teaching and worship, and imbued all her relations to society with the power of an instinct, and, at times, with the fervid energy of a passion; and that instinct, that passion, has had its source and ground in a well-reasoned belief that the Gospel and the Church of this age have authority only as they are one with the Gospel and the Church of apostolic times. This historic temperament in ecclesiastical methods has had its influence, and a marked one, on the mind and character of the people; and yet it has not been what it will be in the near future. Heretofore the common mind has felt, rather than recognized it. The masses have been too busy in making history to give much thought to history already made, and especially to the formative chapters of Church history in a remote past. But as the nation verges toward maturity, and its memory begins to turn with studious pride the leaves of its own records, it will strive to weave them more and more into one piece with the past, as another act in the drama of the ages. As this feeling grows, the historic influence of the Church will grow with it. Stronger now than it was even a generation ago, it will be still stronger in the next.

(2) The Church has been helped as a missionary force by the confident rather than controversial tenacity with which she has adhered to a fixed and positive teaching on all the essential verities of the faith. Her Creed is an inheritance. It has come to her as a legacy to be handed on as she received it. It embodies the voice of the Christian past, the definite testimony of the body of Christ guided by the Holy Spirit in its judgments and interpretations of God's Word. This Church disclaims all power or right to change it. To improve it by addition or subtraction, or even by transposition of its articles, is impossible. It is the deliverance of authority, and yet to hold it is consistent with all wholesome liberty. For while it covers the citadel of God's truth, it leaves open to freedom of private opinion a vast, unfenced area of probable or only possible truth. And so, while it binds to the centre, it provides for limitless radiations of thought. The necessary facts of the Gospels and the necessary deductions from those facts compose it. It is simple in its unity, wonderful in its brevity, and utterly free from all traces of the rational or even the devout speculations of men. None, save those who have tried it, can know with what power this Creed has enabled our missionaries to speak to individuals, and even to whole communities weary of sectarian shibboleths, or set adrift by a looseness of teaching whose prevalence has won for it the honors, if not the name of orthodoxy. This power will grow as men yearn more and more for stability of faith, and dogmas founded on opinion ravel out into impotence under the handling of free thought. Nothing is more noteworthy in the history of our missions than the extent to which the Church has welcomed earnest seekers among the thoughtful for the city that hath foundations and the ancient ways of the great company of God's faithful people.

(3) Liturgical worship, another part of the common heritage of the Catholic Church, has done good service as an aid to our missionary work. For a whole generation this was thought by some within and by all without the Church to be a burden and a hindrance. It was often argued that with such extra weight to carry, whatever the soundness of our teaching, we could undertake no hopeful, aggressive work. It was asserted that the "rough and ready" life along the frontiers, and in communities too new for settled habits or intelligent tastes even in social arrangements, would be intolerant of prescript forms and established offices in religion. These, it was claimed, must be thrown aside, and more elastic and popular methods adopted if the Church was ever to become a power among the formative elements of our Western civilization. Nor was this all, for even in the old life of the Eastern and Middle States liturgical worship was openly and learnedly opposed as a hindrance to devotion, and not seldom controversially denounced as a petrified, mechanical contrivance utterly subversive of religious fervor. Experience has more than answered these objections. With hardly an exception, our missionaries have borne witness to the value of the Prayer Book, as not only providing the best possible services amid the rude and ever shifting emergencies of their work, but as the best compend of Christian knowledge and discipline for use among the ignorant and the irreligious. While, on the other hand, as at least one practical result of the liturgy's missionary work, the Denominations about us have gradually been so wrought upon by its breadth, tenderness, fervour, and dignity that it seems now only a question of time when they will begin first to admire, then to imitate, and finally to adopt this priceless treasure of the Church. Thus it turns out as well in our own experience as in the growing sympathy and inclination of the unliturgical Christianity of the time, that the Church "through the ages all along" was not mistaken either in its estimate of the devotional wants of man in all conditions and in all places, or in its provision to meet them.

(4) Still again it must be noted how much our missions have been indebted to the fact that they have been planted by a Ministry of Apostolic descent. Though for many years an occasion of controversy, and often of bitter prejudice, that Ministry has been a power of attraction. Even in offering itself to those who repelled it, it has done good service, for it told them, though only in a passing way, of an authority, dignity, and continuity in the Sacred Office foreign to the teaching of lower theories. And it was no slight thing to do, moreover, that in a country where the people believe themselves to be the source of all power, having any claim on their obedience, it reminded them that there was at least one function ordained for the service and rulership of men whose authority was from above, not from below. That our missions, as well as the Church itself, have derived advantage from this principle of apostolic descent we have abundant evidence in the increasing numbers of earnest men from other ministries who, by their own action, have owned the value of a commission that connected them historically with the continuous priesthood of all the Christian ages.

(5) Finally, in naming the elements of strength in our mission, due place must be given to the living power embodied in the missionary episcopate. Armies are nothing without leaders, and governments useless without rulers, so the Church, in the task of laying foundations in new empires, is powerless without pioneers and master-builders. In this respect God has richly blessed us. Guided by His Spirit fit men have been, as a rule, chosen by the Church for this work—men of whom, as a whole, it is impossible to speak too highly. They have proved themselves worthy of the best days of the Church. For energy, perseverance, patient endurance of hardship, administrative ability, and abundance of labor, it may be doubted whether any body of men consecrated to the like office and work has ever surpassed them. In the vast fields committed to their charge they have stood out in bold relief as the central figures around which the Church's strength has rallied for aggression and conquest. Though too far apart to join hands or to meet for counsel, save on rare occasions, their solitary missions have flamed with Gospel light, and, as beacon fires kindled along the far-reaching frontiers, they have signalled the incoming host and given them a welcome as they advanced over river, and desert, and mountain. With saintly patience and heroic nerve, and amid discouragements and difficulties that may not be described, they have built foundations worthy of men of apostolic descent. By what they have dared, done, and suffered they deserve to be regarded as the glory and strength of our missionary work, and, next to the truth as it is in Jesus, they, with their faithful clergy, represent a large share of the spiritual endowment of our American branch of the Catholic Church. It is, speaking generally, only as we rise above the varying fortunes of the hour—above mere statistics meaning much or little according to circumstances—above the ever-changing machinery of our reigning ecclesiastical wisdom, and fasten our eyes upon these abiding helps, these living forces that we can estimate the present influence or forecast the future of apostolic Christianity in this land.

"YORK"

A Biographical Sketch.

BY MRS. CHARLES GARNETT.

It was on the 25th of January, 1880, that we first made acquaintance with "York."

How well we remember that morning! It was a very cold day, the air was intensely clear, and our footsteps rang on the frozen pathway as we turned off the high road and made our way across a ploughed field to the Works. The huts built of wood, an old picturesque hall, with its outbuildings now turned into several dwellings, and a newly-erected mission-room stood below the brow of the hill we were crossing, and were as yet hidden from sight: but the wide expanse of undulating country was dotted by farm-houses and cottages, from whose distant chimneys thin lines of blue smoke rose straight into the wintry air. It was a morning which made the blood tingle in one's veins, and brought far-distant sounds with sharp distinctness to the ear—the church-bells were ringing two miles away, I remember. We had hardly entered the field when we met two navvies. One of these was a remarkable-looking man—tall, somewhat thin, and very muscular. His features were plain. A scar disfigured one cheek, and the countenance was by no means a pleasant one. He wore the usual navy dress—a pilot cloth coat, white trousers, and soft hat, and was clean and respectable in appearance. He and his mate came lounging along, and looked a little surprised when we stopped them.

We asked the tall man if "he knew that he was going the wrong way."

"Why, how's that?" he replied.

"You are going from the mission-room instead of to it!" and then, as the men smiled, we explained that the Bible class was to be held every Sunday morning and afternoon by the young lady who, for the first time, came that morning; that there would be also evening service; and we begged them not to waste the day, which was not theirs but God's, and come with us.

But in vain; they gave the usual reply as they edged away: "Not to-day," "Not this time."

"Then will you come this afternoon—do? This beautiful day is God's; He has given us it; do come and read His Word for an hour."

"Well," said the tall man, "I don't mind if I do."

"Now that is a promise you won't forget."

"No, I'll come;" and so he did.

We soon were informed his nickname was "York," and that his life had been as bad as had could be. He was a great strong man—a powerful son of the devil, for though uneducated he had much force of character and great determination; but the Spirit of God must have reached his heart, for from that afternoon he became a regular attendant, and he never missed again either morning or afternoon unless he remained away to nurse a sick mate, or to go to some special church service at a distance.

From that time, too, his place was never empty at the evening service; and strange, indeed, would the mission-room have looked without "York." Between the ending of the Sunday-school and the time for evening service that first Sunday, we two friends went round the huts and houses, and invited the men to the mission-room.

At some of the dwellings we were known, at others we were strangers, but at each we received a kindly or at the least a tolerant welcome.

In one a good many men were sitting, some finishing their teas, others grouped round the fire. Near the hearth "York" was sitting, reading the tract we had given him that morning; and on his knee was seated a tiny, pretty child, his strong arm round the little thing.

The Bible-class teacher tried to make friends with the child, but she turned from the strange young lady, and clung with both hands to the big, rough man.

"That speaks well for York," we remarked to each other, as we came out into the darkness.

Hardly a month later, on the 15th of February, the secretary of the Navy Mission spent the Sunday at the Works, and preached in the mission-room. It was that evening's sermon which made things clear to "York's" mind. The previous three weeks had done much for him. His interest had been awakened in subjects which he had never thought on before, his conscience was aroused after a sleep—a stupor, rather—of years, but the very voice of the Lord spoke to him that night.

The subject was Abraham's sacrifice on Mount Moriah, and Isaac's question, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?" and the old man's reply, "My son, God will provide Himself a lamb for the burnt offering." The preacher compared the burden of sticks to the sins a man had committed and had to carry, and said that the wrath of God would fall like fire and consume the man and his sins if a substitute could not be found, but such a substitute had been provided. "God has provided Himself a Lamb for a burnt offering;" and the speaker urged his hearers to accept the substitution of the Lamb of God.

Bedtime came, and he, too, lay down, but not to sleep. The more he thought upon his sins the greater number he remembered. Old forgotten transgressions started to life and stared him in the face. They would not be banished; they crowded round him more and more; a multitude, they came to torment him. He felt, from the bottom of his soul, he deserved to be lost. Hell seemed close to him. He felt he could not, dare not "stand by his sins" before the bar of God. He burst into a violent perspiration. Well he knew, if he decided for Christ, the life of persecution before him; but those sins! those sins! he could not silence their outcry. In the early morning hours, in the pitch darkness, he flung himself on his knees by his bedside and cried, "O God! I cannot carry my sins any longer. I put them upon Jesus. The fire has fallen on the Lamb of God. I take Him—now." And the worn-out man crept back to bed and fell asleep—soothed by the blessed sense of pardon to rest.

The very next morning he got up early to pray, and from that hour gloried in the Cross of Christ.

He soon seized an opportunity of pouring into sympathizing ears the story of the change that came over him in the room, and his love for the place and all its surroundings; and he showed his delight in the mission-room in a very practical manner.

It, like the huts, was made of wood. In his wandering life he had picked up two handicrafts, if such they might be called—haircutting and joinering; and the latter he was glad to put in practice for our benefit.

It was "York" who knew how to doctor knots in the wood-work and so on; and when our little chancel was added "York" varnished it with much satisfaction and pride, losing half a day's work on purpose. He was fond of taking illustrations from his joinering, and once, when regretting that lack of education hindered his usefulness, he said, "If I'd had education I might have done some of the planing work; but, as it is, I can only knock a few rough knobs off." But not only did he turn joiner for his beloved room, he became also a decorator. He labored hard with some more scholars over the Christmas decorations, and produced grand effects in red calico, though we must own that "merry" did lack an "r" and "Christmas" a "t."

One hot day, when all the other men had gone off to the Sports, "York" and another dear friend spent the day in tarring and sanding the felt on the roof, and they said it had been happier work to them, though it was so hot, than "enjoying the pleasures of the world."

"York" was always eager to learn, and a most attentive listener to any teaching. He took intense interest in the Bible lessons, and the afternoon was oppressive indeed when "York's" eyelids drooped. He took to missioning amongst the other men too, sometimes in rather a rough fashion, for if a man got drunk "York" would mark him, and rising next morning at five, instead of half-past, would go to his slumbering mate, rouse him, and give him a good talking to, showing him in very plain language the consequences of his sin.

"But," we asked, "are they not angry at being awakened?"

"Oh, yes; they don't like it so well; but they don't want to get up, and while they are in bed I have 'em. I puts truth into 'em rough, and they can plane it for themselves."

His one object now became to glorify God. The winter had ended, spring had come and gone, summer had smiled and passed away, and now September had come. The fruit-trees in the garden of the old Hall were laden; the corn-fields on the opposite hillsides shone golden in the sunshine, and another red-letter Sunday had come to the Works. On that seventh of September a confirmation by the venerable Bishop Wordsworth was to be held in our Mission-room, and eight navvies were prepared after much prayer and thought to openly confess Christ before their mates and renew their baptismal promise "to be His faithful soldiers unto their lives' end." Two of the candidates, "York" and another dear fellow, a young man of twenty, were not sure that they had ever been baptized, and so to be certain of it the same clergyman who had preached in the previous February came that afternoon to baptize them. A clean table-napkin was spread on a bench, a white china bowl containing "fair water" stood upon it and served for a font, and there, reverently with bowed heads and clasped hands, we saw our dear friends stand and, even as little children, be baptized. Out into the bright afternoon we went, praising the Lord who had turned darkness into light.

That same evening, before a crowded congregation of his mates, "York" and seven more grown navvies were confirmed, and if ever men meant the words they spoke those navvies meant their confirmation vows. Those who watched the laying on of hands knew what they had been and knew what they had become.

From this time "York" became a regular communicant.

As in his old days he had thrown himself madly into sin, so now, with all the enthusiasm of his soul he gave himself to God. He studied his Bible incessantly. He did not always quite get hold of the meaning, but his mistakes were of no real importance.

A brave, strong, loyal Christian was "York." A man full of prayer; one who walked in the sight of God. His influence was bound to touch his mates. One of these saw him one day, when he thought himself quite alone, cover his eyes and pray before he began breakfast. The man was surprised, and watched him after that from behind heaps of stones or pieces of timber. "York" was working alone then, at some distance from the other men, and thought no eye but God's was on him. His fellow-workman saw he never ate without grace, and the thought "He has got something I have not," drove him to seek and, thank God, to find the Saviour.

But we were not to have "York" much longer amongst us. He is not dead, no! we trust he will live to a green old age; but he is thousands of miles away, and most probably we shall never meet on earth again. He determined to join a brother in Australia. It was at Whiteside gathering of the members of the Christian Excavators' Mission in Leeds, in the June of 1881, that we said farewell to dear old "York." His mates presented him with a book and a purse containing about four pounds. His Sunday teacher had given him a handsome reference Bible; he was photographed with it last year and sent us copies of the likeness. In saying farewell he gave us a most racy and characteristic speech. We wished him good-bye with an ache at our hearts, but thanking God for what in fifteen short months His grace had done; for before our eyes we saw a living testimony that out of a drinking, fighting, hispheming, impure man, God the Holy Ghost can make a new creation—a brother of the Lord Christ. The next day (for he had remained with us to the last moment, and had to travel all night to catch the ship) "York" was out on the ocean.

From his decent appearance and behavior he was at once appointed constable, and had to see that the emigration rules were not broken, and that proper conduct was maintained among the emigrants. This appointment at once subjected him to the dislike of the bad and unruly. When he knelt at his bunk-side to pray, they did all they could to annoy and disturb him, swearing, throwing things, and finally, seeing he bore patiently their insults, one man, an Irish Roman Catholic, emptied a bucket of water over him.

In the old days, "York" would have instantly knocked the man down, but not so now—though he would not allow the slightest infringement of the rules, he bore all personal insults with an unmoved patience. Moreover, he did all he could for the spiritual welfare of his fellow-passengers, feeling, as he described in a letter home, "the courage of a Daniel and the zeal of a Paul." He got up a Bible-class and prayed constantly for his persecutors. Nor did he omit small kindnesses in return for their unkindness and annoyance. "I cut their hair, shaves them—love your enemies," he wrote. All this had its effect; before the voyage was half over, he had won some to care for their souls, and even the worst grew to respect him. As the ship sailed up the Sydney harbor, the man who had thrown the bucketful of water over him came up with a shamed face and held out his hand.

"Will you forgive me?" he asked.

"York" replied, "I can't, for there was no offence taken."

"Will you shake hands?"

"Ay, that I will, but what for?"

"Because you're a brave man."

Then, after a brief time of Christian communion with his mates in Sydney, he went far away up to his brother's farm in the bush, and there, till a few months ago, he has remained ever since. He had hardly got settled when he began to look about for work for Christ, and undertook the charge of a Sunday-school twelve miles away. On Sunday evenings he gathered a few "neighbors" together and held a little service. And for his own spiritual nourishment he rode twenty miles for the holy communion. As time passed, "York" made one rule never to let an opportunity go by of speaking to every one he met of those subjects which lay nearest his own heart. He had done the same in England, and he pursued the like course in Australia. "One of the best opportunities I have of doing my Master's will," he wrote, "is when riding along the road from home or making new acquaintances—"

"I have sent you my likeness," he continued. "I said to the man after finishing me, 'Do you know the first likeness taken in the world?'"

"He began by telling me the Grecian, and it was improved by another foreigner."

"'No,' I said, 'I have it in this Bible.'"

"'He was a German; he listened very attentively. I told him he was the image of his Creator."

"'Surely,' says he, 'you do not mean to say our Creator is so full of selfishness as man?'"

"'No, not so; but the likeness was there,' I told him what defaced it, and how that Blessed One came to rectify it, and that by faith we can get a likeness to God."

"He said he believed he was a sinner."

"I said, 'if you do there is a Saviour for you,' telling him to read the third chapter of St. John's Gospel."

When once he had taken a little contact to mend the road close by a public school, he made friends with the schoolmaster, hoping to learn from him, for "York" is always trying to "improve his mental education." "I meant," he wrote, "to learn something of him and he should of me, in which I rather think I was the gainer of the two, I am sorry to say. For I wanted to learn him in return for what he had learnt me, but he felt himself too proud to learn from a poor navvy."

"When one time I had occasion to go to his house on a Sunday, I asked him if he had given his heart to God."

"'Cannot I be a Christian without praying in public or going to a place of worship? I can go by myself and pray.'"

"'Yes, you can, but do you do it?'"

"'That is my own business.'"

"'Yes, and God's.'"

"'It's my opinion,' he said, 'that passage of Scripture will come true—the first shall be last and the last first.'"

"I said, 'Let us try to have one place of the two, but I think, if you do not alter, you will lose both.'"

But all "York's" work has not been equally unsuccessful. Many has been the means of bringing to the feet of that Saviour he loves so utterly. This has been so because he realizes "Our works are very little in helping on God's kingdom, yet I feel it a pleasure to do all I can for Him to have the glory."

Last Christmas Eve, early in the evening, he saddled his horse and rode off on a long road he had planned out through the bush, touching one farm here and another there. He was armed with his hymn-book. He thought to himself, "Christmas Day is to-morrow, and out here in the wilderness most like they will forget what the Lord did for them. I will remind them with some carols." So the whole night long he rode from farm to farm, and the sleeping households woke to hear a single rough voice singing with the angels, "Glory to our new-born King."

"I cannot do enough," he simply said once, "for Him who has done so much for me; but the widow's mite pleased our Lord."

So his life has gone on in the bush, but his heart has been constantly turned to his old navvy life and his fellow-workmen, and he sent his all in money, £2, to help forward the Navy Mission, which God had used to bring him to Himself. At length the longing to be at work for Christ in the old way and among his old mates has broken down every other consideration, and sent him off on tramp. This June he has written us a happy letter, with part of which we close this little account of dear old "York":

"MY DEAR FRIEND AND SISTER: I AM now in Sydney, which I may say on tramp, although I am having some happy visits with my old friends and fellow-workmen. Nearly ever since I have been in this country it has been on my mind that I ought to be amongst my old mates to show and tell what God has done for my soul, and now keeps me by His heavenly grace. I praise Him I have been with good Christian people and enjoyed happy seasons, and the results of my labors have been fruitful; but I do feel for my fellow-navvies. As Moses chose rather to be in the wilderness with the children of Israel than in Pharaoh's house, thus God knows my heart on this subject. I have not got much light, but, the darker the place the brighter will a little light shine, and may He, for His own glory and to His praise, increase my courage . . . and I do have occasion to mourn over my hard-heartedness and weakness of faith. Lord, give me more. . . .

Well, as work was slack in the place where I was living, I thought I would get on some public work. Well, I bought a tent, and got on some waterworks. I felt alone, yet not—the Father was with me. The second day, at dinner with them, I told them what God had done for my soul, and what a devil I was before giving my heart to be cleansed from all sin. Then I said, 'Will you allow me to read a few verses out of my Bible?' 'Yes,' they said. I read the fifth of St. Mark to the twenty-first verse. Then I said, 'I will pray with you, my brothers.' They laughed, and said, 'Do you think, if you was to die now you would go straight to heaven?' 'Yes.' Some said, 'That's more than I can say.' I said, 'Believe on the Lord, forsake your sins, and repent, and thou shalt be saved, and God bless you.' Do you know, I had a lot of eyes watching me after that, even the ganger watched me more than common, to see if he could not pick me up. I felt God with me, for His eye was on me too and guiding me; I felt it good to keep well down at the foot of the cross, looking well up. Here I stayed three weeks, and it was finished, so now I had to ride all night on the water in a boat to get to Sydney to see my old friends and to go out on the line where J. Smith and Teetotal Tommy is. In the room where our bunks were there was card-playing. Before retiring I pulled out my Bible and began to read. The card-players left off playing to rattle me, and the steward said:

"Do you believe in that book?"
"I said, 'With all my heart.'
"He said, 'I don't.'
"I know you do."
"No; it's been altered five or six times."
"I know all about it; thank God it is true for me."
"How do you make that out?"
"It's only been translated and retranslated for every poor soul to read and understand it."

"You know, I had three or four at me at once; but I said, 'Let us reason together, then I will talk with all.'
"One fellow said, 'Read us a chapter.'
"All right," I said, and turned to the fourteenth Psalm: 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'
"The steward said, 'I never said there was no God, for I do say there is one.'
"Again I repeated the verse, and 'Steward, you do believe in my Bible, I know.'
"How is that?"
"You believe you are a sinner; do you not?"
"Yes."
"Then the Bible tells us so too, and we need a Saviour."

Then I fell on my knees and prayed, and got into my bunk. The next morning I saw some of them with their backs up and asked them how it was with them. They shook their heads. Lord, help them to come to the light from darkness. I went to see Miss — at her home, and she has a nice place, and she said, 'Well, York, you are looking younger,' I am not six yet, for all my other time in the world was dead till my conversion; then I was quickened by the true life. She is very busy, and we proposed to hold a union meeting at W. Noyce's, so I went round and told the members our intentions, and as many as could come came, and we told of the good our mission had done. It was the instrument in the hands of God for bringing me for one out of darkness into His marvellous light; before I was led by the devil. It is a deal different in this country to home, yet there is plenty of room for workers. Lord, help us to push it along here. . . .

Good-bye, and God bless you, "York;" it is true of you at least, "Once I was blind, now I see."—Sunday Magazine.

WHAT AN OLD CHRISTIAN THOUGHT OF LIFE.

The Epitaph of Abercius of Hieropolis.

BY ARCHDEACON FARRAR, D.D.

"We are His people and the sheep of His pasture,"—PSALM c. 2.

5. "For He—this pure shepherd" says Abercius, "taught me faithful writings." The faithful writings are the four Gospels, the old, old story, the Gospels of divine and human love, the Gospels of peace and good will toward men. The special reference seems to be to the Gospel of St. John, to the authority and genuineness of which we have here a new and powerful testimony. But notice that Abercius puts Christ first, the Gospels afterward. He is not a Bible-Christian, and the difference between the two is stupendous. It is the difference between sectarianism and piety, between orthodoxy and holiness, between narrow hatred and heavenly love. The supernatural revelation to him was Christ, and not the books which testified of Christ. "Ye search the Scriptures," said Christ to the Pharisees, "for in them ye think that ye have eternal life, and ye will not come unto Me that ye may have life." Abercius went to Christ, and then the Scriptures became to him, not what they are to modern parties and their idol newspapers, heaps of miseries to throw at all who hold different errors from their own, but guides to the feet of Jesus, and luminous with the light of love.

6. Then he tells us of his travels; not because they were travels, but because they led him everywhere to happy communities of Christian men. The pure Shepherd had sent him to Rome, where he saw the golden-robed, golden-sandalled queen, and a people having a bright seal. This has been frivolously explained to mean that he saw at Rome the Empress Faustina, and the Roman senators who wore large seal rings; and out of his supposed interview with the empress, his biographer has made a marvellous legend. Nothing assuredly would have been less likely to occur to this Christian bishop as worthy of record, than the fact that he saw at Rome a pagan empress. The Empress Marcus Aurelius, his bad wife, Faustina, and his bad son, Commodus, would have had less interest for him than three poor Christian slaves. He would have estimated the grandeur of their humanity, not the glitter of their passing rank. To him, as to our Prayer Book, the greatest queen could but have been "this woman," and the mightiest sovereign "this man." Faustina was as little to Abercius as Poppaea and Nero were to St. Paul. Still less would he have cared for men having gold rings. No! in his simple metaphorical style "the golden-robed, golden-sandalled queen" is the Church of Christians in the royal city; and the bright seal is the seal of baptism, the seal of God on the foreheads of His redeemed children. In the book of Ezekiel the vision had said to the prophet, "Go through the midst of the city and set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and cry for the abomination that be done in the midst of her." That mark, in the original, is the letter thou, which in the old Hebrew was written as a cross. What struck Abercius in the great wicked streets of Rome, was that there walked in the midst of them a purer people who had the bright seal of their redemption visibly marked upon their foreheads. In the imperial city he saw the crowded splendor of her merchandise, her palaces and amphitheatres, her purple robes and golden eagles, her ivory sceptres and curule chairs; but he saw the Church which reminded him of St. John's vision of the woman clothed with the sun and sandalled with the moon, and with twelve stars as her crown; and he saw the souls of men.

7. And so when he goes on to say that he had travelled through the plain and cities of Syria, and crossed the Euphrates to Nisibis, it had not been his object to speculate on the resources of nations, or to gaze on the magnificence of nature, but to share his thoughts, and hopes, and happiness with those who owned with him one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of us all. Faith was his guide and courier, and he followed her with the thoughts of Paul for his support. With such a guide, with such bright truths to help him, Christian intercourse was a precious thing in days when Christian was to Christian as a brother; when for professing Christians brotherly love had yet a meaning; when even pagans exclaimed with envy, "See how these Christians love!" whereas now they say with triumph, "See how these Christians hate one another!"

And when Abercius tells us that faith set before him everywhere as food a "fish from the fountain, right large and clean, which a pure virgin held," do not suppose that he, like modern travellers, is telling you about his daily meals. It is only the picturesque style of the East. Perhaps, originally as a secret watchword in times of danger, Christians were accustomed to speak of Christ as "the Fish," because the first letters of Greek word ΙΧΘΥΣ "fish," stood for the Ιησους Χριστος Θεου Υιου Σωτηρι Jesus Christ the Son of God the Saviour. It is said that when under peril of persecution, one Christian desired to recognize another, he would say in a low voice Ιχθεις and the other, if he were a Christian, would reply "Ιχθιδιον" a little fish, a humble Christian. "We are," says Tertullian, "as little fish in relation to our Ιχθεις; we are born in the water (of baptism)." In another ancient epitaph found at Autun, the Christian is thus addressed: "Offspring of the holy Ichthus, use the immortal life which, while yet a mortal, thou hast received from the divine waters. Refresh thy soul, beloved one, with the overflowing waters . . . eat with a longing hunger, holding the fish in thy hands." So then here, once more, we have the old Christian idea, now so utterly forgotten, or with such gross and superstitious materialism abused, of feeding on Christ; nourishing our life with the life of Christ. This is mystically expressed by Abercius, when he says that everywhere faith gave him the fish as food—that fish is Christ. It is right large, for it satisfies all needs. It is clean, for in Him is nothing but holiness. It comes from the fountain of baptism, and the pure virgin who grasps it is the Church. She gives it to all everywhere, and with it good wine—the new wine of the kingdom of heaven, and bread therewith. The bread is the bread of life, and He who said, "I am the bread of life," and the wine is Christ.

The word "excellent" wine is Xpociv, and among the early Christians there was a play on the words Xpociv and Xpociv—Christ and excellent. Here, then, thus early, on this tomb of a poor Christian hishop in the second century, you have the recognition of the Gospels; of the Epistles; of the love, and the divine exaltation of the risen, ascended, glorified redeemer, Christ; of the strong sense that He was ever with His children, and His Church; you have also the spread of the Christian truth; the mutual loving-kindness of Christians; the supremacy of faith; the communion of saints; the Holy Catholic Church; the holy seal of baptism; the sacramental communion of the Body and Blood of Christ. And thus the little epitaph of a few lines becomes a mine of Christian evidences. And notice as its central thought that the Christian must live on Christ; cannot live without Christ; must be sustained by the thought of Christ.

What do we live on? Our bodies on material food. Yes! and our minds on what? It is on journalism; and on frivolous personality; and on books which ignore Christ, and think Christianity an obsolete thing beneath their notice? Do you expect Christian intellects to thrive on such food? "Give me a great thought, and I will live on it," said Herder. Are these great thoughts to live on?

And our spirits, what do they live on? or do they live at all? There is only one thing on which the Christian spirit can live, and that is on Him who is the true manna, and the water which he who drinketh shall thirst no more.

"Irene, da calicem! Agape, misce mi!"—O Love, give me that cup! O Peace, mingle that wine for me! Lord, ever more give me that living bread.

Such was the self-chosen epitaph, the last legacy to the world of the old man who tells us that he was spending his two-and-seventieth year, not amid the world's shame and shadows, but truly; that is, in the region of the eternal realities; and thus he has supplied us with our thoughts this morning; he has, as it were, handed to us the bright torch of his faith over the dust and darkness of seventeen hundred years. Compare his thoughts with those of modern life; compare his epitaph with those in the abbey, and you will feel the change that has come over Christians. You see it in the abbey tombs. First, the effigies lie on their backs with hands upon their breasts, like the Russian proverb, "Two praying hands, and life is done." They are tombs of humility, of prayer, of death. Then the figures kneel humbly on their knees. Lastly, they stand in earthly pomp and pride, the bishop in his lawn and mitre, the judge in his ermine, the warrior with his sword, the statesman gestulating in the passion of oratory; lastly, their memorials loll at ease in their arm-chairs. The old way was the better; the old conception was humbler and more true.

8. And to conclude. Has he nothing to teach us? Are your views of life like those of the old simple-minded Abercius of Hieropolis? Do you attach the same importance to the things which seemed important to him? Are the same things dear to you which were so dear to him? The citizenship which he places first of all—are you citizens of that heavenly city?

Competition, fret, push, envy—the Juggermath-car of our modern life, under whose wheels we fling our children in thousands—it has no place in that city of God. There are no jealousies, no meannesses, no deliberate injustice, no slanders there. The greatness of great men is not there supposed to be manifested by shamefully bitter judgments on others, and all the spleenful malevolence of atrahulous pride.

The great archangels there—the cherubim and seraphim, the lucifer spirit of knowledge, the ardent spirit of love—are not too intellectual to know God, or Christ, or judgment, or eternity. There are no evil passions there; no wrangling sects; no peering malignities; no paltry jealousies; no fawning flatteries; no subterranean intrigues. Their ignorance does not assume the air of infallibility, nor hatred wear the mask of zeal. That city of God is not in the least like London, nor its society like modern society. In it the leading principles are magnanimity, and unselfishness, and purity, and love.

Are you disciples of the pure Shepherd? Are you among the sheep which He feeds on hill or plain? Does it ever occur to you that His great eyes are looking down upon you? Are the Scriptures to you faithful writings meant only to lead you to Christ, and to teach you love? Do you ever think of the bright seal of baptism on your own brow, or on that of your brother Christ's? Is your chief delight in humble, kindly, genial intercourse with those who own with you the same dear Lord? How many of you come to the supper of the Lord, to rejoice in the wine poured out, the broken bread which faith provides for you? Does faith give to you that great, clean fish from the fountain? Do you feed on Christ in your hearts by faith? Are you spending your lives truly—among the things which are face to face with eternal realities, or in the midst of small aims, of mean shams, and selfish greed, and ever-vanishing illusions? How many of us offer, how many of us receive, how many of us desire the prayers of our fellow-Christians?

What, when you die, will be the meaning of your life? When poor Robert Emmet was sentenced to execution he said: "Let there be no inscription on my tomb; let no man write my epitaph; no man can write my epitaph."

It is true; none know us; none can write our epitaph. But what honest epitaph should we choose for ourselves? One epitaph of eternal significance shall be written for us. It cannot be avoided. It is, "He did that which was good," and "he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord." What epitaph shall the eternal hand of God inscribe upon our tombs?—Sunday Magazine.

ON PRAYER.

BY M. O. C.

Of all the duties of the inner life I suppose there is none which is performed so frequently in a perfunctory manner as private prayer. Probably the rule of our lives since we first learned to whisper our holy prayers at our mothers' knees, has been to "say our prayers" each day, morning and evening. Alas! that "saying" our prayers should be but a too true description of a vast majority of our devotions: the evening comes, so we kneel down and, with little thought or effort at recollection, repeat our common form, perhaps learned from some book, perhaps still the childish prayers, though we have long outlived our childhood. A year or two ago I was speaking to a woman about her children's prayers, she said, Oh yes, she always made them say their prayers at night; but on my asking her what they said, she quoted the old doggerel,

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
God bless the bed that I lie on, etc.

and after these a few words about "telling no lies," which I now forget. And yet this was an intelligent woman, who for some time had been attending a little mission church where there was very decided Churchly teaching, and was herself a communicant. Knowing that such ignorance as this still exists, and that with some less ignorant prayers are simply forms without any reality, at the outset of this paper I will say a few words as to what prayer is, and its constituent parts, in the humble hope of helping perhaps one of my sisters. First, then, prayer is the lifting up of the heart to God; talking with God. It is the treating Him as "our Father;" and as little children look trustfully up in an earthly father's face, and make their little wants known, or tell him their little joys and sorrows certain of sympathy, so ought prayer to be to us. In prayer we make God our confidant, and as we speak He hears and helps and comforts. Are we glad and full of a deep joy, then we follow St. James's advice, and being merry, "sing psalms." Are we anxious and careworn, then we go and lay our burdens down at His feet, and even as we lay it there relief and comfort come, and He "refreshes" us, and as we rise from our knees we feel such a wondrous fullness of vigor, such a simple trust, that though the trouble remains it no longer crushes nor weighs us down. A praying Christian brings to bear against all difficulties, within and without, the host of heaven, yea, God Himself, and surely "if God Himself be for me, I can a host defy." My sisters, if we would pray, if we would but really live, we must pray, and pray continually. "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God." It must not be only great needs, great joys, great sorrows, that must bring us to our knees, but the tiny daily trials and pleasures of life should all be the subjects of prayer. Prayer ought to consist of five parts, by which I mean our stated morning and evening prayers, and they are: 1, confession of sin; 2, thanksgiving for mercies received; 3, praise; 4, petition; and 5, in tercession. The more these several steps of prayer come in all our devotions the better. Whatever time of day we pray we must always be conscious of having committed more or less of sin since last we knelt in prayer, so ought to begin our devotions with confession of sin and prayer for mercy. "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on me," is a prayer for pardon with which we are all familiar, and which will suffice for our general prayer for pardon; at night there ought, after the Invocation, to be a brief but careful examen of the day past, and then a somewhat longer form of confession, bringing in the particular sins our examen has brought to mind. One word of warning: self-examination is a very unpleasant duty, and if the devil can make us neglect, or slur over it, he certainly will; hence we should jealously watch ourselves, lest, little by little, we get into careless habits as to this duty. Then, if always conscious of sin in ourselves, we ought also to be ever thoughtful of the loving, tender care wherewith our Father has guarded us, and this naturally comes in the second step in prayer, thanksgiving. If this is a difficulty, I think it will help us to attain to a thankful spirit if we often, in our morning prayers, just briefly recount the great blessings of our life, such as our birth of Christian parents; our baptism; holy teachings in early childhood; our confirmation with its great gifts; all opportunities He has given us of being present at the holy sacrifice and of communion; for being brought under Churchly teaching, and led by the spirit to accept the faith; preservation in dangers and sickness; for the twenty, or thirty, or forty years of long-suffering, tender, pitying love wherewith He has loved us, notwithstanding all our sins and coldness; and surely by the time we have thought of these, and of the special, particular love to our own souls which are sealed up in our innermost being, known only to ourselves and God, our hearts will be filled with a great thanksgiving, which shall express itself in a Te Deum or a Magnificat, or a simple "for this, for this, my God, I thank Thee." And by thanksgiving the heart is attuned to praise, the third step in prayer, and we cannot better express praise to the great, the glorious, the Eternal God Who is Love, than by a Gloria Patri or the Gloria in Excelsis from the Communion Office. Praise will be, we believe, our great employment in heaven; let us try to learn it here on earth. See how full the Psalms are of praise; see how in the glimpse of glory we have in Revelation the key note is praise and worship, and do not be satisfied with your devotional life until you can offer to God true praise.

The fourth step is petition. And here I would only say, my sisters, you cannot ask too much, and yet nothing is too small to be prayed for. Thus I make a grand petition for the salvation of all men, for the spread of the Catholic faith, for my own entire conversion—all great things, but not too great for His power and strength. And again, I am hungry and have no work, so I ask for daily bread, and He who "feedeth the young ravens that call upon Him" sends me what I need. Some thing or person I love much may be removed from me, I ask for him to be spared, and am quite sure, if good for me, it shall be so. I may pray about my work, about my games, about all that interests, like a little child prattling to her mother, and I know He will hear and bless. And when I have prayed for myself, my own needs, the temptations I am about to meet, the work I have to do, I must leave myself in His hands, knowing how He will be with me all the day to make me strong in His service, and "keep me in all my ways."

Lastly comes step five, which is intercession, and about this I would speak at some length, for it is a duty but little thought of by many.

If we omit intercession in our daily devotions we are failing in a very plain duty taught us in Holy Scripture and by the example of our Lord Himself, and we are missing a glorious privilege, even that of being fellow-workers with Him. For what is the present work of the Man Christ Jesus but making "intercession for us"? and if we pray for others here our prayers ascend into the Father's presence, making one sweet harmony with the prayers of His dear Son. My sister, because you are a poor, hard-working woman, may be, and with lots you need to pray for yourself, that need not cut you off from the happy privilege of praying also for others. What is the pattern prayer? "Our Father," but intercession? No, "I" nor "me" in that prayer, but each time we use it we do so simply as "members of Christ, children of God," and pray for all who are united to us in that wondrous "communion of saints." Whatever we do we must not be selfish in prayer, narrow, petty. We may pray for our own wants as much as we like, but the wants of others must never be excluded. That is one of the great blessings of our "Common Prayer," that it is composed so largely of intercession. Look around you and see; is there no one living near you who needs your prayers? do you not know any one who is in sorrow or trouble, or whom you feel powerless to help; human sympathy is so poor and comfortable in real trouble, and you feel that; oh, then, pray for them. There is a Heart that can feel for every sorrow, there is a Hand stretched out to hold up and sustain the most broken-hearted. Invoke from your Heavenly Father that aid, and you will help the sorrowful a thousandfold more than you could by warmest expressions of pity.—The Penny Post.

THE FAITHFUL FRIEND.

The following is a pretty little Eastern Legend:

"When Adam was driven out of Paradise all the animals that aforesaid had delighted to follow him fled at his approach. In deep sorrow he sat down upon a rock and covered his face with his hands. Soon, however, he heard a rustling in the bushes, and felt a soft tongue gently trying to lick his covered face. He looked up and met the liquid eyes of a dog brimming over with love and compassion for his fallen master, and Adam was comforted; for he found there was still one creature that forsook him not, but preferred his company to a life of wild liberty. And ever after through succeeding ages the dog has been of all animals the friend of man."

How can anybody ill-treat so faithful and loving a companion? Especially a dog's love for children will claim a return for all children's hearts. The other day in making a call I saw a very large dog lying at full length upon the hearth-rug. He was a St.

Bernard and a splendid fellow; his mistress was a tiny maiden of twelve years, who had been sent to the house with a message and the dog had followed her. "Come, Leo," said the little girl when she was ready to go. The huge creature rose in an instant and obeyed, as if he had no will of his own. And yet he could have crushed her with his paw; I might have said he could have eaten her at one mouthful; but he was content to do her bidding, baby as she was, because he loved her, and ill would it have been for anybody or anything that would have dared to molest her.

THE ART OF CATECHISING.*

BY THE REV. GEORGE HODGES.

I.

Bishop Wilberforce once preached a sermon before the University of Oxford, having before him, by way of manuscript, the back of an envelope bearing the one word "fog." The bishop's biographer does not tell us what the sermon was about, and the note gives foothold only for the most hazardous conjecture. If we were to guess what the sermon was not about—which would certainly be the easier task—our knowledge of the bishop's theology would give us ground for affirming quite positively that he did not describe the happiness and helpfulness of a "vague religion." It is much more likely that his theme was the danger of indefiniteness. In spite of Mr. Matthew Arnold, there is danger in theological indefiniteness. Many a man who has made shipwreck of his faith, first lost his bearings and drifted from the right course by being blinded by a doctrinal fog. He only can steer surely who sees clearly. He will be the keeper of the faith, able to go aright himself and to lead others, who knows exactly what he believes and precisely why he believes it. Accordingly, our duty as teachers in a day of doubt, is to teach as definitely as we can. We may well pray with one of old, "Lord give me wisdom enough that I may speak plain enough."

The advantage of catechising over other methods of instruction, is in its unrivalled opportunities in this matter of definiteness. Other modes of teaching display the knowledge of the teacher; catechising discovers the knowledge or lack of knowledge of the learner. Preaching, or general instruction, is an attempt to fill a group of narrow-necked vessels by dashing water over them. A few drops may lodge in each. Catechising, to give the old comparison a new application, is a singling out those vessels one by one, and pouring water into them. You are sure then that some gets in.

The word "catechise" has a syllable in common with the word "echo." In each word the common syllable is the significant one. The letters which precede it in "catechise" are, in the Greek, κατὰ and simply add emphasis. Catechising, then, is an emphatic or loud kind of echoing. An echo in the chateau of Simonetta, in Italy, has thirty voices. I have heard catechisings that had three hundred.

In the first rubric after the catechism in the English Prayer Book, clergymen are directed to "instruct and examine" the children of their parishes. "To instruct" has been defined as a questioning of the meaning into them; and "to examine," as a questioning of the meaning out of them. In our Prayer Book, for some reason, the rubric reads: "instruct or examine." To instruct and examine is catechising. "To instruct," that is the voice; and "to examine," that is the echo.

* Read at two meetings of the Pittsburgh Sunday-school Association.

The purpose, then, of catechising is to get a clear, emphatic echo. At Simonetta you can get only sounds repeated. Sunday-schools may be made to echo thoughts also. There are two kinds of catechising. One aims chiefly at a repetition of exact words; the other seeks ideas and meanings, and has small regard for the mode of their expression.

In doctrinal catechising, the former method is the better. We have apostolic example for teaching a "form of sound words." Much depends in matters of the faith upon the use of the best words. The catechist who provides a catechumen with the most true and definite expression of a doctrine, thereby arms him with shield and sword. What is the mystery of the Trinity? That the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet they are not three Gods, but one God. What is the mystery of the Incarnation? That Jesus Christ is at the same time God and Man. What is the mystery of the Atonement? That Jesus Christ saved us from our sins by dying for us. Such answers become formulas, definition of truth, tests of falsehood.

Doctrinal catechising, especially with infant classes, may well be made a literal echoing. Catechist: "What is it to sin? To do what God tells us not to do." School: "To do what God tells us not to do." Catechist: "What is it to sin?" School: "To do what God tells us not to do."

Exclusive attention to sound, however, sometimes produces quite remarkable echoes. Here is "My duty towards my neighbor," from an English school room. It should be remembered that where we say "to honor and obey the civil authority," English children say "to obey the queen and all that are put in authority under her." Here is the whole answer: "My dooty tornds my nalsers, to love him as myself, and to do to all men as I would they shall do and to me to love, onner and suke my farther and mother and bay the queen and all that are pet in a forty under her, to smit myself to all my goones, teachers, spartial pastures and masters who oughten myself lordly and every to all my betters to hut nobody by would nor deed, to be trew and jest in all my declins, to beer no nalsis nor atred in your arts, to keep my ands from peeking and steel, my turn from evil speak and lawing and slanders not to civil or desar other man's good, but to lern labour trewly to get my own leaving and to do my dooty in that state of life and to each it bes please God to call men."* The catechist here had evidently made no sufficient attempt to find if the child knew the sense as well as the sound. In doctrinal catechising, after the words are learned, the formula should be made real by questions upon the meaning. This process demands much patience. Again and again must the mind be urged to reinforce the lips. Even after the most careful teaching some curious answers may be expected. The Bishop of Chester, acting as catechist, asked "Who is your spiritual enemy?" and one child in the school spoke up and replied, "the bishop."

In narrative instruction, that is in Bible lessons, it is better in the main, to use the other kind of catechising, and to get the meaning of the answers recited, rather than the words. The Scripture story having been read, or told, or previously studied, the catechist tries to make it real to the children, and to impress its meaning by questions.

The lesson, for example, is the marriage feast at Cana. Where did our Lord go? To Cana. Where is Cana?—no answer. Well, is it anywhere in Pennsylvania? No, sir. Think now where the Bible says it is; Cana of—? Galilee. Now, you remember there were three parts in the country where Christ lived. The lower one, in the South, was Judea. What great city was there? Jerusalem. The middle part was Samaria. What happened there at a well? Christ talked with the woman. Galilee was the northern part. Our Lord lived there till he was nearly thirty years old. What was the name of the place where he lived? Nazareth. Yes, and Cana was only about five miles from Nazareth. What did our Lord go to Cana for? no answer. Well, it was to attend a funeral, wasn't it? No, sir; a wedding. What kind of a time do people usually have at weddings; do they feel happy or sorry? Happy. And so our Lord was there when these people at Cana were having such a good time. Does he know when we are happy? Yes, sir. Is he glad when we are glad? Yes, sir. And yet some people think that religion is meant to take all the pleasure out of the world. Don't you think that those people enjoyed themselves all the better because our Lord and St. Peter and St. John and St. Bartholomew and the other ministers were there? Of course they did. But if our Blessed Lord is with us and sees us and hears us, how careful we ought to be to make our glad times good times. Then, farther on, about the water-pots: What were standing in the yard? Water-pots. What were they made of? Stone. What was in these big stone jars? Water. Were they full? Yes, sir. Think a moment; didn't our Lord tell the servants to fill them? Yes, sir. So you see they were not quite full. Well, if some of the water had been taken out, what had the Jews used it for?—no answer. Why, what do we use water for? To drink. Yes; for what else? To wash our hands. But when do we wash our hands; when they are clean? No, sir, when they are dirty. Well, one of the strange things about the Jews was that they washed their hands when they were clean! It was a part of their religion. No matter how clean their hands were, they would no more think of eating their dinner without washing them over again, than we would think of eating without saying grace. Perhaps they were even more particular than we are. What proverb do you know about clean hands—"Clean hands and a"—? "pure heart." Now we can see one reason why the Jews washed so much, even when they were clean; it was to remind them that God wanted them to have pure hearts. We have left off washing our hands as a part of our prayers; but what are we to have? Pure hearts.

"THEIR EYES WERE HOLDEN THAT THEY SHOULD NOT KNOW HIM."

BY THE REV. JOHN MAY, M.A.

We talk together as we go
All sadly down the path of life;
Broken with pain, and bent with we,
Or wearied with the daily strife:
O come, Thou crucified! draw near:
Walk with us till the night is here.

When cares oppress, and doubts arise,
Come near, and join us as we go;
O take the dimness from our eyes,
That we may see thy face and know!
Say in our ears the word of peace;
And bid the doubt and anguish cease.

Lo! as the widow weeps her loss,
When Thow art gone our spirits fail;
Our sins have nailed Thee to the cross,
And sadly we passed down the vale;
O Jesu, come from out the tomb
Where they have laid Thee,—Saviour, come!

Be with us, Lord!—Forgive the sin;
Come, talk with us: our hearts are sad!
Thy words shall make them burn within!
Thy loving voice shall make them glad.
Walk by our side, and with us stay;
The night is near; far spent the day.

These sins have hid Thee from our sight;
Yet, Lord, we fain would do Thy will.
We hate the evil, love the right;
But, oh! somehow, we stumble still!
Draw near, and let us hold Thy hand;
Without Thee, Lord, we cannot stand.

Thou praydest, once, that all of Thine
Might from the evil thing be kept;
But we have lost the grace divine;
For sin assailed us as we slept.
O come! Our oil is all but spent:
We love Thee, Lord, and we repent.

Come, Saviour, come! and with us sup;
The Night is drawing on apace;
Come, break the bread, and pour the cup,
That we may see and know Thy face!
Come! drink with us the sacred wine
And feed us with the bread divine.

And when, before the final gate
We stand, and shrink with mortal fear;
Then as we halt disconsolate,
Wilt Thou not, as of old, draw near!
'Bid with us through that awful Night,
And lead us safely to the Light!

A RECOGNIZED PULPIT TALENT.

Better than the literary style of the day as found in the pulpit, or at the desk, is the clear deep stream of devotional feeling which runs through the sermons and lectures of the parish clergy. The cold essay of Blair and of his court days is gone, no less than the stately efforts of Jeremy Taylor and his unconscious imitators and followers. Every principle established or elucidated, is driven home by the living voice, and though but as the chance arrow of the archer who drew his bow and shot King Ahab between the joints of his armor, that he died, still the sermon loses by no means any of its force from the loving sense of personal responsibility and heart consecration with which, in our pulpits, far and near, it is delivered. The sermon is living truth for living men, and dead issues and a dreary style are recognized as all out of place.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

MISS PHOEBE'S SCHOLARS

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

III.

Two of the youngest of Miss Phoebe's scholars were her own little nephew and niece, who lived in the house where the school was. Little Elma, indeed, would have been thought too young for any school, except her auntie's, under her own papa's roof. And yet Elma felt herself a match for Charley, any day, when they were together.

When the school first began, more than a year before Ernest, or Margie, or Walter began to attend, Elma began with it as a scholar. Then she was not quite three years old, and sometimes she had the same effect upon the other children as "a lamb at school." But, as the scholars knew that if they did "laugh and play" Miss Phoebe would send Elma in to her mamma, they tried to keep straight faces, and treasured up her funny little sayings and doings to laugh over at recess.

One day Elma was scribbling earnestly on a slate; after a while she said to Susie Nott, in a loud whisper: "I've made a horsey on my slate!"

Susie looked and nodded, though she could not make out "head or tail" of the horse.

"Take it off now!" said Elma, and she held up the slate to be washed with Susie's sponge.

Another time she was watching a bug, or beetle, which lay on the floor without moving.

"Poor bug, all dead!" she said to herself, pityingly, and then nudged Charley to look at it.

Something else arrested her attention, and when she glanced back at the beetle it was slowly travelling across the floor.

"Oh, see the bug now, Charley! Is it mended?" said Elma.

Once when the geography class was reciting, Miss Phoebe was explaining to the children about the productions of different climates. Elma sat beside her auntie, gravely listening, and presently announced:

"My bruvver Charley sared some beans, out of the squash, when mamma cut it, and he's going to plant 'em in the summer, and have some onions grow!"

Charley and Elma were generally very loving and kind to each other, and did not often have a serious quarrel. But one morning when the school-bell rang they came in with clouded faces, and glanced at each other several times rather crossly. They had been with their papa for an early drive before school, and on the way they chose sides, as they often did while riding. That is, Charley claimed everything that they saw on one side of the road, and Elma had the other side for her's.

"I've got a beautiful flower-bed, in front of that house!" cried Elma.

"Have you? I've got a cunning little dog. Oh, and a swing! See how high that boy is swinging in it!"

"That's nice! Oh, see my little ducks, and my calfy over there in the pasture!"

So they went on, until at last Elma screamed, with delight,

"Oh, Charley, three dear, pretty rabbits for me! See—in that field!"

Charley was envious now.

"Say, Elma, let's change sides!" said he.

"Oh, no; 'cause then the rabbits would be yours, and I want 'em for mine!"

"Let me own one of them!" But Elma shook her head.

"You'll have lots of nice things on your side," she said.

"I think you're awful stingy!" answered Charley.

Papa had been driving slowly up the steep hill while this went on, and was so busy with his own thoughts that he did not notice the children's prattle until these angry words came out. Then he said,

"Tut, tut! Don't quarrel, little ones."

But, as I said, the cross feelings lasted until they reached home and had gone into school. Miss Phoebe noticed this, and when she had a few moments to spare she called Charley and Elma to her side.

"What is the matter, children?" she

"THREE DEAR, PRETTY RABBITS FOR ME!"

Of course the children had to laugh then, and they wondered what sort of climate Charley would need to raise onions from squash seeds.

"He's going to, isn't he, Aunt Phoebe?" said Elma; "and I'm going to plant all the egg shells, and have some eggs grow in my garden!"

By the time Elma was four years old she was a very sedate little scholar; only, even then she would ask funny questions sometimes. As, when her auntie was telling some of the children about the motions of the earth around the sun, Elma asked:

"Auntie, does the sun turn into the moon at night?"

asked, in a low voice, so as not to disturb the scholars who were studying.

"Charley wanted my rabbits!"

"Well, auntie, she had three, and she wouldn't let me own one!"

Auntie was puzzled until she remembered their drive, then she guessed what it meant.

"Were they wild rabbits, out in the field?" she asked.

Charley guessed they were wild.

"Were they quarrelling, Elma? Was one little rabbit keeping all the good things away from the others?"

"Why, no, auntie, of course not! Why, they were cuddling down together just as nice as could be!"

"Just think," said auntie, "how they would feel if they could understand that two little children were quarrelling about them! If you had some rabbits that were truly your own, Elma, would you like to keep them all yourself, and not let brother Charley own a share?"

"Why, no, I wouldn't!" said Elma, and, after a little struggle, she added, "You may own one of my field rabbits, Charley, and I'll own one, and the other we'll own together!"

Miss Phoebe smiled at them, and sent them quietly to their seats, and she smiled again as she saw Charley give his little sister's hand a loving squeeze on the way.

After school Miss Phoebe called Elma and Charley to take a walk with her.

"Would you like to see some tame rabbits?" she asked, and there was no doubt left in her mind by their answer.

Miss Phoebe took the children to a house off on a by-road. She knocked at the door, and asked for "Barney."

"I think he's out feeding his rabbits," said the pale woman who opened the door.

"Oh, then, may I take these little folks out there? I came to ask if they might see the rabbits."

Barney's mother said,

"Certainly."

And they went round to a shed back of the house. Part of this shed was divided off with wire screening, and, looking through the wire, the children saw Barney and the rabbits, too.

"Oh, what beauties!" cried Charley. "They're all white! How pretty white rabbits are!"

"Oh, Charley, see those dear, dear little ones!" cried Elma, clapping her hands.

"Well, Barney, have you any ready for sale now?" asked Miss Phoebe.

"Oh, yes, ma'am; all these nearly grown ones are large enough. There are three pairs of them, you see," and Barney reached after one and another of his pets.

"Auntie, are you going to buy some of those dear, pretty rabbits?" asked Charley, with sparkling eyes.

"I thought of it, Charley. Have you forgotten that it is somebody's birthday today?"

"Mine! Oh, will they be for me, then?" and Charley fairly danced with joy; so that the old rabbits made a rush for their burrow.

Elma stood by, with her little hands clasped, looking at Charley, and then at the rabbits.

"Auntie, Elma shall own them with me; may she?—because she said I might own part of her wild ones."

"Very well, dear; that is a kind thought.

And now Barney wants you to choose your pair."

"Why, aren't they all alike?" asked Charley.

"They are not all alike to me," Barney said, and he pointed out some little differences.

"Well, you help me choose, Elma," said Charley.

And after due consideration the important bargain was made, and Barney promised to bring the pair home within an hour.

To the children's surprise, when they reached home they found their papa busy building a rabbit-hutch. So the little rabbits found a home directly.

And Charley and Elma never quarrelled about them once.

A SUNDAY SERVICE AT CAMP CHOCORUA.

BY K. S. H.

As I am sure every boy who reads THE CHURCHMAN will have his curiosity and interest aroused by the word "camp," I may as well begin by telling you a little about Camp Chocorua. On an island in one of the most beautiful lakes in the White Mountain region are the permanent wooden buildings of this summer camp for boys. Here every year nearly the same boys spend three months in a healthy, happy outdoor life, and the place might well be called a boys' paradise, so thoroughly "good," in boy language, are the times they have. The name of the camp is taken from grand old Mt. Chocorua, which, nearly thirty-five miles in the distance, raises its bald, gray summit far above the surrounding hills.

One bright, clear, cool Sunday afternoon in August we started from our hotel in a large mountain wagon, and drove nearly four miles over a rough but picturesque road to a point on the shore of the lake nearest to camp. Here we were met by a party of camp boys and quickly rowed over to the island. I wish you could see this island, with its quaint camp buildings, seven in number, its sandy beach, its placid cove, where a fleet of tiny white canoes lay peacefully at anchor, its fine trees, and, best of all, the twenty-two brown, healthy, happy boys who love this island almost as dearly as their homes.

After landing and greeting the many boys familiar to us from our frequent visits, we started for the chapel, following a winding path under the trees to the extreme end of the island. Here, in a grove of white birch trees, the boys have made a clearing, built rustic seats, and Nature, as though working with the boys, has placed a large flat-topped stone, which answers well for a reading-desk and could be used for an altar. In fact it is always called the altar by the camp, and every Sunday it is dressed with ferns, golden rod, pond lilies, or any fresh wild flowers that are in blossom. A large white birch cross stands on this rock altar; I won't try to tell you how many feet high, as I am very stupid about measurements, but it adds greatly to the impressiveness of the chapel. A small cabinet organ, which can easily be carried to and from the chapel by the boys, furnishes the music for the services, and on this Sunday one of the camp gentlemen accompanied the organ with his violin.

Quietly, reverently, as though in a real church, the boys took their places on the rustic seats. All were dressed in the regular camp uniform of gray and red, and were bare headed. After a few moments of silence, "Onward, Christian soldiers" was heard in the distance, sung by the camp choir, as they marched in procession along the winding path. The choir is constituted of such men and boys in the camp as possessed voices, and they had been carefully and faithfully drilled by a member of the camp faculty.

Of course you know there was no priest at this service, but Mr. B——, the originator and owner of the camp, wearing a plain black cassock, took his place by the big rock and impressively began to read the form of Evening Prayer. The versicles and psalter were chanted by the choir, assisted by some ladies among the guests. At the close of the regular evening service the hymn, "Art thou weary, art thou languid," was beautifully rendered; the first two lines of each verse were sung as solos by the different voices, the remaining lines being given by the entire choir. No sermon or address followed, but at the close of the hymn all knelt, and Mr. B—— read the Commandments, the choir chanting the responses as in a choral service. We all know the Commandments have no place in evening service, but the reading of the old Mosaic law seemed a fitting close for this particular service, and a good moral lesson for the boys to carry with them through the week.

Then followed the offertory, for every boy is expected to give every Sunday some portion of his allowance, or of money earned in camp work, as I can assure you the camp is no mere holiday place, but a great deal of real hard work is done by these boys. During past seasons the offertory has been used for subscriptions to papers and magazines for hospitals and news boys' clubs in New York City, and I suppose it will be appropriated to such objects this year, but on this particular Sunday of which I am telling, the money was for work of the Bishop of New Hampshire. I am sure you will be surprised and interested, and will wish the boys success, when I tell you that this summer they commenced a fund to endow a bed in the boys' ward of St. Mary's Hospital, New York, and they have formed a charity contracting committee to do work and earn money for this object. Two thousand dollars will be needed, but the boys do not seem appalled by the largeness of the sum.

But we have drifted away from the service, so let us go back to the chapel and listen while the choir rise and sing, "All things come of Thee, O, Lord!" and Mr. B—— places the alms basin on the rock altar. A few collects were read, the choir chanted the Nunc Dimittis, and then the procession formed and slowly left the chapel singing, "Hark! hark! my soul!" As the voices died away in the distance, I think every one present felt that in every way the service was beautiful, reverent and touching.

No one present that Sunday will ever forget the scene; overhead through the trees the blue arch of sky, here and there glimpses of the beautiful lake sparkling under the rays of the western sun, and in the distance grand old Chocorua, seen

ART.

A SOLDIERS' and sailors' monument is to be erected on the plaza at the entrance of Prospect Park, Brooklyn, at a cost of $250,000. The architect is R. M. Hunt, and J. Q. A. Ward is working up his designs.

MR. I. M. GARGENGOLO's "On the Promenade," which was exhibited in Boston, was very effective in its rendering of the costume of two models of the time of the directory. It was not long without a purchaser.

A NEW "Holy Family," by Correggio, unspolied in the principal details, has been discovered and restored through Herr Pentler, the custodian of the Vienna Art Academy. It has been recolored three times.

THERE is at South Kensington, England, a picture of Niagara painted by a Massachusetts artist named Wickers, before there were any houses near the falls. It is said to have artistic merit as well as historical.

SOME of the heads in some of Rubens's pictures which have been supposed to be fanciful creations, are now found to be counterparts of heads of some statues in Mantua. It is supposed Rubens made studies of them when residing there.

BRONZE portrait busts have been executed by Thomas Woolner of Lord Palmerston, Earl Russell, the Earl of Derby, Lord Beaconsfield, and Mr. Gladstone. They are to be placed in the Executive Council Chamber of Sydney, New South Wales.

ABROAD the talents of the best artists are employed in interior decorations. Alma Tadema has not thought it beyond the scope and dignity of his profession. Something of the same kind has been done in this city, but only a beginning has been made.

THE value of the works of art belonging to the City of Paris is appraised at $2,451,890. In this sum is included the value of works in the civil buildings, religious edifices, parks, public gardens, highways, etc. The estimate is much lower than we should have placed it.

MUNKACZY is at work upon a painting, the "Death of Mozart," of the same size as his "Milton." Mozart is represented as reclining in an arm-chair feebly attempting to beat time, while four friends sing a requiem. Behind the chair are two female figures manifesting their grief.

THE Louvre has obtained an antique male statue, life-size, holding in one hand a lyre formed of the carapace of a tortoise, and resting the other hand on the trunk of a tree. The "Diane" has been removed from the hall to which it gave its name, and placed in the Salle la Caze.

A PORTRAIT of Albert Durer, painted by himself in 1503, has been found in Germany. In the Albertina collection of Vienna there is one inscribed, "This is a likeness of myself, made in 1484, by means of a looking-glass, when I was a child. Albrecht Durer." It is a marvellous work for a child.

THE Symphony and Oratorio Societies have at length completed their arrangements and issued their prospectuses for the coming season.

Mr. Hilborne L. Roosevelt continues President of the "Symphony," and the Rev. Wm. H. Cook, of the "Oratorio."

The concerts of both societies are to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, where perfect ventilation, exquisite decorations, and inexhaustible seating capacity invite the public.

The "Oratorio" gives three concerts, and three public rehearsals, and the selections are of highest importance, viz. (I.), "The Grand Requiem Mass of Berlioz" (II.), "The Messiah," and (III.) Wagner's Sacred Musical-Drama, "Parsifal," without mutilations or omissions. This latter event is likely to prove the climacteric of musical interest this season, as it will be the first delivery in America, and it will draw from many parts of the country the leading disciples of the music of the future. The concerts will be given November 19, December 19, 1885, and March 4, 1886, and the rehearsals, as usual on the preceding afternoons.

The "Symphony" proposes a series of six concerts and six rehearsals. The opening programme, for November 7, presents "Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony," "The Parsifal Vorspiel," "Raff's Walpurgisnacht," "Liszt's Orchestrated Rhapsodie Hongroise," with two arias for Fräulein Brandt, from Liszt and Gluck. The rehearsals are given on the afternoons before the concerts. The management announce many novelties of great interest, proposed by Mr. Walter Damrosch during his recent visit to Europe. It almost goes without saying that Mr. Damrosch is director of both societies.

SCIENCE.

MICHAEL ANGELO underestimated the lateral strain upon the cylindrical portion of St. Peter's dome in Rome, and huge cracks appeared in it about 1681. In 1747, after finding by close mathematical calculations that the strain exceeded the resisting power by 1,000 tons, six iron bands were put around the dome and there has been now for 138 years no further trouble.

THE mortality tables for July show that the following cities were the most unhealthy of those in this country, and in this respect they went before all the cities of Europe but one: Yonkers, Richmond, Va., Mobile, New York and Brooklyn. Yonkers leads the way with a rate of 38.6 to the 1,000, and none of the others fall below 37. The rate of Königsburg, in Europe, is 39 per 1,000.

A PHOTOGRAPH of a section of the sky has been taken at the Paris Observatory some five degrees square, which shows 3,000 stars on a ten-inch square plate. These are distinctly seen on the plate stars of the fourteenth and fifteenth magnitude. If this portion of the sky is fairly representative, the number of stars, visible to the fourteenth magnitude inclusive, must be more than 20,000,000.

THE inclined plane of the Pennsylvania Railroad by means of steel cables hauls up teams, and freight and passenger cars with the utmost ease. It is 840 feet long, with a rise of nearly forty-three feet to the hundred. It is built on arches, with spans of 232 feet, 120 feet and 60 feet. The cables, entirely of steel, are the largest ever made in this country, and the whole structure has been built without regard to cost.

THE Anthropological Congress, soon to meet in Rome, will have before it a collection of 700 skulls of criminals numbered and classified, with photographs of 3,000 and the brains of more than 150 convicts. They will have thousands of autographs, poems, etc., by criminals. Maps of crime in Europe, with reference to food, institutions, suicide, meteorology, etc. We will furnish a curious study and the conclusions will be looked for with interest.

SOME time ago vessels arriving from sea reported large areas of surface as covered with dead tile fish. From that day no trace of the tile fish has been discovered, and it would seem as if the whole species had been destroyed. Professor Baird thinks it may have been done by cold currents penetrating the waters where they lived. It is only about five years ago that the tile fish was first made known to us by officers of the United States Fish Commission.

M. DOMEYK gives some curious conclusions of his forty-six years of observations on earthquakes in Chili. They are more frequent in the north part where the Andes are 15,000 feet high and there are no volcanoes, than in the south part with its volcanoes and lower mountains. The effects upon buildings depends more upon the nature of the soil than the violence of the shocks. Where there are several shocks the same day it is the second or third that is the most devastating.

THERE is an imitation Japan that may be applied both to iron and wood-work, and it will look nearly as well as if it came from a Japanner's oven. The article at first receives a coat of size, mixed with ivory-black, and when it is dry it is sand-papered and covered with another coat. Then repaint and smooth, taking care not to expose the color of the wood. Mix black Japan with turpentine until it will run from the brush, and give a coat, perhaps two coats may be necessary, in a warm room free from dust.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

IN VIEW of the recent appearance of the revised version of the Old Testament, we feel that a special interest will arise with reference to the history of the Bible. We have therefore secured Messrs. A. D. F. Randolph & Co.'s edition of Dr. Mombert's "Hand-Book of the English Versions of the Bible," published at $2.50, and offer it, with THE CHURCHMAN, at $5.00, or to subscribers now fully in advance at $1.50.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"The book can be recommended to readers and students alike."—Literary World.

"Dr. Mombert . . . has given us in this beautifully printed volume . . . by far the most complete account of the origin of our English Bible that is to be found anywhere."—Southern Churchman.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1885.

The great event in the Church during the last week was the Church Congress at New Haven. It had been admirably prepared for, both by its own secretary and committees, and by the local committees of entertainment, and it was admirably conducted throughout. Preceded by the Holy Communion, with an earnest, loving address by the Bishop of Minnesota, it was opened with a notable speech by its chairman. This speech struck the key-note for the whole congress. It was remarkable not only for the dignified courtesy of its delivery, but also for its conservative independence of thought. The time has, indeed, come when what is merely human in theology, what is new and not the old faith or doctrine, must be rooted out, even if another reformation is required. It was altogether fortunate that the congress was held in Connecticut, and so had the advantage of the presidency of the bishop of that diocese.

As to the subjects of discussion it was of necessity the case that some should be old, and therefore that little which was new should be elicited in their discussion. But the writers and the speakers, with scarcely an exception, evinced that they had thought deep upon the subjects of which they treated. There was little of "buncombe," and a vast deal of earnestness. They differed thoroughly. But the statement of differences made each see the other more clearly, and appreciate him the more.

After all, it is a great step toward unity, to bring differing men upon the same platform. It is one thing for a student, a defender of his opinions, to sit in his study and think, and write against one who differs with him, and quite another thing to meet him personally in public debate. He is no longer an abstract, but a concrete being. The two find that they have many things in common; that they are both men of like passions, yes, and what is better, of like virtues and like excellences of character. The personal presence may be provoking, but it is provoking to love and to good works.

At the congress, that most profound, far-reaching, all-absorbing topic—the Atonement—was discussed from all sides, and in such a spirit that men with a reasonable faith, who had previously dreaded and deprecated the introduction of so sacred a theme to the forum of the congress, were not only disarmed of their apprehensions, but were profoundly grateful for the discussion. Æstheticism in worship was a subject which promised to produce a spicy, keen, debate, and it kept its promise. It was apparent that the laity were not a whit behind the clergy in their interest in, and in their knowledge of the principles of worship.

Acrimony, if there was any, was confined strictly to the Tariff Question, for on that men may differ as widely as they like. It is not a matter of theology. Still less is it a science. Apparently it never will be. The best financiers and political economists do not understand it, and they never will.

Church Unity seemed on the whole to be the subject of profoundest interest. And well it might. It is the comprehensive, all-absorbing need of the day, and Churchmen may well devote time and thought to determining what shall be done and what shall be undone, in bringing into their proper place those who still refuse their allegiance to the one holy, universal, apostolic Church.

It need not be said that the presence of America's distinguished guest, the Venerable Archdeacon, Dr. Farrar, gave a special and valued attractiveness to the congress.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has set forth some "prayers for the approaching election" with an expression of his wish that they may be used in his diocese. It need not be said that the prayers are reverent and devout in spirit and in form, and perfectly appropriate to public use. It is easy to see, however, that their very adaptation to public use allows them to be employed by all parties, and with any political intention that the worshipper may cherish. To the Conservative they will be a devout petition for the defeat of the Liberals. To the Liberal they will seem to ask for the success of his own party. Each will read into them his own party hopes and fears, and will employ them for the confusion of his adversaries. It may be gravely asked, we think, whether such use of public prayer is desirable. It is not that the prayers set forth by the Primate are not excellent. On the contrary, they are so admirable that it is to be wished that they might be used at all times. It is only when they are set forth to be used with reference to a particular crisis like the approaching election, concerning which men are sure to differ, that the use of them is open to grave question. The serious employment of them at this juncture by the two opposing political camps will hardly tend, we fear, to promote belief in the sincerity or efficiency of public prayer.

The news that comes from Copenhagen of the trouble between the Danish government and people reads like a page out of the history of the seventeenth century. It is hardly credible that a constitutional monarch like Christian IX., in a country where the rights of the people are so clearly guarded by constitutional guarantees, could be led to occupy a position so untenable and so critical as that which he has assumed in relation to the popular branch of his parliament. For some reason or other the King of Denmark has been more kindly thought of and spoken of outside of his own kingdom than usually falls to the lot of reigning princes. Whether this has been due to the story of the simplicity and poverty of his life before he succeeded to the throne, to the affection that has dignified his domestic life, to the beauty and attractiveness of his daughters, and the brilliant marriages which they have made, or to the worth of his own character, it is certain that he has stood high among contemporary rulers. It is a matter of sincere regret, therefore, to see him engaged in a struggle with his parliament and people much the same as that which drove the Stuarts from England and the Bourbons from France. Unless he shall somehow learn wisdom before it is too late, there is little doubt that a like fate will overtake him and his house. There may be no bloody revolution and no use of the headman's axe. Kings are no longer so important or so dangerous that it is necessary to kill them or to shut them up. King Christian's castle of Glücksburg, whence, in 1863, he was called to the throne, is conveniently situated just across the border, in the duchy of Schleswig, which, since his accession, has been absorbed by Prussia, and thither he could easily retire if fortune should deprive him of his crown. Or, if Prince Bismarck should object, he can easily and comfortably emigrate in a Cunard steamer to this country. There is room enough here for all the unfortunate and oppressed; and an exiled king could hardly do better than come here, be naturalized, and settle down to the enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship.

From the accounts which reach us there is abundant evidence of the interest and success of the National Prison Reform Congress, which held its annual session last week in Detroit. The discussions of the various topics on the programme were all marked by distinguished ability, and gave evidence of such careful research and earnest thought as augur well for the important and unselfish work which the association has in hand. On the last day a set of resolutions was adopted, which may be considered as summing up the results of the congress. They recommend the industrial training of children as an important means of preventing crime; promptness and certainty in the detection and punishment of criminal offences; the investing of the wardens of prisons with the power to appoint and remove all subordinates, and with responsibility for their character and service; the making of the rescue and reformation of the prisoner the primary and controlling aim in all prison discipline; a thorough reformation of the county jails of the country, so that all contaminating intercourse between those confined therein shall be impossible, and the establishment of houses of detention for accused persons and witnesses, distinct from the prisons to which convicted persons are consigned; the establishment, wherever practicable, of separate prisons for women, to be governed by officers of their own sex; and that in determining the kind of productive labor which shall be used, regard should be had not to its effect upon labor outside of the prisons, nor to its cost to the taxpayers, but to its effect in promoting or injuring the reformatory discipline of the prison. It should be added that these recommendations were made after a most thorough and exhaustive discussion of each topic, and were adopted with substantial unanimity.

At the meeting of the New York Classis of the Reformed Church, which was held the other day, the pastor of a "down-town" church made a vigorous appeal for permission to remove his church to another locality. The reason which he urged with most vehemence was the disreputable character of the neighborhood and the wickedness of the people. From the account of the discussion which has been published, it would seem that the ground of the pastor's contention was not the absence of population, but their depravity. Indeed, he drew quite a striking picture of the crowded houses within a stone's throw of his church, the inmates of which could, in summer, when the doors were open, "see the pastor in his pulpit." The result, urged this zealous pastor, was the emptying of his church, because the respectable people disliked going to such a neighborhood, and the consequent inability of the congregation to pay expenses; and he predicted that unless the removal which he asked for should be allowed at once, the work would be abandoned and "the shutters go up on the church." We do not undertake to fault the reverend gentleman's application for permission to abandon such a field. From his standpoint, perhaps, it seemed the only thing to do. If the Gospel is to be preached only to the respectable, and only when those to whom it is preached are able and willing to pay for it, as seems to be his understanding of it, then, perhaps, it should be provided only in those localities where respectable people live, or to which they will go. Meanwhile, what is to become of the unsavory locality from which this pastor would fly? Who is to preach there the old Gospel to the poor? and who shall support the ministry of such a gospel? We commend these questions to some of the rich Churchmen of New York and elsewhere. In all the large cities of the land there are localities in quite as evil case as this, and where the case is quite as hopeless under any system of mere congregationalism or parochialism. In England, one strong argument in favor of the Established Church is that she is able to hold her own, and to minister to the poor and outcast, because of her endowment. In this country we have only the endowment that lies in the interest and affection of our people; but if this is available, as it should be, there is no reason why, under the Church's system of episcopal administration, such work should not be as thoroughly done in our cities as anywhere in the world.

Among the notable happenings of the day is the declaration made by Cardinal Newman against the disestablishment of the Church of England. In a recent public address he advised Roman Catholics to assist the Conservatives in maintaining the establishment against the attacks of its enemies, declaring that "it is one of the greatest bulwarks of England against atheism," and promising it the support of his friends. It is supposed that this utterance will greatly assist the Conservatives in the coming election, and will aid them in securing an alliance with the Irish party. It is well known, however, that Cardinal Newman does not represent the influence that exerts most control in Irish ecclesiastical matters. He has always been too much an Englishman to be a thorough-going papist. It is pretty certain that there are Roman Catholic dignitaries in England and Ireland whose zeal for alliance with the Conservatives will be cooled rather than heated by the cardinal's plea for the Established Church. However honorable, therefore, this utterance may be to Dr. Newman as an Englishman and a Christian, it is not likely, we venture to predict, to cut much figure in the coming campaign against the establishment.

TENTH CHURCH CONGRESS.

The Tenth Church Congress opened in New Haven, Conn., on Tuesday, October 20, with the celebration of the Holy Communion at 10.30 A. M., in Trinity Church, by the Bishop of Maine, assisted by Rev. Dr. G. S. Wildes. There was a large number both of clergy and lay present. In the chancel, besides the celebrant, were the Bishops of Connecticut and Minnesota. The address was by the Bishop of Minnesota:

Our Lord said to us, "Come, turn aside with Me and rest awhile." The Church repeats her Master's words, she calls His children to give to Christ as ministers the sacrament as she has ministered it for a thousand years. There is no name sweeter than Holy Communion. Communion with a present Christ and Saviour who will be to troubled folks what he was to Mary Magdalene as she knelt at His feet. When the tie that bound man to God was broken, all other ties snapped asunder. We cannot kneel beside His table and not have sad thoughts come,—thoughts that everywhere hedges have been builded in the Lord's garden. It's most sad to think of Christian division. All around us men are asking, in doubt and despair, is there any God? We thank God that while we Church folks are as narrow as any other people on earth, because we are men, yet the Church recognizes the validity of all other baptisms and has faith in the wisdom of the incarnate Son of God, she recognizes that the Holy Ghost is the salvation for us, and it is the Holy Ghost which keeps up the life current between us and those who walk in heaven. Our Saxon fathers gave this dear feast the name of the sacrament. Every off-recurring communion should be a fresh consecration to Him who gave His life blood for us. Unbelief will scoff at the Church, alas, it will doubt the Christ of history. The Christ that lives with us, works through us and speaks to us, none can gainsay or deny. The originators of the Church Congress bided wiser than they knew. World-wide Christ is stirring the hearts of His people. Wherever you find a great heart, it is pondering over the incarnate mystery of creation. A little while 'oh! such a little while to do the work the Master has given us to do, and then rest in the paradise above.

At noon the congress met at Carl's Opera House, which was quite filled, over two thousand being present. After brief preliminary devotions, the Bishop of Connecticut, who presided, read the OPENING ADDRESS.

It is my duty and far more my privilege, in the position with which you, brethren and friends, members of the Tenth Church Congress, have honored me, to bid you welcome to this doxace and to this, one of its chief cities. In extending to you a cordial greeting I am not speaking for myself alone, nor yet for the good people of this city. I speak for the diocese, and I may venture to add for the State as well. Permit me to express the hope—I trust it will not miss its fulfillment—that you will bear away with you not only pleasant memories of your session, but also of the city, the State, and the diocese in which it is to be held. May the results of our coming together be more than all that we dare to anticipate. It is true that we are not here to decree anything, to bind ourselves or others to anything, to pass any hard and fast resolutions which are to be maintained and enforced in the face of any and all opposition. Indeed, it is almost, if not quite, a truism to say this. But even truisms are not altogether without their use. But surely disputation for the sake of a forensic victory and discussion in the interests of truth are widely different things, though they are readily confounded by persons who are either unwillful or unable to take the trouble to distinguish things that differ. Mere disputation is less than worthless, alike in its temper and its results. Fair and honest discussion can never issue in anything but good.

I inspect that a good deal of the unbelief which is hastily charged upon the discussions of the Reformation period of the sixteenth century is rather to be traced to habits of mind engendered by those scholastic disputations and exhibitions of intellectual gladiatorialship which, after the revival of learning, became so popular in Europe, and came, one may say, into the places of the tournaments of earlier days. When a scholar of those times consulted the lists with three hundred and more propositions which he was bound to maintain against all comers, when both attack and defence "consisted almost wholly in advancing authorities, pro and con, on every point, inventing fine doubts as to the meaning of these authorities, and tripping up each other by every trick of word-splitting authorized by the subtleties of dialectic fence," then only one result could follow. All truth, even the most sacred and awful, must have come to be regarded as a plaything to be sported with, a ball to be tossed about by skillful combatants—in short, an utter immorality.

No wonder then that a terrible vengeance followed such a fearful perversion. We wonder that the heart against the just claims to reverence and humble obedience of that which stands next to God Himself should have been left to follow out the way which they had chosen to the bitter end of indifference first and at last of unbelief. Why, it may be asked, should one speak of this! Simply because there are many, very many persons, who, confuting this capricious disputations, with honest and manly discussion, shrink from and fear the latter because of results which are due only to the former, and dread the contact of differing thoughts and convictions that are living and real because of the deep wrong and abiding harm that have been wrought by these unmeaning contests in which altered thoughts and expressed convictions, methods, and results are alike shams and unrealities. Let it be understood, everywhere and always, that truth, all truth, can never suffer or be endangered by frank and free discussion, provided always that one thing is borne in mind.

In all departments of human knowledge or belief—and it is difficult to see why the credenda of the Christiana truth, faith, should be excepted from this law—there are certain great truths, which in themselves considered, lie outside the limits of possible discussion, and from which, as a basis, all discussion must start. In science, for instance, no one but a man ignorant of its first principles would undertake to discuss the phenomena of what we term the solar system with another who deided the system of any certain sun round which that system revolves. With such an one that elementary scientific truth might be so far matter of discussion as to involve its certainty, its position as an absolute and fundamental truth, but till that was settled and admitted any further discussion of the phenomena attended to would surely be barren. Their discussion presupposes certain admitted and established truths, and this one among the number. It is difficult, as has been said, to see why settled truths in morals and in the faith should be regarded as lying entirely outside of this law.

I do not mean to say that such things do not present different aspects to different ages and changed conditions of human thought and life. So those unchanging truths they are sometimes called the everlasting—hills present themselves under the changed aspects as imparted to them by the morning or evening twilight, or the noonday glow; by the effects produced by shadows of passing clouds; by the fresh life of springtide; the glory of summer greenness, or the snow of winter, which yet in themselves their inner structure and being, they remain the same, the grandest earthly emblems of Him who is "the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

There is another thought that suggests itself just here, not altogether foreign to what has now been said, though it bears chiefly on matters of religious belief and incidentally of practice.

We are all of us familiar with the apothem—a half-truth is a whole error. The same may surely be said of a single truth or aspect of a truth, dissociated from its proper place and taken out of its rightful connections. Herein

I am persuaded we find the origin and cause of many sharp doctrinal discussions, and of many attacks of unbelief. We may add to these, and with the same comment, that theories about doctrines are true, or false, often for into the place of the doctrines or truths themselves, much in the same way in which the two things just spoken of usurp the same position.

Let, then, any one of these mistakes occur; let some single truth or doctrine, or some single aspect of either, be distorted and isolated from its proper connections and relations; above all, let some human theory about a doctrine or truth be thrust into the place of the doctrine or truth itself; and who can measure the disastrous results! It comes to this in the end, that the merely human theory of speculation is so identified with, and so usurps the position of the doctrine once revealed and then transmitted in the Church of God, that it fills the field of vision. And then, when a few generations, or a few centuries, it may have gone by, men talk of this as old doctrine, a title to which it has no claim, and in its break down the true doctrine falls with it. What do we see in more than one country in Europe to-day, but this very thing! The faith once given to the saints has been weighed down and over-shadowed by the assumptions and vagaries of scholasticism, enforced as part of the faith itself, till the ill-compacted mass has given way; till the faith itself has been buried in the ruins, and the dread silence of utter unbelief broods over the wreck of what men have most unhapily, most wrongly, identified with Christianity.

Something of the same sort may be witnessed nearer home. How often it is said, all about this country, that the old doctrine is abandoned and cast aside, when the real truth is that that which called old is simply new, is nothing but one or another theory of a single great sixteenth century mind, a mind which evolved what has been termed the Protestant scholasticism, beyond and back of whose theories and speculations the real truth and the ancient doctrine lies. Even so, beyond the theories which have broken the beams of pure white light into the various colors of the spectrum, we find the pure white beam again.

These truths, so important to be remembered in all discussions which touch on Christian doctrine, have equally important bearing on that subject which occupies so large a place in the thoughts and hopes of Christian view, the unity of a divided Christendom. It is not for him who is honored with the duty of presiding over the discussions of the congress to attempt, in any way, to deal with one of the topics introduced in its programme. But this much may, I think, be said.

In approaching the great subject of Christian unity, it is most encouraging and hopeful to remember that we approach it under conditions widely different from those which prevailed not many years ago.

First of all, there was then a disposition to look first at points of difference. Now, it would seem men are ready, or are getting ready, to look first at points of agreement. Now it is said that there is some danger in an era of good nature. No doubt there is some truth in the saying. But I venture to think there is a great deal more danger in an era of ill nature. If an apostle could expect believers to be ready to give a reason of the hope that was in them, surely they who profess themselves Christians may well approach each other in the same spirit, and put away all wrath and clamor and evil speaking.

Secondly, and the great importance of this fact can hardly be overestimated, we have passed far beyond the stages of discussion when men talked of the advantages of division and separation, because they provoked out "good works"; the other, not unimportant word in the passage, the word "love" is I believe, generally omitted in the quotation. To-day we are ready to admit the evils of division, not only in view of what he immediately about them, but also in view of the conversion of the world; are ready to own that our Master and Lord meant what He said when He uttered the prayer, "That they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me and I in Thee, that they also may be one in Us, that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me."

I am delaying you too long from other and more important things; and I will only add these inspiring and of the same kind hopeful words of a great divine: "We live amid closing histories and falling institutions; there is an axe laid at the root of many trees; foundations of fabrics have been long going away and the visible tottering commences; the earth quakes and the heavens do tremble.

"The sounds of great downfalls and great disruptions come from different quarters; old combinations start asunder; a great crash is heard, and it is some vast mass that has just broken off from the rock and gone down into the chasm below. A great volume of time is now shutting; the roll is folded up for the registry, and we must open another. Never again—never though ages pass away—never any more under the heavens shall be seen forms and fabrics and structures and combinations that we have seen. They have taken their places among the departed shapes and organisms deposited in that vast mausoleum which receives sooner or later all human creatures. The mould in which they were made is broken, and their successors will be cast from a new mould. The world is evidently at the end of one era and is entering upon another, but there will remain a Christian and the Christian Church to enlighten ignorance, to fight with sin and to conduct men to eternity."

After the address the Rev. Dr. G. D. Wildes, General Secretary, delivered a brief necrological memorial of members deceased during the year.

TUESDAY EVENING.

The congress is already a full-blown success. The attendance is marked both by high intelligence and deep earnestness. There is little room or disposition for frivolity or superficial attention. There seems to be a solid fulcrum, a sufficient leverage, and unexpected power, for this joint movement against misconception and ecclesiastical impracticability. The outgrowth must be something solid and encouraging. The people here know how to manage such a congress. Ushers are at the railroad station to welcome and direct visitors, while their hospitality has ransacked the city in the service of expected guests. Yale, through its venerable president, who sits with his guest, Archdeacon Farrar, at the right of Bishop Williams, offers its warmest welcome. The congress has captured both college and city, and were Carl's opera house twice as roomy it would be filled. Many clergymen of various ecclesiastical bodies are in attendance.

TORIC: "The Christian Doctrine of the Atonement."

PAPERS.

THE REV. C. A. L. RICHARDS, D.D., of Providence, R. I.

For the Platonic doctrine of ideas we study the dialogues of Plato. For the Christian doctrine of the Atonement shall we not turn to the sayings of Jesus? What is that doctrine? Its friends shall state it. We may take it as a sober expression of a common view of the Atonement as put forth by an able authority in the English Church, and adopted by leading divines of other Christian bodies, that God the Father laid upon His Son the weight of the sins of the whole world, so that He bore in His own body the wrath that men must else have borne, because there was no other way of escape, and thus the Atonement was a manifestation of divine justice.

We have here four things—a concentration of wrath due to many upon one, a divine transfer of penalty from guilt to innocence, the descent of the Father's wrath upon His Son, in the very act of that Son's self-devotion, and in all these a display of divine—i. e., absolute and ideal, justice. Whether these statements harmonize or conflict with morality, philosophy, and sound theology, it is not the purpose of this paper to inquire. The simple question is, Do they speak the mind of Christ?

After reviewing many sayings of our Lord bearing upon His ministerial office on earth, in which the writer discerned no trace of the expiatory work, he continued: Now in all these words of Jesus, from which it is believed no relevant text has been omitted, there is none which suggest that our Lord had any work to do upon His Father, had any change to bring about either in the Divine nature or the Divine attitude toward men. The all look toward, not Godward. Hardly one out of two of these can conceivably be associated with the expiatory theory. They all are in full accord with the simple conception of a loving Son, who is the visible image of a loving Father, is born into the world to disclose His Father's heart and win thereby His brethren, becoming to every light and life, and freeing them from their sin by reconciling them to His Father, and giving them back their lost sense of sonship, and on the road to this divinely-blessed work, incurring with a willing mind the shame, the suffering, the death which men, not knowing what they do, inflict upon Him.

The advocates of the expiatory theory rest, then, their system, save a single, solitary phrase of Christ upon the words of His disciples and mainly St. Paul's. The Christ-saying is found in St. Matthew xx. 28. "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give His life, a ransom for many." The words undoubtedly imply sacrifice, and may suggest expiation. They would comport with a forensic transaction. The context is enjoining unambitious service. How simply the thought unfolds itself. Let superiority show itself in service, let the lofty mood adjust itself to lowly duties, and an instance is our Lord's own thorough self-expenditure upon His people. The argument is, since the Master proved His mastery, the King His kingliness by self-sacrifice, do ye likewise, even as the Son of Man did. It is not an isolated occurrence or question to be regarded justly if by saying might comport with an expiatory theory otherwise established, and, so taken, it stands alone among the words of Jesus. Such an exposition is neither necessary nor natural.

We pass on to our Lord's general teachings. Could He frame a prayer for His people's use without some implication of His office to the victim of His Father's wrath, averting it from others? Elsewhere, in the Sermon on the Mount, there occurs no such allusion, veiled nor open, to such a doctrine. Turning to subsequent and later disclosures of Christ's teaching, we catch no glimpse of any further disclosures, as to the office of expiation.

The Parables were examined with the same result. In the Unmerciful Debtor we find the King simply moved with compassion, going royally beyond the debtor's prayer, and all "because thou desistest me." Then followed an examination of the latest teachings of our Lord. He spoke more than once of the inevitableness of His sufferings. The Lord's Anointed must go against the grain of the world, and endure its hardness. And He accepts the actual fate, and submits to it freely. It is not set forth as a solitary sacrifice, a unique and exclusive agony, but rather as a companionable and exemplary suffering. Paul would therefore afterward share the sufferings of Christ; to John and James the assurance was directly given that they should have part in them. If there be an apparent variance between the words of Jesus and the teaching of the disciples we must interpret the disciples by Jesus, rather than Jesus by the disciples. We are Christ's disciples, and of no other master. His word concerning Himself should be to us a final word.

We have to do with that great doctrine of which the Gospel is a synonym, the Eucharist a paraphrase, the Cross the sign. How shall any man venture to formulate a doctrine when the Holy Church throughout all the world has never done so—namely, to set forth in precise theological terms the Christian doctrine of the atonement.

There have been minute and numberless attempts in this direction, but nowhere save in the few broken words, "Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven," "was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate," "suffered," "was buried,"—nowhere, save here, can the voice of the Church universal be justly said to have set forth any credo of atonement.

Our first resort must be to the words of Christ and His Apostles; the second to the writings of the great interpreters. And for a helpful use of these lights we must approach the atonement of the Son of God, both as a process, and as an act accomplished; the process a process still unfolding—and a key to this study lies in the word "reconciliation," as presenting a more intelligible conception of atonement, or at-one-ment, or the setting at one those who before were set asunder, according to the etymological structure of the word. Yet so accustomed are we become to the secondary use of the Tyndall word, that Tyndall's meaning becomes hopelessly obscured. But "reconciliation" involves action between persons, and it presupposes such persons to have been originally friends. Every genuine reconciliation is a personal matter. We may learn from children's differences—non-intercourse, then coming together again—an illustration of the word and its meaning. What play is to children, council or society is to their elders; and for two men who have mutually forfeited one another's favor, to be brought back into society and friendliness, is the resumption of council or reconciliation.

This is reconciliation looked at as a process; but there is in every such a certain culmination which we may term the reconciliatory act; and this act may contain much and many things. We distinguish a climax in the process, as definite as that movement of chemical union wherein two substances, hitherto distinct, merge into a product which is the "new thing" it was proposed to make; and this answers to the reconciliatory act.

No reconciliation is achieved without pain somewhere; nor can we assume that that pain or suffering will be confined to the party in fault. In every act of forgiveness there is necessarily cost. It is free; not inexpensive. Looking at natural analogies, there is observable a certain law of equivalence, whereby it holds good that just as the arrest of motion develops heat, so the sudden checking of indignation at the tribute of love engenders suffering. Those who recognize no sacrificial character in the sufferings of Christ, cite in evidence against the costliness of forgiveness—the Parable of the Prodigal Son. But we must enter into the true value of those pregnant words, "and had compassion on him!" "He ran and fell on his neck and kissed him." There we have the reconciliatory act; but how little can we know of its accompaniments. Possibly had it been given us to look into that face as he thus turned and went, we should have discerned there a likeness of that great reconciler, whose visage was marred, more than any man. To forgive is something loftier than to condone. The one is without effort, the other requires it; and in all effort there is an element of pain. It is a law of ethics as sharply defined as any law of physics, that the deeper the injury the costlier the pardon.

Looking at the largeness of the Christian doctrine of the atonement, we shall see how large it is in this analysis of reconciliation. It also means an at-one-ment of persons. God is personal, so is man; and between these personal relations may and do exist.

A banishment of personality from religious conception is a loss of such words as these: "Love towards us," "compassion," "sympathy," "forgiveness," and this draws the stranger towards the doctrine of the atonement, because of its intensely personal character. It takes us back to the witness of a primal amity between God and man, antedating the alienation. So reconciliation is the renewal, and not the beginning, of concord. To start with the child is in the father's house. Behind original sin lies original righteousness. There came to pass, how, when, or where, we cannot certainly know, an alienation, a break between the spirit that is in us, and God who is a spirit. So that there came to be needed not only at-one-ment between God and man, but between man and man.

It must begin from above; a motion of heaven to help earth. There was need that the hand of God should be present to heal so great a hurt, and in the person of the Lord God it came. But not without suffering could the end be brought to pass. The helper, who consented to be born into this lower life to set us right, must needs become closely acquainted with grief. He must love his own to the very death. Surely the evangelists could never have concentrated our attention on the cross so largely had not the death died there been a "precious death." Here is seen the need of clearly distinguishing between atonement as a process of reconciliation, the atonement, and that special crisis which we may term the reconciliatory act,—the sacrifice. The agony and passion are the death struggle out of which our head and leader emerges into peace. "It is finished;" when those words were spoken the sacrifice was complete, and ever since the world has been living into that reconciliation then made complete. Of this process we know not when it began, or when came the end. The half remains untold; we see the altar and the victim; we are witnesses of the death, but what is going on beyond this darkened sky we know not. "There they crucified Him," that we can understand. It is an event in time, but of the mysterious title, "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," who shall say what that means? It comes out into the unvisited regions of eternity.

Two influences for half a century have been operating in Anglican theology to depress the doctrine,—High Church and Broad Church, in so many points mutually antagonistic have been at one in this in agreeing to place the dogma of the incarnation above the atonement. The schools of Pusey and Maurice both hold the incarnation, as covering and comprehending the atonement as the greater, the lesser.

The incarnation has this larger reach, if we understand the atonement as the evangelists did fifty years ago, as being only the sacrifice on the cross,—the reconciliatory act. But if it comprehends the reconciliation of all that is discordant in the universe of God, it will follow that we shall come to affirm that the Word was made Flesh and dwelt among us, in order that in the future of time God might reconcile all things to Himself.

Three difficulties lie in the way of modern thought touching the atonement,—ethical, sentimental, and historical; and the writer concluded with a searching analysis and solution of each, setting forth, also, in rebuttal, the strong points that uphold and fortify the doctrine in its relations to the personal and Church life.

THE VEN. F. W. FARRAR, D.D., Archdeacon of Westminster.

I suppose that the subject of the discussion has purposely been left a little vague, but I will venture with the most absolute simplicity, with no reserve, with no superfluous, to tell you my exact thought respecting it. Our belief in the atonement is based on revelation confirmed by the inward witness of God's Spirit in our hearts. If we desire fit words wherein to express that belief, we look first and naturally to Holy Scripture, where in many different places we read that Christ died for our sins, that He suffered for our sins, the just for the unjust; that He was sacrificed for us.

On the other hand, by the doctrine of the atonement is often meant some systematic theory of the atonement, some theological philosophy of the atonement, some scholastic theodid of the atonement; and when we enter on the consideration of these we are no longer on the solid shore of Christian unity, but are lunched on the stormy and open sea of controversy and indifference. I say at once, and without fear of contradiction, that no theory of the atonement, no scholastic explanation of the atonement, has ever been accepted by the universal Church, or can put forth the slightest claim to catholicity. The fact is sufficiently admitted by all competent theologians, and in every history of doctrine ever written, that writings of the Augustine school, or any other subjects are entirely unsystematic, and only quote the current Scripture phrases. The main exception is St. Irenæus. In him first appears the disastrous theory that the ransom Christ paid was paid to Satan. This unhappy theory can, strange to say, put forth a stronger claim to universality than any other, for it lasted, unquestioned, for nearly a thousand years. It was not only adopted by Origen, but he was the earliest to suggest the still more base and self-denying fallacy that Satan was tricked into acceptance of this ransom by our Lord's incarnation, which though it seems to be a little short of blasphemous, is repeated even by such writers as St. Ambrose, and down even to the sentences of Peter Lombard which was the one chief theological manual of the Middle Ages. The genius of one man, of the great St. Anselm, destroyed this deeply-rooted theory at a single blow, showing that it involved nothing short of pure Manichæism. He substituted for it the forensic theory of rigid equivalent satisfaction. This theory, too, had its day, and has fallen into a neglect so complete that it is seldom ever alluded to. Then came the reformation theories of substitution, of imputation, of vicarious punishment. Then came the juristic theories of the great Grotius. Now none of these theories have ever been stamped with approval by the Church of God. They have at the utmost been left as permissible opinions in the regions of unfathomable mysteries. They all abound in terms which are but inferential, not scriptural. Even the phrase "God for Christ's sake forgive" is a mistranslation of our authorized version for "God infinitely pleased and divine expression of St. Paul, "God in Christ forgive."

No numberless is in flagrant discord with the Scripture revelations which tell us that the atonement was the immediate outcome of the Father's love. In popular apprehension, at any rate, all such theories are dangerously tainted with the heresies of sheer Lutheranism, of a most unscriptural contrast between the Son and the Father, and the Father's wrath; implying an antagonism, so to speak, between the attributes of justice and mercy in the character of God. And the cause of all these errors is obvious. They spring from the fact that it has not pleased God to give us the plan of salvation, either in detail or in dialectica; from the bad tendency to torture isolated expression into the ever widening spiral error of unlimited consequences; from the attempt to construct metaphors into formal systems; from trying to construct the whole when God has only given us knowledge of a part; from the bad rule of ecclesiastical opinion worship.

This is what the Church clearly teaches us alike by what she does say, and what she carefully abstains from. It has been the ultimate conclusion arrived at by the greatest theologians, both dead and living, of men so entirely different, as Canon Mozley and Professor Maurice, and it is also the direct teaching of the great divine who of all others the English Church has delighted to honor. "Scripture," says Bishop Butler, "has left the matter of the Satisfaction of Christ mysterious, left something in it unrevealed," so that all conjecture about it, must be, if not evidently absurd, at least uncertain.

We turn to the creeds of Christendom, there to find the doctrine of man's redemption stated simply as a fact. I say at once, and without fear of contradiction, that no theory of the atonement has ever been accepted by the universal Church, or can put forth the slightest claim to catholicity. While we bannish out our sole trust in Christ, and look on His atonement as the sole source of our hope, we are not obliged to accept any of the theories of men respecting it. Nothing but failure can come or has ever come of the attempt to fathom the arm of God by the figure of men, the attempt to fly up into the secrets of the Deity on the wings of the understanding. The infinitely blessed results of the Christian redemption are the atonement, the forgiveness. They are the joy and the thanksgiving of our life.

The delivery was in a firm, musical voice, with little or no gesture, very earnest, something of the English pulpit cadences, and with rare simplicity and modesty of presence; indeed, quite disappointing the popular ideal of a great Church dignitary. The audience joined in the warmest applause, most meant in greeting and welcome for the august visitor.

SPEAKERS.

THE REV. A. C. A. HALL, of Boston, Mass., confined himself with much earnestness and directness to the specially theological aspects of the great doctrine, stating with elegant precision the distinctions and definitions as laid down by the great Catholic and Anglican divines. He dwelt upon the latent Trithemism which had drifted into the Reformation development of the dogma, laying reverent stress upon the supreme Unity of God as set forth both in the process and act of the atonement, and placing the dogma of the incarnation and atonement in such juxtaposition as to demonstrate a reciprocal explanation. As a salutary reaction against the fierce Calvinism of the early Puritan day he dwelt upon the Unitarian development, and especially Channingism, presenting as it did afresh the truth of the Divine Unity against the impieties of Trithemism. He also touched with muchunction on the practical relations between this dogma and the growth and shaping of Christian life.

THE REV. R. H. McKIM, D.D., of New York, readily favored a common rallying ground for all earnest orthodox in and outside the Church, as in the conclusions of the various writers and speakers. All had united in casting out the mechanical, "give and take" theories, mainly of Calvinistic origin, having root in the fierceness and implacability of the Divine Father, and found themselves gathered at the foot of the cross in joint adoration of One who so loved the world that He gave His only Son for its redemption. This was the reading of the Gospels, and the interpretation of its tremendous catastrophe, which should bring strength and fruitness to the ministry of the sacred Word.

It is freely intimated that this is the evening, or occasion of the Congress, not only in the ability and thoroughness of the papers and addresses, but in the admirable spirit prevailing during the handling of a most sensitive topic.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The sessions tend to an inconvenient length. The audiences are crowded, hungry listeners, and thus invigorating to reader and speaker. These latter are full of the matter, and in some instances unfamiliar with that supreme literary art, compression, and that quiescence of distillation demanded on such an occasion of protracted strain of mind and heart.

This morning's session opened at 10:30, and held on until almost 1:30, the audience having thinned but slightly.

The appointed subject was "Grounds of Church Unity," yet clearly as it is put, it failed to concentrate sharply the general line of the treatment. Besides, the topic is well worn, and little fresh or remarkable was developed, as might have been anticipated. After the usual brief devotions, Bishop Cox, of Western New York, read the opening paper. He is yet, clearly, the Rupert of such an occasion; bringing all the buoyancy and impetuous dash of his earlier years to the onslaught. The bishop is by literary heredity a man of war, and his voice, rhetoric, and message were redolent of chivalric clamor, and suggestive of tilt and tournament. No man reads a paper on such occasion with more scholarly grace; and he was at his best, for it was, for him, a field day against Decretalism and the Ultramontane type of Romanism.

TOPIC: "The Grounds of Church Unity." PAPERS.

THE RIGHT REV. ARTHUR CLEVELAND COXE, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Western New York.

The subject of Christian Unity has relation to the past, the distant, and the future; the past, in that it gathers into one fold all the elect saints of God, who have finished their course, from the Risen Lord down through the ages of martyrs and confessors, making but one with the whole family of God of Christ; distant, in that all places and lands together were being brought into the common heritage of the children of God; and the future, when all the promises of God shall be abundantly verified in the gathering into one fellowship all such as shall be saved. This all shall come to be by a loyal love of Christ and His children; not by trick or compromise, but by the power of a loving fidelity to truth. The unification of Christians can be brought about in no other way. We are not to concern ourselves with methods or results, for these are all in God's hands—they belong to God, and the end is His.

There is a world-wide movement among the dry bones of denominationalism. Men everywhere are weary of cross-purposes, waste and estrangement. There are certain well defined and practical grounds on which we rest our efforts in promoting this unification. First we are to stand steadfast in the apostles' doctrine. There can be no surrender here, for it is a divinely fashioned foundation, other than which no man can lay. It is our mission in God's providence to learn how to give, and teach how to receive and use the primitive organic unity who, having in the computations of history, lost this golden chain of identity, have at least kept the faith. It is ours to preserve for the American Church this historic continuity, and to labor to rescue it from the perils of forfeiting it. Why should this divine gift be forfeited to the denominations, and why, we may well ask, should they themselves have themselves lost it? We are to love magnificently our common faith, but charity to them no less than fidelity to our Divine Master forbids us to break with the past. The Nicene Age is the great rallying ground accepted by the Greek Church, while the Latins themselves cannot repudiate it, notwithstanding that fatal lapse into Decretalism in the fifth century, when the foundations of the Papal usurpations were there laid in error and fraud.

The great eccumenical symbols are the hope of a possible unification. Trent and its decrees are not oecumenical, nor of the least obligation to the true Catholic. They are only provincial and schismatical, as it concerns the great body of Christ. Here alone, on Nicene ground, can the East and West, the Gallican, Anglican, and American Church, find substantial and fatal error of the great and learned Dr. Pusey and his school, as set forth in the so-called Eirenicon, lay in assuming the Catholicity of Trent, whence followed the necessity of bending and warping the Thirtieth Articles which are the standards of the Anglican Church, to meet and accommodate themselves to the Tridentine Decrees. And this attempt at the impossible explains the drift and purpose of the Tracts for the Times.

The xxxix. articles, indeed, are only a local catechism of the reformed English Church, and as such the clergy are to subscribe to them. But it is ever to be borne in mind that the American Church was organized and commissioned by the Mother Church without these articles—demanding only of us the acceptance of the Nicene creed—and with the same spirit, not requiring the Athanasian creed—itsself not oecumenical, although a full expression of the Catholic faith—because it is of Western origin, and has never received the assent of undivided Christendom. Trent authenticated it, and this with its own decrees afterwards made logically necessary the three new Articles of Faith set forth by the XIX.

This is a fatal breach in the Catholic unity, for no council of the Catholic Church has authorized or accepted them. We have only to look to the great Dr. Dollinger to show us the emptiness of Trent and the later articles, showing also that Constantinople is within reach of unity, while Rome is hopelessly cut off from the past by her own hand.

In seeking a practical unity for American Christianity, we are met and tormented by a foreign intermeddler, the Grand Lama of the Vatican and his unscrupulous emissaries. There is a present ascendancy of Jesuitism, which manipulates the machinery of Romanism, and even the infallible Pope himself. But the great mass of the laity are Gallican in feeling and Church conception. May be it is the great duty reserved for ourselves to instruct such in the ways of true Catholicism. No ultramontanist can be a true American patriot. There is, therefore, for us an irconcilable antagonism with Jesuitism. But the old Clementine element in Rome, as it is still against the Jesuits, is, thus far, with us, and this school of Romanists alone, has a future in this land. The paper concluded with an avowal of the writer's belief in the ultimate unification of American Christianity on a Catholic basis.

THE REV. WILLIAM WILBERFORCE NEWTON of Pittsfield, Mass. (in the absence of the Assistant Bishop of Virginia).

The human mind will never outgrow its own inherent tendency to reduce confusion to order. It has done this in theology, politics, and in social science. It seeks to do so still in Church life.

The fact that this subject has always attracted the attention of logical as well as saintly minds is worthy of our attention. Unity is different from union. Union may help to make unity if the union elements are sympathetic. Yet the unity of a piece of mosaic work is different from the unity of the growth of a tree. Christian unity must appear in the light of a growth or sequence from opposite stand-points toward a common goal. Unity must be a concentric growth, not a one-sided absorption.

The unity which is suggested by the concurrent religious thought of to-day in this country is not the unity of dogma, as was the movement of Pusey and Newman, nor the unity of sentiment, as was the drift of the Evangelical Alliance; but is the unity of the practical religious American mind, seeking for definite available results.

This practical unity is found in the atmosphere and thought of the present, and is suggested by these four facts: The running out of the sect idea in the development of modern Christianity, the economic waste of the machinery of religion in our rival organizations and Church life, the social parity of our present Church life—different members of the same family going to different churches, and the clergy meeting at weddings, funerals, and charity organizations—and the crying need in our land for a central standard of Christian ethics.

Such a practical unity would, in time, create a national standard, and would, in so far, lead to a national Church. Though it is not given to men of any period to see the results of that period, we can at present notice three tendencies which are perceptibly modifying the theological and ecclesiastical life of to-day: the penetrating influence of the hypothesis of evolution, the changed conception of the doctrine of the inspiration, with the consequent loss of the Protestant standard of infallibility, and the centralization of power in the religious and political forces of the age.

Three centres of authority, and only three, appear to-day: the infallibility dogma of the Romish Church, the visible definiteness of scientific materialism, and the limited, because finite, hypothesis of rational Christianity.

After a lengthened citation from the story of John Inglesant, bearing on the argument, Mr. Newton continued: This basis of rational Christianity, while it rejects both the dogma of Roman infallibility and the denial of scientific agnosticism, accepts a positive, definite fact in the midst of indefinite Christian mysteries. On this basis both the Anglican Church and her American daughter stand, and, standing there, have already fulfilled the prophecy of Maurice, and have become, both by inheritance and by training, the leaders in the renaissance of practical Christianity. To arrive at this practical unity, which rests neither upon ecclesiastical dogmas nor sentimental affiliations, but upon the economy of moral force, philanthropy, and an adaptation to the wants of the age, will require a long period of preparation and a virtual change of base in our method of seeking unity. Our American life shows us among the masses at present the centralization of power in two opposite directions —the creed of Rome and the creed of socialism.

To meet this changing condition of modern life, the Churches of the Protestant Reformation must either disintegrate utterly and run out into nothingness, or they must come together and seek a higher plane for a new lease of power.

To this it is objected that this is not a "Church" position, and that Catholic dogma is the only antidote to modern doubt. To this I answer, the doubt of to-day goes deeper than the dogmas of the Fathers ever went, and must be met by a combination of the living forces of Christianity as we have found, and not merely by any one phase of opinion.

The grounds for Christian unity at present are found in the following facts: That the Holy Ghost brings forth divine results, regardless of man-made limitations; that the Holy Ghost and the Zeit-Geist—a very strong combination—are alike leading the thoughts of Christian people in this subject; that the bleating of the sheep in opposite folds to get nearer together is the great discovery of the Christian life and thought of to-day; that the policy of absorption and of imposition having failed, the policy of growth from the basis of practical co-operation remains to be tried; that in all our efforts we must remember that the future is only the sequence of the past, and is always a development from it, never the mere reproduction of it.

THE VEN. F. W. FARRAR, D.D., Archdeacon of Westminster.

It is with extreme diffidence that I venture to accept the request that I should offer you a few words upon this great topic. The topic is so wide and the importance of it so imminent that it will be impossible in the few moments at my disposal to enter into any extended argument, and what I shall try to urge must necessarily be partial in scope and apposite in compression. I shall need all your sympathy to bear with so inadequate a treatment of so great a theme. The first ground of Christian unity, of unity in heart and soul amid diversities of opinion, is the uniformity of practice, in the most wide-spread of truth. We must draw a deep distinction between unity and uniformity. Unity is essential and obligatory; uniformity is impossible, and even, I will venture to say, undesirable. Infinite truth has manifold aspects for finite understanding. The Church, to use the ancient phrase, is communio variabilis, clothed in raiment of diverse colors, and the truth she teaches does not shine in a single light only. We discern the separate hues of the divine rainbow; we cannot see the sevenfold perfection of its undivided light. Truth in theology, no less than in science, has been revealed to us, as we are told in the epistle of the Hebrews, fragmentarily and multifariously in many parts and in many manners, nor is it possible for us, with our human limitations, to see it steadily and see it whole. If it did not exist in the Church of Jerusalem, why should we expect it to exist in the Church of Europe? In the first country there were the schools of Jerusalem, of Antioch, and of Alexandria; is it likely that there will be no wide differences of views and ritual amid the immense complexities of modern Christendom? If this fact had been duly apprehended Churches and their rulers might have been saved from their disastrous attempts to secure what is impossible. If diversity without unity be discord, on the other hand unity without diversity is death. In every living Church, in every living nation there must be freedom and there must be progress.

Another ground of Christian unity is the command of Christ—Christ's new commandment—the commandment so often repeated on the lips of Christians, so often belied in their actions—Love one another.

What has been the sphere in which discussion has chiefly worked? Has it not been in the matter of organization, ceremonial, and minor and non-essential opinion? But the discoveries of every year are demonstrating to us more decisively that in these matters the widest latitude was left to the Apostolic Church as to ceremonial. St. Paul's own sufficient rubric was "Let all things be done decently and in good order." As to organization our Lord said "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring." But these may not be one fold, which, perhaps, they never will be, or were meant to be, but that there may be one flock, one shepherd. As regards the mind and opinions which separate Christians, we can conjecture how the great apostle of the Gentiles would have dealt with them, when we read how he dealt with so serious an error as the denial of the Resurrection. He dealt with it not by anathema, but by a solemn question and by a glorious argument. "Sects and parties have been fond of hurling at each other the name of 'heretic,' but in the New Testament the word 'heretic' means, not the aberration of opinion but the recklessness of faction. The worst of all heresies in the heart of Christians and the heresy which Christ holds as the most execrable, however commonly and however bitterly it betrays itself in the controversies of Christians, is the heresy of hatred, it is that odium, which, to the eternal shame of our apostasy, from the tender forbearance of our Lord, has acquired the destructive name 'odium theologicum.' If a man be animated by that spirit, if he be guilty of that heresy, his Christianity is so far from being his, his orthodoxy a cloak for error. 'If a man love not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?'

A third ground of Christian unity is that of faith, which in its highest sense had to St. Paul no other meaning than oneness with Christ. Theologians may write folios of interminable dogmatics, they may enshrine in our temples their own idols of the forum and of the library. Nevertheless, the terms of Christianity are few and simple. The terms of our fellowship of love should be Catholic as the Church of God. The railing restrictions which would fain fence in with anathemas the portal of the Church are unevangelical, unapostolic, unchristian.

To those who tried at Corinth to foster party names and draw party distinctions, St. Paul addressed the following question: "Has Christ been parcelled into fragments!" Will you dare to inscribe His name on the ignoble pennons of a party, and claim them as the Semper Eadem of the Church of God? Wise was the answer of the old Christian bishop who, when he was asked to what party he belonged, said: "Christianus mihi nomen est; Catholicus cognomen." Partisans are ever ready to say with the sons of Thunder: "We forbade him, because he followeth not after us;" but Christ's answer was: "Forbid him not."

The last ground of Christian unity on which I will touch is that it is essential to the prosperity of the Church of Christ. While we are disputing and wrangling, often about the uncertain, often about the infinitely little, the enemy is at our gates. What injures the cause of Christ is not in the least the existence of differences, whether in practice or in opinion, or respecting that which is imperfectly revealed, but the mismanagement of those differences, not the inevitable divergencies in minor matters of opinion, but what Melancthon was glad to die that he might say, the rage of theologians respecting them.

Our perils are from within. What neither atheism will achieve, nor agnosticism, nor direct assault, may be fatally accomplished by our internal dissensions and want of mutual charity. The best and truest Christians in all ages learned, alike in theory and in practice, the lesson of these truths. If theological inflexibility be a duty in maintaining and preserving the treasure of eternal Christian truth which has been handed down to us from our fathers; still such inflexibility degenerates into opinionative obstinacy. Where it is extended to the commandments, doctrines and inferences of men; and we are not worthy of the high name in which we are called, unless we live in the spirit of the injunction which Christ gave and which, if the ancient tradition be trustworthy, he clothed in these very words: "Never be happy save when you behold the face of your brother with love."

THE REV. THOMAS RICHET, D.D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the General Theological Seminary.

The question is double in its scope. It is historical, and again, it is theoretic or dogmatic, as laid down in the Word of God. We cannot permit ourselves to give way to sentiment or feeling in seeking its full meaning. Spiritual things are spiritual things, and are not to be quizzed as among physical things. In the great Hebrew Scriptures we encounter two fundamental truths, the unity of God, and its counter truth, the unity of God's Church. One is as clearly revealed as the other. The unity between God and His Church in the New Testament Scriptures is set forth to be as the union of man and wife. "Sin ye not against God and His Church." What is it to break the unity of Christ's Church—to scorch Her whom Christ has made His Bride! We recognize in the sin of schism the commission of spiritual fornication against God, a sin visited with such terrible penalties as we read in the Hebrew Scriptures. We recognize in God's dealings with man, a great economic law by which He overrules man's sins for good. So God bore with patience the unholiness divisions of Israel, forasmuch as the retribution for these very sins the Jews became in their dispersions missionary throughout the oriental world. So God exiled them, and used them for His purposes in that exile.

So we see in the Christian world two truths, the unity of God, and its counter truth, the unity of the Church, which is Christ's own by purchase. The divine aim is the unity of the Church, that all men may be led to accept the unity of Christ's truth, and the brotherhood of man in that all men are one in Christ because Christ is One.

It was Guizot, the Protestant, who saw, with a scholar's critical insight, all the defects of the Church, and yet said, that it was the saved civilization, that of the fifth century but saved civilization, that gave England her political constitution, to Germany her confederate civilization, and to which all that we call civilization is mainly owing.

It is a sorrowful thought that on account of all these earlier violences and schisms the Church never again can be one in this world, and the separations cannot be repaired save at such great cost and expiation as men will not endure. Byzantinism is the answer to early imperialism in the Church, and the Reformation to the imperialism of Hildebrand.

Again, spiritual things must be spiritually described, Christian doctrines are the logical exponents of facts. At Pentecost there is a unification of all possible diversities. And yet the unity of the Church until the Holy Ghost descends upon and remains with them. Then, after the supernatural gift they become a living body, the Church of Christ. And that is Pentecostal unity, the Head in Heaven, the body hereforth one in this world, seeking to accomplish a spiritual unity, and in the Church shall be the rallying place for believers until the end.

THE REV. DAVID SESSURS, of Memphis, Tenn.

In any effort to restore the broken historical unity of the Church of God, we should remember that that imperialism which has sought to dominate the gifts of a possible diversities, from its very nature cannot but be of short duration. The true work and issue of the true unity is to uphold the inspirations of God. It is the rationalization of human hope to look for this divine aid which God promises. In God perfection is simply absolute unity whose truth is the only condition that can preserve the spiritual and divine attributes of God. And so within the body of the Church the same spirit works to organize and incorporate the spirit of unity. What is the object, the end and purpose of all man's agitating and struggling toward God? How can these things for which man yearns be secured? It is not man that lives in his renewed nature, but it is Christ that lives within him.

THE REV. JULIUS H. WARD of Boston, Mass., dwelt very earnestly upon the problem of Christian unity as relating to work in country towns and villages, and the means that may be taken to bring all the population under the sanction and teaching of the Christian religion. In England parochial divisions covered the whole territory. In New England, at the outset, the town was the parish with its one minister. But subsequent enlargement broke up the old order, by the intrusion of sects and preachers of different connections. This broke up the old corporate life into repellent fragments without supplying any equivalent advantages.

These sects cannot work together. Each pursues a half hostile independence, and each minister has to place himself on guard to protect himself and flock from pilferings of predatory shepherds. The various energy are in practical antagonism, and masked hostility and distrust. The consequence is, two thirds of the population have come to stand altogether outside all the churches.

The Puritan separated the spiritual from the sacred life. The Church of England made no such mistake.

It is our manifest duty to do our part in rectifying this evil, and disentangle these contradictions of relations. This is our practical duty. This can be done by indirection. Here we are dealing with very practical questions. How can we stand and live and work together? How can we blow down the walls of our modern Jerichos and get the better of sect divisions? All up and down the country you will encounter towns and villages containing 500, or 800, or 1200 people, who are parcelled out among four or five different churches. Sometimes the ratio between churches and population is yet more formidable.

Social unification must precede spiritual. We are to get together and work together for the people, helping build up a sound family life, driving out divorce and all social and moral offences against the general welfare, taking hold of the public schools, purifying and rectifying amusements and the general culture, and thus the Churches may break the ground for reciprocal reinforcement. Social and ethical contact reach spiritual purposes. Denominationalism must fall before it. What is the relation of the Episcopal Church to this public duty? We must encounter and overcome individualism. Our Church organizes social life, and this is our mission. Bishop Lay thought and felt deeply on this point. During his recent illness he said, "I want to live until it can be shown that the Protestant Episcopal Church can organize society." The Roman Church is to be honored which has taken such resolute hold of organization in American life, showing its efficiency in this direction. We do not look for an absorption of all other churches with our own, but her mission is educational and a teacher of organization. The speaker concluded by a very graceful allusion to the presence of Bishop Williams and President Porter side by side on the platform as a harbinger of better social conditions among the people.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

TOPIC: "The Ethics of the Tariff Question."

The topic for this evening was "The Ethics of the Tariff Question." A driving rain-storm reduced the attendance to comfortable proportions, while it did not dampen popular interest. The people seem possessed by a marvellous capacity for listening, and listening closely. It is generally felt that the topic does not lie squarely in line with the legitimate work of the Congress. Possibly the real purpose of the Committee on Topics would have been better met by a consideration, say, of Christian socialism, or the ethics of trade and commerce. As it is, not a little political heat was elicited during the discussion, and it was demonstrated with significant distinctness that if there be an odium theologium, a sharper and fiercer thing is the odium politicum.

The comparative merits of free trade and a tariff as economic expedients after all usurped the evening, with here and there a chance dash of ethics, which sounded not a little out of place in the general harangue. The Bishop of Maine presided, and after the usual devotions introduced the first reader.

PAPERS.

GEN. HENRY E. TREMAINE, of New York.

It was Montesquieu who said: "Virtue in a republic is a most simple thing; it is a law of the republic." This proposition states the fundamental ethics for an American tariff. The promptings of affection which would provide for the child's necessities, nurture, development, progress, industrial attainments, mental and moral strength, endowment, and life-long happiness, exhibit at the same time the philosophy which patriotic virtue ascribes for sound national legislation. This is, therefore, the standard of ethics by which tariff laws are to be made and judged.

Born with the nation's life, commended by its fathers, applied by successive generations of its statesmen, never uniformly antagonized in the entire career of any publicist who has left his imprint in the laws of his time, the ethics of the American system were formulated in the preamble of the first tariff. An examination of the tariff passed under this constitution by the Confederation Congress applies an un-American, unnational theory to articles of possible importation, and easily illustrates by various schedules. In any era of peace, general intelligence, virtuous industry, and honest elections the Confederation tariff is not likely to be enacted. By 1828 the investment of domestic capital in manufactures required an enlarged encouragement, and the protective tariff of 1828 was passed. The Whigs struggled vainly for the American system, except that at every successive crisis they compromised. Thus was the protective principle of 1799 and 1832 compromised away, resulting in defeat of publicists and the free trade tariff of 1846. Under this tariff industrial retrogression and the country's finances were thrown into confusion.

Under Lincoln's administration the new tariff of 1861 was of course strongly protective, and so the tariff of 1863, which last tariff, however, in its adjustments and philosophical classifications, is the best tariff ever enacted by Congress. After the war the woolen interests required and obtained special consideration by the wool tariff of 1867. The present tariff of 1883, while liberal in the free list as to articles not in competition with American products, is equally protective. Free trade subordinates national self-interest to the schemes and policies of foreign nations. It abandons the defence of our own interests in opposition to foreign legislation. When, in fair discussion for public education, or in settlement of principles to guide legislation, the issue of free trade as against a tariff exclusively for revenue is made, it is due to ethics that the issue should be pronounced and squarely accepted. It is rudimentary. Nor should it be disguised under the name of "revenue reform." Free trade does not mean that commerce should not be burdened more heavily than agriculture and manufactures, but it means opposition to American ships and American shipping. Nor does protection mean a bounty for favored manufactures. I place the ethics of the American system above ministerial differences or judicial inquiry, above sections and above parties, above the special interests of this art or that employment, above questions of selection and administration, above the demands of any class, occupation, or locality. I place it on the primary polity, next only to the struggle. Why should we lag behind and forsake our own industries and the elevation of our workmen, leaving both to shift for themselves while, under adverse inspiration, we spin out a theoretical "reform."

THE REV. F. A. HENRY, of Ridgefield, Conn., read the second paper, proving to be scholarly development of the philosophy, as well as the ethics of free trade. As a compact, thoroughly-reasoned monograph, in a finely-tempered idiom, and a masterly application of the religious conclusions to the vexed question of current political philosophy, it was conceded that Mr. Henry's paper was quite unique. This is the conclusion:

To sum up the practical results of the protective policy, we find foreign commerce so crippled, that our export trade, except in raw products, has been almost extinguished. The country is forced to depend on its harvests for support, while agriculture shows signs of inability to bear much longer the double burden, and wheat-producing competitors are rising in every quarter of the world. The mass of the people are kept poor by an enormous indirect taxation, which they pay, but which no one receives. A fraction of it goes in revenue to the government, another fraction in subsidies to manufacturers, but the bulk of it is dead loss. For the protected manufacturers are doing business at a loss; many have been ruined, and more are reduced to desperate straits. In their embarrassed condition appears another ethical aspect of this question, and that is the working of the moral law of retribution: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

We have seen that restricted trade means a restricted market, which soon becomes a glutted market, and that enforces restriction on production. That is—to restrict trade is to restrict production, and the policy of selfish greed is self-defeating and suicidal. And it is unsuccessful because it is wrong. There is a Power which makes for righteousness in all human affairs, and that Power is not marked of men.

Righteousness is no abstract ideal to which men are to conform; it is the organic law of action to which men must conform. Such conformity is the health of the social body, and there is no violation of the law but entails disease and suffering. Hence, it is not possible for any way of conduct to be ethically bad, and yet good under some other aspect. Only that which is morally right is economically wise; what is wrong will be disastrous. Utilitarians have perceived this coincidence of the right and the expedient; we have only to reverse the terms of their formula: it is not its conducing to happiness that makes an action right, but it is being right that makes it conducing to happiness.

Let us understand that moral truth is no mere theme for learned dissertation, but the light of our actual life. Business relations may seem to counsel selfishness, but until we leave their guiding law. A study will go hard with us. Bring your action into line with eternal law, and you make eternal forces workers for your health and wealth. Give, and it shall be given unto you; "now, in this time," shall be your reward, as well as in the world to come.

It is a truth for nations as well as for men, that neither moral laws nor economic forces know anything of political boundaries. What is right and expedient for the conduct of men within a nation is right and expedient for international intercourse. As a national policy, protection appeals to national selfishness. It is born of the ignorant fancy that the interest of other nations is antagonistic to ours, so that we can gain by their loss. Hence patriotism bids us boycott them by keeping out their goods. Let us make America independent of the rest of the world—world as well as self. A study will go hard with us. Bring your action into line with eternal law, and you make eternal forces workers for your health and wealth. Give, and it shall be given unto you; "now, in this time," shall be your reward, as well as in the world to come.

upon social welfare, so protective tariffs are a fruitful burden of international hostility. Centuries ago Thucydides described restriction on commercial intercourse as an unproclaimed war, and Prof. Fiske declares: "Our robber tariffs are a survival of the barbarous modes of thinking which belonged to the ages of primeval warfare, before industrial civilization began to teach the pacific implications of free exchange." All history shows that free commerce, uniting men in the fellowship of mutual service, has been one of the potent agencies in human progress. But, as Kant says, "There is a constant tendency to social conceit, pathologically extorted from the mere necessities of situation, which grows ever into a moral union founded on men's reasonable choice." This great century has seen a wonderful drawing together of the nations, and as the bonds strengthen which unite mankind they are seen to be bonds of mutual dependence, and it becomes even more plainly impossible to promote a national interest by their severance. We all are members of one body, and none can suffer or rejoice alone. We cannot work to our own advantage except as we work together, for we can only share a common good. And so the organic law of the social order reveals itself as love, and that we live by it is the end of the divine education of the race. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself is more than a command—it is a prophecy—and to this goal the universe has been speeding since the first step out of savagery tied a knot on selfish instinct. It is no pulpit orator, but the ablest of our evolutionists, who declares that "it is the destiny of man to throw off the brute inheritances and rise into the loving life which is union with the divine." Nothing can defeat the purpose of the Maker. We may scheme and strive to snatch a private good, but through all our ways and doings the Everlasting Arms stretch themselves forth into the world, slowly and surely moulding the sons of men into the image of the Eternal Son of God.

CHAS. HEBER CLARK, Esq., of Philadelphia, followed with a third paper, crowded with economic data and deductions in the elucidation of the tariff policy, forcibly put, shrewdly arranged, and bristling with keen hits of an expert controversialist. But, as the paper touched very remotely, if at all, the ethical bearings of the topic, its reproduction here would be somewhat irrelevant. It was the fortune of the clever and adroit journalist to stir the potent densities of political doctrines so effectually that for an hour the platform of the Church Congress seemed more like a session of some trade exchange, and a lively exchange of repartee followed, quick and brilliant, but quite irrelevant to the question.

SPEAKER.

THE RIGHT REV. THOMAS UNDERWOOD DUDLEY, D.D., Bishop of Kentucky, in a humorous and fervent vein, took up, as the only appointed speaker, the putative immoralities engendered in the practical operations of a tariff, making several telling points.

Among the volunteer speakers were Professor Sumner, of Yale; Mr. Charles H. Fowler, of New Haven; and finally, Mr. A. Foster Higgins, of New York, who, as a student of economics, had been drawn to the congress to listen to this exceptional discussion, and frankly confessed his inability to discover any purely ethical bearings in a topic which he regarded as exclusively economic. He made, however, some exceedingly instructive comments on the shipping interests of our country as affected by legislation.

Some asperities of a personal nature arose between other parties, which, however, were subsequently cleared away by apologetic remarks.

It is very doubtful, at least, whether the topic and its discussion strengthened the influence of the congress.

THURSDAY MORNING.

Topic: "Aestheticism in Worship."

PAPERS.

THE REV. W. A. SNIVELY, S.T.D., of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The element of fitness or propriety, or the natural proportion, adjustment and harmony of parts, which we vaguely call beauty, has a place in worship, and that it is intrinsic in the devotional expression of the religious idea seems to have the sanction of inspired truth. The Hill of Zion was a fair place; it was beautiful for situation and the joy of the whole earth, and it was so because it was perfectly adapted to the purpose for which it was selected, and because it impressed an uncultured and semi-civilized people with sentiments of mystery and awe and solemnity far better than any abstract treatise or ethical code could have done. And the manifold and elaborate preparation for the worship of the true Church, in the beauty of holiness, in the only temple on earth of which He Himself was the architect, and of the details of whose ritual He was the author, supply us with all the dates needful to gain at least a glimpse of the divine idea which underlies our theme.

The place, firstly, must be selected upon the principal of beauty for situation. If this was the glory of the Hill of Zion, it was equally a kind of intuitive perception, the distinguishing characteristic of the high places upon which offerings were made to the other gods in the idolatrous worship of the Gentiles. By the same intuitive precept the Grecian Temple was the apex and culmination of the hill upon which it was built, and the relics of pre-historic tribes in our own west and south indicate the next law of selection.

The same problem is the architecture of the building itself, and its solution may vary from the simplicity of the rude and rectangular meeting-house up to the most ornate and comfortable edifice, whose lines and curves and angles in artistic proportions, and whose finished result is itself a sacrament of beauty. It may be the plain and familiar structure whose weather-boarded sides and square green shutters were the fitting home of the old "three-decker" arrangement of holy table, prayer-desk and pulpit; or it may be the Gothic church, with nave and transept and choir and chancel, whose every arch is a line of beauty, and whose "long-drawn aisle" and "dim, religious light," with the effigy of saint or martyr in its niches and the glory of the legendary or traditional sainthood in its windows, or its walls may make the very atmosphere of the place an inspiration to faith, and be to the devout worshipper a vestibule of heaven. These, however, are but the outward and distant approaches of the soul in its aspirations to the shrine where these aspirations are satisfied.

We come to the more frequent and commonplace surroundings, accessories and incidents of worship, whose observance is contemplated in this day's topic. The appropriate and impressive rendering of the liturgy of the Church—whether in its bald and naked simplicity, as mutilated by the iconoclasm of continental reformers and Anglican mal-contented—or a ritualistic attention to details which may imitate, if it does not seriously follow the meretricious adornments, the gaudy decorations and the artificial unreality of a mediæval tradition and a foreign obedience; and at what point between these two the best combination of beauty and truth is to be found, this is the practical distinction to which the discussion of this theme must naturally tend.

One thing at least is certain, that the worship of this Church is not spectacular in its first intention. It does not seek so much to convey impressions through the senses, as to manifest the truth to the intelligent conscience and the earnest heart. Magnificence of ceremonial is only occasional in its system, and then it grows out of surrounding circumstances and necessities, and is impressive to the beholder because the elements of grandeur and solemnity are inherent in the function. But this is exceptional. The question before us is what place has the element of beauty or of taste, of condition or of mystery, impressiveness of architectural or ritual surroundings, or symbolism of attitude and gesture in this well-worn and variously rendered liturgy of ours. Evidently the specific answer must vary with the special season of the Christian year. What would be fitting and appropriate amid the penitential, heart-searchings of Ash-Wednesday and Advent season, would be quite out of place on Easter Day.

We meet just here the varying shades of opinion and taste, of conviction and conscience (the name which men sometimes give to their prejudices), the variety of standard both in the priesthood and the laity which naturally belongs to a comprehensive branch of the Church Catholic. What does a rubric mean, and how shall it be observed? If the ministrant be an unimaginative person, bound down by a literal construction to a precise mechanical obedience, which knows no liberty within the limits of law, it means one thing; if he is alive to the influences of inspirations of beauty and taste it means quite another.

In this heterogeneous, earnest, and only half educated life of ours, where can the element of beauty find a place, and how shall it be saved from the vulgarity and grossness of excess?

After mentioning examples of chancel and interior fitness, as of vessels, lace, furnishings, etc., the paper concludes:

A true aesthetic spirit will ever seek to offer to God its highest and best gifts. If with its expression in the unknown and unrecognized qualities which escape the vulgar gaze, but which are not unnoticed by Him who clothes the lilies of the field with his gorgeous hue. In texture and quality and adornment it will seek to offer what is best and purest to the highest use of which man can conceive. The element of beauty should never be the final aim and end, but only an accidental factor in divine worship.

It must never be enshrined as a goddess where it should only serve as a hand-maiden. Grace of gesture, propriety of style, rhetorical accuracy of expression, and rubrical precision of act must all be subordinate to that deep sincerity of heart which discriminates between a prescribed order and a mechanical formalism—which finds in the Christian liturgy not the crutches of a limping devotion, but the wings upon which the soul may soar into communion with the Infinite and which delights in the symbolism of the beautiful only because at the same time it is the symbolism of the good and the true.

THE REV. PERCY BROWNE, of Boston, Mass.

Worship is in the last analysis, entirely subjective, an internal experience. It is the expression of faith, and this may be by judgment, but its true direction is intensity of communion with God. There should therefore, be no distinctions of dogmatism and aesthetics to chill or distract.

A true art seeks the universal and leaves the particular behind and out of sight. Suggestions of aestheticism are thin and fimsy in such high relations—amounting to a superficial impertinence—reducing high spiritual exercises to the level of mere dilatory and aesthetic considerations. Touching universal conceptions and experience, it degrades them. Great art lies in contrast with universals, while the first concerns itself with particulars. We have little need or use for the limited conceptions of medievalism. One cannot worship with the highest devoutness amid art-surroundings. Simplicity and absence of art-expression are not derogatory to highest acts and moods of worship.

The Ephesian shrine makers seem to have become chiefly artificers in brass. Aesthetic or undevout beauty now current, is a type of materialized Christian life, and our worship is too often jeopardized by the ecclesiastical materialism.

Ritual in relation to Church principles has little generic force. Ten men may adopt any or all of our ritual without adopting our beliefs—even while ignoring them. Men might adopt our rituals in positive unrighteousness, even. Almost an endless variety of opinions are abroad among ourselves as to the definition and limitations of Church doctrines. There are differing and contending parties in all directions. Hence sharpest discords must follow all attempts to identify worship with the altar and its ritual. The announcements of traffic that disfigure the landscape distract our attention from its beauties; in the same way ritual significances of worship, all ingenious hieroglyphs, and multiplied altar bric-a-brac are virtual stumbling blocks to the spiritual worshipper. Holy Communion is a symbol, and the breaking of bread and the pouring of wine absorb and overrun all symbols—and can entertain, or indeed accept, no supplemental symbolism. And so it comes to be that altar worship is enfeebled by all this decoration and illustration of extremists who are all the while attempting to set forth a Real Presence in their ministrations. The Church theory of the Eucharist is a subjective and symbol theory. It is a grave responsibility for the Episcopal Church to sanction or introduce such a mode of worship. It estranges brethren. It causes harsh and intolerable charges of undevoutness against those who prefer, and are educated under a simpler worship. The best and true ritual has not yet been developed, and it will not come until the Bible, the Church and the truth of God together have moulded the hearts and minds of Christian people into a sympathetic readiness for it.

MR. JOSEPH PACKARD, JR. of Baltimore, Md.

The limits which should be placed upon aestheticism in worship are all implied in the statement that it is not an essential—that there may be worship of the highest and best kind in which art and taste have no part. Neither from revelation, nor from reasoning, nor from observation of artistic people, do we find that art has any necessary relation with religion. It is a matter of the bark, merely, and the outer bark at that, and while the bark has its uses in keeping the life currents of the tree warm, yet it is a wrapping and nothing more. And this is as much as can be said for the uses of art and taste in worship. Indeed there are many beautiful things in frequent use in our worship which cannot be deemed to have any religious significance whatever. Take for example a procession of surpliced choristers. An orderly procession of well dressed youth is a sight which must be pleasing to almost any eye, but it is hard to see where there is any more aid to religion in witnessing it than in seeing a representation of a similar spectacle on a Greek vase. To be sure there is no harm in it; nor is there in flowers or any other such adjuncts unless they use time, or thought, or money that might be better spent.

So, for the communion between man and his God, which is the great end of religion, there is nothing essential except the means of grace which God has provided, and He has been pleased to order that these shall be of the simplest character. Worship is one of those means of grace. Any adjunct to worship which, on the whole, tends to increase the number of reverent, attentive and instructed worshippers, is to be sought by Christian people. But it should be ascertained, or, at any rate, well believed, before making any such addition, that the result will be as hoped for. The aim should be in matters of this kind to suit the average taste of the community. Regard should always be had moreover to the case of the man who is in the minority. One of the Yale professors, who has written on social questions, has invented a phrase which aptly describes the man who, in the conflict between labor and capital, finds his own rights utterly ignored. He is a quiet, well-behaved citizen, doing his daily work, but not interfering with either of the conflicting parties, and so he becomes the prey of both. Professor Sumner calls him "the forgotten man." Now, in no scheme or type of worship should there be a forgotten man.

I once heard a bishop say that, speaking generally, when the people of a neighborhood were unwilling to build a church for themselves, he thought it was a strong indication that a church was not needed in that neighborhood. I think it was a wise saying, and it applies as well to the decorating as to the building of churches. The church ought to be as good as the average of the houses of its attendants, but it need not be better. If they live in tents, the church may be a tabernacle; if they live in log houses, the church may well be a log house, and for the worshippers themselves to build it of logs, is far better for their spiritual health than for them to beg the money to build the most correct Gothic edifice that architecture's brain ever conceived. The true plan is to collect the worshippers, the living stones, first, and then, when they have been trained to Christian faith and zeal, the house for God will come in due time and in fitting style. A healthy organism that needs a shell will itself secrete it. But too often, to change the figure, the cart is put before the horse, and the church is built with the hope, but without the assurance that there will be people to fill it. Who that has travelled through the country but has seen churches in places where they were not needed, or buildings more costly and worship more ornate than the place required. I once saw a church, built in a missionary district in the mountains by a young clergyman, mainly through contributions from city churches, and from persons to whom he had appealed through newspapers and otherwise. The church was in excellent taste, with some good stained glass, and had all the chancel furniture that would be needed in a large city church, including stalls for four clergymen, though the nearest one was fifty miles away, by a bad road. The service was so far choral as could be rendered by a choir of two young ladies. The congregation was small and depressed; half-dazed, it seemed, by the splendor. Would it not have been better for those people to have struggled up to a seemly church building and a solemn service, by degrees. Windows adorned with colored tissue paper are not good as art, but when the paper has been bought by self denial, and put in place by zealous hands, there will be heartier worship in that church, than if the best specimens of the stainer's art had been obtained through mendacity.

One word in conclusion. For some Christians, things of taste are as though they were not. By those who are most open and susceptible to aesthetic influences, constant care needs to be exercised lest thereby the soul be diverted from personal religion. The lack of faithful service cannot be made up for by refinement of taste; nay there is danger lest that very refinement may so lull the conscience that the lack will not be felt. The fairest flowers upon the lawn will be hurtful weeds if planted amid the growing grain.

SPEAKERS.

THE REV. G. R. VAN DE WATER, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The legitimate use of aestheticism in worship is becoming more and more appreciated by Christians of every name. There are now Methodist and Presbyterian churches arrayed in beauty, which would have condemned them a generation ago in the eyes of their own adherents. Music, sweetest of the arts, most heavenly in its origin, has been more and more utilized in public worship, as Puritanical repugnance to it has given way to a proper appreciation of its use. Architecture, too, has been appreciated more, until no longer the country meeting-house is undistinguishable from the horse-shed hard by; and even the Quakers give evidence they are not beyond being influenced by a thing that is good.

Choral services and surpliced choirs are taking the place of the quartette and the chorus to such an extent, that soon the choir gallery will be as antiquated a thing as a stage coach, and the "O, let us (four) sing unto the Lord," a faded thing of the past. What some of our evangelical brethren mistake for error of doctrine, is only an appreciation of the use of aesthetics in worship, and with the use, the removal of all unreasonableness and prejudice.

Old St. George's, Stuyvesant Square, is to-day as evangelical as when the elder Tyng thundered from its Bema, against those High Churchmen who said in their exclusiveness, "The Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord are we;" yet there we have choral services, weekly and evening communions, surpliced choir, and all other accessories of beauty to make worship what it should be. St. Ann's, Brooklyn, has suffered no change in its distinctively evangelical tone. Its new rector is as likely to be "low" as the old and honored one now in the rest of Paradise; yet the old chancel, with the table in the courtyard, has given way to a new one, and the surpliced choir of men and boys has taken the place of the former chorus.

St. John's, next oldest, has rallied into line, and our general assistant secretary, its rector, is ready to justify the change.

Not alone aesthetics in the architecture of the church, nor music of the service, but in ornaments of the sanctuary, and in the official robes of the clergy. A man's churchmanship does not depend any longer upon anything but his utterances. You cannot determine it from the shape of his surplice, color of his stole, cloths on the altar, or book marks in the Bible. The demands of the people are such, that whatever kind of Churchman a rector may be, even if he keeps his eyes wide open to prevent it, these things will all be arranged for him by the godly in his parish, and before he knows it, he will be surrounded by the evidences of taste, and leading a worship marked by its beauty.

We are beginning to think for ourselves, and are not longer willing to be influenced by opinions of those who, in the past, have been affected by the prejudices of their day. We are becoming, too, more independently American, which is a good thing. In this we are restive under edicts of English courts, composed chiefly of laymen, often of unbelievers, seldom of theologians. Even altar lights used in the early Church to edification, we feel we may have and use, though, forsooth, a court of Englishmen imagine they eclipse the light of the world. Aestheticism in worship is a sign of the times.

At the consecration of the Cathedral of the Incarnation of the Diocese of Long Island, acknowledged generally to have been the best rendered service ever witnessed in this country, there marched behind the processional cross and banners three hundred clergymen, bishops, priests and deacons of every known school of thought in the Church. They took part in a choral service, turning to the east in all ascriptions of praise, and in the recitation of the Creed. No man's opinions were settled or condemned by his attendance.

I thought as I witnessed that service, that it only emphasized a truth most plain and striking in the present condition of our American Church. It is this—that any aesthetics useful in public worship, which does not teach erroneous doctrines, is to be accepted for its worth, and encouraged for all it is worth.

THE REV. C. W. WARD, of Englewood, N. J.
(Read by the Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington.)

One of the chief difficulties in the way of a thorough discussion of such a topic upon such an occasion is, perhaps, that of securing just as fair a respect for the rights of aesthetics as for the rights of worship. For this is a Church congress, it is not an art congress. And it may, therefore, to-day be both natural and proper for us to have a larger care for ecclesiastical than for the artistic (or aesthetic) factor in the topic. And yet the balance is essential, and this because the two great underlying factors, aestheticism and religion itself, are so absolutely and inherently related that you cannot discuss the terms of the one without equally observing the terms of the other. Above all things else, our art (or artifice), our music, decoration, ceremonial, or whatever agencies we employ in worship, must be beautiful. That is, our art must be artistic, and our aesthetics must be aesthetic.

I think the aesthetic movement, which, within the past few years, has so happily and most fortunately been gathering force, both in the Church and in society, hardly stands, just now, in need of accolades. For surely there is no longer any honest fear of Puritan rigidity. We have no iconoclasts to speak of. And surely, as to the Church, the restorers in England have been busy enough with undoing the barbarisms of Cromwell. The sons of the Pilgrims, right here in New England, are raising churches upon the ruins of their meeting-houses, with crosses, quatre-folds, and mullions, before which their fathers would have trembled with holy rage, and with stamed-glass saints which, scarce a century ago, would have called down fire from heaven. Neither are we longer threatened anywhere with slovenly services, or slouchy ritual, or obtrusively barren sanctuaries. Those peculiar altars (quadruped fetishes), those sacred pedestals played such a lively part in ritual controversies not long ago, are things of the past. Those three-story pulpits, in which the service mounted up by easy stages to the emphatic point of Gospel oratory, have been well-nigh banished. Octagon fonts of chiselled stone have superseded household implements of toilet, chaste sestilia of polished wood have risen in the stead of prelatial easy-chairs, while the more fastidious now enjoy all the colors of all the "seasons" where they used of old to find only the faded melancholy of a sort of a perpetual ecclesiastical autumn, and embroidered ante-pendia where tasselled hangings and gully cushions used to speak the rotund language of a ponderous and drowsy respectability. In the room of tuning-pipes there are thundering organs and brilliant double orchestras and quartette marvels and surpliced choristers. Yes, and the wall that twenty years ago rejoiced in being bare, or—if the rector were a little "high"—in being paper-covered, to-day blazes with poly-chromatic wonders: the nave has shot out transepts, the roof has taken a Gothic pitch, the ceiling broken out with stars, the portals become all eloquent with illuminated legends. True, and so mighty has become the impulse, that we have our sanctuaries blazing with tapers and priests bedecked in copes and chasubles, and acolytes with censers and incense burners—and all seen through an atmosphere often so very dimly (?) religious with the clouds of incense that the whole has seemed to some of us like a quaint illusion, a pageant of the Middle Age, a dream, a vision, a very creation of the fancy itself! Yes, who will dare to say that we are to-day in danger of Puritan rigidity? Who can find an image-breaker of the real old muscular kind, search for him never so diligently? Why, even a noted Presbyterian divine was bold enough to say, not long ago, before the General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance: "Our present Presbyterian baldness of public service is hurting us—hurting us in many ways which need not be specified." I repeat, then, who that is not an alarmist or an extremist can seriously fear any longer the religion of ugliness, unless, perhaps, by way of that kind of ugliness which always comes from excess of any kind?

And this is precisely one of the dangers, I submit, which it behooves all the true lovers of aesthetics to consider:—the danger of an art riot, of an aesthetic craze—a fashion, a mere penchant, a boom, which shall naturally lead us to place quantity above quality, ostentation before reality, and shall tempt us to forget the good taste and moderation which are essential elements of beauty everywhere and always. For we must remember there is a correlative penalty in the use of beauty. Every triumph of art mellowing human nature has been achieved at the terrible risk of rotting it. We must remember that beauty is a solemn thing to play with, and, like the religious sense to which it ministers, is most sensitive to caricature, so there is but one step between the aesthetic and the hideous—and that step is the overstep.

It is not the province of the best art to instruct. I agree with a great authority who has said: "Aesthetic teaching is the highest of all teaching, because it deals with life in its highest complexity. But if it ceases to be purely aesthetic, if it lapses anywhere from the picture to the diagram, it becomes the most offensive of all teaching. And think you that the masters did their sublime work in the past, simply to illustrate dogma?"

Were the studios in the ages of romance and religion simply the tool shops for a Vatican or a Propaganda? For example, did they paint the Crucifixion simply to enforce a certain doctrine of Sacrifice? I say no! Rather the virtue of sacrifice. For that was universal, and art, like religion, deals always with the universal, while theology is constructing and manipulating the particular.

No! The priest may have so used the works of the artist. But when the sensitive and imaginative master came in the first place, to paint them, "sacrifice" found for him a possible meaning far outside the chapel doors. For he found in life itself the great fact of suffering. And he found the great fact of suffering to be altogether crucial. Calvary was, to him, as wide as the world. The man of sorrows was, to him, the man everywhere, and art, art like, did what it was born to do—when, like George Macdonald's baby, it came out of the "Everywhere" into the "Here," and simply referred to the humanity of that age, its own image from the face of the universally-suffered.

Several volunteers followed the speakers, all of them scoring telling points relevant to the discussion. Prof. John W. Weir of Yale pointed out with felicitous clearness, and vigor, the essential or necessary character of art as a constitutional outgrowth of the beautiful, marking the presence of some spiritual germinal quality at the root of every art form, as in the poem, statue, picture and cathedral.

The Rev. Arthur C. A. Hall brought the discussion to a close in an eloquent vindication of the beautiful, especially in its evangelical relations with the august solemnities of the altar. This session will be remembered as one of the most restful and refreshing during the congress, especially quickened with clear and earnest thinking.

THURSDAY EVENING.

TOPIC: "Free Churches."

PAPERS.

JOHN ALEXANDER BEALE, Esq., of New York.

The question to be considered under the title free churches is, as I apprehend, whether it is desirable that the pews or sittings in churches should be free and open to all persons, subject of course to the condition of decent, orderly behavior—without the exaction of any rental or entrance fee. There can be no doubt that such was the original universal custom throughout Christendom. Indeed until the fourteenth century at the earliest, there were no fixed or permanent seats in churches, except occasionally stone benches round the north, south, and west walls, which were almost as often outside of the church as inside, and were manifestly intended for resting-places for the people before service began. There is one church in England where such benches were also placed around each pillar. The first seats introduced for use in churches during divine service were in the chancel, and for the clergy and choristers, and at first these were only in the colleges and religious seminaries where long and frequent services were held. From the feudal character of society in those days it soon happened that kings and a few of the greater personages were accommodated with seats in the choir. The Diocesan Synod of Exeter, in the year 1287, enacted a canon denouncing those who claimed exclusive rights to particular seats, which seats the learned author of "The History and Law of the Church Seats" (Mr. Henley) says were probably in the choir. The rule was that standing or kneeling space was to all. Mats were sometimes provided by the church authorities for kneeling and sitting upon, and not infrequently kneeling-cushions or stools were carried by worshippers, and placed where opportunity offered. This is still the custom, nearly universal, in the Roman and Greek communions, except in the United States and England. The earliest appropriations of particular places in a church by individuals probably occurred in England, where it sometimes happened that the founder of a church, or one who added a chapel or aisle to an old church, retained a part of it for the use of himself and his family, which descended to his heirs, and in which he and they buried their dead. Such cases were very different, however, from the sale or letting of pews, and the retention or occupancy of such parts of the church as was in no sense the act of ecclesiastical or parochial authorities. St. Margaret's, Westminster, has the memorable distinction of being the only church in which pews were reuted prior to the middle of the sixteenth century. The next instance was St. Matthew's, Friday street, London, half a century later, but even in those cases it is not likely that all of the church was so apportioned. It is probable that pews first came into general use in England about 1600, very shortly after the accession of James I. The Rev. J. Mason Neale in his "History of Pews," says that Puritan objection to the directions for behavior in church, issued by Queen Elizabeth in 1559, and embodied in a canon in 1630, had much to do with the erection of these great pews or private drawing-rooms. The directions and canon in question commanded reverence for the Holy Name, standing at the Gloria. In 1493 an action at law for trespass for breaking and carrying away the plaintiff's seat in church was brought. The practice of charging for the special privilege of an appropriated seat has been reprobated by the ecclesiastical courts wherever it has been set up.

Then followed a carefully digested survey of the practical situation and operation of the movement. Statistics were presented, showing that in forty-one dioceses seventy per cent of the churches were free; that of all our churches, sixty-five per cent are free, while in New York City considerably more than one half were free. The fiscal successes of these churches was declared to be generally quite as satisfactory as that of pew-revenue churches. The social enrichment of parish life was also dwelt upon, and the writer's long experience in official relations with free churches drawn upon in support of the views he advocated.

R. FULTON CUTTING, Esq., of New York.

The free church theory has been so long and thoroughly discussed, its ideality so widely recognized, its practicability so vigorously disputed, that I shall not attempt a general argument, but merely consider several features of its relation to society at large. I am afraid the ethics of the free church will never wholly win the battle for a system in which some of us see the most brilliant promise. I am told it is visionary and impracticable. I am ready to confess the maintenance of a free church is more difficult and precarious than is the fixed income derived from renting pews, but I can declare emphatically the methods employed to supply the fund for current expenses are not an exhaustive drain upon the charities of the congregation, and I venture to assert that free churches actually contribute more largely in proportion to their means to charitable and missionary objects without the parish than the churches where pews are rented. Gentlemen of the clergy, we must look to you for the greatest helps in training for final victory for a polity as important to the Church's influence as it is consistent. When you are called to the rectorship of any charge, demand the institution of the free system as the condition of your acceptance, and bring with you to the new flock the blessing of emancipation from former exclusiveness. My brethren of the laity are not indifferent to a movement that attempts to make our Church a true representative of the American people. Doubtless, were our churches all made free they would soon be filled as they never have been. The Church was gradually pushing its way and becoming recognized among the people. It was appearing in the arena of every question. With gloves off it had gone into the fight and was delving down deep where the soil was unpromising. Pere Hyacinthe, while in this country inspected a well equipped parish in New York. "What is your annual subsidy?" he asked of the rector. He had not learned that the Church received no civil aid, and when told of it, was for the moment silent, when he remarked, feelingly: "What a great country yours is. Here it is God and the people, God and the people." Far better might he have said: "God and the rich!"

The writer dwelt upon the social portents darkening the present and menacing the near future, insisting upon the immediate responsibility resting upon the Church and Christians in making the ministrations of religion accessible and attractive to the masses of laboring and middle-class people, demanding that all humiliating distinctions in the Lord's house be done away with, and that the best should be provided for the poorest, rather than for the rich and privileged, who already have the comfort of enormous and elegant houses, whereas the poor spend nearly their whole lives in discomfort and unhomelike homes.

Chapels for the poor had so generally failed to "draw" because they deserved failure in their mistaken policy of discriminating between the rich and the poor. We don't want churches for the rich and churches for the poor. This is not St. James's doctrine. The wonderful success of St. George's, Stuyvesant Square, and of St. Ann's, both great and gorgeous sanctuaries, now given over absolutely without discrimination to the people, was dwelt upon. He had no misgivings as to the success of free churches, although not insensible to the difficulties in the way of their administration.

SPEAKERS.

CARSTEN BROWNE, Esq., of Boston, Mass.

My knowledge is based on eighteen years' experience in one parish and fifteen in another. I have wintered and summered this agitation through thirty-three years. I have seen what is disagreeable in it, and also that which is wise. I suppose it is somewhat unbecoming in a lawyer to undertake to discuss whether or not it is wise to buy and sell or rent and hire a pew. I am not disposed to favor a general or random free church agitation in the established pew church, whose system works well. It is not easy to measure the harm to come from the introduction of new systems. But in my opinion the harm is far outweighed by the good. If one is right and one wrong, surely we are bound to cling to the one and reject the other. The question which I put to myself and to you is—which of the two systems is the best adapted to get the most possible good of that work which the Church was put on earth to do? I take it the Church is to do a missionary work—the work to be done is mainly the public administration of religion. To us the progress of religion is the progress of sound morality, the very life and growth of social order. As devout Churchmen, as honest citizens, we must not work against this. Thus, I don't see why the question is not one of the greatest gravity and responsibility.

I know there are men in parishes whose eloquence and personal magnetism are sufficient in themselves to draw people in spite of the rent system. But these cases are comparatively few. What in general do we see? The poor practically excluded. This may be denied. Some of you may say that seats are assigned for the poor. Yes, seats are assigned for them where they are ticketed and billeted as such. Poverty and pride proverbially go hand in hand. Poor people are anxious to go to church, but not when they feel it like a brand, this being billeted. Make a church for the poor and a church for the rich, some may suggest. This brings us to the result that the free church for the poor will be a second class church, a very good church for the poor, like Mr. Bumble's soup in Nicholas Nickleby; it was very good soup indeed, good soup for the poor. The common idea of a free church is one in which the people's offerings are received as offerings for pew rent to pay the parish expenses, a man's gift for his seat. I profess and believe these are profound errors. Here is the truth. Every free church is, and law has made it so, a public charity as much as a free hospital is. Its office is to maintain the worship of God free to all comers. Every man who puts in ten dollars, or five cents, is as much a donor to a public charity as truly any of the great names who have been canonized by the gratitude of mankind. Let clergymen work that into the minds of their parishioners and there will be less of hard scratching in the churches. Suppose the great burden of such a system falls on a few individuals? Why not? Don't a few of you support the hospitals, and why not the churches, too?

THE REV. JOHN COTTON BROOKS of Springfield, Massachusetts.

What is the Church of God to do in this world as it was placed here by God to do? he began. My brother who has preceded me has touched upon one side of the question. It is to preach the Gospel to the poor. But this is not all that the Church is to do. Therefore I do not recognize that this opening of the pew doors is all the work for the poor that our Lord required of the Church. It has to do with those people outside the churches, and finally it has to do with the whole world. It is the universal power by which the Gospel of Christ is to reach out to the very ends of the world. It is a cultivator of those within its limits, and a propagator of the Gospel to those without. I am warmly hoping that the poor may be more generally brought into the Church, but I stand here to deny that pew churches are exclusive to the poor. Is it for those who are renting pews that our work is to be carried on in the largest way? Are we not laboring for the poor outside? Now my dear friends it seems to me that there must be something besides exclusiveness that is keeping the poor outside the churches. It is not fair to take any such standard as that of twenty years ago when there were fewer of the foreign population than at present. There is another view of this matter. A few years ago you could go into the homes of the poor and see the proper garments being made. But the sewing machine has led to demoralization among the poor much more than among the rich. It has made the poor try to secure garments for members of the family as fine as those of its neighbor. Why stand and try to tear open the pew doors? Go up into the pulpit and insist, in a manner that shall institute the reform. See that you make clean the inside the platter and the outside shall be made clean also. At the same time I will turn and ask what would be the effect of bringing in a free church system? It does not seem that it would reform the rich. They would be just as exclusive to the poor. What effect will it have upon the poor? Why, all the best development of charitable benevolence will answer that it will begin to pauperize the poor. You will cultivate and develop that selfishness which our free church friends are trying to tear out of the churches. The other thought in to be considered, I look deeper than to whether the poor can sit in this seat this Sunday and another seat another Sunday. The Church is beginning to build up a system of self-support among the poor. And now, lastly, what effect will it have upon the poor outside? The middle classes are fully able to pay for what they receive. They pay more regularly for their seats, and attend more regularly. If every Sunday the offertory is used for a free church, where is the great work—the outside work—to be performed.

FRIDAY MORNING.

TOPIC: "Deaconess and Sisterhoods."

THE REV. T. M. PETERS, D.D., of New York.

The best information on the earlier stages of this movement, he said, is to be found in articles which appeared in the Monthly Packet, signed R. F. L., in the years 1874-75. He discussed the relations between those associated workers and rectors; also, with bishops, in their parochial and diocesan relations, concluding that sisterhoods should work untrammelled, while deaconesses should be in full co-operation and in subordination to pastoral authority.

For thirty-five years there have been women laboring in the work of the Church—in fact, members of sisterhoods. There is some indispensable work of the Church for which at the present time the only sure dependence seems to be upon sisterhoods. Notwithstanding all that has been said of the disadvantages attending sisterhoods, their existence to us is a rich gain over the past. Much of the work of the Church can and will be done in no other way than through their aid. There is little need to urge the necessity among our deaconesses or independent laborers of an organization which will make them a strength and encouragement. There was placed in my hands recently a set of rules drawn up after consultation among a company of active workers in the Diocese of New York. They do credit to their devotion, their humility, and their singleness of purpose to serve the Master in the spirit of her whom the Lord said, "She hath done what she could." Let the Church smooth the way for the feet which bear the willing hearts, and give them her most ready help. Theirs is the offering, theirs will be the great reward.

THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM CROWSELL, DOANE, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Albany.

First of all, as to the women themselves, comes the great difficulty of combining in their due proportion what I may call the practical and the sentimental sides of their life and work. I use the words in their best sense, not practical in the sense of hard and dry, not in the sense of gushing and emotional, the pretty and effective phases, but in the sense of love and enthusiasm. The true woman in every estate of her life is neither the Martha that serves and never sits, nor the Mary that sits and never serves; but the combination of serving that is never so encumbered that it cannot stop and sit at Jesus' feet in worship and adoration; and of service that never sits so still in absorbed meditation that it cannot rise when the Master calls, and gird itself as He did once to wash the disciples' feet. Human nature, and woman nature especially, is just so constituted that it is apt to have one or the other of these two features in excess. To some women the thought and tendency are to what I think is most unwisely called the religious life; as though religion was not the common duty of all, and of each in the highest possible degree; as though religion did not mean the whole nature, the worshiping as well as the working. You cannot have sentimental sisterhoods and practical sisterhoods. You cannot refuse one because she is too practical, or the other because she is too sentimental. What are you to do? I believe the true idea and value of a rule of life for a sisterhood is to correct and make proportionate the two elements. Perhaps the most mooted and conspicuous question now about sisterhoods or about deaconesses, is the question of vows. First, "shall there be any?" next, "what shall they be?" thirdly, "shall they be irrevocable?" It seems to me quite out of the question that any society shall preserve its continuity and character without some pledges, call them by what name you will, of allegiance and fidelity on the part of those who join it. Of course there stands conspicuous in the Christian story the three great sets of vows, all of divine institution—the baptismal, the ordination, and the marriage vows. They may be claimed as recognizing the principle of rightfulness and of the helpfulness of vows to steady purpose. But no other promises can ever rise to the height of dignity or the depth of indelibility of these vows. At the same time there are indications of God's approval of other vows, the Nazarites and the Rechabites for instance; and there are instances of special vows like that of Jephtha devoting his daughter to perpetual virginity. After all, the question is of the expression or the non-expression of an intention which all the while exists, expressed or understood, for I am quite sure no woman ever undertook to be a deaconess or a sister without intending and expecting that she would continue such all the days of her life, and it is desirable, both for the thoroughness of training and for development of character, and for absorption in the work, that this purpose should exist. It is, therefore, of the first consequence that no one should give herself to the work until she is old enough to know her own mind, unless she has shown the elements of character which imply suitableness and steadfastness; or without a probation long enough to test those two points beyond human pervenience. For this to be done I believe there must be what in popular language are called vows in the setting apart of every sister or deaconess.

The reader commended the diocesan use of the sisterhoods and thought that comity would arrange for the transfer of workers from one place to another far better than canons. He thought the property of the deaconesses and sisterhoods should be in the control of a body of trustees. In closing, he said: "I have the most intense sympathy with the movement, and the greatest admiration for the spiritual character, the unswerving devotion, the earnest love, of the women who are called of God to this closer service of their Lord."

SPEAKERS.

THE REV. C. B. PERRY, of Baltimore, Md.

Sisterhoods are but beginning their work, and nothing is easier than to destroy a young plant by over-pruning. My first appeal, then, is to avoid crushing this young life by over-legislation. I would suggest that the Church will show great wisdom if it over-prunes this young organization. There are many things in which it is best for the Church not to take the initiatory responsibility. The sisterhoods are just in this condition, and are voluntary workers who have asked for no such recognition. It is only forty years since such an organization was unknown in the Anglican Church. Let them grow. Let them have full scope to do their work. Law is to correct sinners. It is utterly impossible to correct evils before they come. When they do come, we surely trust the wisdom and judgment of this Church to correct them. There will be no greater influence in going among the homes of the poor and lifting them up than these noble, self-sacrificing women who go forth in Christ's uniform. I don't think, my dear friends, that it will need any argument in their support.

THE REV. A. ST. JOHN CHAMBERLAIN, of Lowell, Mass.

I do not believe that all women who have been engaged in Church work are those who have lost their husbands. Some of us seem to be very much afraid that women may have something to do or to say. So far as I am concerned, I am not afraid of the women or their work. I am very much afraid that we'll not say enough that is good. There is certainly the need of these orders for consecrated, life-long work. It seems to me that there are numerous instances in a parish minister's life when a devout woman is an essential forerunner, acting in the spirit of John the Baptist, and preparing the way. I believe that woman's work is indispensable in the parish. We need those whose lives are given in this direction. I regard that as a very dangerous doctrine, broached by the previous speaker, that we are to allow these orders to grow into great powers themselves. I would not have these deaconesses and sisters ordained by the laying on of hands. They ought to be set apart by the bishops of the Church with some suitable ceremony. I would not have any irrevocable vows. I am not afraid of popery. I don't think it is the spirit of the bishops or of the age. I think the bishops can be trusted with power over the length of the vows. These sisters are not born as are poets, they grow.

The Chairman (the Bishop of Connecticut) introduced

LORD BRABAZON, of London, England, Chairman of the Central Committee of the Young Men's Friendly Society and a member of the Committee of the Girls' Friendly Society, who said:

"Ever since two months ago, when I first landed on your shores, I have been made to feel that I am not a foreigner, that I am surrounded by those of my own race and religion. To-day I have witnessed one more proof of that kindness which has characterized all whom I have met here." Lord Brabazon then briefly discussed the work of the two societies with which he is connected.

THE REV. ARTHUR BROOKS, of New York.

It is not a fact that in every instance sisterhoods have proved useful, but we wish that there shall be some order which shall attach itself to the heart of the individual. It seems to me that if there are any points to be decided, I feel that it is this power of individualism, before referred to, which will settle them. I am advocating an individualism which has all its dangers taken away and all its powers left. We have but one law of work in the Church. We want another which shall make the work of women an organized one, as that of the clergy is.

protested against allowing individual bishops to control the orders in their own dioceses. He believed in Church legislation concerning religious communities. He objected to a prohibition of vows.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

TOPIC: "Place and Methods of Bible Study in the Christian Life."

PAPERS.

THE REV. GEORGE WILLIAM DOUGLASS, of New York.

Bible study has a place far beyond the bounds of the Christian life proper. What does the Christian lose who does not study the Bible? For that it is possible to live and die believing in Christ and belonging to the Church without real study of the Bible, few would care to dispute. What, then, is there lacking to the Christian life in such cases? Why should we urge such persons to make great sacrifices in order that they may study the Bible? This, I presume, is the subject assigned for our discussion.

When we consider the machinery of Christianity in the world, it is evident that the very fact of its organization, necessary though it be, leads to the danger that the members of the Church should neglect the Bible. Whatever theory one may hold as to the original relations of the Church to the Bible, it will be generally admitted that the Church as now existing anticipates the Bible in the ordinary Christian life. The Christian faith is in the atmosphere that the Christian child breathes. In organizing the Church our Lord was careful that Christianity should be vital in the Christian's mind from the beginning. Therefore the Church has, in one sense, taken the faith only of the Bible beforehand, and made it current among Christians. Therefore we have a Creed, a Liturgy, a catechism, and rule of life.

It is well known how familiar with the Bible the primitive and medieval fathers were; how the early fathers passed the manuscript from hand to hand in the face of persecution; how earnestly they set about translating the scriptures into the different tongues of the races that they evangelized, urging the laity to study the word for themselves.

Careful study of the heresies of the twelfth century among the Roman Church peoples show that although they appealed to Scripture in support of their theories these errors were in fact imported by them into the scriptures from outside sources, while what measure of truth the heretics had was due to their acquaintance, however improper, with the scriptures.

The central problems of to-day are the personality of God, the existence of man after death, the necessity of religion to morality, the possibility of a supernatural revelation in a sphere where law is natural and lastly the origin and destiny of the human race on earth, and the mutual relations of its several classes, rich and poor, governors and governed.

The battle of the last hundred years between faith and skepticism has shown that the Christian is safe and strong when he takes his stand on the facts of history, as the verified expression of the wants of the human soul and the true source of this satisfaction. And whosoever this method has been pursued, then the Bible has disclosed itself as the advancing revelation of the great central fact of the personal God working in human history for the salvation of the world through Jesus Christ. The Old Testament is the story of Christ's coming and of the world's preparation for Him. The New Testament is the record of the life and exposition of His wisdom, informing, purifying, stimulating and regulating the minds of men.

THE REV. C. H. BABCOCK, of Columbus, Ohio.

The Bible is the Christian's collection of divinely inspired writings for religious purposes. That it is not a continuous composition is apparent upon a first examination of its contents. When I reflect upon another statement—namely, that the Bible is divinely inspired—my assurance of unanimous support is somewhat diminished, if indeed it does not forsake me altogether.

The Bible as a book cannot in strictness be called God's revelation, or, save in a secondary way, be said to be inspired by Him. The Bible is only the record, the writing down by human hands of those revelations of Himself which God from time to time has vouchsafed to the human race.

The true Bible student will always proceed with lowliness of mind. However much of critical or exegetical knowledge of the Scriptures he may attain, he will be kept profoundly humble by the larger knowledge of how ignorant he is. In the spirit of Lord Bacon's student's prayer he will humbly pray that human knowledge may not prejudice divine truth; that from a pure understanding, cleared of all fancies and vanity, he may attain unto faith; and lastly, that being freed from the poison of knowledge, we may neither be too profoundly nor immoderately wise, but worship truth in charity.

SPEAKERS.

THE REV. E. S. THOMAS, of St. Paul, Minn.

I have arrived at the conclusion that the study of the Bible is very much neglected. There is a great multiplication in these days of devotional books, which have taken the place of the study of the Bible. Then there is a growing indifference to the study of the Bible owing to the skeptical works that are crowding it out of its appropriate place. It seems to me that there could not have been a subject of more importance presented to this congress for discussion than the study of the Bible. The Bible is not a collection of Hebrew legends, if it was so it would be read only to find the residuum of truth, and that residuum would be very small. I fear there are a great many honest Christians who think that the miracles of the Bible may be miracleized so that they are no longer miracles. Now if we see the possibility of a miracle let us open the Bible without prejudice. In studying the Bible invoke the light of history, invoke the light of science. Let us be courageous in the study of the Bible, for it will bear all the light.

THE REV. B. W. MATRIN of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

No man must go to the Bible to study it until he is thoroughly prejudiced. The Christian religion was not first written down in a book. First know what you want and then go to the Bible. The first thing is to have the order of the Bible in its relation to the Church. There has been talk about putting the Bible in opposition to the Church. There is no opposition. The position is not that we go to the Bible to find religion in it, but because we have already found religion. We have sometimes read the pages of some great commentator and find that the principles of the Bible are breathed into his very writings. There is room for the life of consecration. The deeper student you are of the Bible the less you will ask about inspiration. The question of inspiration comes before us continually. When the Word of God was written it was written in the language of children and suited to the people of those times. Everything that men wrote in those days was not revealed. There is a wide difference between revelation and inspiration.

You have got to study the Bible intellectually and then study it spiritually. I read the Bible over and over again and every time I study it I find something new in it.

RUSSEL STURGIS, Esq., of Boston, Mass.

I can never say what this book has been to me. I am not to speak upon this subject theologically, but I suppose you want to hear what a layman thinks of it. Thank God, I have no doubt about the truth of the Bible. Twenty years ago I pinned my faith to that book. The more you go to it to learn to live spiritual lives, the more you will learn how to love it as the Word of God. Nothing would ever send me anywhere else for comfort but to the Word of God. The time I do have for reading is very largely given to the reading of that book. The Bible is the assaying office to which we may bring our thoughts and have our acts tried as by fire.

THE REV. W. HAY AITKEN of Bedford, England.

The study of the Holy Scriptures is our principal duty of all. The five points of the greatest importance, in connection with an intelligent study of the Bible, are: First, sustained habits of prayer; second, regular observance of the communion; third, necessity and earnest study; fourth, expediency of engaging in active religious work; fifth, care in the selection of one's associates and friends; sixth, we want to study the Bible critically and conscientiously.

THE REV. G. Z. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass.

How are we to learn the right feelings, the right thought, and the right action in Christian life?

The New Testament is the only rule of your Christian life. It is the presentation of the picture of what you are to realize in your Christian life.

It is the place where Christians learn how true Christians ought to live. Study it honestly; get the true meaning. Get out of it what God put there, and that will help you all through. Don't explain its teachings away. Honestly find out what is there, and the true lessons of Scripture will help you. When we are the humblest we see the widest horizon. Our mission is to live out the Christian life, and be humble and devout before God. Those will realize it the best to whom it is a lamp unto their feet and a light unto their path.

Immediately before the reading of the first paper, the general secretary,

THE REV. DR. G. D. WILDES, addressed the large audience in attendance. He referred to the sad circumstances attending the assembling of the Congress, owing to the bereavement of one of their number (Dr. Harwood), and said that out of all this great sorrow came bright voices, which told us to go on with our Congress. We have had, on the part of the local committee, a completeness in management unparalleled in the history of the Congress, and for our members, and from the bottom of my heart I return to them my sincere thanks. Not one thing have I thought of which they have not thought of, and anticipated before the want was felt. Archdeacon Farrar said he felt the greatest pleasure in coming to this old university town, and in his reception. You have seen the hospitality ministered by the venerable president of Yale. Had he been a bishop of souls he could not have been more hospitable. We shall go from New Haven with grateful recollections. Once again let me thank the people of New Haven and the beloved bishop of this diocese for his kindness in presiding.

The Bishop of Connecticut, in response to Dr. Wildes, said: My own share in the matter has been the smallest. It is a very easy thing to sit here and do just what you are told to, and I have followed so closely the instructions of the gentleman who preceded me, that if I have failed to do anything, the responsibility will be on his shoulders. I also wish to extend thanks to the president and officers of Yale, and to those who have extended their courtesies, many of whom were not of our faith. I look for good results from this Congress, and if so, it will be due in a great measure to the executive committee. We shall always hold pleasant recollections of the Tenth Congress in New Haven.

After Dean Gray's remarks, closing prayers were said, and the president dismissed the Tenth Church Congress with the benediction.

To a casual or superficial observer, the keeping of men of rare talent in places of greater or less obscurity may excite wonder; to one who thinks deep it ceases to do so. Why should Keble, say, have been kept at Hursley? There is, however, a divinity that shapes our ends. All over the Church, here and in other lands, men are not advanced, yet the work is. Therein lies the kernel of the question. Not men, the work. No light that is such can be hid beneath a bushel. It will shine and penetrate. From the vicarage and from the chancel and pulpit went the influence of that humble priest just as effectively as goes that of Liddon from St. Paul's.

MESSRS. E. P. DUTTON & Co., the American publishers of Archdeacon Farrar's works, gave a delightful breakfast to the distinguished author at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, on Monday of this week.

The distinguished visitor received the guests who had been invited to meet him in a parlor of the hotel, and at ten o'clock he was escorted to the breakfast room by Mr. Dutton. Grace was said by the Archdeacon. Mr. Charles A. Clapp, the partner of Mr. Dutton, presided with Canon Farrar at his right.

There were present, Whitelaw Reid, Rowell Smith, Cyrus W. Field, Rev. Dr. Mallory, Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, R. W. Gilder, Hiram Hitchcock, David M. Stone, Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field, E. L. Godkin, J. D. Champlin, Jr., Major J. M. Bundy, Rev. Dr. Chas. A. Stoddard, and Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, mostly all editors of daily and weekly journals or magazines. There were no speeches, but after breakfast the guests gathered in groups for general conversation. It was a most enjoyable occasion.

A&T.

The Compline Service at St. Chrysostom's Chapel, Seventh Avenue and Thirty-ninth street, on the third Sunday of the month, merited announcement in the daily journals; and justifies the most deliberate criticism in its relation to the growth of true religious art.

It is a delicate matter to call in question either the fidelity or practical wisdom of such a man as the minister in charge; but he cannot take it unkindly if we suggest that the neighboring Casino, with all its wantonly meretricious allurements, does not hide its ignis-fatuus light under a bushel, but advertises its "Sunday evenings" with lavish hand. Why should Mr. Still be outgeneralized or outwitted in such an involuntary competition? All the world knows and hears about the Casino, while nobody beyond the congregation hears or knows about the little chapel on the neighboring corner, with its incomparably better entertainment for the intelligent lover of music.

The truth is, thousands of religious people are literally wheeled away into untimely and secular recreations on Sunday evenings, in the absence of the legitimate refreshments of the Lord's house. We impeach the religion that is so easily betrayed, and we censure the churchly apathy that is too blind or indolent to meet the crisis energetically and wisely. In this regard St. Chrysostom's has fought a good fight and earned a good degree—only she let her light shine out, so that the silly and simple and wayfaring and restless souls might catch a glimpse of it, and that means practically an explicit card in the Saturday or Sunday papers, mentioning its musical selections.

All Churchmen know, or should know, that every Sunday service in this chapel is exceptionally rich in its musical expression; that Compline every Sunday is glowing with devoutness, and that on every third Sunday a work of highest excellence and importance is presented for the Offertory. On this occasion Mr. Still devotes the offerings to a chancel improvement fund, which has already provided the exquisite east window among other works.

The service opened with Hymn 337 for a professional; Psalm xxiii, was chanted in plain song, with a very reverent delivery, with Hymn 189 before the sermon. The Offertory chiefly demands attention. It was Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's Anthem Cantata, "All They That Trust in Thee, Lord." It is distributed in four beautifully contrasted movements, having for the text verses from the Psalm cxvii, and had not before been sung by this choir.

The first number is a chorus in 3-2 time, moving with an elastic rhythm, and grandly harmonized. The basses and tenors open in strongly marked unison passages, while the parts enter in an antiphonal spirit, advancing in fluent, melodic figures until the ripe strength of the movement matures in majestic choral form. Under the organ accompaniment of Mr. Messier, who often assists on these occasions, the resolute tonic spirit of the chorus was brought out with exhilarating distinctness.

No. 2 is a brief dramatic episode, "Round Jerusalem stand the Mountains," as a tenor recitative, with a beautifully colored choral response, making ready for the 3d number, "Lord, do Thou well to those that are good," in which a lively tenor solo carries out the thought, upheld by a choral accompaniment of subtle and most pathetic import. The accompaniment is a delicate, fluttering, harp-like figure, full of ancient Hebraic suggestion. Here the composer displays his striking individuality in the wealth and boldness of his harmonic shadings. The last number is the most highly wrought, the voice parts moving in a polyphonic spirit, threaded on a strongly-drawn tenor solo. The peril and crisis of evil-doers come out in vivid colors; but the turbulence and storm-drift give way to the blessed refrain, "But peace shall be upon Israel," in the development of which Dr. Hiller pours out the vials of his most seraphic inspirations.

The whole cantata—and it hardly lasts twenty minutes—was delivered with exemplary intelligence, and what is better than all, in a very devotional spirit.

Indeed it fell like a wonderful sermon on the people with visible eloquence. The worshipper here, and at other times, finds criticism giving way to devout influences, for there is recognized an exalted art so merged in a fervent religiousness that it savors of irreverence, if not profanity, to tear them asunder. The devout student of musical liturgies will do well not to forget St. Chrysostom's choir, and especially the Service of Compline on the third Sunday of the month.

THE REV. ASH L. COLE, D. D.

The Faculty of Nashotah would reverently and lovingly place on record their sense of the grievous loss which has befallen themselves, their House and its students, the cause of education for the ministry, and the whole American Church, in the death of the Rev. ASH L. COLE, D. D., for thirty years pastor of the house and revered President of Nashotah House.

Accepting the office at a time when the outlook was discouraging, he has for more than a generation, in the most unflinching, self-sacrificing, and self-denying manner, pursued the even tenor of his way, ever steady in his faith, abounding in hope, continuing to pray for those who have known him. He will be appreciated the heavy burden he has so long and so abjectly borne, in presiding over an institution whose origin has been a venture of faith, and whose only support has been the aims of the future.

A life devoted to his sacred work has been closed by a peaceful and holy death in the Lord, surrounded by loving colleagues and students, and cheered by the knowledge that the Master's blessing was never being more richly poured out upon the object of his labor and love and prayer.

W. H. KEMPER, Bishop of Wisconsin, and Acting President of Nashotah House, LEWIS A. KEMPER, Secretary of Faculty. October 16, 1885.

THE REV. A. D. COLE, D. D.

Resolutions of the visiting clergy, adapted at a meeting, held in Dr. Aikin's recitation room, at the residence of the Bishop of Missouri, directly after the burial.

The visiting clergy desire hereby to express their deep sorrow for the loss which has fallen upon Nashotah and the whole American Church in the death of this distinguished divine. His home life, his studies, his work as a colonial worker, his pleasant greeting has often met us at the train, his almost every diocese the influence of his ministrations has been felt. His life has been for good; and the solid worth of his character has given added value to the institution, and secured for it the respect and confidence of the whole Church. For thirty-five years of unceasing prayer and toil, Dr. Cole has given his life to this work, and in the state which he has reached he has truly said to be written upon his heart. Besides the training of over 200 young men for the Sacred Ministry, he has found time to do his work in neighboring villages, and do much for the sick and needy. The poor have shed tears over his body, and we as we look at his remains in the casket he loved so well, and the rich have been moved to special trains to show their reverence for him. As we look at his remains in the casket he appears the dignified, venerable, Christian Priest. Not unlike the sketches of some of the great selection of the early Christian saints, he has sought the good fight; he has finished his course; he has kept the faith."

MORRIS FRANKLIN.

At a meeting of the Vestry of St. George's church, Washington, specially convened, October 23, 1885, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted: "We have pleased Almighty God to remove from his earthly sphere of usefulness, our beloved and honored colleague, MORRIS FRANKLIN, who for many years was a most valued vestryman, and for the last fifteen years a warden of this parish. Therefore,

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. Franklin, after an exceptionally long life of activity and usefulness, we recognize the loss, not only of a most important member of the Vestry, but also of a friend, that of a venerable and dearly loved friend, a wise and experienced counsellor, a generous co-operator in every department of Christian work, an honored and influential citizen, and a man whose stainless record of public service and of private virtue will be a noble monument and example in this community.

Resolved, That this Board extend to the family of our deceased colleague the warmest and most cordial sympathy. We assure with them their sorrow and their sense of loss; and while we commend them in every department of their life, we sympathize with their sorrow, and we also rejoice with them in the assurance that an All-wise Father has gathered into His garner all who departed friends—of old years and of honors—like a sheaf of corn fully ripe.

Resolved, That this Board as a body attend the funeral of our late colleague, wearing the usual black cravat upon the left arm, and additional mark of respect to his memory.

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered on the minutes of the vestry; also, that a copy of the same be sent to the family of our deceased colleague, and that copies be furnished by the Vestry to the friends of the late colleague, and the New York Churchman, for publication.

W. H. KEMPER, Cleric, pro tempore. J. CARPENTER SMITH, Rector.

IN MEMORIAM.

WILLIAM CLEVELAND RICE.

At a meeting of the Wardens and Vestrymen of Calvary church, Summit, N. J., held at the rectory, on October 27, 1885, the Rev. J. F. Butterworth in the chair, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Forasmuch, as it has pleased Almighty God in His wisdom to take out of the world of our dear friend and brother, WILLIAM CLEVELAND RICE, deceased, that the following be adopted as a memorial:

That in the death of our brother, who for many years was a most valued member of the Diocesan Board of Missions, and a delegate to the General Convention, and who has at large has sustained a grievous loss which is most deeply felt in his own immediate parish and diocese, and for many other benevolent institutions and for the poor, the sick, and the suffering, as well as his own earnest personal labor for Christ and the Church we would hereby express our sympathy.

That we extend to the family of our brother, our sincere sympathy with them in their sorrow, praying that God will help, comfort, and console them in their grief and grant them resignation to the Divine Will.

That a copy of this memorial be sent to the family, and that it be published in THE CHURCHMAN.

By order of the vestry, A. F. DOHRMAN, Secretary.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Entered into the joys of Paradise, on Tuesday, September 22, ANNE, wife of the late Thomas Messenger, Esq., of Brooklyn, New York.

Entered into the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

Again the heart of the Saviour has been made glad as another saintly spirit passed through the dark valley into the glorious light of the presence of God, On Tuesday afternoon, September 22, as the sun was slowly sinking in the western sky, Mr. THOMAS MESSENGER passed swiftly and peacefully from earth to Heaven. It is but a few short years since St. Ann's was called to minister to his bereaved and staunch friend, Mr. Messenger, and now her tears are falling as she pays a last tribute of loving respect to his wife; the parish has lost a firm friend, and its members mourn for one whose holy, consistent life was an example and encouragement to all who were in communion with him in the faith. To the many calls from far and near, for help, Mr. Messenger ever gave a ready response, and the poor and needy were his constant care, but he was never deaf to their appeals. While, however, St. Ann's mourns, and those near her by special ties of kinship or affection are bowed in grief, let us with stiller hearts listen to the voice of Christ, and forgetting our own sorrow, remember her unspcakable joy. What says the Master, beloved are the dead who die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors; "I go to prepare a place for you, that when I shall come again, I may be able to come and receive you into my Father's house." "Come ye, blessed of my father, inherit the place prepared for you." And then St. Paul's triumphant assurance, "Absent from the body, present with the Lord." Oh what rapturous joys, what glorious realizations of all that the soul has battled for on earth. All this time, in the more than earthly home, where he abides, from our midst we mourn to-day. Knowing this we are not as those that mourn with hope, for, thanking God for this blessed example, we are sure to have as he followed Christ, praying that our last end may be even as his.

CONVENTION AT THE GENERAL CONVENTION OF SEPTEMBER, 1879.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In a learned article on "The National Church and the Diocese," published a few months ago,* are the following words in regard to the General Convention which assembled on Michaelmas, 1789:

"It was composed of deputies professing to represent ten State Churches—not Dioceses. Of these only five had any form of organization, and even that was wholly voluntary, without law or precedent to authorize it. . . . Dr. Parker represented Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and Dr. Jarvis, Connecticut, at the request of certain clergyman resident in these States."

"Without entering into the question whether in 1789 Connecticut had not been formally organized as a diocese, in full accord with Church law and precedent I wish to call attention to the authority which was given to the delegates who represented her in the General Convention in the autumn of that year, and also to the recognition of that authority on the part of the General Convention itself."

The original records of the conventions of the Clergy of Connecticut, prior to 1790, are not known to be in existence. But in a "Life of Bishop Jarvis," written by his son, the Rev. Dr. S. F. Jarvis, and published in the third volume of the Evergreen, is an account of the election of the delegates to the General Convention, evidently taken from the original records made at the time. It is in the following words (p. 174):

"At a Special Convention of the presbytery of Connecticut, held at Stratfield (now Bridgeport), Sep. 15, 1789, the Bishop being absent, the Rev. Dr. Leaning was chosen President, and the Rev. Mr. Jarvis Secretary. Their object was to deliberate upon the invitation from the general Convention at Philadelphia to the Bishop and Clergy of the Church in Connecticut, to attend the Convention which they had adjourned for that end to the 29th of September. The letters and papers sent relating to a general Union having been read, it was voted, on motion of Mr. Bowden, that the Convention would send Clerical delegates. The next day (Wednesday, 16th), Messrs. Hubbard and Jarvis were chosen, and empowered to confer with the General Convention on the subject of making alterations in the Book of Common Prayer," but "the ratification of such alterations" was "expressly reserved to rest with the Bishop and Clergy of this Church."

2. So much for the formality of the appointment of the delegates. It remains to see how they were received by the convention in Philadelphia. The record will be found on p. 71 of Bioren's reprint of the early journals, under date of Wednesday, September 30, 1789, as follows:

"The Right Rev. Dr. Samuel Seabury, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Connecticut, attended, to confer with the Convention, agreeably to the invitation given him, in consequence of a resolve passed at their late session; and the Rev. Dr. Samuel Parker, deputy from the churches in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and the Rev. Mr. Bela Hubbard and the Rev. Mr. Abraham Jarvis, deputies from the Church in Connecticut, produced testimonials of their appointment to confer with the Convention, in consequence of a similar invitation. These testimonials were read and deemed satisfactory."

On Friday, October 2, a committee of the convention reported in regard to "the deputies from the churches of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Connecticut" (p. 73 of Bioren's reprint):

"That they have had a full, free, and friendly conference with the deputies of the said churches, who, on behalf of the Church in their several states, and by virtue of sufficient authority from them, have signified that they do not object to the constitution," etc.

The report having been accepted, Bishop Seabury, Dr. Parker, and the Rev. Messrs.

Jarvis and Hubbard signed a paper expressing their agreement to the Constitution of the Church, as that day modified, and "took their seats as members of the convention."

It may be added, with reference to the reservation of the powers which were given to the delegates from Connecticut, that the clergy of that diocese, assembled at Newtown on the first day of October, 1790, after consideration of "the alterations in the Book of Common Prayer made by the General Convention at Philadelphia," voted to "confirm the doings of" their "Proctors in the General Convention at Philadelphia on the 2d day of October, 1789."

SAMUEL HART.

GOD A BEGGAR.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

These words sound profane. They are profane. And yet the profanity lies not in the words, but in the exercise of that custom which has become now so general throughout the Christian land of raising money for accomplishing religious purposes through the medium of "begging." Begging addresses, begging sermons, begging from house to house for stray coins—such is the order of the day. And these mendicants who debase themselves, and debase their noble religion, and dishonor their God, however unintentionally, by engaging in these acts are treated as beggars by those to whom they make their appeals. No uncommon thing is it for them to be turned away from the doorstep as though they were veritable paupers; around banks and places of business they are almost regarded as pests. Even the clergyman preaching from the pulpit, when he begins to speak of charity and waxes warm in his appeal with the view to increasing the offertory at the close of the service, is looked upon in a cynical, almost sneering way, by many in his audience. And this plan of raising money by begging is not successful. God's blessing has not rested on the system, too, is distasteful to those who have to engage in it, and it has to be supplemented by fair, and sane, and social, and every other imaginable means, before money sufficient can be raised to build the church or schoolhouse, or to purchase the organ, or to accomplish whatever may be the work on hand. No, the plan is not successful because it is not scriptural; it is not successful because it is not honoring to God.

"Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruit of all thine increase." Here is the remedy. And the practical way of bringing the desirable change into effect, is by simply refusing, on religious grounds, to have anything more to do with begging. Let a few of the clergy band together and bind themselves to have nothing more to do with begging for God's work. Let them have faith and believe that the Lord of the harvest who calls for laborers to reap his fields, will both pay them wages and build them houses both to preach and to live in. It is the want of faith on the part of the clergy that causes want of faith among the laity. Let the clergy be content with food and raiment for themselves and their families, and cease adding land to land, and field to field. Let them work in faith as God's laborers, and very soon, I believe, the effect will be seen among the people. Men of affluence and wealth taught, led, drawn by God's Holy Spirit, will begin to do as they did in the apostolic days, to give up their houses and lands for Christ's sake, and the income of the Church will be increased thirty fold, sixty fold, yes, a hundred fold. E. F. WILSON.

CHRISTIANITY USES ALL THE FACULTIES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Has not your correspondent (R. W. Lowrie) mistaken the point of the article in THE CHURCHMAN on "Reagan's Romance." As I recollect, the objection was that a romance is addressed to the imagination solely, and, Roman by calling religion a romance left it to one faculty of the mind. The point evidently was, that true religion must reach all faculties of body, soul and spirit, and fill the whole individual man, to full satisfaction; supplying all his needs, answering or quelling all his questionings, outscouring, yet uplifting, his aspirations, and both comforting him and nourishing him day by day.

The imagination, as your correspondent skillfully shows, is an essential part of us, and therefore may be sanctified. The true religion makes good use of it. But Christianity uses all the human faculties. They who do not appreciate this, its comprehensiveness, have no adequate conception of it. It is real now and full of blessing. The walk with God even in this mortal life, is as real as its promises for the future are true. It comes to the whole person in this life; it saves him. He enters eternal life while on earth. His undestroyed, unnummated, entire person reaches out for this life, with the assurance of faithful hope that the life to come will be the same eternal life, filling him full and expanding forever.

SUNDAY PAPERS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Such burning words as those lately from one of our bishops are to the point, and need no poor words of mine to strengthen them. But the thought has been aroused in my mind, could not people who while away their time on these seducing prints, turn upon us and say, "You have your Sunday paper, what you like; and you must allow me to have a Sunday paper I like!" I refer to our Sunday school papers. And here let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean that these papers for the young are printed on Sunday, as many of the Sunday papers are; no. I mean this, that they are dated for such and such a Sunday. Allow me to make a suggestion. No doubt many of your readers can make a much better one. E.g., instead of dating a paper for the "19th Sunday after Trinity," say the "19th week after Trinity." Perhaps some one can offer a better plan. Who will!

NEW BOOKS.

THE BLOOD COVENANT. A Primitive Rite and its Bearings on Scripture. By H. Clay Trumbull, D.D., Author of "Kadesh Barnea." New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, pp. 300. Price 8t.

We hardly know which has struck us most strongly—the varied and curious learning so copiously displayed in this book, or the keen and convincing reasoning by which it is applied. It is not easy to get away from Dr. Trumbull's conclusions, or to overlook the fact that he never begs the question or forces unduly the manifold citations he uses in support of his theory. With one point he makes us are thoroughly in accord—viz., that ancient and wide spread customs are to be referred to a common origin in a primal revelation, and are not to be taken in their later and debased form and sense as the original idea. This book is made up of three lectures delivered before the Summer School of Hebrew in the Divinity School at Philadelphia. They grow out of the rite of "Blood Brotherhood," which the readers of Stanley's books on Africa will readily remember. This rite consists in the mingling or interchange of blood (with other ceremonies) between the two contracting parties, and its effect is to constitute a firm and absolute league of amity between the "Blood-brothers." This is not confined to the African tribes of the Congo basin, but, to our surprise, we found as we read Dr. Trumbull's pages, was of the most remote antiquity and of the widest extent. It is developed into not a few variations, among others the symbolism of the wedding-rite. We refer the reader to the book itself or these, as we do not wish, by attempting to epitomize the doctor's well-chosen words to measure statements, to weaken their force.

As we read we were, as is natural when one takes up a work written under the pressure of a decided theory, on the lookout for some inconsequent deduction, some forcing of the facts, or some passages where ingenuity was directed to smooth away hostile premises. We have failed to find these. We do not remember among the books of this class a single one in which the fancy has been so sternly subjected to the requirements of logic.

In the bearing of this topic on Scripture, especially as elucidating the general idea of sacrificial covenant, and also as illuminating a host of minor passages, otherwise obscure, we acknowledge the great value of this work. It seems to us to throw a true and important light upon the sacrament of the Holy Communion, and to rescue it alike from Roman perversion and Zwinglian degradation. Throughout we have been impressed by its reserve of power, its care not to press unduly any analogy. It seems to us a model of what biblical study should be, at once removed from the indiscriminate catching at every straw of resemblance which floats on the surface, under the plea of pious opinion, and from the skeptical rationalism which would reduce everything to its lowest terms of bald and meagre interpretation. We have said that we look with suspicion upon the books of a dominant idea. But where a dominant idea is not an a priori assumption, but a legitimate induction, as we think this to be, a dominant idea is only another name for a cardinal truth. Such books may have their uses in giving a fresh aspect to familiar facts, as they have the gift to please the ephemeral fancy. But a work like Dr. Trumbull's has a deeper and more enduring merit. It is a contribution to human knowledge, a help to human thought, and that is the highest of human studies.

THE WITNESS OF THE CHURCH TO CHRISTIAN FAITH. By Jas. Mulchahy, S. T. D. [New York: James Pott & Co., 1885.] pp. 214.

The author of this thoughtful volume of sermons is one of the assistant ministers of Trinity church in this city, and has for many years been in charge of St. Paul's historical chapel. He has already published occasional sermons and essays, which have done excellent service in the form of tracts; but this is his first attempt at a more sustained work. In appearance it is a volume of twenty-one sermons, each having its own subject, and all adapted to the seasons of the Church, yet such is its continuity of thought and its unity of subject that it may be regarded as one work, an attempt to bring out a recognition of the Church's attestation of Christian fact to the believing mind and heart as the true remedy for much of modern scepticism. It is cast in the form of sermons in the hope that it might become the more useful, whether for private study or for the lay reader in many congregations. Just now there would seem to be a wave of scepticism going over the land, not confined to scholars and thinkers, but reaching down to the masses of men. They ask, is there any truth? and, what is truth? and are met by the abstractions of philosophers, not to say cranks, and by essays upon theories of evolution and other quiddities of "science, falsely so called," which they can not comprehend, and the result is that they are more muddled than before. They will not wrestle with dogma nor with the ratiocination by which, to many minds, it can be best sustained, but they can appreciate facts and testimony. Dr. Mulchahy, taking advantage of this characteristic, has shown in this volume how the great fundamental verities of Christianity have, in every age, had the testimony and authority of the Church in their favor. They are reclaimed and asserted truths, they are in the world, and their existence has to be accounted for, and this is done by showing their historic basis, and that there has been, in every age, not only a succession of the apostles, but a succession of the truth. Christian truth alone is the salvation of the world, and in these sermons it is shown how that truth, "coming into the world as a Divine Revelation, did in its reception gladden the hearts and guide the lives of men, and how it is ever calculated to work those cheering and saving effects." One by one he takes the great subjects, brought before us in the teaching of the Church, from Advent to Trinity; and this is suggestive of a subsequent volume, and we have a body of sound and Churchly doctrine, "wholesome and Godly, and necessary for these times." The sermons were not written for the purpose of making a book, but for use in the ordinary course of pastoral care; they have stood the test, and what was intended for a congregation is now addressed to the Church itself. The same evils, the struggle with doubt and scepticism, are everywhere found, and need the same remedy—the parish is a miniature world, and this volume is timely, and should find a wide degree of favor. These sermons are plain and simple in style, without any ambitious rhetoric or straining after effect, and if they are pleasant reading, it is because they have been carefully thought out and studied by the author, because he had something to say and knew how to say it; he gives us "boaten oil."

HEAVEN REVEALED. Being a Popular Presentation of Swedenborg's Disclosures about Heaven. With the concurrent testimony of a few competent and reliable witnesses. By B. F. Barrett, author of "The New View of Hell," etc., etc. [Philadelphia: Porter & Coates.] pp. 92. 12mo. Price 81.

We can dispense of Mr. Barrett's argument in a few words. It is briefly this: Man wants to know everything about the future state. Therefore, he is capable of knowing all about it. Therefore, he ought to know about it. Therefore, if anybody (as, for example, Swedenborg) professes to have had a revelation on the subject, it is probably true, provided it is consistent and reasonable. Mr. Barrett asks: "Why shouldn't we know these things?" The simple answer is: "Why should we?" He asks: "Why may not Swedenborg's revelation be true? Of course it may, and so may be any other speculations. Mr. Barrett claims that Scripture is a witness for Swedenborg, but he is evidently not a lawyer, or he would understand better what "being a witness" means. Mr. Barrett understands it to be something to be set aside wherever it does not agree with one's own views. For instance, the Scripture distinctly says that men do not become angels in the state of bliss, that angels and men are different beings, etc., etc. Swedenborg says that men by natural evolution became angels—at least Mr. Barrett says that this is Swedenborg's doctrine. We feel bound to make this qualification, because whatever Swedenborg may have taught or held, it is perfectly apparent that Mr. Barrett is not capable of drawing a correct inference, and we doubt very much if he can recognize a correct inference when he sees one. He seems to think he has reached a conclusive argument when he asks: "Why is not this so?" We cannot advise any reader to waste time over this book, unless as a mere study of what beliefs are held by the disciples of Swedenborg. As far as we can make out the author's mental attitude, the strongest reason that he has for his faith, is the utter absence of any foundation for it to rest upon.

DEE SOORH; or, Cuba Past and Present. By Martin M. Ballou, author of "Due West." [Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.] pp. 318. Price $1.00.

Mr. Ballou makes it evident in the course of his pages that he has travelled extensively and often. In these pages he tells all that he knows about Cuba, and tells it in a pleasing, straightforward way. The most charming book on Cuba, we ever met with was W. H.

Hurlburt's "Gar-Eden," a little volume now probably out of print. We fancy Mr. Ballou has read it, from a brief allusion here and there, but he has wisely refrained from trying to imitate it. Instead, he has given a readable volume, with some history which his readers might be supposed to know already, and some statistics which they will probably find instructive. Like as in a lady's letter, Mr. Ballou has put his chief thought in a postscript. At the very close of the book the purpose of writing it peeps out. It is to advance the notion that the United States must take possession of the "ever faithful island." How that is to be done with a navy which even Spain could "whip with one hand," or how Spain is to be persuaded into a sale, we are not told. The great objection once felt to Cuban annexation lay in the belief that thus the area of slavery would be extended and a probable door for the yet unsuppressed slave trade opened. Mr. Ballou is careful to say that in 1888 slavery will expire by limitation of law. At the same time he gives one to understand that many things take place on paper in Cuba which have little foundation in fact. There seems to be two things inevitable to every visitor of Cuba, one is to detest the regime, and the other is to covet the island. If this volume is written in the interest of Cuban annexation, we cannot say we approve it. There is territory enough under the stars and stripes which yet is waiting to be governed properly, without adding more which has for centuries been misgoverned.

NOVEMBER OF A DIPLOMAT. Private Letters from America during the Administrations of Presidents Van Buren and Tyler. By the Chevalier De Bacourt, Minister from France. With a Memoir of the author by the Comtesse De Mirabeau. Translated from the French. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.] pp. 297.

A Frenchman in high spirits is an amusing creature, a Frenchman in the opposite mood is sometimes more amusing still. M. De Bacourt is no exception to this rule. It is evident from these pages that he was in a state of ill-humor from the time he set sail from England to this country till the hour of his leaving it. He is in a state of intense, bristling nationality. He is a bigoted Romanist, which for a French diplomat representing Louis Philippe does not lessen the oddity. He hates republicanism. He finds almost everything in this country detestable—manners, cookery, morals, intellect, the houses of Washington, and the climate of Boston. He worships Talleyrand, and believes that the ex-Bishop of Autun died in the odor of sanctity.

An Englishman's blunders respecting this country are sufficiently quaint, but a Frenchman's are the quintessence of happy ignorance. He spells names as only a Frenchman can, and confounds persons and places in a most charming manner. In spite of all this, one cannot help being greatly entertained by this book. It is much to see this country, even through unfavorable foreign spectacles, as it was in 1840. He found Brooklyn largely laid out, but with few houses built, piggis roaming in the streets of New York, Washington with two-storied, shabby dwellings, Philadelphia comprised between Broad street and the Delaware River. He admires the Hudson and Niagara Falls, and predicts the dissolution of the Union, as already begun in the Dorr rebellion of the State of Rhode Island. He saw the unfinished monument on Bunker Hill and Harvard University, at Cambridge, Mass. If not flattering, this book is certainly funny.

WHY WE BELIEVE THE BIBLE. An hour's reading for busy people. By J. P. T. Ingraham, A. T. C. [New York: D. Appleton & Co.] pp. 155. Price 60 cents.

Dr. Ingraham has here attempted to give in the catechetical form a very condensed summary of the reasons for receiving Holy Scripture. It is impossible, in a work of this scope, to do more than to state, dogmatically, conclusions and facts. This has been fairly done in the volume. How far it will succeed in convincing those whose faith is shaken by infidel argument we cannot say. At least it prepares the ground for honest inquiry, and will enable any one whose general belief has been disturbed to see where the difficulty lies, and to consult larger and fuller sources of knowledge. General disbelief can hardly be reached by any methods we think, since it most commonly proceeds from ignorance and mental weakness. Unbelief because of scientific objections requires a mode of treatment peculiar to the special case. But as a foundation for inquiry, this little book seems to us well adapted. After all, the best defence of the Bible is the Bible itself. To one who can reason correctly there is no such answer to doubt as the real harmony of all its parts.

THE HAUNTED ADJUTANT, and Other Stories. By Edmund Quincy. Edited by his son, Edmund Quincy. (Boston: Ticknor & Co.) pp. 396. Price $1.50.

Edmund Quincy was the son of Josiah Quincy, who in 1845 resigned the Presidency of Harvard College. These stories and papers (for they are, most of them, too slight to be called stories) belong almost entirely to the ante-revolutionary period of Massachusetts history. Mr. Quincy belongs by birth to the post-revolutionary period, but his thoughts, his sympathies, and his tastes evidently go back to the days before Lexington and Bunker Hill. "The Haunted Adjutant" is a regular story, and a very cleverly told one, we may add, and the scene of it is Boston during the siege. The other sketches are like it—all on the Tory side. Mr. Quincy says in one of them that if he had lived then his principles would have required him to be a Whig; but it is manifest that he is exceedingly thankful for being born at a date when he may indulge himself in dreaming of himself as a Tory, without any one being the worse for it. Any one who remembers Mr. Quincy's amusing letters to the Anti-Slavery Standard (signed "D. Y.," the final letters of his name) will perfectly appreciate his mental constitution, and understand why he should write thus. He has always been believed to be the hero of the nursery rhyme :

"A metaphysician of Boston,
This two horned dilemma was tossed on—
As to whether 'twere best
To win wealth at the West,
Or be poor, but peculiar, in Boston."

The pages of such an author are pretty sure to be very enjoyable reading, and certainly these are by no means wanting in flavor and sparkle.

ON THE GOSPELS. By J. G. Bennett. (Boston: J. A. Whipple.) pp. 498.

The writer of these four studies of the four Gospels has manifestly grasped at right ideas concerning them. That St. Matthew's is the Messianic, that St. Mark's is the Gospel of action, Christ as King and Head in His Church, that St. Luke shows Jesus as the Son of Man, and St. John reveals the Word made Flesh, the Son of God—these are cardinal truths. There is a good deal of superfluous matter in these pages, and quite too much of the exclamatory and interjectional style, but so far as we can discover, they are doctrinally unobjectionable, earnest in tone, and with much that is suggestive and thoughtful. It is a great point gained when the individual character of the four evangelists is clearly and correctly pointed out. It serves to explain a great many passages, and is, in fact, the key to not a few of the perplexities raised by modern criticism. Especially where this is devoutly done, as here, so that the reader can feel sure of not being beguiled by the "destructive criticism," it is very valuable.

THE AMERICA'S CUP: How it was Won by the Yacht "America" in 1851, and has been since Defended. By Captain Richard F. Coffin. Author of "Old Sailor's Yarns," "Archibald the Cat," "How Old Wiggins Wore Ship," etc., etc. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. 155.

Captain Coffin has two requisites of a successful author. He thoroughly understands his subject, and he has a deep interest in it. He has made a very entertaining little volume, and Mr. Frederic S. Cozens has adorned it with a number of excellent illustrations. The book appeared just before the great trials between the "Puritan" and "Genista." A second edition might contain an account of those magnificent races. Every American who knows anything or cares anything about yachting now knows that the cup is still this side the Atlantic, and it is to be hoped, may remain for years to come. With another century's beginning, according to present appearances, steam will have superseded sails to that extent which will render yachting a thing of the past. Till then this book will be pleasant reading.

HEROES OF ANCIENT GREECE. A story of the days of Socrates, the Athenian. By Ellen Palmer, author of "The Fishermen of Galilee," "Christmas at the Beacon," "Nona," "The Standard Bearer," etc. (New York: Thomas Whittaker.) pp. 286. Price $1.25.

There is a knowledge of classic customs and Grecian history in this little book which makes it decidedly interesting. Its leading idea, that of the friendship and intercourse between Hebrews and Greeks is very beautiful, but, we fear, too fanciful. The intense nationality of the Jews, and their inborn and inbred conviction of the superiority of the blood of Abraham would hardly have permitted at any period of their history such an interchange of thought and sympathy as is here portrayed. Nevertheless, if it is pure fancy, it is very touching and admirably wrought out. We think that it is a work which every Sunday-school library would do well to possess, for it is one of those which lead directly to the study of history, the study most needed of any secular study in this day.

ELIJAH THE REFORMER: A Ballad Epic and other Sacred and Religious Poems. By George Lansing Taylor, D. D. Second edition. (New York: Funk & Wagnall.) pp. 579. Price, $1.50.

Dr. Taylor has a faculty of verse making, but we cannot say that he has done well to turn one of the most impressive stories of the Old Testament into indifferent rhymes. His is a handsomely printed and well bound volume, but we have looked in vain in it for any traces of poetry. It would indeed take a very lofty genius to make a version at all approaching the majesty of the English Scriptures. But when this is attempted in a ballad metre with commonplace rhymes and an entire lack of poetical expression, we decidedly feel that it were best left undone. We notice that this has reached a second edition, which shows that there are a great many people who will read this because it is scriptural. But no one who can discern and love genuine poetry would look at it twice.

PASTIME PAPERS. By the Author of "Salad for the Sullied and the Social," etc. (New York: Thomas Whittaker.) pp. 238. Price $1.

The titles of these papers will give the reader a fair idea of the book. These are "Notes on Names," "Letters and Letter-Writing," "The Old Masters," "Tonching Tailors," "Genius in Jail," "The Marvels of Memory," "Concerning Cobblers," "Coffee and Tea," "Printers of the Olden Time."

These are pleasant essays, not too long for a single sitting, and not lacking in liveliness. They make a little volume, easy to be carried on a journey, lightly to be taken up and not less lightly to be laid down. There is a good deal of curious information in them; they are like the talk of a well-read and thoughtful man, and they do not lay too heavy a stress upon the attention of the reader. Altogether it may be said that "Pastime Papers" is a nice little volume, and worthy after it has been once read of a place on the book shelf.

A BAND OF THREE. By L. T. Meade, Author of "Water Gypsies," "Scamp and I," etc. Illustrated. (New York: Thomas Whittaker.) pp. 277. Price $1.25.

If this story was as probable as it is pretty it would be a model one. The band of three is of three little girls who support themselves by street music, and cherish a steadfast purpose to go on a search for their lost father. They are made to talk confirmed cockney, so far as the misuse of aspirates, but in other respects a doubtful London dialect. But the main idea is very pretty, and prettily carried out, and we can say that, under the circumstances, the story and its incidents are possible.

HESTER TRACY: A Schoolroom Story. By A. Weber, Author of "At Sixes and Sevens," "Miss Harling," "The Old House in the Square," etc. (New York: Thomas Whittaker.) pp. 307. Price, $1.25.

We are always glad to meet with a good story for young people and we do not hesitate to say that "Hester Tracy" is exceptionally good. It is really a very striking sketch of a young girl's character in the process of forming, and the people by whom she is surrounded are all well drawn and individual. There is not a little which is highly suggestive in it, and the whole atmosphere of the book is thoroughly healthy.

AFTER ALL: A Novel. By Lillian Spencer (Chicago: S. C. Griggs & Co.) pp. 150. Price, $0.50.

There is nothing to be said in favor of this little story. Its scene is laid in England, but we doubt if the authoress has much knowledge of English life and it is hopelessly unnatural in its plot. We cannot say that it has any particular moral, and altogether our conclusion is that we have taken the pains to read it; the best service we can do is to advise others to let it alone.

LITERATURE.

The American Sunday-school Magazine will be issued November 1. It will have a large corps of contributors among the bishops, clergy, and laity, and should meet with a warm welcome.

The October Lutheran Church Review has a thoughtful paper on "Ebebe, the Deaconess," in which the work of the deaconess in this country is considered by the Rev. Dr. A. Spaeth. It also gives a portion of the journal of the Rev. Peter Muhlenberg in London in 1772.

The October Art Age, by way of supplement, gives in red chalk a figure study by N. Sarony, with a sketch of the artist. It represents a young girl blowing bubbles. There are a number of other illustrations, and the letter-press in every department of art is full of interest.

The Bay State Monthly has in its October number a paper on the "Authoritative Literature of the Civil War," by Geo. L. Austin, and one on the "March of the Sixth Regiment." It gives a copy of the last portrait taken of Daniel Webster, and a steel portrait, with a sketch, of W. W. Cropp.

A NEW Sunday-school instruction book, entitled "Sufficiently Instructed," will be issued in a few days. Price 20 cents. It will contain 55 lessons on the whole Bible, 105 on the Church Catechism, 55 on the Collects, 55 on the Epistles, 55 on the Gospels, 40 on the Prayer Book Services, 42 on the Feasts and Festivals, 55 Topics for Conversation, with other instructions for teachers and scholars. The author is the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair of Baltimore.

ALL SAINTS' DAY.

I do not strive to pierce the veil
Which hides that world from this,
I would not push ajar the gates
Which open into bliss.

What God hath hidden from our sight
Is not for us to see,
Nor would I try with curious gaze
To learn the mystery.

Ear hath not heard, nor hath the eye
Those future joys yet seen;
Then why attempt in vain to look
Behind the shadowy screen!

Enough for me that with the Lord
My loved forever dwell,
Each in the place Christ hath prepared,
Who "doeth all things well."

Enough to know that in that world
No sorrows ever come,
That every tear is wiped away
In that Eternal Home.

That death nor sickness enter there
Amid that sinless throng,
But joy eternal ever swells
The grand triumphant song.

So I can wait the "little while"
That hides them from my sight;
Dear Saviour, grant us grace to reach
That land of radiant light!

RESIGNATION, SUBMISSION TO THE INEVITABLE.

BY THE REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

VI.

My dear, your last letter is full of suggestiveness. But is not your friends' idea of resignation a trifle "off-color"? Resignation is a duty—a Christian duty; but to what is it that we should resign ourselves? Not, surely, to dejection or despair, nor yet to an imaginary something; not to the wrong thing, nor yet to the right thing even, before the time come. There is, thus, a right and a wrong way of being resigned even, high and holy a grace as resignation is.

In the first place it is submission, but it is more. That implies unwillingness, a being "sent under" the yoke, as conquered and perhaps scowling soldierly used to be under the three spears of the victorious Roman. It is voluntary, not enforced. "Lo, I come to do Thy will." God has a way of expressing His will to us. Of course His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor His ways as our ways. He has a way of His own, nor is His will a great, glittering guillotine, to which, like so many convicts, we are dragged, in a spirit of mere restless submission.

Nature is His mind, and events and phenomena are His speech. He has, thus, not left us without a witness nor without the means of learning His mind. His language is no foreign tongue, impossible or even difficult of apprehension. Our fleshly hearts may not always learn it, but is it then not because we are idle at school and study not diligently? To our own consciousness, as to a convenient lexicon or library, may we each turn as we face what we may think a difficult phrase or passage, and catch the construction and discover the meaning.

* * * Now, of His will as to our being resigned—does He mean us to be anything that we can avert? Before the calamity, then, has befallen us, it were pusillanimity to give way for a moment. It were a fortress striking the flag before the enemy were upon the walls. In other words, we are bound—you and I, as events threaten or states of life seem to approach—to be resigned before the proper time, or to anything except the absolutely inevitable. God's will is the unavoidable! If anything evil seem likely to happen to us, and we can remedy it, and are bound to try before giving up, else we were cowardly and treacherous. This is what energy and perseverance were given us for. If a man lose his fortune, should he never seek to retrieve it? If my house burn, must I never live in another, or try to get me another? Resigned, thus, to the particular loss, submissive to the forgone conclusions of the past is one thing—that is, enduring the inevitable; but to be resigned in the sense of inertness and supineness is another. We are, thus, not bound to be resigned to anything that we can avert or can better.

A good definition of God's mind towards us—a good answer to the questions: What is His will? Is this His will? Is that? Is the other question Was, or is it really unavoidable? If it was not, then were we ourselves culpable; we did not use our best endeavors, we were negligent or something; if it is yet, then it is not His will that it happen to us, and to be up and doing, and not down and doing not, is our undoubted part and our bounden duty. Nothing is God's will to man save the inevitable! To the inevitable, let us be resigned. Resignation is, then, manly and womanly. It is bowing the neck to the yoke. In the presence of what may yet be averted, resignation is cowardice. It is treachery. It is a betrayal of trust and a storehouse rusting of fire arms that were meant to be kept bright by use in the field. There are times when we may not, indeed, say "No" to God, but No, and with emphasis, to what some may say is of and from Him, and what may, indeed, really seem so, for a moment, to our eyes. A false "resignation" in such a case is unmanly and unwomanly; we have not reached the inevitable, but, on the contrary, stand in the presence of the evitable only, if you will let me obey your friend Horace and coin a word. Said Fénelon (I think): "There he lies, and with him lies buried all my hopes of earthly happiness; but if the turning of hand would restore him to life, not for all the world's would I be the turner of that hand, in opposition to the Almighty will."

Don't "trouble trouble till trouble troubles you," I saw in an album the other day. Very good, thought I. Never cross a bridge till you come to it! If ill is coming to you, you may spare yourself going out to meet it. "Take no thought for the morrow," means, be not over anxious; take some, that is prudence; but don't fret and worry, it spoils the temper, and does not improve one's religion. Your * * * reminds me of the lady who bought a door-plate at auction, with the name Thompson on, because, said she, her daughter might marry a man of that name, and with a "p" in it, too.

Those oils at our friend —'s are poor; they are poor, done by one who failed as a copyist, and thus fitted herself as a judge of other people's copying; done for love, not for pay; done in the flush of a lovely life; done by fingers now in the dust, as yours and mine must be; but there are those who, if it were God's will that those van fingers were here again, would rather own their work, poor as it might be, than to be possessors of the best thing ever done by Turner, or criticised by Ruskin. But no; resignation; it is the Lord, be it unto us according to His will. Nothing, in an unregenerate human view, appears more capricious than the occurrence of Death. Leaves seem to have their very time to fall, but this to have, indeed, "all seasons for its own." Yet, wayward as it may seem, even the keys of Hades are in His hands; nor shall they turn in the wards of life until He gives the word. It is from "sudden death," in only the sense of an unprepared one, that we may pray. From this we may, and do, pray to be delivered. Yes, in a sense, may we not deliver ourselves? "Work out your own salvation," altho' it is "God who worketh in us." The answer to the prayer for deliverance from a sudden death, does He, thus, put, in a sense, in our own hands.

Thus I try to answer your query—Just when to be resigned. Your other:

"Why should such a being as I am, praise and pray to such a One as He is?" Why does the bird soar and sing? It loves to. You have never prayed or given praise and thanks aright, if you have ever rendered them in a mercenary or slavish spirit. Love to do them, and you will then do these things aright; and not (entirely so) until. Many want everything demonstrated to them; some, on the contrary, reason with the heart: Thomas hesitated, so did they all—all save those women; let us be women, nmanly as it may be called; the Master bade us be children, even; tho' once, I mind, a woman of Canaan (St. Mat. xv.) reasoned with the Lord, even, and beat Him in the argument, at that. (Of course, He led, and let her.)

If she could reason with the Lord in His face, may we not before we give up; we, who have not a clear face-to-face expression of the heavenly will? Only, in reverence; only, in humility. And if it be that faculties given us to avert ill, can not, then those given us to accept it, come into play. The women argued Jesus into consent; it may be that we, too, may prevail; if not, then silence and holy resignation.

THE more we examine the operations of nature, the more unbounded is our admiration for the all-wise Being who controls them. The adaptation of a means to an end, everywhere so evident throughout the universe, renders it impossible that any naturalist, worthy of the name, could be an atheist.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, PARIS, FRANCE.

We lay before our readers to-day a view of the interior of the new church in Paris, as it was photographed three weeks ago. Although unfinished, the work is sufficiently advanced, as our sketch will show, to indicate its general character of excellence, and to tell us that the ultimate result is to be something markedly grand and imposing. The church is situated on an avenue one hundred feet wide—the Avenue de l'Alma—near the Avenue des Champs Elysees, a central part of the city. Its dimensions are 148x70 feet. The height of the nave is 58 feet, of the chancel 54 feet. The cornerstone was laid on March 24th, 1881.

The architect was George Edmund Street, Esq., R.A., of London, the architect of the new Law Courts. Shortly after the laying of the corner-stone, in the autumn of 1881, Mr. Street died, and the work has since been carried on upon his plans by his son, A.E. Street, Esq., and A. Blomfield, Esq. Not long before his death, in looking over the plans, Mr. Street said to Mr. Blomfield: "The American church in Paris is to be my best church." Such a testimony from one who was admittedly the master of Gothic architecture in his day, is very gratifying. The church, even in its present unfinished condition, is justifying his predilection. One feature of the building which is specially admirable is its solidity or reality. There is nothing in its material, either within or without, which is not what it seems to be, which is not real. No plaster and no paint is employed throughout the entire construction.

The walls are of stone, the pillars of marble resembling Purbeck, from Ancy le France, near Dijon. The ceilings of the chancel, the organ chamber, the aisles, are of stone vaulting. The nave is vaulted in oak. The floor, which is ready, but awaits the completion of the heating apparatus to be laid, is of English marble. The windows, many of which are in place, illustrate the Te Deum. This is of special significance, as the title of the church is the Church of the Holy Trinity. The large west window represents the first three verses: "We praise Thee, O God," "We acknowledge Thee to be the Lord. All the earth doth worship Thee, the Father Everlasting." "To Thee all angels cry aloud, the heavens and all the powers therein." The window next in order illustrates the verse: "To Thee cherubim and seraphim continually do cry," and so on, one versicle to each window throughout the building. The large triple window in the chancel, which appears in our sketch represents the verse: "Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ." In the central lancet is seated a crowned figure of our Lord, in each of the side lancets twelve figures, representing together the four-and-twenty elders of the fourth chapter of the Book of the Revelation. The glass is the work of Messrs. Bell & Beckham of Great Russell street, London. Connected with the church by a cloister is a church house, already completed and in use, containing a chapel, in which the services of the

are to have a church which will afford abundant accommodation, in a city where art has such ascendancy we are to have so splendid a monument of ecclesiastical architecture, and in a city where the American name has become almost a synonym for lavish expenditure and luxury, we are giving to God of our best. The work is one which should win for its completion, as it has in the past, a large and liberal support. In the congregations of our foreign churches there gather from time to time worshippers from all our dioceses, from all our larger parishes, and from many of our smaller ones. To those who are in an atmosphere of indifference and of worldliness and of strong temptation—temptation far stronger to those who are removed from home ties and other influence of home surroundings, these churches hold forth the Word of Life; they sustain habits of Sunday observance and of church attendance, they continue and enforce the teachings of our home churches, just when such teachings would be most likely to be forgotten. In this view, certainly a just one, the foreign churches are no far-away and unimportant factor of our Church life, but needed aids to our home churches in the care of their wandering members, and this work which is being done upon the Continent of Europe deserves the sympathy and support of all. Our travelling Church members would not return to their home churches what they have been when they have left us but for the provision of these services that have ministered to them by the way.

INTERIOR OF THE NEW CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, PARIS, FRANCE.

Church are now held, a choir room, a room for Bible classes, mothers' meetings, etc., a large vestry-room, and a mortuary chapel.

The work of this church among the poor is so large (the number of garments alone distributed during the past three winters has been four thousand each winter) that a building such as this had become a necessity. This church house was the gift of one generous member of the congregation.

With such admirable appliances for work, the Church should bless a yet larger number.

It is gratifying to us, alike, as Americans and as Churchmen that, in a city where our country people gather in such numbers, we Names are things. Magna Charta recognizes this, and never said the Church of Rome, nor yet the Roman Church, but the Church of England. And this means more, much more, than the Church in England. The English Church is the Church for the English: the Church of England, England's Church. For ourselves, the simpler the title the better. We are a Church—a national, autocratic body. Hence he that uses the term "the Church" uses the better English. He neither affirms nor denies anything of other Christians. The "the" is definite, not definitive. And then, if we unite to make it truly and in fact what we claim for it, all shall be well, and our works shall silence our adversaries.

BASINS AT MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS.

No part of our country, not to say of the world, is so full of marvels as that through which the Yellowstone river flows—and it is there that nature would seem to have stored up her most elaborate and wonderful works. The traveller is struck with surprise and amazement every foot of the way, and whatever description may have previously done for him, he is ready, like the Queen of Sheba at the court of Solomon, to say, this half was not told me. It is like a fairy land, but where the fairies are children of Titan, so gigantic are its marvels. Nothing but themselves can be their parallel, and no part of the world of nature is better adapted to lead the contemplative mind from nature up to nature's God, and to fill the heart with awe at the vast display of creative power. He only Who made the world could fill it with scenes of such marvellous beauty, which no pen can adequately describe, and no artist's pencil reproduce. The Yellowstone country has not been long opened, but it is attracting attention more and more, and the stream of summer tourists, native and foreign, is widening and deepening year by year. Government surveys and reports, with their maps and panoramas, are becoming accessible; travellers are publishing accounts of what they have seen, we have guide books and excursions, and a visit to Yellowstone Park is taking the place of one to the Jungfrau or to the homes of ancient art. Among the government documents is the twelfth annual report of Dr. Hayden and his coadjutors of the geological and geographical survey of the territories. It is full of interest, and not the least fascinating part of it is Dr. Peale's account of the hot-springs and geysers of the present day. He tabulates more than two thousand springs, and seventy-one geysers. We have a striking illustration of the basins at Mammoth Hot Springs of Gardiner's River. It will be noted that these springs, unlike many in other parts of the world, show a development of chimneys or cones at their orifices, cones which are accounted for either on the theory of the greater antiquity of these vents, or else by reason of the greater dryness of the air as compared with that of Iceland and New Zealand. They would seem to be arranged in some regular order and upon terrace above terrace, and the divided flow of the river in its descent over the precipitous rocks makes a beautiful and picturesque view, which art may imitate but can never equal. God spoke the word and it stood fast. The number of geysers and hot springs is great in the Park, and some of them are very large and have become celebrated like the Giant Castle, Grand, Old Faithful, Giantess, Bee-hive, and others. These are on the upper geyser basin of Fire-Hole River, and so great is the flow of heated water as to affect the temperature of the streams. Some idea may be obtained of the Nature has a wonderful laboratory, and in it are hidden most important secrets invaluable to man. Happily she is not unwilling to reveal her treasures to intelligent and diligent search, and she is lavish of her rewards upon that reverent science which makes its quest for truth only. Busy minds and hands are at work in the Yellowstone country. Enough is already known to give a zest to industry and zeal, and a trip to the geysers instead of a voyage across the sea will soon become a necessary part of American life.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BY THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND.

III.

Hindrances to Domestic Missions.
But while thankful for the helps, we cannot, in making up the record, be unmindful of the hindrances to our missions. The elements of strength and weakness have been strangely intermingled. When out in the sunshine these missions have never ceased to feel the chill of pursuing, hovering shadows. If triumphs they have had, these have been sobered by narrow escapades from defeat; and when really aggressive, the joy of advance has been saddened by the recollection of intervals of torpor and delay. When we see how this Church is outnumbered and outflanked by Christian bodies that have wandered, more or less, from the ancient faith, and have cast aside utterly the ancient order of Christ's kingdom, our pain and humiliation force us to recall some of the causes lying far enough back in the past to be forgotten, but for facts that stare us in the face.

(1.) It is a fact that this Church originally entered upon, and, for a long time, pursued its missionary work as one born out of due time. In view of its antecedents, it could not have been otherwise. For nearly a century and a half the Church in America was left without the episcopate, and when given, it was with reluctance, and almost under constraint. Meanwhile there were hundreds of parishes, but no diocese; multitudes of the baptised, but no confirmation; clergy demanded on all sides, but no ordination, save by crossing three thousand miles of ocean.* Meanwhile, too, every other English speaking Christian organization, embarrassed by no such fundamental defects

*It is possible that a few persons were confirmed and a few clergymen ordained by the non-juring bishops—Dr. Walton and Mr. Talbot, after 1722; but there is no sufficient evidence of it.

great number of these springs from the fact that in this area of less than four square miles there are four hundred and forty known springs, and twenty-six of them are geysers, some of which during eruption throw up columns of water from one hundred and fifty feet to two hundred and fifty feet high. The therapeutic value of these springs is yet to be determined, and to that end chemical investigation and analysis of the waters are now in process. Dr. Peale divides the springs generally into three classes—calcareous, siliceous, and aluminous; but further research may change the classification. For the present the springs are visited as matters of curiosity and as manifesting a curious variety of nature's work, but the time will in all likelihood soon come when the Yellowstone country will be the resort of thousands of invalids seeking health in the springs and geysers.

of polity and discipline, coming out to the New World on fire with a zeal kindled by both political and ecclesiastical differences at home, found a welcome lodgement, and laid deep and wide the basis of their power, so that, when the Church at last appeared in the field with the Apostolic equipment so long withheld, she seemed a laggard amid the conflict with the powers of darkness—an eleventh hour laborer in the Master's vineyard. She was taunted and maligned for her seeming indolence; and for a generation after she swung into line as a newly formed National Church, she staggered along under the disgrace of a forfeited prestige, as well as under the burden of a popular prejudice, largely created by her relationship with the Church of England, which had matrimonised while practically disowning her. And it is now scarcely more than thirty years since this relationship began to be treated as a reality, and to be dealt with as worthy of respectful recognition before the face of Christendom. But further. Even after she was set upon her feet and knew that she must stand alone, the old feeling of dependence on the Mother Church bred in Colonial days lingered just enough to make her slow in learning and timid in exercising, save in absolutely necessary things, her prerogative, as a National Church. It is only in this way that, as we look back on the first third of this century, we can account for the lack of earnest and intelligent effort in her public councils, and by individual bishops, to organize her gifts and resources for aggressive action. She seemed to be busy in picking up lost threads rather than in weaving new sinews of power, in mending old fences rather than in ploughing and seeding down new territory. Needful, perhaps unavoidable, as this policy was, it was damaging to the growth of the missionary spirit.

(2.) Again, the growth of our missionary life, as representing the aggressive expansion of the Church, was hindered by the fact that for at least one generation, if not longer, the Church was allowed to appear as too much the Church of the rich and the cultured, and too little as that of the laboring and often unlettered many. The former gravitated toward it as by instinctive preference. They came without being sought. And yet, the characteristics that attracted them ought not of right, and when properly directed, to have told upon them any more than upon the masses. Always and everywhere the Church is to do what she can to sanctify wealth, social position, intelligence; but when true to the spirit of the Master, she must do still more for the multitude to whom fortune is more sparing of its favors. However Catholic in other senses, she is pre-eminently so in her hold upon all phases and all grades of life. It is only in moments of blindness and folly that she can be tempted into preferences and discriminations which the world, not God, associates with respectability and power. It required years of plain speaking and hard work to check this drift and arouse the Church to the full breadth of her commission. She was slow to learn the lesson of flexibility and adaptation in her methods of work among the people. Assailed for peculiarities growing out of principles that she saw no way to modify without seeming to surrender them, she thought herself obliged to stand on the defensive, and to avoid all that could popularize only at the apparent risk of gainsaying her consistency or breaking in upon her traditional treasures. There was no reason, considered in themselves, why she should have closed her eyes against elements of popular strength that wrought so mightily in building up a Denomination that, in an evil hour, was alienated and repelled from the Mother Church. Plain chapels, plain preaching, free seats, services adapted to time and place and people, itinerants and evangelists, all, amid the exigencies of her work in a new world, fell within the limits of her lawful choice. That she declined them and other things like them, so far from proving her wisdom, proves rather how poorly she comprehended her mission and how the gifts committed to her keeping were hid from her eyes. It is the habit in this country (and many will think it hers) to question it to hold voluntarism in religion to be an unmixed good. The support of religion that comes directly, exclusively from the people, and as they choose to give it, is held to be not only the best, but the only support compatible with the freedom and dignity of Christian institutions, as well as with the zeal and energy of individual Christians. Nothing need be said of its advantages. We know well what they are and rate them at the highest. I notice the other side here because, in the past, it has helped to check, and is likely to do so in the near future, the growth and expansion of the Church as a missionary body. Two tendencies have been advancing side by side. On the one hand, with the increasing density of our population, especially in the cities, the poorer classes, and among them vast numbers that, so far as religion is concerned, are in a state of semi-heathenism, have drifted off into sections by themselves—dwelling apart from the rich. If the Gospel is to reach them, it must be carried to them. If they are to attend public worship, they must be invited—even persuaded to do so, churches must be opened to them, and a welcome as from loving hearts be offered them. No facts in missionary work are better settled or better known than these. And yet, on the other hand, parishes, under the voluntary system, have been growing more and more selfish. They are dependent for support on their current revenues. These revenues, drawn from pew rents, depend on the wealth of the parishioners. As a matter of course, those who cannot, or who are too indifferent toward religion to care to pay for sittings, are gradually sifted out and left to shift for themselves. The well-to-do are welcome; the other sort unnoticed, or in effect repelled. A critic lately uttered, and with only too much truth in it, has affirmed that our parish churches are fast becoming little more than select ecclesiastical clubs, membership in which can be secured only by people of known respectability and of considerable means. Some wealthy parishes, to ease their consciences, have built free chapels, but these are a weak breakwater against the swelling tide. The class whose label they bear refuse to see in them a home. Where all are politically equal, no one class can be thus dealt with; and no parish can be true to the sympathies and aims of the Catholic Church that, for the sake of a competent revenue, is forced to weed out from its constituency those who can do nothing toward it. This state of things has wrought evil enough in the past, and it threatens still more in the future. It seems likely to grow with the growth of our millions of dollars and our millions of souls. It puts a sore burden on our missions; for if they succeed, it is felt by the multitude that they will only add to the number of organized religious communities who will be infected with the same spirit, and so repeat the same wrong. This wrong will never be reached, certainly never removed, save by a radical change in our methods. The Free Church movement has made considerable progress, but it has not gone far enough to alter the dominant tone of our parish system; and it never will go far enough to do this, until it relies less upon individual voluntarism, and more upon permanent endowments.

(3.) Another obstacle to our missionary development was the long delay in recognizing the episcopate as the true pioneer in missions. It was not strange perhaps, that the average Church mind which so feebly, and for many years, comprehended the powers and capabilities latent in the Diocesan episcopate should fail to attach much value to a Missionary episcopate. There seemed to be no good reason why the inferior ministries would not do quite as well. The heavy, rough-and-tumble work belonged to them, and the bishops, it was thought, had no vocation until forests had been felled and stumps grubbed out, and the fields were ready for smooth ploughing. It was accounted a great venture of faith by the strong men of the Church, and an act of rashness, if not folly, by the weak ones, when the beloved Kemper was sent out in 1835, to a region out of which some nine populous States have since grown. There was only less hesitancy in sending Bishop Scott to Oregon, and Bishop Kipp to California in 1833. In fact the Church was not alive to the missionary duty and power of the episcopate until 1859, when Bishops Talbot and Lay were set apart to their work. Of late years much has been done, and well done, to atone for the mistake; but we shall never know what the Church lost by it. The regrets of to-day will not bring back the forfeited chances of the past. What in our blindness we did not see, or in our timidity or torpor we refused to do, slipped from our grasp, perhaps forever.

(4.) The Church has been, and still continues to be, hindered in this part of her work by the lack of clergy properly trained and with a ready will for it. There have been plenty and to spare for established parishes, and in a certain way, perhaps, it may be said that there have been plenty for the other field. Yes, plenty in respect of number, but not in respect of proper equipment and real aptitude. The scholarly men have too often been without energy, and the energetic men too often without scholarship. That remarkable world that forms the theatre of our missionary labors, is the last place in all the world where zeal without knowledge, or knowledge without zeal, can hope to succeed. I would not fault the general morale of the clergy; but this much truth demands—if anything be said on the subject—that our missions have found it hard to draw into their service, and especially in the rough places and along the lonely frontier, men who, in their work for Christ, would patiently, heroically, accept the denials, hardships and dangers that entered into the common lot of men seeking only their worldly fortunes. It may be the fault of the times, it may be the fault of our Schools of the prophets, it may be the fault of human nature, but true it is that, if the men of mental force, stout wills, ready hearts, holy lives—men, who in other ages have gone to the front as heralds and cross-bearers—be among us, they, for some reason, and with rare exceptions, have heard unmoved the cry for help sounding across plain and river and mountain. There has been no sadder, more pathetic sight than that of the beckoning hands just visible above the far-off Western horizon—the signals of the Church's want and sorrow waving over the mile-posts and halting places on the track of the migratory millions, and with next to none to answer them. How can our light rise and shine over those cradles of empire until all this be changed, and so changed that the best and the strongest will go forth, it may be, to the baptism of fires kindled by this world; and so not only to the work of saints, but to the ordeal of martyrs.

SILENCE IS GOLDEN.

Silence is golden sometimes. Especially it is golden when you are conscious of irritated nerves, and your temper is in the condition which invites the last feather and rejoices to be broken under its weight. The most amiably-disposed people have their days of darkness, their moods when nothing looks bright, their seasons of inconsistency, when they astonish their friends by their success in the art of being disagreeable.

If you and I are sadly aware that we are not in an angelic temper, that we are fretted by petty things, and ready to quarrel with our nearest and dearest, in danger of saying sharp or bitter things prompted by to-day's misery which to-morrow we shall repent of in sack-cloth and ashes, there is one safeguard within our easy reach.

Feel as we may, we can repress speech. Our lips are our own. We may lock their gateway, if we choose, to whatever is unkind, or censorious, or unworthy of our better selves. Nobody compels us to find fault audibly. Nobody urges us to scold or complain. If we avail ourselves of the escape-valves of hasty speech we shall certainly suffer pangs of regret by and by, besides inflicting present pain on children and servants, who cannot answer back when we chide; on brothers and husbands, who are too patient or too proud to be resentful; or, perhaps, on some dear aged heart, which has had its full of sorrow, and does not need our adding a drop to the brimming cup.

Silence is golden when we are tempted to unkind gossip. Somebody's name is mentioned, and at once recalls to the mind an incident, a forgotten story, something which ought to be buried in oblivion's deepest depths. Do not yield for an instant to that suggestion of the evil one, which bids you revive what ought to be kept buried in the grave where it has found retreat. The impulse to speech on such occasions is unworthy a Christian.

Silence is not golden when an absent one suffers defamation, when it is the badge of cowardice, or when one's Christiana belief should be asserted. To sit with closed lips when all that is most precious to heart and life is assailed by the tongue of the scorner is far from noble—it is following the Lord afar off, and is next door to denying Him altogether.

SOME THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

BY THE REV. DONALD MACLEOD, D. D.

There are speculative difficulties regarding prayer which would require volumes for their adequate treatment. It is best, therefore, not to state them at length in a brief paper which is intended for practical help to those who believe in prayer. It may, however, be said, in passing, that the objections to prayer are of a kind which, if granted, only lead to still greater difficulties. Indeed there are few questions in natural or revealed religion which, if pushed to their ultimate conclusions, do not encounter some contradiction arising from an opposite line of reasoning. Thus the freedom of the will seems opposed to the sovereignty of God; the existence of evil appears to contradict His omnipotence and goodness; and the promises connected with prayer, in like manner, apparently run counter to the conception of Him who knows all our wants without our telling them, and of that fixed order of the universe which cannot be affected by our supplications. But these seeming contradictions probably arise from our ignorance of the meeting-point, where they are harmonized in a higher unity. Standing on one side of the circumference we imagine that the radius we perceive going in a certain direction must be opposed by that which comes from the other side. But our mistake arises from failure to see the great centre where they are all combined, and that through that combination of apparent opposites the vast circle of the universe is rendered harmonious and strong. With our present partial knowledge, what are we that we dare assert that either truth must be false because we cannot unite them in our petty reasoning? We know that we have freedom of choice, and we know that the Lord bringeth the counsel of His will to pass. We know that He understands all our wants before there is a word upon our tongue, and governs the universe by law and not by caprice; and we also know that "He is the hearer and answerer of prayer." Let us, then, leave alone the questions which we cannot, with our present light, fully answer, and take the attitude of children toward our Heavenly Father, believing at once in His knowledge, love, and power, and that He makes many of His highest blessings dependent on our asking them from Him.

To the believer in Christ the best answer to all such doubts is the example and teaching of the Master. There is not much told us in the Gospels of what we might term the private life of Christ and of those habits which were strictly personal. But His habit of prayer is an exception. We have repeated allusions to this, and to the many seasons He spent alone with the Father. It was "while He was praying" that the Holy Ghost descended at His baptism, and His last word on the cross was a prayer. In the midst of the busiest hours of ministerial activity He used continually to retire to some quiet mountain or to the solitude of the desert for the refreshment of prayer. "He went into a solitary place and there prayed;" "He departed into a mountain to pray;" "As He was alone praying," are the notices which ever and anon occur in the narrative. We read of how He used thus to spend sometimes the whole night on the quiet summit of Olivet. And what temple could compare with that still oratory! It was once our privilege to pass a night there alone beneath the stars, and we can never forget the impression we then received. The paschal moon floated through the passing clouds, as it had done on that other paschal week when Christ suffered, and when He had sought such a solitude as this to be alone with God. As light after light went out in the Holy City which lay beneath us, and all the sounds of busy life became still, we could, without effort, imagine the time when He had knelt there, and gazed down on all those scenes which were so soon to be identified with His passion—Gethsemane, the house of Pilate, and Calvary—and where He "offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears." The intervening centuries seemed for the moment obliterated, and in the changeless quiet of earth and sky we almost beheld Him there, our great High Priest, kneeling in that Holy of Holies beneath the open heaven. We could also realize the beauty of the connection, when beholding the grandeur of the dawn as it flushed from the east and poured its splendor on the grey walls of Jerusalem, we read how, after the night of prayer on Olivet, Christ entered the Temple, and as the glory of the morning flashed on the marble pavements and gilded rafters, He said, "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but have the light of life." The communion with God on the Mount, and this Light of God in the crowded Temple, were at one. It was the harmony of the peace of prayer with the purity and power of active life.

There never was a time when the influence of solitude and of private prayer was more needed than in this busy age, when "every hour must sweat its sixty minutes to the death," and when the noises of earth are so sure to absorb us, except we study to be ever and anon alone with God. In one sense, "to labor is to pray," for all work done unto God is worship. But such work is possible only when the motives are kept pure and fresh through the realization of the divine Presence. If the stream of activity is to be preserved deep and constant it must be fed from the still lake of meditative devotion far removed from the din of worldly traffic, and holding in its surface the reflection of the wide heaven, whose glory it calms itself to contemplate.

THE RURAL CLERGY.

Said the late Rev. Doctor Smith Fyne, in his memoir of Wentworth Childs, "while I yield to no man in grateful recognition of the merits of those, who, in the more ostensible positions of the ministry, are winning name and fame, and bringing souls to Christ, yet I know enough of these very men to be well assured what their judgment is on such a question—by whom is the work of the Church really done? This work is effectively done by that measureless majority of quiet, faithful men, who, over the field of the whole Church, are sowing the seeds of which, in this world, they rarely reap the harvest." It is a tribute merited well, and one which we are glad here to iterate. Rural and suburban Church work is among the most difficult of performance—a fact which intensifies its importance and its value.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE BLESSING OF THE LORD.

BY H. E. GEORGE.

"I've got a little job for you to-morrow, Mac," said Mr. Roberts, the stationer, to a half-grown lad who stood leaning against the outer wall of his shop.

It was Saturday night, and Mac Miller was "loafing" a little in aimless fashion about the centre of the village. He had worked hard in the mill all the week, and very much enjoyed Saturday, when the mill closed early enough for a little rest before dark.

He turned around to see what Mr. Roberts meant.

"I want you to take the Sunday papers out Elm street way," continued Mr. Roberts. "I haven't done much in the line of Sunday papers, but now the special trains from New York bring them so early that folks will have 'em, and I've said to two or three that they'd be sent this week."

"What time?" asked Mac, with a doubtful look.

"About ten. Besharp about it, and you'll make a good thing."

"Queer business for Sunday, ain't it?"

"Well, I don't know about that. I ain't so particular about that as some are. It's good reading, and men can't be around doing nothing all day, if it is Sunday. But there's plenty to take the job if you don't want it."

"Oh, I'll try it," answered Mac, "and much obliged to you for the chance."

Mac was the son of a widow, and a good dutiful son too, for he worked hard, and he was a smart, stirring lad. His mother was proud of him, and leaned on him a great deal, for he knew the world pretty well for so young a boy, and kept himself away from bad companions and low amusements of his own accord. He had a great deal of self-respect, and he meant, he said, to be a man of some account one of these days.

He was ambitious, and this chance of earning a little money in so easy a way it was not in reason to give up for a whim. He wasn't so "awfully particular," he told himself, about attending church that he should give that as an excuse to Mr. Roberts for not selling the Sunday papers, and if his conscience was not quite easy, he did not let it worry him much.

He did not quite like to offer his papers at the rectory. Still he did so, for he told himself that he was not ashamed of his undertaking, he wouldn't do anything he guess I will; I've nothing to read—but hallo, there are the papers!"

"Oh, Mac Miller, is that you!" said Miss Annie in such a surprised tone that Mac blushed in spite of himself. "I'm sorry!"

"Mr. Charley isn't," said Mac, with a mixture of defiance and deprecation in his tone.

"That's so, Mac; you're a blessing to humanity. No, Annie, I guess I won't go. I've got something to read now."

Mac felt several inches smaller as he went out of the gate, and the remembrance of Miss Annie's rather reproachful and disappointed look took all the comfort out of the sale of his papers. More than that, he found that young Mr. Reed was not the only one who preferred a comfortable lounge with the morning's paper to church that morning.

He had sold out his stock and was returning, much too late to think of church for himself, when he passed the house of a friendly-looking old man who was sunning himself on its veranda, very near the sidewalk, and as Mac passed by this old gentleman addressed him in a friendly tone.

"Good-morning Mac. Well, my boy, will it pay?"

Mac started, he was surprised that Mr. Field should was ashamed of. So he walked boldly up to the door. He hoped the rector would buy one, and so give his sanction.

"Sunday papers!" he heard the rector say to the girl who had opened the door. "Tell the boy not to bring them here again. I do not approve of Sunday papers."

So Mac went on, thinking to himself, "I don't see the harm in them, anyhow, and how can he be know without reading them?"

The next house was Squire Reed's. Miss Annie, the squire's daughter, was talking to her brother as Mac came up. He heard her say: "Come, Charley, do get ready and go with me to church this morning, and young Mr. Reed gave a yawn, and said: "Well, I be thinking of the very thing that troubled him.

"Yes it's good pay," he said slowly, "I can't afford to let the chance go. We need the money, and I can do it as well as not."

"Don't be too quick about it. Such accounts ain't so easy to reckon up. Come in a moment, I'm too feeble to hear the parson preach the sermon this morning, but maybe I could preach one myself, I want to tell you a story."

Mac came in very readily, for Mr. Field was such a dear old man that no one ever took what he said amiss.

"There were once two farmers," said Mr. Field, "one a Christian, God-fearing man, and the other a skeptic. The skeptic called to his neighbor one day early in October, and bid him notice a fine piece of corn. 'There,' said he, 'is not my crop better than yours, and yet I have worked it only on Sundays, you have worked week days and rested Sundays all summer. What do you say to that?'

"Only this," replied his neighbor, 'God doesn't settle up His accounts the first of October!'

Mac laughed uneasily.

"I like you, boy!" cried the old man, "I like to see you so steady and so ambitious, and I hope you'll succeed; but I tell you one thing, you can't afford to get on in the world by doing anything wrong, you can't give up your Sunday to earning money without suffering for it. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God,' and don't do anything you can't ask God's blessing on, and then be as smart and industrious as you can, and you'll get on."

"I want to get on, I want to be rich!" cried the boy.

"Well, that's natural, and it's all right enough, but don't you ever say 'I will be rich,' and then take any means that comes along to accomplish it!—'The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and He addeth no sorrow thereto!' That's the best of it. I tell you boy there's men in this town who would be thankful to be poor again in this world's goods if they could get rid of the sorrow, the remorse, the tough old stony hearts, and the miserable sin-twisted bodies which they have got, with the doubtful means they have taken to earn the money that they have, maybe, sold their souls for!"

"I guess I'll quit the Sunday paper business, and go to church," said Mac, "I want you to know that I didn't half like it anyway, Mr. Field."

"I'm right glad to hear you say so," replied the old man, "Folks say that men won't go to church anyhow these days, and that these papers give them good reading. I can't say, all I know is you can't afford to give up divine worship to pamper lazy folks, and you won't miss the money that hasn't got an honest blessing with it."

ENGLAND.

THE PORTSMOUTH CHURCH CONGRESS.—The Church Congress assembled at Portsmouth on Tuesday, October 6. Opening sermons were preached at St. Thomas's church by the Bishop of Carlisle, at All Saints', Landport, by the Bishop of Ripon, and at St. Jude's, Southsea, by the Bishop of Derry. The opening address was made by the Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Harold Browne). The first topic discussed was "The Revised Version of the Old Testament." The Bishop of Bath and Wells (Lord Arthur Hervey) read the opening paper, in which he took position in favor of the revision, as did also Canon Driver, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, Dr. Kirkpatrick, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, Dr. Wright of Dublin, and Archdeacon Palmer. "Special Church Work amongst Men" was discussed by the Rev. George Everard, Mr. William Inglis, president of the Church of England Working Men's Society, and the Hon. James Granville Aclerdy. They all advocated the employment of all means whereby the Church can be brought closer to, and in sympathy with, the masses of the people.

The Prayer Book was discussed by the Dean of Worcester (Lord Alwyne Compton), Canon

Venables, and others, all of whom agreed that some revision was necessary, but did not quite agree as to what the amendments should be. This is a state of affairs not confined to England.

"The Work of Women in the Church" was one of the most interesting questions discussed. Canon Thynne, Mrs. Townsend of Shipson-on-Stour, and the Rev. R. C. Billings being the chief speakers.

"Evangelizing Agencies Supplementary to the Parish System" was discussed by the Dean of Manchester and others, the Rev. W. Carlisle explaining the origin and operations of the Church Army.

"Religion and Art," on the second day, brought out the most earnest discussion, Mr. J. D. Sedding and Mr. F. T. Paigraue contending for the introduction of sculpture and painting into churches as religious instructors, Mr. J. C. Horsley taking an earnest stand for morality in art and against undressed models, and quite a storm of discussion arose at the assertion of Mr. Breesford-Hope that the crucifix is now being introduced into English churches without protest, and under a faculty from the Archibishop of Talet.

"The Cathedral in its Relations to the Diocese and the Church" and "The Church's Responsibility with regard to Emigration" were the main topics discussed on Wednesday afternoon.

On Thursday "The Teaching Work of the Church" was the chief topic for the morning, Canon Wescott and Prebendary Stevens being the leaders. The great question of the Congress was "Church Defence," which was brought forward in the form of a resolution commendatory of the Church Defence Society. The discussion was outspoken, and though some difference of opinion on some points was evident, the strongest expression on all hands was for Church defence.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.—The Rt. Rev. James Fraser, D.D., second Bishop of Manchester, died in Manchester on Thursday, October 22, aged sixty-seven years.

His death was the result of over-work. A month before his death his physicians ordered complete rest for him; but the order came too late, and he rapidly sank from the effects of his labors.

Bishop Fraser graduated at Oxford in 1839, was ordained deacon in 1846 by Bishop Wilberforce, and priest in 1847 by the same prelate. He was consecrated Bishop of Manchester in 1870 in succession to Dr. James Prince Lee.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF ELY.—The Right Rev. James Russell Woodford, D.D., Bishop of Ely, died in London, on Saturday, October 24, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. Bishop Woodford was born at Henley-on-Thames, England, April 30, 1820, and was graduated with honors from Pembroke College, Cambridge, in 1842. He was ordained deacon in 1843, and priest 1845. He held the incumbency of the new district church of St. Mark's, Euston, from 1847 to 1853, when he was presented by Bishop Monk to the vicarage of Kempford, Gloucestershire. This living he held until 1863, when he was chosen by trustees of the Parish Church and Vicarage of Leeds, as successor to Dr. Atlay, on the elevation of the latter to the See of Hereford. He was also for many years examining chaplain to the late Bishop Wilberforce, who in 1867 bestowed on him an honorary canonry in Christ church, Oxford. He was nominated to the Bishopric of Ely when Dr. Harold Browne was translated to Winchester, and was consecrated in Westminster Abbey, Dec. 14, 1873. Bishop Woodford was author of several volumes of sermons and lectures.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

PORTSMOUTH—Cottage Hospital.—The Cottage Hospital in this city was opened on Thursday, October 15. The Rev. H. E. Hensy read a service of benediction, compiled for the occasion from the Church Collects. This was followed by addresses from the Unitarian and Methodist ministers, and one of the leading physicians of the city, in hearty approval of the work, and in congratulation to those who have been chiefly interested in starting it, and to the public in its possession of an institution so much needed. After the addresses about one hundred and fifty guests were entertained.

The directors are happy in having secured an exceptionally gifted matron. The hospital will easily accommodate a dozen beds. It is hoped that Portsmouth people abroad will remember in their benefactions this institution, which needs funds to carry it on.

LONG ISLAND.

FARMINGDALE—St. Andrew's Cottage.—Some two years ago the Order of the Holy Cross conceived the idea of taking a lot of boys out in the country, with a view to their spiritual and physical benefit. An old farmhouse and barn were hired near this place, and, in the space of four weeks, sixty-seven boys were given the benefit of fresh air and good country living. The experiment was so successful that early last spring some wealthy young men of New York bought for them at this place forty acres of land and a large wooden building which, or not to put too fine a point on the matter, is, or was, simply a barn. This is the structure the boys now occupy, but it answers the purpose. It is about a mile from the railroad station, is fifty feet long, thirty-five feet high and thirty-three feet wide. On each end of the building there are sliding doors, while the interior is divided by cloth partitions into eight or ten apartments. In one corner a chapel, a visitors' room and a wash room are separated off, while there is a kitchen connected with the main building. There is a patch of woods in the rear, which stands away by itself, remote from neighbors. The success of bringing boys out to this place has been so great, that those in charge of the enterprise now have a definite plan of carrying it on in the future. They propose to bring out here such boys as they find during their missionary labors in the great metropolis, and teach them farming. Then they want to establish a trade-school, to be open during the greater portion of the year, where boys can learn the rudiments of agriculture, the care of cattle, the use of tools, household work, and prepare themselves to "go West" and grow up with the country. It appears that there are many poor persons with whom these worthy young missionaries come in contact in their city work who have sons, but who are unable to properly fit them for any industry. To such boys it is proposed, eventually, to teach the first principles of several trades, carpentering, blacksmithing, cobbling, horse-shoeing, etc., and at the same time let them become acquainted with the general run of life on a farm. There is no nonsense about this enterprise, no coddling spirit, no losing sight of the responsibility which should rest on a boy to go out in the world and battle for his own living. The youth, though separated from fathers, mothers, sisters and younger brothers, are taught to think of their relatives and of the duty they would owe to them in their old age, when once they were able to reap the reward of the instruction they had received. Eventually, it is hoped in the course of five or six years, a colony will be established in the West through the influence of the order having this work in charge, and to which boys can be sent. Father Huntington, who is at the head of this movement, holds out no promise of Utopian happiness. He says the boys will have to work hard, endure great privations and meet with many disappointments; but, he adds: "We will be there to share their hardships ourselves, and to give them all the aid and encouragement that we can." Surely there can be no harsher or kinder words than those. It is believed when once this movement of bringing boys out of the great tenement-house quarter is started, it will grow to great proportions to the immense advantage of the section of New York City in which the young missionaries are now working.

On the 15th of July the cottage was blessed by the Rev. George H. Houghton. Dr. Houghton acted at the request of Bishop Littlejohn, who was unable to be present, but who wrote a letter expressing his approbation of the work that was being done, and who requested the Rev. Dr. Houghton to give the blessing to it.

The boys that are taken out to the farm are from six to sixteen years of age. Most of them come from the Mission of the Holy Cross, though this year some have been sent from one of the missions on the west side of New York. Of course the boys that come out to this practical training-school are not always the best in disposition. Many of them are ill-bred, ignorant, even vicious. But it is proper to remark that they soon change when brought under the beneficent influences that are here thrown around them. The value of order and systematic living is nowhere more thoroughly and happily illustrated than at St. Andrew's Cottage. Each boy is obliged to do some kind of work, and each night the programme is laid out for the next day. Besides the farm work, which is done mostly by the larger boys, there are knives and dishes to be cleaned, beds to be made, floors to be scrubbed, and the animals to be fed. The boys are allowed to stay a week or two at the farm, when they are brought back to the city and their places filled by a new batch. While they work, as has been described, they are allowed time for recreation, playing all sorts of hearty, out-door games, screaming to their heart's content, while, on rainy days, they find more quiet amusements in the house.

This enterprise is one which would seem to commend itself to all. It is founded in the most practical spirit of helpfulness, and is carried on by those earnest young men in a manner that not only points to the success of the enterprise, but to its enlargement as well. On Sundays, it should be mentioned, the boys attend services at St. Helena's chapel, the chapel of the community of St. John the Baptist, whose summer-house for women and girls is about a mile from St. Andrew's Cottage. There have been about a hundred boys at the farm this summer.

The above account is mainly taken from an appreciative article in the Brooklyn Union.

NEW JERSEY.

ELIZABETH—Woman's Auxiliary.—The annual meeting of the New Jersey Branch of Woman's Auxiliary was held in St. John's church, Elizabeth, on Wednesday, October 21. There was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist by the bishop, assisted by the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford, after which the business meeting was held, officers were elected for the coming year, and reports read. These showed an increased activity, so that much had been accomplished during the past year. New pledges were made for the coming year. Addresses were made by the bishop and the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford, General Secretary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, Miss J. C. Emery, Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, spoke of the needs of hospital work in Japan, and Mrs. Brewer, wife of the Missionary Bishop of Montana, gave a very interesting talk about the bishop's diocese, telling much that was new to her hearers of the life and Church work in the territory. She asked for an offering for the hospital, which was gladly made, as she appealed to each one's sympathies. After the business meeting there was a lunch provided by one of the ladies, which was followed by a social meeting. The next meeting of the Branch will be in Trenton in the spring.

PATERSON—To Take Holy Orders.—The Hon. William Prall, a young lawyer of Paterson who had already attained distinction at the bar, and who was a member of the New Jersey Legislature of 1884, has been received by the bishop of the diocese as a candidate for Holy Orders. He expects to retire from the bar in the spring, and will pursue his theological studies at Geneva, N. Y. Mr. Prall lost his wife last year, and a few weeks ago his only child.

1. A. M., St. James's, Drifton; evening, St. James's, Eckley.
22. All Saints' Parishes; Christ church, Leacock; St. Grace, Nickel Mines.

ALTOONA—St. Luke's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. A. S. Woodie, rector) on Sunday, October 11. He confirmed twenty-seven persons, celebrated the Holy Communion, made two addresses, including one to the Sunday-school, and preached to his third congregation in the evening. Although Bishop Howe has passed the allotted three score years and ten, his manhood yet triumphs over the exactions of his office, and persuades men by its peculiar power.

The Church in Altoona is not the least in importance among the many vital interests of the diocese, and deserves to be furnished with a standard apparatus to subserve its important functions. It is proposed to build a new rectory and use the old for a parish building, which is much needed for the growing schools and other purposes. About $15,000 is needed to accomplish these ends, which the rector hopes to obtain from the many faithful friends of the Church in Altoona.

SCRANTON—Convocation.—The Scranton Convocation held its autumnal meeting in St. Luke's Church, Scranton, on Tuesday evening, October 13. There were present the dean of the Convocation, the Rev. H. L. Jones, the Rev. Messrs. E. P. Brown, E. S. Cross, W. E. Monon, E. A. Enos, G. D. Stroud, W. H. Platt, W. Kennedy, E. A. Wanizer, J. Scott, L. R. Dickinson, W. F. Watkins, Jr., J. P. B. Pendleton, and the rector, the Rev. H. C. Szwentzel. Mr. J. M. Koehler, missionary to deaf mutes, was also in attendance. After evening prayer by the Rev. Messrs. Enos, Scott, and Cross, the dean read an essay on the work of the Sunday-school teacher, and addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. Watkins and Dickinson.

On Wednesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. F. Watkins, Jr., on Psalm cxix, 96. The discourse was able, and marked by clearness and breadth of thought. At the business meeting in the afternoon reports of missionary work were presented. An admirable exegesis of St. John x, 29, 30, was read by the Rev. John Scott. The Rev. H. L. Jones was re-elected dean, the Rev. E. A. Enos was chosen secretary, and the Rev. H. C. Szwentzel, treasurer. In the evening spirited addresses on missionary topics were delivered by the Rev. Messrs. E. S. Cross, W. H. Platt, and W. B. Monon.

Cordial hospitality, hearty music, and kindly spirit characterized the session.

St. Luke's parish is to be congratulated on the ability, fidelity and zeal of its new rector.

CHAMBERSBURG—Convocation.—The Convocation of Harrisburg met in Trinity church, Chambersburg, on Tuesday, October 13. Sermons were preached by the Rev. Dr. W. J. Chauncey Langdon, and the Rev. Messrs. F. M. Clay-Moran, and L. F. Baker. Missionary addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. R. J. Keeling, and the Rev. Messrs. A. S. Wordis, and James Stoddard.

CHAMBERSBURG—Sunday-School Association.—The Sunday-school Association met in Trinity church, Chambersburg, Thursday, October 13. Teachers and officers of Sunday-schools from various parts of the Harrisburg Convocation were present. The addresses and discussions were carefully listened to, and all abandoned in direct instruction.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Hallowed Name, Columbia Heights.—This is a new and beautiful stone gothic church, and a gem. Mention will be made at another time of several of its excellencies and beauties; at present the altar and reredos are sufficient for notice. The work is that of the Rev. Johannes A. Oertel, whose merits are greater than his fame. Carving with patient tools, and painting with faithful brush, he has again achieved a success in a line which taste and nature have seemingly assigned to him, making him an enthusiastic devotee of the revival of art in connection with religion.

The chancel is semi-octagon. Three sides are occupied by the reredos, which measures fourteen feet in height, by eighteen feet in width. Immediately over the reredos are three lancet windows, filled with stained glass, and these are included in the effect of the composition. The reredos consists of two tiers, each in three sections, but so joined as to produce the impression of a unit. It is surrounded, moreover, by four angelic figures in adoring attitudes, carved in the round, and two feet in height. The altar occupies, of course, the central position. It is itself strictly symbolical. Emblematic heads of the four evangelists support a projection on either side of the front, between which appears the sacred monogram, and to right and left the Alpha and Omega. Over these runs a very bold moulding all round, carved in fruit, with grapes and wheat in naturalistic forms, and over this the incised words, "I am the Bread of Life." On the left side the corresponding moulding is bolly, as emblematic of the Incarnation, and over it is shown the seven-rayed star. To the right a morning-glory vine and flowers symbolize the Resurrection, with the cross of victory above. The mensa proper contains a flat incised Latin cross, and the retablo the thrice holy.

The reredos itself symbolizes the "Church of the living God," in which the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" is the central figure. Bold arches, richly decorated, surmount the carved Lamb of sacrifice on ornamented gilt ground. On either side, under a canopy on the buttresses, is an Old Testament symbol of the Christ crucified "for the sins of the whole world." To the left the Paschal-Lamb on a cruciform spit, as was customary in roasting it among the Jews, and is with the Samaritans to this day. On the right the image of the serpent crushed by Moses in the wilderness as the cure of the living serpent's bite.

The Church of Christ is founded on "The Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the head cornerstone." Therefore, in the reredos the four greater prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, are placed in the lower panels, two on each side of the Lamb, as representatives of the Old Testament foundation stones. In the second tier, and forming an almost continuous tablet, are the twelve apostles seated "on twelve thrones," as judges of the tribes of Israel, that is, rulers under Christ of the collective Church in His eternal kingdom, symbolizing the faithful of the New Testament dispensation. Thus the Old and New Testaments, with the surmounting angels constitute, with the "Lamb of God" as the centre, the church.

"Angels and living apostles, and dead
But one communion mark."

The prophets and apostles are paintings in oil; the Lamb, carving in high relief; the angels, carving in full relief, as are the Old Testament symbols, and heads of Scriptural animals between the prophets. The wood employed is mainly light ash, in its natural tint, and to this framework the paintings are strictly harmonized.

The prophets are single, standing figures, nearly four feet high, and the seated apostles are almost as tall in their chairs.

WESTON—Episcopal Visitation.—The bishop of the diocese visited the missionary field, of which Weston is the centre, on Saturday, October 3, and the following days. He arrived on Saturday, and in the afternoon rode with the missionary, the Rev. J. W. Keeble, five miles into the country to a farmhouse, where he confirmed one sick woman, who had been baptized in Fauquier county, Va., over eighty years ago, and at the time of her confirmation was near her ninetieth birthday. On Sunday the bishop preached in the morning in St. Paul's church, Weston, and in the evening he preached and confirmed eight persons. On Monday the bishop and the missionary went by private conveyance twenty-three miles to Brownsville, an important lumber point on the Kanawha River. Here in the evening the bishop preached and confirmed one person. On Tuesday morning they went twenty miles to Sutton, and held service in the Methodist chapel in the evening. The service was a very interesting one. After the service they returned to their hotel, and rested by a good fire until 2 A.M.

It was very dark and inclement, but the bishop and Mr. Keeble had forty-three miles of mountain road before them, and they had appointed to be in Weston to meet the convocation at 2 P.M. So they started over a rough and dangerous road, Mr. Keeble holding the lantern, while the bishop drove. It was the intention to breakfast at Brownsville, but in the darkness they missed the road, and kept on to Jacksonville, reaching there at 9 A.M. After a two hours' rest they drove on to Weston, reaching there in time to dine at the rectory at 2 P.M. It was a fatiguing journey, but both bishop and missionary were fully refreshed when they met their brethren of the

THE BISHOP'S APPOINTMENTS.—In the issue of THE CHURCHMAN of October 17, is published the October appointments of the venerable Bishop Green. We regret to say that he has been obliged to cancel all of them, on account of his health, which makes it improbable that he will attempt any visitations before the spring.

INDIANA.

TERRE HAUTE—St. Luke's Church, Nail Works.—This beautiful church was opened by the bishop of the diocese on Saturday, October 17. As the bishop's carriage approached he received a marching salute from St. Luke's Cadets, followed by three hearty cheers. Only a few weeks ago these boys were a terror to the neighborhood, but under the care of the Church matters are changed among them. At the appointed time the bishop, preceded by the cross bearer, chorists, and rector of the parish, and followed by St. Stephen's Brotherhood, St. Luke's Cadets, and St. Luke's Sunday-school, all with banners, proceeded to the church, over the front door of which was the word "Welcome." The bishop, as he approached the church, received the key from the contractor, and invoking God's blessing, opened the door in the Name of the Blessed Trinity, and proceeded to the seat in the sanctuary. The service of dedication followed. The bishop preached an eloquent sermon, in the course of which he called attention to the fact that but twelve days elapsed between the turning of the first sod by Mrs. Major Donaldson, and the laying of the corner-stone, and only sixteen days from the laying of the corner-stone to the dedication.

The steel spade used in turning the sod hangs on one side of the church, while the trowel is suspended on the other. The church is a beautiful structure, finished in native woods, with windows of sapphire and ruby glass. A roof screen with arches separates the sanctuary from the nave. The arches are draped with rich curtains suspended from rods of cherry. A memorial brass cross and vases adorn the altar, while above it are suspended heavy brass altar lamps. There is a good organ and a beautiful white font. The seats are comfortable bent wood chairs. A well-lighted reading-room adjoins the church building.

Services are held every Sunday afternoon at 2 P.M., and Sunday school an hour later. All the seats are free.

TERRE HAUTE—Steamer Service.—A service illustrating the adaptability of the Book of Common Prayer was held by the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafield on one of the Wabash Packet Steamers on the evening of Monday, October 12. The deck-hands and stokers were gathered into the boiler-room, and there, by the ruddy light of the furnace-fires, the story of the crucifixion of One more homeless than they was read from the Holy Week gospels to a motley crowd of eager listeners. Then, after singing "Jesus, Saviour of my soul," all kneeled down just as they were, while several of the beautiful collects suited to all sorts and conditions of men were offered up. No grand cathedral ever sheltered a more devout and grateful congregation than that boiler-room.

MICHIGAN.

BRIGHTON—Missionary Work.—The missionary field in Livingston County consists of three parishes, St. Paul's, Brighton, St. John's, Howell, and St. Stephen's, Hamburg. There are about one hundred communicants and seventy-five families enrolled on the books. At Brighton, the central point, there is a neat and comfortable rectory, and a good horse and carriage for the use of the minister in charge. The distance from Brighton to Hamburg is seven miles, and ten miles to Howell. For the past year one regular service has been held in each place every Sunday. There are Sunday-schools at Howell and Brighton, and a growing desire for one at Hamburg. The Rev. R. W. Rhames has just resigned the charge of these stations, and all the Church people will warmly welcome his successor and work with him in this interesting field.

SPRINGFIELD.

PARIS—Grace Church.—The annual sermon before the Paris Light Institution was delivered in this church by the Rev. Dr. Walter Delafield. The edifice was brilliant with color, and a double quartette from the company rendered the music with great spirit.

WISCONSIN.

NASHOTAH—Death of the Rev. Dr. Cole.—The Church at large will join with the Diocese of Wisconsin in regret at the loss of the Rev. Dr. Axel D. Cole, President of Nashotah House, who died on Friday, October 16. Dr. Cole held his place for thirty-five years, and his name has been so connected with Nashotah that the mention of one always recalls the other. The death of Dr. Cole leaves the venerable Dr. William Adams as the only survivor of the original body of devoted workers who started the work in the wilderness of Wisconsin Territory, which so wonderfully and successfully developed into the Nashotah Divinity School.

MINNESOTA.

LETTER OF THE BISHOP.—The bishop has sent out the following letter to the diocese, concerning the election of an assistant bishop.

"To the Clergy and Congregations of the Diocese of Minnesota:

"At the last Diocesan Council I called their attention to the urgent need of more episcopal work than, in my infirm health, I could give. The council expressed the opinion that an assistant-bishop ought not to be elected until provision is made for his support. They adopted two resolutions: the first, authorizing the bishop to call a council; the second, appointing a committee to secure this endowment. I have no authority to call a council, and it would be unjust to the assistant-bishop, if elected, until this provision is made.

"After consulting with laymen and clergy, I believe that, with the income of the property of the Minnesota Church Foundation, and our present ratio of assessments, fifteen thousand dollars will be ample.

"I leave the matter in your hands, believing that your decision will be for the honor of God and the welfare of His Church. With my love and blessing,

"I am your friend and brother,

"H. B. WHIPPLE,
"Bishop of Minnesota."

FARIBAULT—St. Mary's Hall.—The Bishop Whipple schools, at Faribault, are well known far beyond the borders of Minnesota. Seabury Divinity School, Shattuck Military School and St. Mary's Hall are lights which are not hid under a bushel. The light shines strongest in Minnesota, but it shines also from sea to sea. Churchmen of the diocese may well feel proud that visitors from the East and West look upon this "trinity of schools" as simply wonderful. Their foundations were wisely laid, and by the providence of God their leaders and teachers have been eminently fitted for the work.

Though these institutions are not yet a quarter of a century old, yet the sons of Seabury have labored from Wales to the Sandwich Islands; the sons of Shattuck are honoring business and professional circles in nearly every State of the Union, while the daughters of St. Mary's are brightening and ennobling many a home in the broad valley of the Mississippi, and carrying their influence into not a few homes of the Atlantic sea-board and the Pacific slope.

Many of the young women who attended the old Hall, near the Cathedral, would start with wonder and admiration to behold the "wondrous fair" stone building, known as St. Mary's. It has not risen, like the phoenix, from the ruins of the old, but from its prosperity. The new building stands on the brow of a hill, overlooking the "Straight River" (so called from its zig-zag wanderings). The external beauty of the edifice is excelled only by the comfort and convenience of the arrangement within. The parlors, the recitation rooms, the refectory, the kitchen, are all perfectly adapted to the needs, the happiness, the welfare of the pupils. There are two matrons in the school, one of whom spends her time looking after the health of the young ladies.

Besides the rector, the chaplain and principal, there are eleven professors and teachers to care for one hundred and thirty-four young ladies whose names appear on last year's register. The success of the school is owing first to the direct blessing of God upon a work which has been carried on according to His will. The dryness of the atmosphere makes it possible to enjoy the charming walks and drives in the city and vicinity. It is well known that, though parents send their sons across a continent or an ocean to educate them, they hesitate to send their daughters such great distances. But the confidence in St. Mary's Hall is such that she is not only an honored prophesess in her own country, but the register for 1884 shows that she drew twenty-eight per cent. of her pupils from other parts of the country. The Diocese of Minnesota is sprinkled with her graduates, and the majority of them are co-workers together with God. May He continue to bless St. Mary's and make her the fruitful mother of many more such children! All her influence tends to develop and strengthen true womanhood, the mind, the heart, the soul. In all departments of English, in Latin, German, French, in music, drawing and painting, she is thorough and unsurpassed. Virtue and energy have brought to her godliness and success!—The Church Record.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1885.

Great interest attaches to the Semi-centennial Commemoration of the Board of Missions, which is to take place in Philadelphia, on the 18th and 19th of the present month.

It is a commemoration of the reorganization of the "Domestic and Foreign Mission Society" in 1835, on the basis of the membership of the Church. That reorganization was the recognition of the fact that the Church herself is a missionary society—nothing more, and nothing less.

It involves, too, a further fact, that the first mission was the mission of the Holy Ghost, and that that first mission was to the Church, and not by or from the Church. That mission is incessant and perpetual. The Church herself is a missionary society only in co-operating with and working under the Great Missionary, the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Godhead. In this one fact lie the principle and the motive of her activity. She will be active in her work, or slothful in it, just in proportion as she recognizes and relies upon the presence and the work of that Holy Spirit.

It is reported from Washington that the President of Mexico is negotiating with Germany for a loan to help his government out of its financial difficulties; and the opinion is fully expressed in well-informed circles that Prince Bismarck will grant the assistance required provided certain concessions favorable to German colonization be made. The occasion for such overtures so distant a power is said to be due to the anticipated failure of the proposed reciprocity treaty with the United States from which President Diaz expected to derive financial succor, and the miscarriage of his recent attempt to arrange for a loan in England. Of course the whole matter belongs as yet to the region of conjecture; but even so, it cannot fail to command the interest of our statesmen. It is altogether likely that the Mexican government would be glad to secure pecuniary assistance from Germany or elsewhere on almost any terms; and it is equally credible that Prince Bismarck would see his opportunity in such a negotiation to secure what he has long been suspected of desiring, namely, a foothold on the American continent. The example of the thrift of English statecraft in extending pecuniary aid to bankrupt governments, and then occupying their territory, can hardly have been lost on the astute Chancellor of the German Empire.

It is true that something similar was once attempted in Mexico by the late Emperor of the French, the disastrous results of which there are few left alive to mourn, save "poor Carlotta," who still waits for her unreturning lord; but Prince Bismarck is hardly the man to be deterred from any undertaking by the failure either of the French or their Emperor. Nor is he likely to be very careful to avoid possible complications with the United States. Indeed he is more than suspected of positive hostility already to the Great Republic. To one who cherishes his reactionary and despotic ideas the very prosperity of such a government as ours is not a pleasing spectacle. If, therefore, his far-reaching diplomacy should see its advantage in making a lodgement for German imperialism on this continent, we may be sure that he would care very little for American sensibilities. At the proper time, however, he will, no doubt, be informed through Minister Pendleton or otherwise, that American sensibilities have long since formulated a principle known as the "Monroe doctrine," according to which our government is traditionally committed to the defence of all American nationalities against European interference and occupation. It is easy to see that insistence upon that venerable but salutary policy may, at any time, become necessary in the practical politics of the day.

THE finding of an infernal machine on a street car track in St. Louis a short time since, and the explosion of another machine similarly placed in the same city a few days later, seem to indicate that dynamism has made its bold advent in this country also. That the "Knights of Labor" are formally responsible for this fiendish device cannot, probably, be proved. It can hardly be denied, however, that they are morally responsible for it, since it was evidently an attempt to avenge the failure of the strike which they recently ordered in that city. Indeed, it is one of the evils of such organizations that they incite to any lawless acts and crimes which seem to further or serve their objects, even though they formally disown and condemn them. No matter how judicious and temperate the counsels of their leaders may be, yet since they are powerless to enforce them in the presence of the passions which they excite, they are responsible for every deed of violence and wrong committed by those who march under their flag and act in their name. Other evidences of a more direct character do not wanting that the wide-spread organization known as the Knights of Labor is not only a despotism of the worst description so far as its members are concerned, but that it is likely soon to become a portentous and intolerable tyranny as regards the commercial and industrial pursuits of the land. Notwithstanding the fair professions and protestations of its president and other leaders, it has contrived to introduce the spirit of European proletarianism into this free country, with all the savage methods upon which it relies. Indeed, it may be said that the very combination of workingmen into a class, with an enforced leadership which they must follow blindly, is a renunciation of the individualism which belongs to liberty, and a return to the rude and despotic economy that belongs to tribal savagery.

Boycotting is merely the modern name for a very old thing belonging to the social and industrial policy of all savage tribes. The use of it among the Irish and other Kelts is a proof that those peoples are not yet individualized into true liberty; and the introduction of it into this country is a relegation of those who employ it to the old instincts of savage association such as array tribe against tribe in all barbarous countries. As an evidence of this it is only necessary to point to the active boycotting that the Knights of Labor do not hesitate to recommend in order to gain their ends. Other socialistic organizations are more outspoken and minatory; but they are composed mostly of a European proletariat that has recently been imported and is not yet naturalized. The most portentous thing about the Knights of Labor is that they are composed largely of American workmen, the adherence of whom to such a movement is not only a renunciation of their birthright as American citizens, but is a surrender of themselves to the control of a barbarous and reactionary despotism between which and the spirit of our free institutions there must always be an irrepressible conflict.

WHILE we are pondering the weighty and timely transactions of the American Church Congress, the published proceedings of the English Church Congress, which met at Portsmouth on October 6, have reached us. Of these special mention should first of all be made of the opening sermons preached by the Bishop of Carlisle and the Bishop of Derry respectively. The sermon of the first-named prelate was a temperate plea against the disestablishment and spoliation of the Church of England, characterized by a noble dignity of sustained argument, and ending in an eloquent and touching appeal to the "old voters and the newly-enfranchised millions," that must have been and must continue to be of much effectiveness. Hardly less affecting and effective was the sermon of the Bishop of Derry, though, as was natural for a prelate of a sister Church which has been disestablished already, he approached the subject of disestablishment with less directness, and spoke of impending issues with rather more reserve. Nothing could be more persuasive than the terms in which he commended the English Church to the affectionate veneration of his hearers:

"Look," he said, "upon the Church which you know—the glory of her cathedrals, the sweetness of her village churches, the chimes of her thousand bells, the venerable rank of her high officials, the charities which radiate from her parsonages, her blessing offered to every babe, her visits of sympathy and instruction ready for every sick man, her benediction waiting to be poured upon every bridal, her words of hope for every Christian burial, her open gates and inviting altars not too jealously guarded by lay or priestly keepers, the music of the Prayer Book which quivers round us day and night, which mingles with our common speech, and is somewhere in every page of the history of the last three centuries, which find expression for English hearts at the coronation of Queen Victoria, at the funeral of Wellington and of Nelson—all these associations, influences, benefits, memories render the National Church surpassingly attractive."

Certainly the preaching and wide publication of these two sermons constitute the most important apology for the continued establishment of religion in England that has yet been made, at least since the present issues have arisen; and when considered as representing the spirit in which the establishment is defended, and the purpose of the National Church to vindicate its rights by a yet wider usefulness and larger beneficence, it may be said that the opening sermons of the Portsmouth Congress were in every way worthy of the occasion, and of the great end which they were intended to serve.

After a very admirable and interesting address of welcome by the president, the Bishop of Winchester, in whose diocese the Congress met, the discussion of the first topic, "The Revised Version of the Old Testament," was proceeded with. Next to the learning and ability of every kind which are conspicuous in the reported papers and speeches on this subject, one is struck by the absence of anything like adverse criticism. Two of the writers, indeed, were members of the revision committee, that is to say, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and Canon Driver; and it was but natural that they should dwell rather on the merits than on the defects of the revision, though it is but right to say that they freely admitted that the work is far from perfect. The other writers and speakers were even less critical and more commendatory in their estimate of the merits of the Revised Version. No doubt more is to be said, and will be said, as time goes on, in the nature of objection to the Old Testament committee's work than was said at Portsmouth. It must take many years and more accurate knowledge of Hebrew textual criticism than is yet accessible, to determine whether the textual revision of the committee has been correct, to say nothing of the translation of the text into English. It cannot be denied, however, that this discussion of the Revised Version of the Old Testament by such scholars and Hebraists as Lord Arthur Hervey, Canon Driver, Canon Kirkpatrick, Dr. Wright and Archdeacon Palmer, and the high and discriminating praise which they bestow upon it, must help it to gain the confidence not only of the uncritical but also of the learned reader. Not only is the New Version of the Old Testament less obnoxious to objection than the Revised Version of the New Testament, but it has been more happy in the circumstances of its introduction to the English speaking world. As such introduction, the discussion at the Portsmouth Church Congress was both dignified and timely.

Of the other transactions of the Portsmouth Congress, there is not space to say as much as the interest belonging to them would otherwise justify. It is greatly to be wished that the admirable paper of the Rev. George Everard on "Special Church Work Amongst Men," might be republished in this country in tract form for wide distribution. The discussion of the Prayer Book with reference to the rearrangement of the services and to supplementary services, proceeded along the lines, mainly, which have been previously taken by our own committee on liturgical enrichment; and it is instructive and encouraging to note that, if one may judge from the papers and speeches at Portsmouth, there is a strong disposition among English Churchmen to follow our lead in the direction of greater variety of services as well as increased flexibility in their use. It is quite likely that a study of the papers and speeches of the English Church Congress on this topic may revive the apparently languishing confidence of some of our own clergy in the wisdom and timeliness of the changes proposed in the "Book Annexed."

As the time of the English elections draws nigh, and the prospect of Liberal success grows brighter, there is a manifest disposition on the part of the Whigs and more moderate Liberals to stand by the Established Church, and defend her against the assaults of her enemies. Among the more notable utterances of the past week are the addresses and speeches of the Marquis of Hartington, Mr. Goschen and others, all of which indicate a change in the tactics of the party which they represent, that must be gratifying to the friends of the Establishment. Both the Archbishops, Canterbury and York, have issued addresses urging the utmost care in the election of men who, they say, are likely to rule the empire for a long time to come. A very complete canvass of all the constituencies has just been made from London, which predicts, with a good deal of certainty, what the character of the next House of Commons will be. It is already evident that the Radicals will not cut so large a figure as was supposed, and that moderate counsels will be entitled to attention. It is almost equally certain, however, that the Liberals will not have a majority over the Conservatives and Parnellites combined, and it is difficult to see how a ministry is to be formed that will be strong enough to deal successfully with the exceedingly difficult questions that have already arisen. It is likely that Mr. Gladstone's skill will be tasked to the utmost in forming a government, and in formulating an opportunist policy that will serve to keep his party in power.

ALONG with the detailed report of the proceedings of the last days of the English Church Congress, comes the estimate which the Church press has formed of the character of the Congress as a whole. Aside from the opening sermons of the Bishops of Carlisle and Derry, the address of the Bishop of Winchester, and such features of special interest as we have elsewhere noted, it seems to be felt that the Congress was hardly up to the mark reached by previous meetings of the same body. The reasons assigned for this are, first, the engrossment of many, especially of the laity, with the political issues that are now pending; and second, the too great unanimity of the writers and speakers on most of the subjects. We venture to suggest that the last cause was due almost altogether to the programme. Almost every one of the subjects was such that Christian men could hardly fail to agree in the discussion of it. There was a notable absence of "burning questions," and, consequently, of fiery polemics. Indeed, the object of the committee seemed to be, for once, to provide edification and not excitement for the attending multitudes; and of edification of the best kind there was no lack. The time has passed in England when the Church Congress needs to cater to popular enthusiasm or bid for popular applause by purveying a sensational programme for the excitation of its audiences.

THE official notice promulgated by the President, that in future his time cannot be given to hearing personal applications for office, will receive the approval of the thoughtful and patriotic of all parties. The chief magistrate of the United States has something more important to do assuredly than to listen by the hour to the office-seeking tribune and his friends, however earnest and persuasive they may be. The deliberate and careful discharge of the duties of his high office is a matter which concerns the people of the whole land. The executive head of no constitutional government is clothed with more important powers. He is called to the exercise of the highest functions of statesmanship, and the country has the right to look to him for a wise and judicious administration of all the affairs that have been entrusted to him, both domestic and foreign. In order to do this, he is entitled to protection from the importunities of the office-seeker. There is no doubt that the making of the many appointments which, whether wisely or unwisely, has been committed to the President, is a matter of such public concern that it should be carefully considered; but it is equally certain that such appointments can, in the vast majority of cases, be best made quite independently of any personal application for them. Under the proper working of the principles of civil service reform very much of the evil of office-hunting is being abated; but enough remains to require to be kept within bounds.

What the proper rule for the distribution of patronage should be we do not undertake to say. Government by party is the method of administration that belongs to our system, and we have no disposition to fault it. With all its imperfections, it is probably better and safer than anything that has been proposed to take its place; and party government requires, no doubt, that officeholders, as a rule, should be in political sympathy with the executive. Yet it cannot be denied that the giving of his time and personal attention by the President to the hearing of the pettifogging applications that are made daily for all kinds of office, no matter how insignificant, and to personal interviews with the politicians, small and great, who support or oppose them, is a kind of business much too small for the chief magistrate of a great country. We commend this attitude of the President as one of the most hopeful indications of a genuine civil service reform.

A COMMISSION NEEDED ON THE NEGRO.

THE first annual exhibition of the Colored Fair Association of Mississippi was opened the other day at Jackson, the capital of that State. The opening ceremonies, consisting of a parade of military and fire companies, followed by an address by the colored president of the association, and an address by the governor of the State, are said to have been exceedingly interesting and impressive. The Board of Control, having charge of the fair, is composed of colored men, and all the articles on exhibition are the product of colored enterprise and industry; but the holding of the fair has been encouraged and fostered by all the citizens of every locality, and of every class. Among the things exhibited are embroidery and needle-work of all descriptions; farm, dairy, and garden products; agricultural implements; and blooded and graded stock of several kinds.

Not only is the fact that such an enterprise has been projected and carried out by the colored people of the South, with the aid and encouragement of the whites, most significant and instructive, but, if it should be found that the exhibition itself is really and genuinely creditable, it will deserve to be considered a fact of immense importance. Many thoughtful men have reluctantly reached the conclusion that the colored race in the South is not improving. There have seemed, to many, to be evidences not a few that as a whole they are positively deteriorating, notwithstanding their emancipation, and the vast efforts that have been made for their improvement and training, while at the same time they have been increasing numerically at such an enhanced rate that, as things are now going on, they must soon largely outnumber the whites in the Southern States. Indeed, all considerations go to show that the future of this race is the question which most deeply concerns the entire country at this present time.

The difficulties of its solution have not been in the least diminished by the results of the late war, or by the reconstruction legislation that has since been enacted. It is now generally felt that the problem is one that cannot be dismissed, or resolved by act of Congress or by amendment of the Constitution; but that it will task a larger statesmanship than has yet undertaken to grapple with it.

It becomes, therefore, a matter of immense importance to determine what the capacity of this race of men is, and to what extent they may be coordinated with the white race, in matters industrial and economical, as well as in things moral and spiritual. No doubt, the negroes of Mississippi will make the best possible showing for themselves at their State fair. Let them have the amplest and most cordial consideration and estimate of all that they can show for themselves after two decades of freedom and citizenship. But let us have a real estimate, and not a merely sentimental one. The question at issue is too vastly important to be settled by mere gush or declamation. It is greatly to be desired that the Government should appoint a commission, composed of eminent men of both parties, and of all sections, to investigate the character and significance of this and like exhibitions of the industrial and economical capacity of the colored people of the South, and to give their conclusions to the country. For the time is rapidly coming when the destiny of this nation, as a whole, will largely depend on the view which shall be taken of this matter.

ENGLAND.

VIEWS OF THE PORTSMOUTH CHURCH CONGRESS.—The Guardian says of the recent English Church Congress:

"If we may judge merely by the number of those present, the Portsmouth Church Congress, which closed last Friday, will hardly take its place in the foremost rank. But the very fact of the approaching general election, which no doubt kept many laymen away, also gave a unique importance to this year's congress. The opening sermons and the evening session on Church defence will naturally be appealed to as expressing the mind of the Church on disestablishment. But the programme itself is perhaps the best answer to the charge that the Church is only a very numerous sect. It was not only that all the so-called schools of Churchmen were represented, but the multiplicity of the subjects discussed bore witness in a remarkable way to the varied activity of the Church of the present day. If the fullness and depth of her teaching were shown in the meeting on the Spiritual Life, her versatility and breadth were proved by the rest of the programme."

John Bull says:

"It must be confessed that the Church Congress this year afforded, as usual, the largest opportunities for indulging in endless verbiage and pietistic twaddle on various subjects. But there were also not a few individual papers and speeches well worthy of close study."

The Rock says:

"The Portsmouth Church Congress of 1885 now belongs to the history of the past. Like all mundane events, its day was very brief, and the opportunities it offered of good or mischievous work can never be recalled. Happily, there is very little in its proceedings which ought to be regarded as anything but useful."

THE "PROTESTANT" CHURCH CONGRESS AT PORTSMOUTH.—At the time of the announcement of the selection of Portsmouth as the place for holding the Church Congress, the Mayor of Portsmouth convened a meeting of citizens to offer the congress the hospitality of the city. Under the lead of the Rev. H. Lindsay Young, in a thinly attended meeting, which many citizens of Portsmouth did not attend, thinking the passing of the resolution a matter of course, a body of ultra Protestants succeeded in defeating the motion of invitation. No one took notice of this, and the congress was held as already reported. On Thursday, October 8, a meeting calling itself a "Protestant Church Congress" was held in Portsmouth "to direct attention to the alarming inroads of Romanism in the English Church." There was a pretty full attendance. A letter was read from Lord Ebury; two or three violent speeches were made, in which Ritualists, High Churchmen, and Broad Churchmen were roundly abused; but the meeting, on the whole, was a dismal failure. One of the speakers was a Presbyterian minister.

IRELAND.

THE IRISH CHURCH'S TITLE.—After a series of attempts to force upon the bishops and clergy of the Church of Ireland the title of "The Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland," which they have steadily refused to accept, or even to acknowledge, the Irish Executive, to find a way out of the difficulty into which it had plunged unnecessarily, has called upon the law officers of the crown to reconsider the question of the title of the Church and give an opinion. The law officers have given their opinion, without going into any deep consideration of the matter, but basing it only on the Acts of Parliament, that the Act of Disestablishment, and subsequent legislation, having given or recognized the term "Church of Ireland," or its equivalent, "The Irish Church," to the disestablished Church, that is its legal title. The law officers, namely, the Attorney General, and the Solicitor-General, have also written to one of the Irish clergy, in response to a letter from him, that they are prepared, in their places in Parliament, to do all in their power to maintain the Church's right to her ancient and legal title.

The Freeman's Journal (Roman Catholic) affects pleasure at this decision, on the pretended ground that what an act of Parliament gave a like act can take away, and says that Mr. Healy will attempt to carry a bill of the kind through the next Parliament. This, however, is more than doubtful.

SCOTLAND.

THE BISHOP OF EDINBURGH'S ILLNESS.—On September 25 the Bishop of Edinburgh (Dr. Costerill) addressed a letter to the clergy and laity of his diocese, stating the fact of his having been advised by his surgeons of being afflicted with an incurable disease, "which must sooner or later terminate fatally, and which, meanwhile, must disqualify him from undertaking any of the active duties of his episcopal office." The bishop then continues: "This is God's will concerning me; and I am sure you will pray for me, that I may accept it cheerfully as such. Through His goodness, although I am physically incapacitated for active work, my mind is as yet unimpaired, and, so long as my life is spared, I trust to be able to aid with my counsels and to some extent superintend the work of the diocese, even as I have done hitherto. I need add no more at present, except that I leave myself and you in the hands of our loving God and Father, and feel assured that I shall have your sympathy and prayers and consideration in this great and unexpected trial. My trial and sorrow is, indeed, yours also, and yours is mine. In the meanwhile I have appointed the dean to act as my commissary in all matters concerning the administration of the diocese which do not require episcopal action; and I have no doubt that if the College of Bishops do not consider that my case is one in which the appointment of a conditor is desirable, some of my episcopal brethren will be willing to perform episcopal acts for me, as the Bishop of Brechin has so kindly done during the last few months. Believe me, dear brethren, yours affectionately, in those bonds that shall last for ever,

"HENRY, Bishop of Edinburgh."

Many private replies to this letter were sent the bishop, and on Friday, October 9, the Dean of Edinburgh assembled the clergy and as many of the laity as could attend, to a service of intercession at the cathedral, which was preceded by an early celebration of the Holy Communion. Immediately after the service there was a meeting held, and the following letter unanimously agreed upon and sent to the bishop.

"To the Rt. Rev. Henry, Bishop of Edinburgh.

"Dear Father in God—Many of us have, directly or indirectly, made some acknowledgment of the solemn and affecting letter which you have addressed to the clergy and laity of your diocese; but we feel that such private communications do not satisfy our sense of what is due to ourselves and to you. A document which has become a public one demands a public recognition.

"We need hardly say that the announcement which it contains has fallen upon all of us as the shadow of a great sorrow. Most thoroughly do we reciprocate all that you have said respecting the community of feeling and of interest, which must render your great and heavy trial a trial to us all, both pastors and their flocks; and you may rest assured that you will not count in vain upon their sympathy, their prayers, and their consideration. They will willingly see the diocese intrusted to such management as shall seem best to your lordship, and to your right reverend brethren of the Episcopal College.

"It would not be becoming on our part, and we know that it would be utterly distasteful to yourself, if we were to indulge in any language of eulogy; but we regard it as an act of bare justice to ourselves to express our conviction that we have found in you one on whom God has bestowed many gifts, which have rendered you not only fit for the episcopal office, but eminently adapted for the supervision of such a diocese as that of Edinburgh. And although every spiritual ruler 'being taken from among men is compassed with infirmity,' we believe that you have earnestly desired to exercise those gifts for the glory of God, and for the highest welfare of your fellow-creatures. We consider that the work of the diocese has, by God's blessing, greatly prospered under your charge. We might point to many evidences of such progress, but it must here be sufficient to refer to the completion and organization of the cathedral church of the diocese. Most especially are we of the clergy conscious that we have never found your episcopal rule limited by the trammels of a dry officialism, but wise, just and fatherly. And in speaking thus, we feel that the truthfulness of our language will be recognized by others besides members of our own communion, who will also join with us in appreciating your contributions to the sacred cause of belief against unbelief.

"With the renewed assurance of our prayers that God may support you and yours under the burden of this heavy affliction, and may impart to all of us more of the grace of resignation to His holy will, we remain, dear father in God, yours dutifully and faithfully in Christ.—(Signed on behalf of the meeting),
"J. F. MONTGOMERY, D. D., Dean."

VERMONT.

WEST RANDOLPH—St. John's Church.—The Rev. John Chamberlain, of St. Ann's church, New York, held an interesting service for deaf-mutes in this church (the Rev. Homer White, rector) on the afternoon of Sunday, October 18.

BURLINGTON—Choir Festival.—The Vermont Church Choir Guild held its seventh annual festival in St. Paul's church, Burlington (the Rev. Homer White, rector), on Wednesday and Thursday, October 21 and 22. There were present from all parts of the diocese about one hundred singers, besides a double quartette of students from Dartmouth College, N. H., representing St. Thomas's church, Hanover, some singers from Claremont, N. H., and two choir boys from the Church of the Advent, Boston. The conductor was Mr. S. B. Whitney, of the Church of the Advent, and the organist, Mr. W. H. Thayer, of St. Paul's, Burlington.

There were present of the clergy, the bishop of the diocese, the Rev. Drs. C. D. Fay and J. I. Bliss, and the Rev. Messrs. A. E. Carpenter, F. S. Fisher, G. Graves, W. B. Guion, T. A. Hopkins, L. Sears, M. P. Stickney, R. M. Berkeley, and C. C. Grafton. The chants at the services were sung antiphonally to Gregorian tones, and many of the solo, duet, and quartette parts were very finely rendered.

The address on Thursday evening, by the Rev. C. C. Grafton, was brief and glowing on the importance of choral music in divine worship.

At the business session the executive committee was re-elected, the Rev. F. S. Fisher being chairman, and Mr. C. E. Parker, secretary. The Hanover choir was voted thanks, and together with the rector, the Rev. R. M. Berkeley, its members were made members of the Guild.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Church of the Advent.—On Thursday, November 5, the Rev. G. McClellan Fiske, rector of St. Stephen's church, Providence, R. I., will conduct a "Quiet Day" for the laity at the Church of the Advent, corner of Brunner and Mount Vernon streets. The Holy Communion will be celebrated at 7 and 9:30

A. M., and addresses given at 10:45 A. M. and 12:15 and 3:30 P. M., Evening Prayer at 5 P. M. All Church people are invited to make use of the church during the day, and to attend any or all of the services.

SOUTH FRAMINGHAM—Mission Services.—Church services have been held occasionally for some time in this place by the Rev. F. S. Harraden, in addition to his other duties as rector of the St. John's church, Framingham Centre, and St. Paul's church, Natick. Increasing interest has been manifested, and this fall a regular Sunday service has been begun. A good sized lot of land, favorably situated, has been generously offered by Mr. R. N. Everit, a churchman living in New Haven, Conn., which has been accepted, and it is intended to build a chapel in the spring.

South Framingham is a rapidly growing and thriving place, and promises to be of considerable importance as a railroad centre, and manufacturing town.

NATICK—To Enter Holy Orders.—The Rev. W. D. P. Bliss, pastor of the John Eliot Congregational Society, South Natick, has resigned his pastorate, signifying his intention to enter the ministry of the Church. He is the son of the well-known Dr. Bliss, Congregational missionary to Turkey. Mr. and Mrs. Bliss were confirmed by the bishop of the diocese on St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Boston.

RHODE ISLAND.

APPONAUG—St. Barnabas's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this church (the Rev. Percy Barnes, minister in charge) on Sunday, October 25, and administered the rite of confirmation to four adults. The church at Apponaug having a morning and evening service, allows a work to be carried on in the afternoon at Anthony, a village some seven miles distant where Church services are for the first time being held. An active mind gives strength to a work which bids fair to become a lasting one.

CONNECTICUT.

NEW HAVEN—Trinity Church.—A memorial tablet lately placed in this church is worthy of notice, both for its object and for the novel and beautiful style of its design and workmanship. It is in memory of the Hon. Nathan Smith, formerly United States senator from this state, and for many years prominent in the councils of this diocese. It is placed in the church by his descendants, among whom are two of the New York clergy, connected with the parishes of St. James and St. Thomas. The backing of the tablet is of Tennessee marble. The letters of the inscription are mostly cast solid with the plate of heavy brass, from which they stand out with a clearness and sharpness which shows the extreme fineness of the casting. The name is on a plate of hammered copper, bolted to the brass, and finished with great delicacy yet solidity of workmanship. The initial letters throughout the inscription are also of copper, contrasting in a subdued but effective manner with the brass. The groundwork of the plate is so treated as soon to oxidize, and thus still more clearly throw out the lettering. The work is that of the Gorham Manufacturing Company, and is in its design, treatment, and solidity worthy of the new era in American art, which they have done so much to forward and to illustrate.

BETHEL—St. Thomas's Church.—This parish (the Rev. G. P. Torrance, rector) held its fiftieth anniversary on Wednesday, October 25, St. Simon and St. Jude's Day. In the morning the sermon was by the Rev. Byron

Hall. In the evening there was an historical address by the rector, followed by addresses from the Rev. S. O. Seymour (a former rector), and the Rev. Byron J. Hall.

ALBANY.

SCHENECTADY—Christ Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this church (The Rev. E. L. Toy, rector,) and confirmed twenty-two persons, the largest number of candidates ever confirmed in this parish. The bishop preached from the teachings of the Church's service for the day.

HOOSICK FALLS—Burning of St. Mark's Church.—At about 8 P. M. on Tuesday, October 27, flames were seen issuing from the windows of St. Mark's church (the Rev. G. D. Silliman, rector). A general alarm was sounded, and in a very short time the fire department was pouring two streams of water on the burning building. The firemen worked hard for about two hours before the flames were controlled, and succeeded in saving the walls and tower of the church, with the clock and the chime of bells. The interior of the church, however, was wholly destroyed. The fire originated in the cellar from a defective flue. The loss will reach $8,000, fully covered by insurance. All the church records were saved, but the organ is badly damaged. The work of rebuilding will be at once begun.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—St. George's Church.—As soon as arrangements can be made about the land, it is proposed to build a parish house in connection with this church (the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, rector) which shall serve manifold uses. The parish own the school house and one or two dwellings to the west of the rectory, and on the site occupied by these buildings, and possibly other land adjoining, it is intended to place the new structure. The house will embrace a Sunday school room large enough to accommodate 1,300 children, a gymnasium, rooms, perhaps, for the industrial schools, for the parish clergy, etc. Nothing seems to interfere with the immediate carrying out of this plan except the location of the building in such way as not to interfere with adjoining dwellings in the matter of light, etc.

NEW YORK—The Church of the Reformation.—The corner-stone of this church on Stanton street near Norfolk, was laid on Monday, October 19, by the assistant-bishop of the diocese. At the hour appointed the clergy passed from the edifice in the former street in which services are held, to the site of the new structure, the choir singing Hymn 547. The service was begun by the assistant-bishop, parts of which were taken by the Rev. Thomas Hyland and the Rev. Dr. E. F. Miles, minister in charge. Addresses were made by the assistant-bishop and by the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, rector of St. George's. A history of the corporation was read by Benjamin C. Wetmore, president of the board of trustees. This history was then placed in the corner-stone together with copies of the Bible, Prayer Book, THE CHURCHMAN, Parish Visitor, the Church Almanac, copies of the New York dailies, etc. The stone being duly laid, was struck with the mallet three times by the assistant-bishop as he repeated the words "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The sermon was then proceeded with, Hymn 275 being sung, as also Hymn 369 at the conclusion of the collects.

The new building, which was begun in August, will be ready for occupancy, it is expected, about January 1. It will be 94x86, the materials being brick with stone and terra cotta trimmings. In the basement will be a kitchen, gymnasium, lavatories, etc. On the ground floor will be rooms for the Sunday-school, industrial school, etc., the space being large enough to accommodate a thousand children. The church proper will be on the floor above, the dimensions being 86x42. It is understood that on this story are also to be reception rooms. The cost of the building will be $46,000, all of which has been subscribed. The architect is Mr. Charles C. Haight.

NEW YORK—The Christian Institute.—On Tuesday evening October 27, a company of the Knights of Temperance was formed in connection with this institution, the one number of young men of the required age having made application for a charter. There was present to take part in the matter of organization a delegation of the Knights of Temperance, of Ascension chapel, together with the minister in charge, the Rev. John F. Steen. There was present also Mr. Robert Graham, the grand-commander of the order for the diocese of New York.

Previous to the formation of the company Mr. Graham made a short address setting forth the principles of the organization, etc., when the delegation present went through the various exercises as prescribed by the ritual. A member of the new company was then initiated, taking the pledges, etc, by way of showing the method of receiving new members. All the members of the new company followed by taking the pledge in unison, when the grand-commander declared the company duly formed and granted a charter accordingly. The company connected with Ascension chapel is to be known as company No. 1, and that of the Christian Institute as Company No. 2.

NEW YORK—St. Luke's Hospital.—The Hospital Saturday and Sunday Association met in one of the hospital apartments on Monday evening, October 19. There were present Mr. George M. Miller, president, the Rev. George S. Baker, corresponding secretary, and twelve or fourteen others. Mr. Baker read his annual report which showed that the number of baptisms the past year had been 23 and of confirmations 65. According to Mr. Frederick F. Cook's report, the outlook for the year to come was most encouraging. All lines of trade would be thoroughly canvassed, and circulars requesting contributions from merchants and manufacturers would be distributed accordingly. The Stock and Produce Exchanges were expected to make a much better showing than last year. Suburban churches and benevolent lodges within 50 miles of the city would be invited to add to the contributions.

NEW YORK—Archdeacon Farrar.—On Sunday, October 25, Archdeacon Farrar preached in Trinity church, from 1 St. John v., 21. The discourse was able, and especially in that part which referred to the idolatry of money was exceedingly practical and opportune. The congregation filled the spacious church to overflowing, and hundreds were unable to gain admittance.

On the following Monday he was entertained at a breakfast at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, by Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co. At noon he was met by a large number of ministers of all denominations, at the house of Mr. Cyrus W. Field. The address of welcome was made by Dr. R. S. Stearns. The archdeacon in reply said, he esteemed the occasion one of the greatest honors of his life.

On Tuesday evening, he was entertained at a lunch at the house of Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt. Among the guests were the Assistant-Bishop of New York, and the Bishops of Long Island and Albany.

On Wednesday evening he repeated his lecture on the "Poems of Robert Browning," before a very large audience at Chickering Hall.

On Friday evening he was tendered a reception at Chickering Hall by the American Temperance Society and the Church Temperance Society. Admission was by ticket, a most intelligent audience filling the house, notwithstanding the drenching rain. The assistant-bishop, who was expected to preside, was unable to be present. His place was taken by the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim, who made the address of welcome. An address of greeting was also made by the Rev. Dr. Cuyler, president of the American Temperance Society, who said they welcomed him not so much as a scholar and a man high in position, but as a large-hearted philanthropist.

The archdeacon, on being introduced to the assembly, made an earnest plea in behalf of temperance, and especially set forth the reasons which ten years ago led him to become a total abstainer.

On Friday the archdeacon lectured before the students of the Union Theological Seminary on "Manhood."

NEWBURGH—Mission at St. George's Church.—A two weeks' mission was opened in this parish (the Rev. Dr. O. Applegate, rector,) on the evening of Saturday, October 17. The services were conducted by the Rev. W. Hay Aitken and the Rev. James Stephens, assisted by the local clergy. The Rev. Mr. Stephens made the first address, setting forth the object of the mission and urging all to take part, and especially urging them to permit their children to do so.

The Rev. W. Hay Aitken then addressed the congregation in an address of remarkable power.

On Sunday there was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7 A. M., and another at 9 A. M. After Morning Prayer, the congregation at the bidding of the missionary, spent a few minutes in silent prayer, and then rising joined in the "Veni Creator Spiritus." Mr. Aitken then preached a powerful sermon from 2 Cor. xiii., 5.

At 2:45 P. M. there was a special meeting for children, conducted by the Rev. Mr. Stephens, and at 4 P. M. a meeting for men only, at which the chief missionary preached from Rom. vi., 21, 22. Evening Prayer was conducted by the rector, Mr. Aitken again preaching.

The Rev. Mr. Stephens preached in St. Paul's church on Sunday morning, and at St. George's chapel in the evening.

There was a special meeting for women in St. George's school room, which was addressed by Mrs. Couch, of England, who is here to assist the missionaries in their work.

The two weeks' work was regarded as having opened very auspiciously.

POUGHKEEPSIE—Church of the Holy Comforter.—This parish (the Rev. R. F. Crary, rector,) celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of the church, on Sunday, October 25. The rector, who has been in charge for eighteen years, celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Dr. D. G. Wright, and preached from 1 St. Peter iv., 10. A large number received, among them many former parishioners who had returned to Poughkeepsie to attend this service. A memorable event of the day was the offering made, by the founder of the parish, of the parcel of land extending from the church to the corner of Main street, which is a most valuable acquisition to the parish.

This beautiful church was built in 1860, by Mr. William A. Davis, as a memorial. Additions were made in 1870. It was consecrated by the Provisional Bishop of New York, October 25, 1860. There have been baptized here 1,278; confirmed, 663; marriages, 226; burials, 509; communicants, 794, (present number, 318). There have been 5,805 services held, and 225 services in St. Barnabas's hospital, held by the rector.

ANNANDALE—St. Stephen's College.—The assistant-bishop and the trustees of St. Stephen's College invited a number of the clergy and laity of the diocese to visit Annandale on Tuesday, October 27, in order to become better acquainted with the college. The day was a beautiful October day, and on the arrival of the train at Barrytown, carriages were in waiting to convey the guests to the college. At 12.30 there was a good congregation gathered in the chapel. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. F. E. Shober, J. R. Lambert and G. C. Hephura. Addresses were made by the assistant-bishop, and the Rev. Drs. E. D. Cooper and J. Breckenridge Gibson.

The assistant-bishop remarked that he came to Annandale with ever-increasing interest in the work which was carried on under the direction of the ex-warden and his associates. He hoped that this holiday, which might be called Commencement Day with more propriety than that day in June when the graduates received their degrees, might be repeated in future years, that the friends of the college might gather together then to give an impulse to the work at the beginning of the college year. He urged upon the students the importance of starting aright, according to the rules which they laid down for themselves at the outset of their career, so they would be likely to continue to the close of it.

The Rev. Dr. Cooper, who was introduced as the representative of a neighboring and a daughter diocese, spoke a few earnest words in behalf of Christian education, urging the young men to lay the foundations of their intellectual and religious culture broad and deep, and to be thorough in everything that they undertook. He believed that such had been a characteristic of the college, as wherever he met the graduates of St. Stephen's, at the General Theological Seminary or elsewhere, he found them occupying the foremost positions.

The Rev. Dr. Gibson spoke very feelingly of his interest in the college; an interest, which was partly of a personal nature, as here a beloved son, who had now gone to his rest, had not only received his intellectual training, but had also had those religious impressions which had been given him in childhood, deepened and strengthened.

At the conclusion of the services the guests of the college, including many ladies, were entertained in the college dining hall. After-dinner speeches were made by the visitors, members of the faculty, alumni and undergraduates.

The college was never in a more healthy condition than it is to-day. Forty applications for admission have been received this year, a larger number than ever before. Of these thirty have been accepted. The others were refused simply for lack of the means to sustain them. It is to be hoped that those who have been blessed with abundant means will appreciate the advantage of an educated ministry, and show by their generous gifts that they esteem it a privilege to aid in the work of Christian education.

EAST CHESTER—St. Paul's Church.—On Saturday, October 24, this parish (the Rev. W. S. Coffey, rector) celebrated the eightieth anniversary of the consecration of the parish church. There were present the assistant-bishop, the rector, the Rev. Drs. E. D. Cooper and M. Van Rensselaer and the Rev. Messrs. F. Chase, C. E. Canedy, S. F. Holmes and J. H. Johnson. The assistant-bishop confirmed nine persons, and celebrated the Holy Communion.

The rector gave a brief sketch of the history of the church, which was erected in 1765, but was not consecrated until October 24, 1805. During the portion of the forty years interim the church was used by the American and British forces during the Revolutionary War as a hospital, and in 1787 by Chief Justice Morris as a Supreme Court room. The church was consecrated by Bishop Benjamin Moore, and the Rev. Dr. Wilkins was the first rector. The bell used to-day was used over a hundred years ago to assemble our forefathers. The old Bible and Prayer Book, belonging to the church when first opened, and which during the Revolution were buried for safe-keeping, were used in this service. The altar used at the consecration, eighty years ago, was placed in the north aisle of the church.

The Rev. H. H. Johnson spoke of the history of St. Peter's, Westchester, as having been in some way connected with the old parish of East Chester. He congratulated the rector, and prophesied future greatness for this venerable parish.

The Rev. Dr. E. D. Cooper followed in a brief address. After the service the assistant-bishop, clergy, and congregation were entertained by the ladies of the parish in the Sunday-school room.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—On Friday, October 16, the rector of this parish (the Rev. G. R. Van De Water) held a meeting of the men of the parish. About forty were present. The plan and object of the contemplated mission was set forth, and freedom was given to those present to express their views. Eight laymen responded in a frank spirit of discussion, and all offered their individual assistance to the rector. On Tuesday, October 20, volunteers for actual work were invited to meet in the guild room at the Parish Hall. There were thirty five present, and the rector said that no one was asked to act unless inclined to do so from a heartfelt interest in the mission. Four committees were formed, (1) to see to the seating of the congregation, preserve order, distribute service books, etc.; (2) to circulate information, distribute pamphlets at factories, shops, lines of travel, and through the press; to make known the design of the services; (3) to lead the musical portion of the services; and to take positions in various parts of the church and chapel for that purpose; (4) on spiritual work, to make personal visitations, and aid in the more confidential work.

The different committees are acting with alacrity, and evincing a spirit of earnestness which promises sincere co-operation with the clergy. The "auxiliary," comprising the women-workers of the parish, is organizing committees to act in similar capacities among the women of the various classes for which the special services are designed. The children hold stated meetings and practise hymns; and their special services are of a suitable character.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—Sunday, October 18, being St. Luke's Day, was observed in this parish (the Rev. G. R. Van De Water, rector.) by an informal opening of the chapel on Pacific street, the new chancel and choir room being used for the first time. The Holy Communion was celebrated, having been preceded by matins. The minister in charge, the Rev. T. B. Foster, celebrated and preached from Ephesians v. 32. The Rev. H. A. Adams assisted. The vested choir, carefully trained by Mr. W. H. Narracont, rendered the music admirably. The second service was at 4:30 P.M., the rector of the chapel preaching from Psalm xxvii. 1. The chapel was filled completely at both services, and the services were hearty and reverent. This work, begun as a mission in May, 1884, has developed wonderfully, and bids fair soon to result in an independent parish. The congregation now numbers over three hundred with one hundred and seventy communicants.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

ROME—Convocation.—The convocation of the Second Missionary District met in Zion church, Rome, on the evening of Tuesday, October 30. After evening prayer, the Rev. R. A. Olin made an address on "The Missionary Obligation Unending." The Rev. C. T. Olmsted followed with an address on "The Source of Missionary Interest in Personal Devotion;" and the Rev. J. E. Cathell concluded with a few words on "The encouragement to what has been accomplished." At 10:30 A.M., on Wednesday, at the celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rev. C. H. Gardner preached from St. Luke xxii, 19.

A business meeting was held at 2:30 P.M. The dean, the Rev. Dr. J. H. Egar read a report of the missionary work of the district, which is very full, and shows a good amount of work done. The Rev. C. H. Gardner was re-elected secretary and treasurer; the Rev. C. T. Olmsted was appointed essayist; and the Rev. Charles Seymour, preacher for the next meeting of convocation. Resolutions with regard to the death of the Rev. John Bayley were reported and adopted; and a message of condolence sent to the Rev. Dr. W. T. Gibson, in his illness.

The convocation closed with a full choral service on Wednesday evening. Service was conducted by the Rev. C. T. Olmsted, assisted by the Rev. R. A. Olin. The Rev. S. H. Cook read an essay on "The Bible and its Interpretations." A discussion followed, in which the rector (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Egar), and the Rev. Messrs. R. A. Olin and C. T. Olmsted took part.

ROME—Woman's Auxiliary.—The Woman's Auxiliary of the Second Missionary District held its sixth meeting, in the school house of Zion church, on the afternoon of Wednesday, October 21. The meeting was opened with prayer by the rector of the parish (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Egar), after which the bishop of the diocese made an address. Reports from different branches were read, showing that much good mission work had been done during the summer. The total contributions from the different parishes were, in boxes, $1,594.95; in cash, $422.02. Interesting letters from missionaries were read. A committee was appointed, of ladies from different branches, to superintend the packing of missionary boxes during the coming year.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

DELANCEY DIVINITY SCHOOL—Special Theological Education.—The DeLancey Divinity School, in Geneva, N. Y., has entered upon a new and enlarged course of usefulness, as a speciality school. Its plan has been hitherto made known by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Rankine, who, a year ago, with the approval of the Bishop, Standing Committee and Annual Council of the Diocese of Western New York, sent out a circular to most of the bishops of the Church, and to many of the clergy, in regard to the character and specific work of this Divinity School. Therein were stated "the advantages of location, surroundings, endowments and instruction already possessed, especially for candidates for Holy Orders, who on account of peculiar circumstances cannot attend other seminaries of the Church. It meets the wants of those coming from the business world; those coming from other ministries, and those who, having families dependent upon them, cannot be long separated from their homes." At the recent meeting of the Diocesan Council, important measures were taken to increase still further the efficiency of the school. Among these "there will be in the present year two courses of instruction by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of the diocese, in Advent and Lent in 'The Institutes of Ecclesiastical History.' There are also secured instructions from members of the Faculty of Hobart College distinguished in their departments, especially the president, the Rev. Eliphail N. Potter, D. D., LL. D., and the chaplain, the Rev. Wm. M. Hughes, M. A. The Rev. Wm. R. Edson, M. A., as heretofore will discharge the duties of professor of Hebrew and Greek and of Exegesis."

To this important announcement let me add my conviction that to meet the speciality of persons (1) under the short probation prescribed by canon, for those received from other ministries, and (2) of persons preparing for the permanent diaconate, there is no place in the Church where equal advantages can be afforded, as they are admitted, at the same time, to all the privileges of Hobart College, and can refresh themselves in Greek and Latin, or in any other department of a college course in which they may feel themselves less proficient than is desirable.

The Rev. Dr. Rankine will give further information to all who may address him (Geneva, N. Y.), and I think it proper to add that the course for 1885-6 will be opened on St. Andrew's Day, with appropriate solemnities.

A. CLEVELAND COXE,

Bishop of Western New York

Buffalo Oct. 28, SS. Simon and Jude, 1885.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

PATERSON—Church of the Holy Communion.—The vested choir in this parish (the Rev. I. S. Cartwright, rector,) has proved a success, and is much liked. The mission work and Sunday-school at People's Park are progressing favorably.

PATERSON—St. Mary's Church, Haledon.—The work here, under the charge of the Rev. J. C. Hall, manifests a steady improvement in the attendance at week-day and Sunday services, in the decoration of the church edifice, and in the general interest.

PATERSON—Services at Riverside.—Services have begun and are to be continued at Riverside, under the care of the Rev. Dr. J. I. Mombert.

PATERSON—St. Paul's Church.—Three persons from this parish (the Rev. E. B. Russell, pastor,) have been admitted as candidates for Holy Orders within three years.

ORANGE—All Saint's Church.—This parish (the Rev. William Richmond, rector,) which was organized in April last, has just erected and paid for a convenient frame building, to be used for the Sunday-school, sewing-school, and other parish purposes. It adjoins the rectory, on the same plot with the church, and contains an assembly room, besides a smaller room for the infant class. On Wednesday, October 21, after Evening Prayer in the church, a brief service was held in the new building, and the Parish Hall was formally opened by the rector.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Episcopal Academy.—The annual session before the associate alumni of the Protestant Episcopal Academy in the city of Philadelphia, was delivered by the Rev. W. W. Newton in the Church of the Mediator, on Sunday evening, October 23.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Barnabas's Church.—The tenth anniversary of this parish was held on Sunday, October 23. The rector (the Rev.

Charles E. Betticher) preached the anniversary sermon in the morning, in which he referred to the beginning of the church with a Bible class of thirteen, and thirteen children in a room on Second street.

The anniversary exercises of the Sunday-school were held in the afternoon, when addresses were made by the rector and the Rev. Thomas A. Latimer. In the evening, the Rev. Dr. Alsop, rector of Grace church, preached before the assembled adult Bible classes, of which there are five.

A plot of ground across Diamond street from the church has been secured, and a commodious parish building will soon be erected. There are 349 communicants, and 800 in the Sunday-school.

PHILADELPHIA.—American Church Sunday-school Institute.—The public meetings were held on Tuesday, October 27, in St. Luke's church (the Rev. Dr. C. G. Currie, rector). At 9 o'clock the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Rev. W. H. Graff, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Edgar Cope and R. Bowdin Shepherd. Immediately afterward, the Institute was called to order, in the chapel, by the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, the Rev. B. R. Swope, of Wheeling, West Virginia, acting as secretary, who stated the aim and scope of the Institute. The topics discussed at this session were "The difficulty of retaining the elder scholars in the Sunday-school," and "What shall we do, as churches, in regard to providing our young people places to spend their evenings."

In the afternoon, Mr. George C. Thomas presided, and read the constitution and by-laws. The Rev. R. R. Swope, Secretary and Treasurer, read the report of the Executive Committee, and made a financial statement. Mr. Thomas referred to the efficient labors of the Rev. Mr. Swope for the Institute. He said the great aim of the organization was to educate the Church up to a better understanding of such work. The Institute approved of the two days set apart by the Church of England Institute in behalf of Sunday-school work. The matters of uniform lessons, leaflets, and helps were discussed.

PHILADELPHIA.—American Church Sunday-school Institute.—The final session was held in the church in the evening, when the rector presided. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. H. L. Duhring and the Rev. W. S. Heaton. Addresses were made on the topic, "What is the Sunday-school for?" by the Rev. B. R. Swope, Mr. George C. Thomas, the Rev. B. W. Maturin, and the Rev. George W. Douglas, of Trinity church, New York City. The sessions were well attended, and much interest was manifested by the earnest discussion participated in by a number of the clergy and laity. In the evening the large church was well filled with Sunday-school workers.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were: President, the Rt. Rev. Wm. Bacon Stevens, D.D., LL.D., of Pennsylvania; Secretary and Treasurer, the Rev. R. R. Swope, of Wheeling, West Virginia; Executive Committee, the Rt. Rev. George Worthington, D.D., of Nebraska, the Rev. J. C. Middleton, D.D., of Long Island, Mr. George C. Thomas, of Pennsylvania, the Rev. George W. Shinn, D.D., of Massachusetts, Mr. Walter Collins, of Ohio, and the Rev. Campbell Fair, of Maryland.

PHILADELPHIA.—Convocation of West Philadelphia.—This convocation met at Trinity church, West Philadelphia, on Tuesday, October 27. The Holy Communion was celebrated at 9 A. M.

At the business meeting in the afternoon, the Secretary and Treasurer, the Rev. Dr. John A. Childs, stated that he had deposited the funds of the convocation in the Philadelphia Safe Deposit and Trust Company. His action was approved. An application was made by St. George's church for missionary aid, and referred to the appropriate committee. A committee was appointed to visit the several missions within the limits of the convocation, and report to a special meeting to be held in St. Mary's church on November 24. St. James' church, Hestonville, was selected as the place of the next stated meeting. The reports of the missionaries were read, showing progress in the work. The following schedule of assessments was presented by the president, and after discussion adopted: St. Mary's, $100; Church of the Saviour, $100; St. Andrew's, $100; Trinity, $75; St. James', Kingessing, $70; Church of the Transfiguration, $50; Calvary Monumental, $50; Church of the Holy Comforter, $25.

A missionary meeting was held in the evening, when Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Gideon J. Burton and the Rev. R. F. Innes. The president, the Rev. C. W. Duane, made an address, in which he explained the object of the meeting. Addresses were also delivered by the Rev. Joseph T. Wright and the Rev. John P. Peters, Ph.D.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Clerical Brotherhood.—That the weekly meetings of the Clerical Brotherhood are productive of much good is very apparent to all the members. The large attendance, averaging between fifty and sixty, shows the interest taken and the earnest discussion of the topics and their practical nature. For two weeks the missionary work of the diocese as carried on by the convocation system has been discussed, and the discussion has brought to light the fact, of which many were already assured, that the missionary work in this diocese had received a new impetus since the last convention, and that many who were indifferent have become earnest workers.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Sunday School Association.—On Monday evening, October 19, this association held a meeting of Sunday-school workers, in connection with the Sunday-school Institute of the Church of England in All Saints' church. Service was said by the Rev. T. William Davidson. The speakers were the Rev. Messrs. H. T. Widdemer, H. R. Phillips, R. N. Thomas, H. L. Duhring, W. H. Graff, and Mr. Lewis H. Redner.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Church Temperance Society.—A map has been prepared by the organizing secretary of this society indicating the number of dram shops in the sixth ward of this city. The population of this ward, in 1880, was 10,000, while the number of voters in 1884 was 2,036. According to the map, the number of drinking saloons is 276, or one to every seven and a half voters. On the other side, the number of churches in this ward is seven, or one to a little more than 290 voters, and the number of school-houses is five. Against the 276 drinking saloons there are thirty-three groceries and sixteen baker shops. In the twenty-third ward, having a population of 25,299, the number of drinking saloons is 159, or one to every 159 of the population, and one to every 32 families. The total number of arrests for nine months had been 511, of which seventy per cent. were for drunkenness.

In view of the evils resulting to individuals, to families and to the community from the unlimited sale of liquor, a circular signed by the bishop and various influential clergymen and laymen was sent out from Philadelphia on October 19, requesting the attendance of representatives of all religious bodies at a conference to be held in the lecture room of the Young Men's Christian Association on Monday, October 26. The object of the conference it was stated, was to consider the nature and extent of the evil in question, and also the remedies.

At this meeting, which met according to announcement, there were about 150 people in attendance. In the absence of the bishop the Rev. Dr. W. N. McVickar took the chair. Mr. R. Graham being introduced to the conference, stated that while the population of Philadelphia was 950,000, the number of liquor saloons was one to every 158 of the population. It was estimated, he said, that the average amount of business done by each saloon was $4,500, the total expenditure in Philadelphia reaching the sum of $27,000,000. This represented 44 per cent. per annum of all the real estate of the city. The total number of arrests for drunkenness and crimes connected therewith was 50 per cent. of the whole, and put upon the community a great burden and expense.

By way of remedy, it was suggested that there should be an improvement in the present law, and that the direct responsibility of granting licenses be thrown upon the excise commissioners and upon the police for a better enforcement of the law. It was moved and seconded that a committee of thirty, representing one for each ward, be appointed, and that they nominate sub-committees who should draft a scheme for the improvement of the liquor laws in Pennsylvania, and seek their better enforcement. It was also voted that on the completion of this work, a mass meeting in the city of Philadelphia be held in the Academy of Music.

BRANTZTOWN.—House of Prayer.—The churchyard of this parish, of which the Rev. George Bringhurst is the rector, was consecrated on St. Simon and Jude's Day by the Assistant-bishop of New York, acting for and by request of the bishop of the diocese. The service was taken part in by the Rev. Drs. Charles D. Cooper, J. Blake Falkner, Theodore S. Rumney, and Samuel E. Appleton. The bishop made an address, and pronounced the sentence of consecration. The singing was led by the surpliced choir of St. Peter's church, Germantown.

The bishop is, at this writing, rapidly recovering from his late severe illness, and hopes shortly to be attending to his duties.

WHITEMARSH.—Convocation.—The Convocation of Montgomery County met at St. Thomas's church, Whitemarsh, (the Rev. H. I. Meigs, rector,) on Thursday, October 15. There were present the Rev. Drs. Isaac Gibson, A. B. Atkins, and J. Andrews Harris, and the Rev. Messrs. R. T. E. Winskill, F. Palmer, T. A. Waterman, G. W. Hodge, H. L. Duhring, and B. W. Maturin. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Isaac Gibson and the Rev. R. T. E. Winskill. After the service a business meeting was held, after which the members, clerical and lay, were entertained at the parish school-house by the ladies of the parish.

At 3 P. M. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Dr. Gibson and the Rev. Mr. Palmer, and missionary addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. J. Andrews Harris, and the Rev. Messrs. G. W. Hodge and H. L. Duhring. The convocation then adjourned, with the Magnificat and benediction.

St. Thomas's church is the oldest of the eleven parishes in Montgomery County. It was established in 1690, and admitted to convocation in 1786. The present church edifice, completed but a few years, is the fourth in succession from the first log building erected for church purposes. It stands on the summit of a large hill, with six acres of land, and a beautiful cemetery containing graves dating back to 1727. The entire design of the church, the quality and finish of the stone and woodwork are unsurpassed by most city or county churches. There is a tower, eighty feet high, at the cathedral corner. The chancel is very spacious (forty feet deep), handsomely tiled, and thoroughly furnished. The triple east window is a beautiful one, representing the Crucifixion. Beneath the window, under a canopy, and on the retable, is a life-size painting, representing our Lord with the disciples at Emmaus.

PITTSBURGH.

SOUTHERN CONVOCATION—Meetings at Rochester and other places.—Rochester, Georgetown, Fairview, New Brighton and Beaver Falls constitute a group of missionary parishes along the Beaver River, within a space of seven miles, with a population of twenty thousand. The convocation held a series of interesting meetings, at which the congregations were large and the music excellent and enthusiastic.

On Tuesday, October 13, at Rochester, the bishop of the diocese preached, and addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. R. A. Benton and George Hodges. On Wednesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, and in the afternoon a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. J. C. White and the Rev. Messrs. John London and H. G. Schorr made addresses. On Thursday a sermon was preached by the Rev. Robert Meech, and addresses made by the Rev. Messrs. A. P. Diller and P. H. Hickman.

At Georgetown, on Tuesday evening, the Rev. W. R. Mackay preached the sermon, and addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. William White and the Rev. Messrs. R. S. Smith and J. P. Norman. On Wednesday there was a celebration of the Holy Communion with a sermon.

At Fairview, on Tuesday, sermons and addresses were delivered by the Rev. A. P. Diller and the Rev. Samuel Maxwell, D. C. Peabody and S. P. Kelly. On Wednesday morning there was a celebration of the Holy Communion and a missionary address by the Rev. S. P. Kelly, general missionary of the diocese, with addresses at night by the bishop and others of the clergy.

At New Brighton, on Tuesday evening, the Rev. Boyd Vincent preached, and the Rev. Messrs. S. D. Day, A. De R. Meares and H. G. Schorr made addresses. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion on Wednesday morning, and in the evening addresses from the Rev. Messrs. F. H. Hickman, Frederick Thompson and W. R. Mackay. On Thursday the bishop advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. P. H. Hickman and James B. Williams, the Rev. H. G. Wood preaching the ordination sermon. In the evening the Rev. D. C. Peabody made an address on the "Ministry as a Distinctive Feature of the Anglican Church"; the Rev. J. A. Brown spoke of the Liturgy as another distinctive feature, and the Rev. S. Maxwell of the Sacraments as a third.

At Beaver Falls, on Tuesday, the addresses were by the Rev. Messrs. P. H. Hickman, W. W. Wilson, DeWitt C. Byllesby and W. H. Wilson, and the sermon by the Rev. E. A. Angell. On Wednesday there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, with sermon by the Rev. W. H. Wilson. In the evening the distinctive features of the Church were also discussed, the Rev. W. W. Wilson speaking on the Ministry, the Rev. Boyd Vincent on the Liturgy, and the Rev. A. P. Diller on the Sacraments. On Thursday evening the last meeting of the series was held, when the subject of Missions was discussed, the Rev. Dr. J. C. White speaking on Foreign Missions, the Rev. Marison Byllesby on Domestic Missions, and the Rev. S. P. Kelly on Diocesan Missions.

DELAWARE.

BRANDYWINE HUNDRED—Calvary Church Mission.—This church (the Rev. P. B. Lightner, rector) was re-opened on Thursday, October 15. Morning Prayer was said at 11 o'clock, when there were seventeen surpliced clergymen in the chancel and numerous friends from near and far in the congregation. The administration of Holy Baptism to an infant was recognized by all as a most significant and touching event. The rector made a statement of the work which had been done, and read quite a list of memorials, &c., which had been placed in the church. On behalf of the old rectors present, the Rev. Messrs. S. F. Hotchkiss and Z. K. Murphy made addresses. Other addresses were made, and the bishop concluded in a bappy congratulatory vein. The offerings were devoted to diocesan missions. A lunch was served under a canopy, after which ivy and other vines were planted around the church by the ladies.

The repairs and improvements upon this old church have followed upon three years of patient and silent preparation. They have been so nobly sustained by the people of Calvary themselves, and have enlisted the readiest interest of so wide a circle of friends, that they have been carried out in a most gratifying and admirable manner.

MARYLAND.

ALL FAITH PARISH, ST. MARY'S COUNTY—St. Mary's Chapel.—The bishop of the diocese visited St. Mary's, a colored chapel of this parish, on Friday, October 14, and confirmed twenty-three persons. Thirty-five was the original number of candidates, but twelve were prevented from being present. The chapel seats about two hundred, and every available space was occupied, many crowding outside at the door and windows. The chapel has no organ, yet the services were spirited and impressive. The bishop firmly held the attention of the congregation while he set forth forcibly and plainly what it is to be a Christian. There were present and officiating the Rev. Messrs. J. H. Chesley, G. B. Cooke, L. Sotheron, and J. G. Bryant.

This chapel was built mainly through the energy and zeal of the Rev. J. G. Bryant. It is making marked progress, and, it is hoped, within a few years, will have a large and flourishing congregation. At present there is a congregation of two hundred and fifty persons, with eighty-three communicants.

The Rev. Giles B. Cooke has recently taken charge of this parish, and is deeply interested in the chapel. He has a rare and valuable experience in colored work.

The Sunday school recently purchased a very beautiful and costly communion service for the chapel. A parochial school will soon be opened.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Incarnation.—Designs for the sixth memorial window have been procured from Munich, for this church. The window will cost a little less than $800, and will be in memory of the late Israel Dille and his widow, two aged communicants of the Church, the former the first senior warden of this parish. It represents the Presentation, Anna, the aged widow in the foreground, and Simeon in the background holding in his arms the infant Saviour. The fourth memorial window, known as the Gilmore window, is very handsome, and represents King David surrounded by his singers. "In Memoriam, Henry and Ellis," is on the scroll. By the side of the American window, placed some six years ago, the latter suffers none in comparison—a merited tribute to the genius of our own land. The records for this church, now being carved and painted by the Rev. Mr. Oertel, is progressing finely.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. John's Chapel.—On Saturday, October 3, a new bell was dedicated in this chapel of St. John's parish (the Rev. Dr. W. A. Leonard, rector), with an appropriate service. In the absence of the rector, on account of illness, the service of benediction was conducted by the Rev. F. B. Reazor, the assistant in charge, assisted by the Rev. J. W. Clark. There were also present the Rev. Drs. I. L. Townsend and J. A. Harold, and the Rev. Messrs. J. W. Phillips, G. Shackelford, and J. M. E. McKee. Immediately after the service the bell was hoisted to its place in the new brick belfry; and, after the mounting, it was rung for the first time by the priest in charge. The bell is from the Clinton H. Menely Bell Company's Foundry, in Troy, N. Y., and weighs 1,029 pounds. It bears the following inscription:

"St. John's Chapel, Washington, D. C., 1885.
"I sweetly tolling, men do call "To take the meat, men do call."
The inscription is from the oldest bell in the chime of Chester Cathedral of 1604.

WOODVILLE—St. Paul's Church.—The chapel of this parish (the Rev. C. I. La Roche, rector) has been given a handsome chancel window in memory of the late rector, the Rev. Dr. Alexander Marbury.

ACCAKEEK—St. John's Parish.—This parish, lying partly in Charles and partly in Prince George's Counties, has been vacant since the death of the lamented Rev. John Towles. The Rev. Dr. W. L. Hyland has been elected to fill the vacancy.

VIRGINIA.

ALEXANDRIA—Theological Seminary.—Some years ago a Churchman, both by name and otherwise, devised $15,000 to the Virginia Society for the Education of Young Men for the Ministry. An apparent informality caused the will to be set aside by a lower court, but since then, on appeal, the decision of this court was reversed, and the society expects soon to be in possession of the amount.

GEORGIA.

CEDARTOWN—Episcopal Visitation.—On St. Luke's Day, October 15, the bishop of the diocese visited the missionary station at Cedartown, Polk County. At 9 A. M. the missionary (the Rev. H. K. Rees) baptized three adults, and at 11 A. M. he presented seven to the bishop for confirmation. The bishop did not preach, but made an address to the candidates and congregation. At 4 P. M. the bishop consecrated the church building, now fully completed, through the untiring energy of a handful of Church people, and preached the sermon.

MISSISSIPPI.

PASS CHRISTIAN—Diocesan Female Seminary.—On Tuesday, October 20, the Diocesan Female Seminary of Mississippi was opened at this place, the assistant-bishop delivering the opening address. This school is under the care of the Rev. H. C. Mayer, rector of Trinity church, Pass Christian. Mr. Mayer is ably assisted by Mrs. Kells of Natchez, who was, for several years, principal of a flourishing school at Sewanee Mountain, Tenn. The Rev. Mr. R. G. Hinsdale, some time president of Hobart College, is lecturer on Theology and Belles-lettres, and all other branches are taught by competent teachers and professors. In the commodious school building every attention has been paid to comfort and hygiene, and in the spacious grounds, the amusement and recreation of the scholars has evidently been considered. A more appropriate site for a school could hardly have been selected than here on the shore of the Gulf of Mexico—too far south to suffer the rigors of a northern winter, and too far north for the languor of a tropical climate.

TENNESSEE.

FAYETTEVILLE—St. Mary Magdalen's Church.—A mission has lately been held in this parish (the Rev. W. G. C. Thompson in charge), which has done much good to the church and the community at large. The Rev. G. W. Dumbell had promised in June last to conduct the mission, but at the last moment he was taken so ill that it was impossible for him to undertake it. A letter was therefore sent to the Rev. C. H. De Garmo, of Toledo, Ohio, who immediately started for Fayetteville to take the work in hand. He arrived on Saturday, October 4, the day on which the opening of the mission was set, and at night, after a few words of welcome from the priest in charge, received the stole from his hands with a blessing on his work.

The church was filled to overflowing during the whole week, the daily early Eucharist being admirably attended. The services were as follows: Sundays—early celebration at 7 A. M.; Litany and address to children at 9 A. M.; second celebration (choral) and sermon at 11 A. M.; prayer and services for men only, at 3 P. M.; mission services and after meeting at 7 P. M. Week-days—early celebration at 6:45 A. M.; matins and plain talk at 10:30 A. M.; prayer meeting and Eten song at 3 P. M.; mission service and after meeting at night. There were services for women only on Thursday at 3 P. M.; for colored people only on Friday at 3 P. M., and for children only at 3 P. M. The missioner's box at the door, for questions concerning the Church and requests for prayer, was always well filled, the requests being read out daily at the 3 P. M. prayer meeting, and the questions answered at the mission service at night.

On Sunday night, October 11, the church was crowded to overflowing, standing room, up to the chancel steps, being wholly occupied. On Monday night, the closing of the mission, the church was again filled, and there was hardly a dry eye as the missioner gave his farewell address. A solemn Te Deum, as a Thanksgiving, was then sung, after which the missioner requested all who had received good from the mission to come forward to the chancel steps and receive a card as a memorial of the mission, with a blessing from the missioner. Fully one hundred and fifty men and women came forward, most with tearful eyes, to receive the memorial and blessing. The mission was then declared closed after the benediction, many remaining to see the missioner in private. This account can not be closed without referring to the efficiency and willingness of the organist, the Rev. Rowland Hale, whose services in that position were indispensable.

The good done by this mission in a town where prejudice against the Church is rife, cannot be estimated.

CEDAR HILL—Convocation.—The Convocation of Nashville met at Cedar Hill on Tuesday, October 30. There was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist by the dean, the Rev. W. C. Gray, assisted by the Rev. Herbert Graben, the Rev. T. F. Martin being the preacher. After the celebration the convocation met for business. Services were also held at Ross View, Montgomery County. The services at Cedar Hill, which were continued until Thursday night, were well attended, and a gratifying interest was exhibited. The people being unfamiliar with the services, the responses were somewhat weak, but all joined heartily in the hymns. It is rather a new departure for this convocation to make its meeting a missionary one; but it is regarded as encouraging. While in session, the convocation received fraternal greetings from the Convocation of Knoxville, in session at Cleveland.

OHIO.

YOUNGSTOWN—Consecration of St. James's Church, Springdale.—The bishop of the diocese consecrated this church on Tuesday, October 30. There was a large number of clergy and laity present. The instruments of donation were presented to the bishop by the rector of the parish (the Rev. F. B. Avery). These included the original deed of the lot, the subscription to the building fund, all paid in, and a full list of the furniture. The sentence of consecration was read by an appointed presbyter. The Rev. R. W. Grange preached the sermon. St. James's began as a mission of St. John's parish about two years ago. It is the result of Sunday-school work started in Smoky Hollow, at the suggestion of Messrs. H. O. Bonnell and J. L. Botsford. Over seventy-five children and adults have been baptized and twenty-two confirmed. The church, with its furniture, cost over $2,000, and is very handsome. The altar, bishop's chair, and clergy-stalls are of solid cherry, highly polished.

During the service, after the offertory, the bishop advanced to the chancel and addressed the children. He was very much affected as he spoke to them of their part in divine worship, and soon after, while endeavoring to speak of the self-sacrifice of not only St. John's, but also of some at St. James's, in their efforts to complete the beautiful house of worship, he was completely overcome, and could only say: "I cannot tell you all that is in my heart. My tears are tears of joy and sympathy. You must take these as the expression of what I would say to you."

YOUNGSTOWN—Convocation.—The annual meeting of the Northeast Convocation was held in St. John's church, Youngstown. The Rev. F. B. Avery was elected dean, the Rev. Dr. R. L. Ganter, secretary, and Mr. C. Parrows, treasurer. An essay on pastoral work was read by the Rev. W. G. Stoner, and the general missionary, the Rev. A. B. Nicholas, made an interesting address on Sunday-schools and mission work.

QUINCY.

QUINCY—Death of Mrs. E. J. Parker.—Mrs. Helen B. Parker, wife of Mr. E. J. Parker of Quincy, died in Quincy, on Wednesday, Oct. 14, aged forty-four years. Mrs. Parker was a prominent Churchwoman, and one of the founders of the Church of the Good Shepherd in Quincy, under the care of the rector of which (the Rev. Dr. W. B. Corbyn) she had passed many of her early years. In that parish she was identified with every movement, and always took a part in every benevolent act. Her loss will be felt deeply both by the church and a large circle of friends. The funeral took place on Saturday, Oct. 17, the services being held at the Church of the Good Shepherd, conducted by the Rev. Dr. W. B. Corbyn, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. William Bardene, E. A. Larrabee, and A. Q. Davin.

On Sunday, Oct. 18, the Rev. Dr. Corbyn delivered a memorial discourse in the Church of the Good Shepherd.

WISCONSIN.

NASHOTAH—Circular of the Bishops.—The Bishops of Wisconsin and Fond du Lac have issued the following circular:

To the Friends of Nashotah:

The death of the Rev. Dr. Cole, President of Nashotah House, who for many years has presented its work and necessities to the Church, devolves upon the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees the duty of caring for the interests of the institution until a meeting of the corporation can be summoned. They have appointed, therefore, the senior professor, the Rev. William Adams, D. D., president and treasurer, pro tem, and the Rev. Prof. Riley, pastor, pro tem. They earnestly request the friends of Nashotah to continue the steady support granted so generously to this important school, and to send their offerings and communications to the Rev. Dr. Adams, Nashotah. Until the mind of the trustees can be ascertained, the work of the House will be maintained on the same basis and by the same modes as during the administration of its late honored head.

Until sufficient endowments are provided, the maintenance of the House must rest upon the piety and love of the faithful.

This year a larger number of students was admitted than for several years past.

The Executive Committee ask that the sorrow that has come to the House may not be deepened by any forgetfulness of its deeds by those who through good report and evil report have enabled it to send into the fields ready for the harvest, workmen of whom the Church has reason to be thankful and proud.

E. R. WELLES, Bishop of Wisconsin,
J. H. HOBART BROWN, Bishop of Fond du Lac.

MINNESOTA.

MINNEAPOLIS—Gethsemane Church.—The brotherhood of this parish (the Rev. A. R. Graves, rector), reports progressive work done at the Mount Calvary mission. Two hundred dollars has been subscribed; services are regularly held in Avery Hall. In the last two years 119 families have been added to the parish, and 49 lost; 82 persons have been baptized, and 55 confirmed; 137 communicants added; pledges, $6,500.

COLORADO.

VILLA GROVE—St. James's Church.—The missionary bishop visited this parish (the Rev. W. Worthington in charge) on Sunday, October 11. The missionary has been here a little over two months. The church is free from debt, owing to the earnest and persevering work of the ladies of St. James's Guild. The building is of wood. The interior, though not fully completed, is comfortable and exceedingly neat. The church was prettily decorated with flowers on the occasion of the bishop's visitation. A good-sized congregation listened attentively to an eloquent discourse from Ephesians iv. 30.

BONANZA—Mission.—This is a mining town, situated eighteen miles from Villa Grove, over a mountainous road, and an acre of about two thousand feet. There is no church here, but services are held in a vacant store tent for the purpose. A few chairs brought in from the hotel are arranged in front; behind these and along the sides of the room are rude benches made by boards resting on boxes. About seventy people were present when services began, well filling the room. Curious glances were cast on the bishop as he put on his robes. The services being unknown to the majority of the people, the bishop, before beginning, made a few explanatory remarks. Though the appliances for service were so simple and insufficient, the scene was an interesting one. The congregation, mainly miners, listened eagerly to the sermon, and one of their number was confirmed. There was an early celebration the next morning. Services here are held once a month, and are well attended; but it is doubtful whether the missionary will be able to get through the narrow mountain passes during the winter, owing to the heavy snow falls at this altitude.

SAGUACHE—Church of the Incarnation.—A ride of about thirty miles on the old "Ute Trail" brought the bishop and missionary to Saguache, the county seat. The ascent and descent over this road are so abrupt as to make the road a marvel. The scenery is wild and grand. Services were held in the old Presbyterian place of worship, long disused, and kindly loaned. The Church people are few but earnest, and it is hoped that the work here will soon show signs of increase.

OREGON.

ROSEBURG—St. George's Church.—An urgent appeal for financial assistance is made for the mission at Roseburg, which is so far from the missionary's home—80 miles—that he necessarily has to spend some days there to effect any good. To pay hotel bills out of his small stipend is out of the question, and Roseburg has always been backward to render hospitality to either bishop or clergy. The consequence is, the missionary has to occupy a room back of the church, which he may well call his den. It was formerly a horse shed, and is too miserable and beggarly for adequate description. Suffice it to say that it is still approached by means of an inclined plane, over which horses passed for years, and is still entered by two rough board doors. It is open to the weather above, below, and on all sides; and, with the stove-pipe running through the side, and the building literally black with age, presents a most unightly appearance. Here the missionary stays when at this end of his missionary field, which is not helpful to the interests of the Church. Inasmuch as winter is approaching, and it is not a safe place to occupy, an appeal for help is made, and it is hoped that, for the love of Christ and in His Name, some generous-hearted Christian people will send the means to render this building habitable. Speaking of this building, Bishop Morris, in his diocesan paper for June of this year, says: "Rev. Mr. Parker has charge of this place and at Oakland, in connection with his parish at Eugene City. We have here a beautiful lot, a small church, and a rough, unfinished building, formerly used as a horse shed, which Mr. Parker uses to sleep in when visiting this mission. A gift of seventy-five or one hundred dollars would make this building a comfortable house for the missionary; but in its present condition it is neither a fit nor a safe place for a man to stay in during the cold and wet seasons of the year. Mr. Parker is a very energetic and earnest worker, and has done much with his own hands in the way of repairing and improving the Church property. Any aid that he may receive will be wisely employed."

Offerings for this object may be sent to the bishop, or the Rev. O. Parker, Eugene City, Oregon.—Columbia Churchman.

THE REV. JOHN MURRAY FORBES, D. D.

As the member of the Wardens and Vestrymen of St. Luke's church, New York City, held this 18th day of October, 1885, the following minute was ordered to be placed on the records of the parish:

MINUTE.

The vestry has learned with profound sorrow the death of the Rev. JOHN MURRAY FORBES, n. c., who died at Elizabeth, N. J., on October 11, 1885, at the advanced age of 73 years.

His eventful ministry covered a period of half a century. For fifteen years he was the faithful and revered Rector of St. Luke's parish, having been called to its rectorship August 5, 1841. On the 24th of October, 1859, his resignation of this charge was accepted by the vestry and soon after he was admitted to the Roman obedience. On his renunciation of the Church of Rome, where he served for ten years, His serene and reverent father, who was his former parish, St. Luke's, and retained the connection nominally till his death. His serene and reverent father, who was his former parish, St. Luke's, and retained the connection nominally till his death. His serene and reverent father, who was his former parish, St. Luke's, and retained the connection nominally till his death.

His serene and reverent father, who was his former parish, St. Luke's, and retained the connection nominally till his death. His serene and reverent father, who was his former parish, St. Luke's, and retained the connection nominally till his death.

Ordered that a copy of this minute be sent to the family of the deceased, with the assurance of sympathy of the Rector, Wardens, and Vestrymen, and that it also be inserted in the New York Churchman.

A. L. McDONALD, Clerk of Vestry.

ELLAN BLANCHARD FOUQUET.

At Pittsburgh, N. Y., September 21, 1885, ELLEN BLANCHARD FOUQUET, died at the age of 84 years.

The autumn days of 1885 have nearly passed away since this dear child of the Church entered on her rest; but "A Sabbath's rest" seems a fitting time to record the departure of one whose life (devoted to the Church she loved), was a life of unselfish assistance to others, surrounded by physical suffering, which was dependent on her love and care, she yet found time to garner from her saintly rest, peace, but "A Sabbath's rest" seems a fitting time to those she loved, while preparing herself for eternity.

To those serene, the Church, and the guild (where suffering ones find comfort), will all cherish her memory in words she loved so well, "I sleep, but my heart waketh."—All Saints', 1885.

WILLIAM CLEVELAND HICKS.

At a meeting held at Calvary church, Summit, N. J., October 25, 1885, the Bishop of the diocese presiding, the undersigned were appointed a committee to prepare for publication a minute commemorative of the late WILLIAM CLEVELAND HICKS, as follows:

A deputy to the General Convention, a member of the Board of Missions of the diocese, a deputy to its annual conventions, a warden for many years of the diocese, and a devoted and energetic member of a consecrated apostle.

The son of a persecuted and honored preacher of the diocese, he was a devoted and energetic member of a consecrated apostle. He was a Churchman by birth and education, and through life the claims of the Church upon his time and his talents were cheerfully and thankfully recognized.

We recall his stirring missionary addresses, his active and intelligent interest in the warfare of the diocese since its formation, his generous liberality, his ready sympathy and personal co-operation with his bishops in the work of the Church, and feel that death has removed one from our midst whose place will not soon be filled.

The presence of two bishops at his funeral and the large attendance of clergy and laity testified to the hold which he had upon the affections of those who knew him best in the diocese. He was a "Not without in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," his life and stamp, entire him to an honorable place on the roll of the Church's faithful men.

THE REV. DR. COLS.

Since it has pleased our Heavenly Father to grant rest unto our loved and faithful brother, who for many years the President and Rector of our Alma Mater, we pray Him to grant us grace ever to follow his saintly example, and to be ever ready to do his unwearied toil for Christ and His Church.

May divine consolation shade the sorrow of his affliction, and may he rest in peace, and may he be comforted with the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

APPEALS.

GENERAL CLERGY RELIEF FUND.

It was the hope of the Board of Trustees of this fund, that the wide-spread benevolence manifested in reports to the General Convention and in other ways, there would be no necessity for further special appeals. It is, however, the duty of members of the Executive Committee, grievous to say has not been realized. To meet our payments, due October 1, we need two thousand dollars more than is now in the treasury.

This fund, as has been repeatedly mentioned, is the only provision of the kind in the Church which is without any restriction of diocesan limits or condition of previous payment of dues and premiums. Hence, throughout our wide missionary field, in many of the weaker dioceses, it is the only organization to which the worn-out laborer, the widow, and the fatherless can look for relief. It is to those who, in obedience to the call of the Church, and moved by a loving, anxious spirit, goes forth to his necessities, that we need the aid of the Church. It is to those who, in obedience to the call of the Church, and moved by a loving, anxious spirit, goes forth to his necessities, that we need the aid of the Church. It is to those who, in obedience to the call of the Church, and moved by a loving, anxious spirit, goes forth to his necessities, that we need the aid of the Church.

It is to those who, in obedience to the call of the Church, and moved by a loving, anxious spirit, goes forth to his necessities, that we need the aid of the Church. It is to those who, in obedience to the call of the Church, and moved by a loving, anxious spirit, goes forth to his necessities, that we need the aid of the Church.

In conclusion, we beg leave to add that the management of this trust is gratuitous, and that every dollar given goes to spread the board, long live the Rev. and Hon. Wm. A. Smith, Treasurer, 28 Wall street, New York.

September, 1885.

An appeal is made for aid in erecting small chapels and preaching-stations in the Savannah Congregation, Diocese of Georgia. With four clergy who are stationed in the same, some colored, but our funds are exhausted when the stipends of the missionaries are paid, and buildings are so small that it is impossible to do more. We need to erect some fourteen chapels, costing in all six thousand dollars, half or more of which can be raised on the spot. For the three thousand, $1,000, we need the least twenty five hundred dollars additional, we must look outside, and if the help is not forthcoming, we are obliged to appeal. All contributions will be received with much gratitude by

Rev. ANNON DODGE, Jr.,
114 N. 10th St., Savannah, Ga.

The work in which the Rev. Mr. DODGE and his associates are engaged in Southern and Southwest Georgia has not yet appeared, and the many friends of the Church will extend to him such aid as may be in their power.

J. W. BECKWITH.

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.
The theological department of the University of the South, dependent upon the offerings of the Church, now makes its semi-annual appeal to those who would aid in the extension of the kingdom of God on earth and in the hearts of men. The post-graduate department of the university was never so prosperous, and is now self-supporting. But the theological department, with its students and students, has no support beyond that which Church people may be disposed to give. Contributions may be sent to

The Rev. TELFAIR HODGSON, D. D.,
Secretary, Tenn. Vice Chancellor.

NABOTHAN MISSION.
It has not pleased the Lord to endow Nabothan. The great and good work entrusted to her requires, as in times past, the offerings of His people. Offerings are solicited:

1st. Because Nabothan is the oldest theological seminary north and west of the Ohio R. Co. 2d. Because the instruction is second to none in the land. 3d. Because it is the most healthfully situated seminary. 4th. Because it is the best located for study. 5th. Because everything given is applied directly to the work of preparing candidates for ordination.

Address, N. H. A. K. A. D. D., Nabothan, Waukesha County, Wisconsin.

I HAVE for sale, in aid of the Building Fund of Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, Florida, some of the choice land of Alachua Co., twenty acres, well cleared, $100; ten acre lots, cleared, $100; ten acre lots, cleared and improved, from $200 to $600. The titles are all perfect. The land is high and dry, Alachua County is now the most populous in the State, and it is given respectability to the entire county, raises more oranges than any county, save one, and more vegetables than all others. High and healthy midland location. Gainesville, the county seat and railroad center. For information, maps, &c., address, F. B. DUNHAM, Gainesville, Fla.

SAFE PARLOR, PENNA. MISSION.
This mission will be most grateful to any church now changing its pews and chancel furniture for sufficient of the same to furnish a chapel.

EFFORTS TO REACH LONDON MASSES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

At the present time the following facts may be of interest to your readers: Previous to the Great Praelim Mission, held in 248 of the largest of the London churches, St. Paul's Cathedral on one occasion, and Westminster Abbey on the other, lay workers visited again and again every family in each parish, and urged them to "come to the mission." In view of the multitudes likely to be confined to their homes through poverty and family cares, devoted ladies arranged to take charge of babies and young children, to enable their mothers to attend the mission services. For the accommodation of working men, special services were held early in the morning, and for domestic servants in the afternoon. Services for children were held before dark in school-rooms and in hired halls, and in some churches ten different services were held daily.

As the mission was "of all sorts and conditions of men," in some localities the multitudes in the streets were notified of the different services by the street crier, who, by ringing his large hand-bell, soon gathered a multitude around him, to whom he gave notice concerning the mission in an adjacent church, or other region of the street. After passing after street, and after singing a hymn, which induced the inmates of houses on each side to open their doors and windows to listen, one of the singers gave notice of the services, and exhorted them to "come to the mission." In front of some churches, committees of ladies invited those passing to enter the church and hear the gospel. Through such efforts, in addition to announcements made through notices in newspapers, on mission posts, handbills, large placards, and pastoral letters, churches were crowded.

As all human efforts would be in vain without the Divine blessing, before the mission commenced numerous persons who volunteered to devote a specified number of minutes of a certain hour of each day or night praying for the mission, were furnished with a printed prayer, imploring God the Holy Ghost to aid the missionary, and God's blessing on the different classes specified on the perpetual prayer card or leaflet. That there might be no failure through sickness or other causes, a large number of Christians arranged to offer the "perpetual prayer" at the same selected time of one of the twenty-four hours of each day. So that, during every moment of the ten days, specific and earnest prayer ascended to Him who said, "Ask, and ye shall receive," that His blessing rest on the missionaries and mission.

NICENE THEOLOGY—NICENE RITUAL.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The following extract from Bishop Cox's last charge suggests a question or two: "Our profession is to adhere to the pure threskita of the virgin age of the Church. Theirs (the alien and meretricious system which calls itself Catholic) is the attire of the Marozias and courtesans, and as he wears himself, who gave the Papacy its monstrous birth. When men's minds are turned upon the contrast, let them say, 'Here is the religion of the fathers and of the Nicene age, and there is the corruption of feudalism and of the ages that were dark.'"

The question here in, is not the good bishop commending the theology of the Nicene age with its ritual? He writes as if, because the Anglican Church goes to the Nicene age for her theology, she derived her ritual thence likewise, that is to say, her ritual as he advocates it, the plain surplice and funeral stoles for presbyters, and the "magpie" costume for bishops, such as he wears himself, but as like of which I will undertake to say was never found enrobing a bishop of the Nicene age. Some of the clergy of the diocese of Western New York might well ask their right reverend father to give them some light as to what was the vesture or vestments of the clergy in the Nicene age, and is it such that the Church of England prescribes her use at the Reformation? A casula was worn in Church services by S. Remigius in the year 500 A. D. Such a vestment at that early age being in use in the Gallican Church, would the bishop have us then believe that it was of the age and place that gave the Papacy its monstrous birth? And such a vestment being prescribed in the first prayer book of Edward VI., and referred to in the canons of Elizabeth, would he consider that a corruption of the pure threskita of the Nicene age, or a relic of "the ages that were dark"? It occurs to me to say that Bishop Cox would have hardly spoken thus when he penned his lay of all of which were reared in the ages, so-called dark.

"The abbey and the arches,
The old cathedral pines,"

AN UNMERITED DISTINCTION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Some inaccurate journalist having set in motion a paragraph to the effect that Grace Church had been an extended work of evangelization among the Chinese of this city, I have been made the recipient of various communications upon the subject, some of them the reverse of edifying.

A physician in a neighboring state writes at great length of his professional experience in the treatment of leprosy, and takes it for granted that a lazaretto will be established in connection with the mission. A praiseworthy, signing himself "Lion of Judah and Shiloh," but resident in California, asks, on a postal card, "Why do you want to assimilate the Chinese!" while this morning's mail brings me a copy of The Santa Rosa Day Book, in which the greater part of a column is devoted to proving that had I given some study to Chinese character, and some thought to the fact that "years and years of missionary labor have been virtually thrown away upon those Chinese people in their own country," I should have known better than to attempt the impossible.

My only regret, Mr. Editor, with respect to these remarks, is that I have done nothing to deserve them. The Chinese Missions in New York have my hearty admiration, and the particular plan with which my name has become erroneously connected, appears to me to bear the marks of far-seeing wisdom. I wish I were engaged in this work, the very suggestion of which seems to disturb the mental balance of our friends on the Pacific coast, but, as a matter of fact, I am not; and a credit which I should count it honorable to deserve, I must in honesty disclaim.

NEW BOOKS.

THE LIGHT OF ASIA AND THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD: A Comparison of the Legend, the Doctrine, the Ethics of the Buddha; with the Story, the Doctrine, and the Ethics of Christ. By S. H. Kellogg, D.D., Professor in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., U.S.A.; eleven years Missionary to India; Corresponding Member of the American Oriental Society; Author of Grammar of the Hindi Language and Dialects, &c. (London: Macmillan & Co.) pp. 300, Price $2.

Dr. Kellogg has done a noble work in this volume, which is not expanded beyond the inevitable requirements of its topic. We do not well see where he could have condensed it, though we should like, for the sake of larger circulation, to see the arguments in a form which would bring it to the reach of those who have been, or are likely to be, misled by Mr. Edwin Arnold's brilliant poetry, and the loose statements of ad captivum critics.

The scope of the book is briefly this. He first shows the great uncertainty of the legend concerning Gautama, and the real doubt as to the antiquity claimed for Buddhism as it is now known. He shows, in a very fair and guarded way, the strong presumption that much which is claimed in it as the original of Christianity is in fact the gift of Christianity to Buddhism. Again he shows that the pretended points of similarity are either superficially like and essentially unlike, or are merely the like product of like circumstances, and that only poetical exaggeration has given them the form of resemblance. He shows also that much which is claimed for the Asiatic faith is because of the use of English words in translating East India words, as, for instance, "sin," "holiness," "righteousness," etc., where the sense of the original and the version is altogether unlike. He proves that nothing can be more misleading than this translation, and he does this by taking up the fundamental ideas of Buddhism, and showing the manifest atheism upon which all its philosophy is based. To seek holiness in the Christian sense is quite another thought than it is in the Asiatic. To preserve purity in the latter bears hardly any kinship with the same in the former.

We are sure that no candid reader can rise from the study of Dr. Kellogg's book without being satisfied that the claim set up for Buddhism is vastly in advance of any justifying state of facts. The argument drawn from the real unlikeness and fancied identity of religious phraseology is very convincing to any one who has ever studied language. Take the term "a religious life," as understood in the continental languages of Europe, and as it is usually employed in English, and one will get some notion of this kind of difference. We also specially commend to the reader's attention the way in which Dr. Kellogg disposes of the resemblances between the legend of Gautama and the story of the Gospels. These are the more important because the antiquity of the former is said to be shown by Scriptures, which go back to a date before the Christian era. All that can really be made out is, that certain figures which are supposed to represent a Buddhist legend are extant, and that that legend is supposed to prefigure the presentation of Christ in the Temple. For that order of mind which jumps at any conclusion, provided there is the smallest starting-point, this may be attractive. The famous comparison of Henry V. with Alexander, by Fluellen, is a case in point. "Macedon and Mowmouth both begin with M, and there is a river in both." But the careful sifting of Dr. Kellogg makes complete wreck of much of the fine theory of the critics. Whatever of coincidence there is is proved to be no more than the fact that like circumstances produce like actions. David cuts off the head of Goliath with a sword, and presents it to his Master, but no one ever supposed that this was the origin of the story of the martyrdom of St. John Baptist.

But perhaps the greatest care should be given to the chapter on Buddhist and Christian ethics. There is no need to deny that there are the same acts pointed out to be abstained from in the one as in the other. But examination shows that in the first place there is a radical distinction in the matter of motive, and in the next place in the real scope of prohibition. The two great ethical precepts—Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery—appear identical. But the Christian command is founded on a Divinely given Law, and the Buddhist simply on the principle of reaching the painless state, of attaining Nirvana. Again the Christian law forbids man slaying, the Buddhist forbids all taking of life, which modern science shows is impossible since even a draught of pure water destroys animate existences. The Buddhist prohibition of adultery extends to all relation between the sexes, and is founded on the same principle as given above, viz.: that the family life is the source of pain. Moreover, so far as the likeness between Mosaic and Buddhist law is shown, that proves nothing, since the latter is clearly posterior to the former and may be very fairly presumed to have sprung from the teachings of the Jewish Dispersion, or from the primal revelations in the patriarchal Covenant. In one point only do we think that Dr. Kellogg might have gone further. In treating of the presentation in the Temple, a German advocate of the resemblance theory, contends that it does not fall naturally into the Gospel story, but is forced and therefore likely to be borrowed from the Buddhist legend. Dr. Kellogg overlooks, or passes by the fact that St. Luke's is the Gospel of the Incarnation and therefore records the two appearances of Jesus in the Temple—as Infant and as Lad of twelve, because the Temple was (as the Lord makes it Himself in His words to the Scribes) the Type of Himself. St. Luke mentions it with a purpose—and therefore the idea of borrowing becomes preposterous. But when there is so much that is admirable we are not disposed to find fault. In concluding this notice we can say that whatever the merits of Mr. Edwin Arnold's poem, as a poem, it is utterly disposed of as a true unfolding of an Asiatic religion. Its beauty is a borrowed beauty from the Christianity it professes to rival. The "Light" of Asia is, so far as it is light, reflected.

THE NEWTON LECTURES FOR 1885. The Hebrew Feasts in their relation to recent Critical Hypotheses concerning the Pentateuch. By William Henry Green, Professor in Princeton Theological Seminary. (New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.) pp. 870. Price $1.50.

The recent "Critical Hypotheses" are those of Reuss, Wellhausen, and Kneener, and they uphold the position that the books of the Pentateuch originated in times after the exile. These Professor Green first states, and then disposes of in a masterly manner. The German argument is that, first, the five books were not the work of Moses; next, that they were combined out of two sources, Jehovistic and Elohist; and lastly, that they were reconstructed by an editor, say Ezra, in the interest of a later developed priestly system. To show this, there are alleged in the Mosaic accounts of the Hebrew feasts—viz., Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles—discrepancies and contradictions; and, moreover, it is argued they are inconsistent with Hebrew history. With all this Professor Green deals in the most trenchant way. He shows the recklessness of the German criticism, its inherent viciousness of arguing in a circle, of assuming any proposition it finds convenient and ignoring any facts which do not square with its hypothesis. We are particularly pleased with the way in which he disposes of the argument from the "general consent of the new critics." That general consent amounts to this—a determination to be rid of the supernatural element—and therefore the critics are compelled to one line of argument. Just so the false witnesses at our Lord's trial showed a "general consent" in accusing Him of blasphemy against the Temple. "But neither so did their witness agree together." These criticisms are mutually destructive. They prove nothing save the critics' determination, coute que coute, to be rid of the Pentateuch as true Scripture, and this the lecturer employs with great skill against them. The point is taken by them that the feasts were merely the natural outcome of an agricultural people, and belonged to a harvest system, so to speak, which the Hebrews brought with them out of Egypt; which they learned of the Canaanites after they settled in Palestine; which they developed themselves (more Germanico) out of their own inner consciousness. The history of the Exodus, and whatever else is found in the Hebrew annals bearing on the subject, is inverted to account for the subsequent character of national and ritual observances which these feasts took on after the Exodus.

These admirable lectures do not rest content with superficial answers to this criticism. Just where it is supposed to be strongest, in philology, he meets and disposes of their argument. It is one thing to know facts about language, and quite another to reason fairly from these facts. It is in the power of weighing evidence that the German is apt to fail. He is the slave of his theory, and woe be to the facts if they get in his way.

We have read, we may say studied, these lectures with great satisfaction. There is something in the historical visions of a German critic which fascinates while it repels, and there is an air of omniscient and exhaustive learning about him which awes the ordinary reader. It is something to have the critic met on his own ground, and this we can fairly say of Professor Green, that he has not left a point unmaneuvered or answered inadequately. The whole German reasoning resolves itself into this: The Old Testament is not true because it cannot be true; it cannot be true because it is not true. Any hypothesis is good enough to account for existing documents, provided it be not the hypothesis that they are what they profess to be. It is with no little pleasure that we notice this volume.

If the "Newton lectures," of which this is the first one published, continue to be as good, they will be a most valuable addition to the theology of the country.

MOVEMENTS IN RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN BRITAIN DURING THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. St. Giles Lectures. By John Tulloch, D.D., LL.D., Senior Principal in the University of St. Andrews. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. 336. Price $1.50.

Deeply interesting as these lectures are, they have one defect which to us seems a radical fault. They regard religion from its subjective aspect. There is a certain confusion in dealing with "creeds" and "articles" inevitable to this point of view. A true "creed" is not the statement of a man's belief, but the statement of what, because revealed, should be believed. It deals with facts. Articles of religion deal with the way in which these facts are to be held. A creed can be enlarged in the way of making that explicit which was implicit before, but it cannot be varied. Articles, on the other hand, can be varied, even to the exclusion of certain topics and the admission of others. They express the attitude of the Church in any of its branches toward the Creed. While man's conception of the revelation of God in Christ, once for all made to the Church, is constantly changing, enlarging here, growing more intense there, reaching out into new questions of moral life and to new phases of duty, that revelation, in its unalterable facts, is not to be changed. It is the lack of this distinction which we find in Principal Tulloch's lectures. While we gladly give them credit for their fairness of tone and kindness of temper, we find that they do not do justice at all to certain movements here treated. For example, the Tractarian movement is here looked upon as having exhausted itself in its earliest stages. So far as it was concerned with externals there is truth in this view, though less than the principal of St. Andrews would have us believe. It produced efforts which still survive in care and earnestness of worship, though the immediate vigor of the Oxford reform has passed away or been diverted into other issues. But the great spring of the movement was in the recognition of the very point above stated, the essential character of the original revelation. Religion is either man's discovery or that which he receives. The basis of the Oxford Movement was in the rehabilitation of the latter truth. Evangelicalism had not indeed denied it, but by putting all tests in the inner consciousness of the individual soul, had practically made private judgment all in all, the voice of the Church nothing. These lectures begin with Coleridge, the poet, as the leader of English thought. From him they take up the Early Oxford School, with Whately as one of its representative men, then the Oxford or Anglo-Catholic movement, and next the movement of religious thought in Scotland, as seen in Campbell and Edward Irving. The fifth lecture is on Carlyle, the sixth on John Stuart Mill, the seventh and eighth are on the "Broad" Church, represented respectively by Maurice and Kingsley, and by F. W. Robertson and Bishop Ewing.

The conclusion of the whole series is, on the whole, hopeful. It recognizes that the present battle-field is on the existence of religion itself—the question whether there be a God and whether man can have any knowledge of Him. But this brings fairly to the front that other question, whether revelation or discovery is to be the source of man's knowledge. It lies between the idea of the Church as a living and continuous witness and the idea of the Church as but the catcombs of the soul's aspirations and theories. In history this makes the difference between reformation and reconstruction. Those who accept reconstruction are fighting, however sincerely they may contend for the faith, on a false battle-ground. It is this fatally untenable position which unconsciously but strongly controls Dr. Tulloch's views in these pages. It is itself a mark of change in religious thought, quite as important as any he has noted.

EIGHT STUDIES OF THE LORD'S DAY. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) pp. 292. Price $1.20.

We have read this book with the more care because, apart from its admirable character, we have been seeking some clue to its authorship. It is strictly anonymous, though we have no doubt many could give the authorship, since it was originally prepared for private circulation. We are satisfied that it is the work of an orthodox believer. Not only in special passages, but in the general tone in which he speaks of the Persons of the Blessed Trinity this is evident. We are morally certain that the writer is in Orders, for the proofs of deep and thoughtful study of the Scriptures and acquaintance with the original tongues of Old and New are on every page. And lastly we think the author to be a Churchman. From what he says of the use of the Decalogue in worship he can hardly be otherwise. But we think, too, that he has striven to keep out of sight his Churchmanship in order to give a greater range to the perusal of his book. We judge this more from the general tone than from anything that one can directly point out. From beginning to end the argument is very clear and logical. It is directed to prove that the Christian Lord's Day is the true and only successor of the Sabbath, and we have never seen this better and more convincingly put. These "eight studies" are as follows: First, "The Phenomena of the Day." Second, "The Origination of the Day." Third, "The Week." Fourth, "The Primæval Sacred Day." Fifth, "The Mosaic Sabbath." Sixth, "The Sabbatic System of Israel." Seventh, "The Permanent and the Transient in the Sabbatic System." Eighth, "The Fourth Commandment." In the clear perception of the three dispensations—the Patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the Christian—in the sense of their unity, we find a line of thought not usual except among Churchmen. We think too that the author has had some special opportunities for, or at least has given special attention to Oriental life. The freedom from dogmatism is very marked, and also the absence of authorities. He has evidently sent forth his "studies" to stand on their own merits, and he uses to a great extent hypothetical statements where he might use much more positive ones. We regard this book as the most conclusive answer to the whole Seventh-Day position that has yet appeared. It meets all the pettinesses of the "Outlook" sophistry by a broad generalization which leaves no room for them to occupy. It lifts the whole discussion up to a higher plane than theirs. Its Old Testament portions in regard to the Mosaic Sabbath are especially able, as he shows in the preparatory character of the Mosaic institutions. We can hardly believe that any other than a Churchman would so perfectly grasp the relation of the Jewish festival system to the present day, and we doubt whether any other would speak of the Lord's Supper as the Eucharist, or recognize so distinctly its connection with the sacrificial system in its double character of an offering and a partaking. We doubt too whether the distinction between the sacrifices of Abel and Cain would have been made in the terms which our author uses unless by a Churchman. We have always seen the subjective side put forth, and this is completely disposed of by our author's statement. If there was no command prescribing the manner of sacrifice, the reason for the non-acceptance of Cain's offering becomes the wildest conjecture. Yet we question whether the great majority of readers will share our suspicions of the authorship of these studies. We think that the writer has taken very great pains to leave no traces of his special character upon his book. He wants it to stand wholly on its own merits, and for its conspicuous fairness, its broad scholarship, and able reasoning it certainly deserves to do so.

THE PROMPT OF THE GREAT ROCKY MOUNTAINS. By Charles Robert Craddock. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Company) pp. 88. Price $1.25.

This is the most complete and most perfect of this author's works. We suppose that as long as the nom de plume is used, courtesy requires it to be respected; but we have a right to say that a genius like George Eliot has appeared in "Charles Egbert Craddock." In the first place there is no living writer with equal power of individualizing character. With a very limited range of external circumstances, each personage in this story stands out with marvellous distinctness. In a gamut of life which does not move out of the ignorance and isolation of the mountain range of Tennessee, each note is struck with perfect precision and distinctness. There is a threefold power displayed, any one element of which would stand for great talent, but when the three are combined the result is the rarest and finest gift. There is first the power of external description, a drawing which makes each figure stand life-like from the canvas. There is next an analysis of the inner life almost as striking for its subtle intuitions. One feels as if the author must have lived that life to comprehend it so exactly; lastly this is set in a background of natural description where the word painting is only saved from oppressive gorgeousness by the fine taste and wide range of the epithets employed. It is possible that these writings may not be popular. We doubt if an English public will comprehend them, and the absence of any touches of ordinary social life may keep the mass of readers from taking an interest in these stories. But to the lover of literary art, nothing more alluring and delightful has appeared on either side of the water.

THE EDUCATION OF MAN. By Friedrich Froebel. Translated by Josephine Jarist. (New York: A. Lovell & Co.) pp. 373.

We commend this book to the reader who desires valuable hints rather than a completed system. Froebel is the author of the "Kindergarten" method, which after all is only a rather highly developed, form copy, a revised edition, so to speak, of the old infant school of bye-gone days. We cannot say that this volume sets out very distinctly what the writer's system is or what his views. Here is a strange commingling of religious theories and educational—but in every few paragraphs one comes upon a capital suggestion. But the inference of this treatise is that the teacher is rather born than made, and that this advice is of little use to those who are not in some degree competent to find it out for themselves. The points made are suggestive, good starting places, and of little use to those good souls who have to go in according to fixed rules. We do not recommend it to the reader who wants to "know all about managing a kindergarten;" but to those who already know a good deal about that matter. They will find here the theory they are, perhaps, in search of, at least much that will be profitable.

DRAWING IN CHARCOAL AND CRAYON: for the use of Students and Schools. By Frank Fowler. (New York: Cassell & Co., Limited) 1885. pp. 88, with eight plates.

This little volume will be very acceptable to art students. It is intended to prepare them to draw from life, and is divided into two parts. It is succinct and clear in its statement of principles and in its directions for practice, and leads the pupil on through the different stages of charcoal and crayon drawing, including landscape and portraits. It is accompanied with eight plates, containing easy studies, by which the scholar may advance step by step to casts and life.

"AS WE WENT MARCHING ON:" A Story of the War. By G. W. Hooper, M. D. (New York: Harper & Brothers.) pp. 310.

A great deal of this novel is the good-natured, lively "war-talk" of an eye witness and participant in the scenes described. There is a slender thread of personal story in it which turns upon a medical, or rather, surgical incident which, as the writer puts the graphic letters M. D. after his name, it becomes not the layman to doubt, but which in another would be set down as "remarkable." It is a slight affair, but will give a good idea of the actual course of war incidents and is perfectly free from all bitterness.

IMMORTALITY INHERENT IN NATURE. By WALTER SUMNER HARLOW, author of "The Voices" and other poems. (New York: Fowler & Wells Co.) Price 50 cts.

Mr. Barlow, whose portrait is prefixed to this volume, writes very smooth and tolerable verse. As for his argument that nature is immortal, it is not very clear, and certainly not at all cogent. We should say it was pantheistic so far as it is anything.

SALVATION STORIES. By Geo. C. Needham. (Boston: J. A. Whipple.) pp. 160. Price 50 cts.

The intention of this little book is better than its theology. It is all but anti-nomian in its insistence upon "assurance," and it confounds Redemption and Sanctification in the way which is too common in revival preaching.

LITERATURE.

"MIND Cure on a Material Basis," by Sarah E. Titcomb, is to be published by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston. The author holds that mind cure is demonstrated by the theories of physiologists and phrenologists.

"THE Knight and the Lady," one of the Ingoldsby Legends, illustrated by Jessop, as was the "Jack-a-w of Reims and Lay of St. Aloys," will lead the Christmas books of E. and J. B. Young & Co. They have also ready "Juliana Horatia Ewig and Her Books," by Mrs. Gatty, with a portrait by George Reid, and cover designed by Caldecott.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS announce Mr. Edwin Pear's "Fall of Constantinople," a history of the siege and sack of the Byzantine capital by the Crusaders, Mr. Howard Pyle's "Pepper and Salt," or a seasoning for young folk, being a selection from his poetical contributions to Young People and "White Heather" in library form, a new novel by William Black.

The October number of Macmillan's English Illustrated Magazine brings it into the threshold of a new volume. It is really a charming magazine, and easily holds the first rank among English magazines. There are eight articles, of which four are illustrated, and there is also a frontispiece, "Rye," drawn by J. R. Wells, and engraved by O. Lacour; "London Commons" promises to be a very interesting serial, of which we have here Part I. "Decayed Seaports," "The Incomplete Angler," and "Aunt Rachel" are other serials. The number is of special value.

The writings of St. John, Gospel, Epistles and Revelation, will be the subject of the lessons in the Uniform Scheme of the Diocesan Committees from Advent, 1885, to Trinity, 1886. These lessons, with Teachers' Helps, edited by the Rev. Dr. Shinn and published by Mr. Whitaker, have reached a circulation of one hundred thousand copies. The same publisher is bringing out a new edition of Dr. Shinn's Manual of Instruction on the Collects, Epistles and Gospels for the Christian year.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is one of the very best of our juvenile papers, and is a favorite with all intelligent boys and girls. The children will have reading, and in this magazine they have the safest and the best. Every page of it is interesting, even to the older children, not to say to the fathers and mothers. It has reached its seventh volume, and is in every way deserving of its great success. A year's subscription to it would give both pleasure and profit to its recipient.

In selecting a Prayer Book either for use or a present, care should be taken not only to secure attractive binding, but attention should be paid to the type and the paper used. There is a great difference in the several editions published. The "OXFORD" editions are printed on an opaque paper made in their own paper mills from pure linen, and the plates from which the books are printed are kept in perfect repair, thus doing away with such defects as broken letters or battered lines. Ask your bookseller to show you the "OXFORD" edition, and compare it yourself with any other he may have.

The New York Advent Mission.

The following list is of books imported especially for use in the great work undertaken by the clergy of New York and vicinity. A First-class Magazine in Every Respect.
LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE.

A Popular Monthly of General Literature.

With the issue for January, 1886, important changes will be made in the literary character and typographical appearance of Lippincott's Magazine, while more than maintaining the former standards of excellence, will, it is expected, increase its popularity and widen its sphere of usefulness. The distinctive features of Lippincott's for the coming year will be as follows:

It will be a live periodical, interesting in all the current topics of the day, literary, artistic, political, and social, and extending its influence to the ablest contributors in England and America. A fair hearing will be accorded to all sides of a controversy, though the magazine will strictly preserve its own impartiality.

It will be especially strong in fiction. A new novel, entitled "Hope," by W. E. Norris, author of "Merrivale," "No New Thing," etc., who is perhaps the cleverest of the rising authors of England, will run through the year, commencing by a brilliant serial, dealing with the literary and dramatic life of a young man, and then, through the year, appearing through with the choicest stories, essays, and sketches by transient authors who will reach the American public simultaneously with their appearance abroad. Under this arrangement constant readers will reach the American public simultaneously with their appearance abroad. Under this arrangement constant readers will reach the American public simultaneously with their appearance abroad.

By special arrangement, it will be the authorized medium through which the choicest stories, essays, and sketches by transient authors who will reach the American public simultaneously with their appearance abroad. Under this arrangement constant readers will reach the American public simultaneously with their appearance abroad.

It will be the cheapest first-class magazine found in America. Recognizing the needs of the time for good literature at moderate prices, the publishers have decided to lower the subscription price commencing with the new volume, in the firm that will place Lippincott's Magazine within the reach of all.

A New Story by George MacDonald.

We shall begin immediately the publication in these columns, in advance of its appearance in England, of a new and very important story by George MacDonald, who stands among the foremost writers of the present day.

ALL SAINTS' DAY.

BY MARY D. SKEEL.

Faint were their hearts, and weary,
 For they had come from sad Jerusalem,
 When, lo! it came to pass, while they commu-
 nued,
 And pondered on the burial of their King,
 "Jesus himself drew near," although, as reads
 In the quaint version of our Saxon tongue,
 "Their eyes were holden," so they could not see.

Green are thy meadows, Palestine, to-day,
 Although we see no footprints in thy stone,
 Nor on the spot where once the Saviour stood Still blooms the Pilox, beloved by monks of old.

And called by them Communion of all Saints,
 Mute witness that day, and telling still,
 If in His name there meet but two or three,
 The promise holds—there also will He be.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH (AND SCOTCH) TRAVEL.

Edinburgh and Neighborhood.

BY M. MEDLACOTT.

NORTHWARD from Durham lay our way through busy Newcastle-upon-Tyne, of which we had only a passing glimpse.
 Near the station a boy in the same railway carriage, a bright little fellow, evidently returning from school or training-ship perchance, pointed out to us the first locomotive built by George Stephenson, standing on a high pedestal or platform close to the track. Very small and insignificant it looked by contrast with those in present use —almost like a toy engine.

It was growing dusk by the time we reached Edinburgh, and we could see but imperfectly how the hills rose all around the city. Especially Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Crags loomed over the town on one side, but for a long distance our road had wound about and among the hills, widening out into valleys between. Only a short drive to the Cockburn Hotel, pleasantly situated at the corner of two streets, looking across the Princes Street Gardens to Princes Street beyond. Pleasant rooms, too, we had here, overlooking these beautiful gardens and Sir Walter Scott's monument.

 How dreamlike it all seemed! Could it really be the famous and historic, even classic, town of Edinburgh, of which we had heard and read so much? So much to see and do, where should one begin? With bed to-night, or at least after supper, which was not unacceptable!

The next morning was spent pleasantly in exploring the old town, out across the Waverly Bridge, through Princes Street to Calton Hill first, to have the view over the city. On the one side lay the New Town, with its finely laid out streets and modern buildings; on the other, the dingy and picturesque Old Town, stretching along the ridge of hills that extend from Salisbury Crags and Holyrood Palace at their foot, to the Castle, towering up on its rocky cliff.
 Beautifully situated this is, overlooking the town, guarding it on the one hand from any sudden foe, and itself seeming almost impregnable. A very interesting place to visit, with such a wealth of historic association, such an eventful record! The room where is kept the Scotch regalia and Queen Mary's apartments are specially interesting, though the latter are bare and desolatelooking. It chanced to be just the hour of noon, when, sitting for a moment in the deep oriel window of one of the rooms, the signal-gun was fired from the rampart.
 Instantly, with the boom of the cannon, rose into the air a soft white cloud, as it appeared, so delicate and feathery, resolving itself into a perfect ring of smoke, hanging for a full moment right over the town below. It was a pretty sight, even though a trifling one to record. But the castle itself is so grand and massive, so stately on its lofty seat, one can fancy it the stronghold of kings and chieftains, the heart of the nation's military strength, but not the abode of queens and ladies, save as it might have been a prison or a refuge from enemies.
 Holyrood Palace, on the contrary, seems very different, though it, too, is a strongly-built, castle-like building, lying under the shadow of the lofty hills. Of course we were shown through the apartments open to visitors, the hall with its collection of portraits of Scotch kings, the rooms inhabited by Queen Mary, and the one where Rizzio was murdered. The old tapestry covering the walls in these rooms is very curious, and the old carved and inlaid furniture is quaint and interesting.
 But most beautiful are the ruins of the chapel of Holyrood, picturesque and graceful, with many graves of sovereigns of Scotland and other distinguished persons.

Our walk to-day took in George Heriot's Hospital and Grey Friar's Churchyard, with its historic memorials of the old Scotch Cov-enanters, and St. Giles Cathedral or Church, forever associated in our minds with staunch Jenny Geddes, who showed her disapproval of Episcopal form of worship by throwing her stool at the Dean of Edinburgh; also associated with the signing of the Solemn League and Covenant, entered into by the Scotch people in 1643, by some from religious convictions, by others no doubt, from party and political motives. Here and there, on and on, through old streets, between the high, dingy rows of houses, some of them black with age, sometimes twelve stories high, fairly overhanging the streets; and oftentimes from the very topmost windows would be hung out frames with clothes dangling down from them, to dry as best they might, an odd-looking sight, to be sure.

 Now stopping to look upon curious old courts, surrounded in their turn by high houses, many of them with staircases on the outside; we would not like to say (if we could) how many families inhabited one dwelling. Through the old High Street, with its many quaint old buildings, past
 John Knox's house, now used as a coffee house, past the old Tolbooth just beyond, with the quaint-looking clock, projecting as on a bracket from high up on the tower; on through the Canongate, a narrower continuation of High Street. Oh, the children here! no danger, methinks of the Scotch nation running out. Swarming everywhere, in and out of courts opening from the street, through the middle of the street, up and down stairways, dirty, ragged, barefooted. Toward evening the street was crowded with women with babies in their arms, or hanging to their skirts, men lounging along or leaning against doorways, a motley crowd. Evidently soap and water are very expensive in Edinburgh.

Just at sunset we climbed Salisbury Crags, where a rifle company were practising target shooting on their ground part-way up the hill. How grandly it sounded, the shots echoing and re-echoing from peak to peak among the hills! now almost like thunder, now dying away in the distance. 'Twas too late to venture up Arthur's Seat, higher still, so we only saw it from a distance. The view even from Salisbury Crags was very fine, and this was a lovely hour to be there.

Sunday in Edinburgh was such a quiet day, no tram-cars or omnibuses allowed to run in the city, but plenty of cabs to be had for the hiring. All seemed to be in Sunday trim, and the streets were different in the air of quiet from other days, although there was plenty of passing to and fro. In the morning we attended service at the new and fine Cathedral of St. Mary's, where, quite unexpectedly, it was our privilege to hear our own Bishop of Connecticut. In the evening we went to the ancient St.
 Giles, where was held the service of the Established (or Presbyterian) Church of Scotland. This is a grand old building, but injured by being filled with high-backed pews, and a high square pulpit almost in the centre of the building. The music was very good here, a large and fine organ being used, which is not generally the custom in Scotland, and they sang the "prose Psalms" as they call them, being the Bible version.
 During the afternoon we took a lovely stroll through the Princes St. Gardens, so prettily laid out on each side of the cutting through which runs the railway. These gardens are lovely with beds of flowers and plants, the terraced bank being festooned with trailing ivy and white-leaved plants in a very effective manner. As may be imagined, the old part of the town is much more interesting than the new, fine and even beautiful though this is, yet because it is modern it was less attractive to us. Altogether the few days in Edinburgh were very enjoyable.

So many places of interest lie within easy reach, too. Foremost among these rank Melrose and Abbotsford, and one could not spend any time in the old city without making a pilgrimage thither. Such a lovely day as it was! As we did not see the old ruined abbey in the way the poet says is the right way to see it, "by the pale moon-light," we saw it under the next best conditions, a fair, summer-like day. Alighting at the station, we first visited Abbotsford, walking there, as the day was so fine, and thus enjoying the beauty of the country better than by the more rapid mode of driving over. Most interesting this visit was, with its many mementoes of the gifted man who ever will be associated with this lovely home. One realizes so much more of a person's life and work, after seeing the surroundings of that life, the place where the work was done! So it was here, and Walter Scott seems more than ever to us a living, breathing man, not merely a gifted magician of the pen.

So back to Melrose, the "fair abbaye," girdled round with "the tombstones grey," to spend a pleasant and memorable hour wandering around and through the ruined walls and arches, admiring the graceful tracery of the windows, the

"... slender shafts of shapely stone
By foliage tracery combined;
Thou would'st have thought some fairy's hand
Tied poplars straight the cedar wand
In many a freakish knot had twined;
Then framed a spell where the work was done,
And changed the willow wreaths to stone."

Beautiful, indeed, are the remains of sculpture and carving upon pillar, arch, and window, doorway, and column, while the graceful ivy, growing in its rich luxuriance, harmonizes so perfectly with the pathetic beauty of the whole. Nor is it least beautiful from the quiet enclosure to the south, so thickly studded with the grey old stones. Thus another is added to our daily increasing gallery of

"... beautiful pictures
That hang on memory's wall."

Then on by rail to St. Boswell's Station, where we take a "trap," something like a dog-cart, to drive over to Dryburgh Abbey, a pretty drive of about two miles. Here we cross the river Tweed by a little foot-bridge that sways with our step, the river itself so charming between its green banks. A walk of half a mile through a road lovely at this season brings us to the abbey grounds and to the picturesque ruins so worthy of a visit for their own beauty, doubly interesting to us as containing the mortal remains, in their last quiet resting place, of him whose home and study we have just left. What a peaceful spot to rest in: surely one can here sleep in utter forgetfulness of the toils and cares of life—sleep till the Resurrection trumpet shall sound! undisturbed even by the crowds of pilgrims and sight-seers who yearly wend their way hither to pay their tribute of respect to the memory of the illustrious dead. It seems almost sad to have such spots made places of traffic, even by the sale of pictures of the place.

Another day took us to Hawthornden and Roslyn. In the garden of the first mentioned place, is pointed out the tree under which the poet Drummond and his friend, Ben Jonson, sat together, the latter having, it is said, walked from London to visit the poet. More interesting still were the old caves underneath the castle through which we were led. These are partly natural, and then enlarged, cut out of the soft rock, and are said to have been used as hiding places and prisons in time of war. A well is still shown in one room or cave, dark and dismal enough, leading down no one knows how far into the bowels of the earth. Another room is said to have been inhabited by Robert Bruce. It has a window—that is a wide slit in the rocky wall—overlooking the precipitous cliff on the very edge of the river Esk, and niches and shelves are shown in this room, in which Bruce is said to have kept his books. We can easily fancy they must have been of vellum or parchment, to stand the dampness of the place—a cold, dark study it seems to us.

Next, crossing the Esk by a rustic bridge, such a picturesque, lovely walk leads us along its banks a mile and a half or two miles to Roslyn Castle, also an interesting and historic old building, with subterranean rooms and dungeons, in one of which Mary, Queen of Scots, is said to have taken refuge at one time. In one of these lower rooms, used as a kitchen, the great fire-place in one corner was pointed out, with the wide chimney looking up, into the faint daylight. All stone or rock, above, below, on every side, with small barred windows, or slits in the wall, dreary enough, dwellings for beasts rather than for men. At a little distance is Roslyn Chapel, very beautiful in form and design, with great variety of styles to be observed in it. Some of the carving is exquisite, especially that of a well-known Prentice's Pillar, which is seemingly encircled with a garland of foliage, standing out like a natural garland or wreath, petrified, as it would about the column. But the tracery and carving of the windows and columns are also beautiful, on the outside of the building equally with the inside, combining strength and solidity with the delicate grace of nature. Lovely, too, is the view across the fields and stream to the woods beyond, and not the least pleasant remembrance of this day, is the quiet meditation and outlook on the slope of the hill, just outside and below the chapel. Everything combines in such a spot, to add beauty to the work of man, and show harmony with the works of God.

THE PICTURE OF ETERNAL LOVE.

BY GEORGE S. GORDON.

In Raphael's Transfiguration we find, with Eternal Majesty glorified, the power of Faith contrasted and illumined. The lower scene representing the failure to cast out the evil spirit from the boy, by lack of Faith; the upper presenting the source of all Faith, in the beatific person of the Redeemer.

In his Sistine Madonna, the shadow of sorrowful prophecy is all pervading; yet, there is a measure of trust in the searching out-gaze of the Virgin, and with the sweetly startled expression of the Child is mingled the confidence of divine hope.

In the Madonna della seggia is given the portrayal of Eternal Love. There is nothing of the majestic on this canvas. Its theme, directly simple, appeals at once to the strongest earthly sentiment of affection; for the group is a family group, its attributes maternal love, and the devotion of little children, one of them the Christ-Child.

That this picture is distinguished from its other Madonnas by the appellation of the Madonna of the Chair is not Raphael's fault.

Only a small portion of the chair in which the Virgin is seated is visible, and that would hardly be observed, except for this label of the name. The name, however, a mere distinguishing tag, leaves no greater impression on the work. The observer is free to clothe his sense of what is beautiful and pure and holy in this work, in whatever high thought he may discover; and it has seemed to me, as I have said, to embody a type of ever enduring love, and I believe the great painter so designed it.

Is it without significance that the figures on the canvas appeal to us from within the boundaries of a circle, "the highest emblem of the cipher of the world," the symbol of eternity? In the minor details of the work, is it mere fancy, or do we find an exquisite, if subdued, suggestion of the same idea: the Virgin's head encircled with the graceful folds of its covering, her arms encircling the Divine Infant, the arm of the Infant Baptist forming its circle round the cross?

We find no accessories of scene or landscape here. The group is not designed to lend its presence to any one scene; any more than we would seek, in obtaining the photograph or painting of a family group to-day, any adjunct to its own presentment.

So, it is the will of the great artist that in this portrayal the mind shall not be diverted from three persons: the Virgin, the Christ-Child, and the infant Baptist; only, besides, one object—the cross.

If there were not any divine record of their lives, if we gazed upon them simply as a fair woman and two lovely infants, yet the evident kinship of the three would be at once attested. Thus, by a power independent of association, does the artist link together the inmates of his canvas with the strong bonds of family connection.

It is true, the divine and wondrous story which connects them is first to occur to the observer, who may not stop to apply the extrinsic test of related likeness. Once apply this test, and the gathered strength is as great as would be the gathered weakness, if, for example, one of Murillo's Virgins were substituted here.

Have you ever paused to consider, in all the hundreds of thousands of representations of the Madonna, ranging from the extreme type of a long-limbed, angular Kranach to the Queen of the Dresden Tribuna, how exacting are the conditions imposed upon the painter in the bare approach to this delineation? She, whose person the artist is about to transfer to canvas, is that holy being of whom the early martyred Bishop of Tyre exclaimed: "Thou hast clad the mighty one with that beautiful panoply of the body, by which it has become possible for Him to be seen. Thou alone hast been thought worthy to share with God the things of God; who hast alone borne in the flesh Him, of God the Father was the eternally and only Begotten." Thus, in the language of a modern divine, "She became the nearest of all created beings to the Divine Person: nearer than saints who glorify Him by their lives, nearer than martyrs who glorify Him by their deaths, nearer than angels who minister the dictates of His will." It was vouchsafed to but one artist once to accomplish the near perfect presentment of the character; to Raphael, in his Sistine Madoma, that inspiration of supreme genius. I have never seen any representation of the Virgin so in the act of the exalted utterance of her Magnificat.

In her greeting with Elizabeth, the moment of their immediate greeting is invariably selected, and they are generally depicted in the act of embracing one another.

But think of the opportunity, when that interval has terminated, and, her face aglow with heaven's own radiance, she turns to the utterance of that fervid hymn of her soul!

Doubtless, the full exaltation of that experience never recurred in her life; but its memory and reflected power must often have surged upon her.

Before her, the fulfilment of the promises of that interview, the son of Elizabeth, and, clasped in her arms, her own Divine Child; and, her pulses throbbing with the new-found instincts of maternity, she turns aside her gaze, and silently renews the grateful theme:

"Yea, my spirit hath rejoiced, and doth rejoice, for He hath regarded the low estate of His handmaidens."

Turn we now to the figure of the youthful Baptist.

Mrs. Jameson, in her Legends of the Madonna, says: "The introduction of the Virgin and Child, lends it a charming significance. When he adores with folded hands, as acknowledging in Christ a superior power, it is evident we have the two children in their spiritual character, the Child-Priest and King, and the Child-Propheet."

Here he adores with folded hands, impassioned gaze, and parted lips, as though "Behold the Lamb of God" had, even then, been breathlessly syllabled.

Observe the contrast in the lips of the Christ-Child. They are closed: "I am the Word."

Note another contrast. The hands of the Baptist are folded, in their nervous power, around the cross. The hands of the infant Saviour are not visible. If they had been, the gesture must have been either of acceptance or rejection; and His baby-eyes had caught sight of that emblem of his final agony. If, afterwards, in Gethsemane, He prayed, "Father, if it be Thy will, let this cup pass," surely, in babyhood, he could but shrink from that ominous symbol, and clasp those baby-hands the closer to His mother's breast.

Of John the Baptist it is recorded that "he grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the desert." Of the Christ-Child it is said, "He increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." Here are lines of character as divergent as the poles. Look closely at this picture, and see if the great painter did not have these diverse elements of character in mind. The infant John is already waxing strong in spirit; he will soon go hence to the desert; he may even now be urging the accompanying thither of the Lamb of God.

The Infant Christ begins to increase in wisdom. Not to the desert will He go; but to human hearts He clings, and sanctifies by this nestling embrace the claims of universal motherhood. "This is my own sweet mother," He seems to say; "you must not seek to draw my baby-love from me. You proclaim, and will again proclaim, me as the Lamb of God; but she may not yet realize that 'she cannot keep her Lamb from being slain.' No; I must remain, that I may increase in favor with God and man."

Have you ever seen a painting in which the Virgin is represented as embracing the youthful St John?

I never have; and I think she never did. In this picture, I am sure she has never once caught sight of the cross. If she had, we would surely find another element in the expression of her face than that of retrospective over her Magnificat.

This pensive figure has no precedence of the Stabat Mater Dolorosa.

Then, finally, is not this a true Trinity picture?

God the Father did not will that the cup should pass from His beloved; and the cross is in the hands of His Messiah's prophet.

God the Son, in all the gentleness of that childhood of which is the Kingdom of Heaven, we have in surest simplicity.

And the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, could not better be symbolized before His coming, than in the gentle presence of the dear Mother of our Lord.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

BY THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND.

III.—(Continued.)

Entrances to Domestic Missions.

(5.) The strength of the Church is far short of what it ought to be in view of its widely spread missions, because of the losses occasioned by the total lack of concert of action between us and the Church of England in caring for immigrants baptised into her fold. To say that a million of her members have come to this country, would be a moderate estimate. So far as the Church is concerned, they have been as water poured upon the ground. Never has there been a spiritual wastage at once so tremendous and so culpable. So far as it attests the ill discharged responsibility of the Mother Church, one would fain speak of it with the courteous moderation due to her dignity and to her eminent services as a propagator of the Gospel in many of the distant parts of the earth; and yet there has been in it all an absence of forethought and discretion that even charity itself must characterize as an awful blunder. For two generations she has allowed countless hosts of her children to leave the shores of England to seek their homes and fortunes in the New World with scarcely a word of counsel or direction as to their duty toward the Church planted here. Meanwhile, before the hand of brotherly sympathy and care could reach them, multitudes have wandered into alien folds, or have fallen away as sheep without a shepherd, first into habitual neglect of sacred ministrations, then into dislike or contempt of them, and then into faithless, godless living. It has been the common experience of our pastorate all over the land to be called in to minister in trouble and sickness and death, to the baptised and confirmed, who then for the first time, learned that it was the same Church, the same priesthood, the same Sacrament, the same worship, the same blessed consolation, that had been known at home by their fathers and by themselves. But for this terrible squandering of strength, and the neglect and blindness that caused it, it is not too much to say that the American Church would be fifty per cent. more numerous than she is. The loss thus created has hardly been made good by all our aggressive work during the present generation. Neither Romanism nor Dissent in England has been guilty of such oversight. Their disciples, to an extent certainly not known among us, have come to our shores with a knowledge of the church doors they were to enter, and of the religious care that awaited them.

It is not yet too late to check this evil. Emigration from Great Britain to this country has of late, as our statistics show, set in with fresh vigor.* Surely all will agree that it is of quite as much moment to save from error and ungodliness a member of the Church of England as it is to lead into the fold a soul out of the darkness of heathenism.†

But in no regard has the Church's weakness in pushing on her missions been so deplorable, as in her proved inability to call out, in any decent measure, her own pecuniary resources for the work. The wealthiest of all Christian bodies in proportion to her numbers, she seems to have had less control of her wealth than any other. Time and again appeals have been made and measures devised to abate this evil, but thus far with little practical effect. Part of the evil is traceable, no doubt, to a lack of interest in *100,000 reached us in 1881, and an average of 150,000 each year since.

†What has been said applies to the past rather than to the present. Of late, the Mother Church has taken up the subject with vigor, as the following facts will show. "The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge" has appointed an able and energetic Emigration Committee. This committee has devised and has in motion several very important practical measures. (1) All the principal emigration ports have been provided with chaplains and agents to care for the religious interests of the emigrants at their departure, or on the voyage.

(2) In many centres of emigration, clergy and other agents receive and forward, and often accompany, emigrants to their destination, and provide for their spiritual interests en route.

(3) The clergy of every parish and district in England can obtain, at a nominal cost, handbooks published by the society, giving accurate information as to almost every field of emigration, and as to the religious and educational advantages or disadvantages of the region to which the emigrant is going.

(4) Commendatory letters are provided, which the parochial clergy can fill up on behalf of their parishioners, ensuring, them a good reception by the bishop and clergy, or missionaries, of the land to which they go.

The earnest hope is expressed by the Committee that the Bishops in America and the Colonial Bishops of the Church of England, will cordially co-operate in these plans. In a letter of the Archbishop of Canterbury, published in March last, all these arrangements are alluded to and warmly commended to all whom they concern. The writer, among other things, says: "It may not be fairly said that if the clergy in England and in America, on the one hand, or any person wishes to emigrate are alive to the means within their reach, and will make use of them, any parishioner may have the aid of clergy, or of other active agents, along the whole line of the journey. . . . I most earnestly commend this great matter to the prayers and to the energy of the Church."

On this side of the water we have been unhelpful and inactive. We have, at sundry times and places, at home and in England, organized the Most Churchy for her neglect and indifference in "this great matter," as the Archbishop calls it, and now that she has not only expressed her regret for the past, but shown in the most practical way her determination to avert the future, we are the last to regard. The last General Convention passed resolutions and appointed a committee to consider and report what can be done. As yet, little more than talk has resulted from this action. The Board of Missions has apparently been unable to persuade that it has any vocation to undertake this work on a scale commensurate with its importance. Even the ill-conditioned chaplaincy which it created some three years ago has been allowed to lapse, and no step to be taken and must be done at an early day to insure the co-operation which the Mother Church now so earnestly invites.

the cause among the mass of Churchmen, but quite as much is due to the want of system in raising money. The annual receipts show how feebly the laity, as a whole, recognize their missionary obligations, and they show, too, just as plainly the loose and irregular practice of the great majority of our parishes. At least one-fifth of them and perhaps more, not only give nothing to the cause, but habitually neglect to notice the cause itself as imposing upon them any duty whatever.

It is a fact which ought not to escape observation, that ten dioceses, in the Northwest and along the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, into which, during the last forty years, the Church has poured nearly a million of dollars from its central treasury and quite as much more—perhaps twice as much—from parishes and individual Churchmen at the East, for the maintenance of missions and the building of churches and schools, gave to Domestic Missions all told in the last year, from September to September, the sum of $2,775.27. The Diocese of Chicago gave the largest sum, $627.50; and the Diocese of Fond du Lac the smallest, $60.51; while from Iowa came only $159.31; from Wisconsin $239.62; from Missouri $426.83, and from Minnesota $343.76.

Speaking generally, there are scores of laymen in the eastern, middle, and western dioceses whose individual income exceeds the total sum given by the entire Church in aid of this object. Clearly this state of things must be changed, or we must surrender our hopes and pretensions as a missionary body claiming to cope with the religious wants of the already vast and still advancing life around us. Who will sound the trumpet-call that shall arouse the dormant zeal and open the shut purses of our laity? What turn of events will send to the front another Peter the Hermit to lead a crusade against the selfish, careless riches of the times? What mind or set of minds is to appear whose organizing genius will invent and execute a method of ingathering that will command the active and loyal co-operation of every congregation, every communicant within our borders? The march of events, and the exigencies of the hour, the multitudes starving for lack of the meat that perisheth not, the growth on all sides of unbelief and unrighteousness, the enormous temptations pressing upon this great people—all forbid a longer continuance of such disjointed, spasmodic, niggardly giving for the spread of the Gospel and Church of the Son of God.

IV.

The Four Stages of Advance.

Fault-worthy as the record is, with its many delays and mistakes, its times of blindness and stagnation; yet the half century behind us, regarded as the spring and seed time of the work, shows substantial progress. Much, too much, has been left undone, and yet, all things considered, we may well be thankful for having gained the point where we stand to-day. The stages in the advance have been distinctly marked. The rounds on a ladder with their respective interspaces could not stand out in bolder relief. From 1790 to 1820 was the period of mere sentiment, sentiment too vague and feeble to put any fire into consciences or into words. There was abroad only a dreamy sense of a great duty lying ahead to be done some time, but not to be grappled with then. If the clergy, now and then, timidly discoursed on the theme, the laity wondered at rather than questioned what they meant.* After the lapse of thirty years, what had been no more than an occasional puff of zeal, took shape (in 1821) in the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, authorized by the General Convention, but practically regarded by the Church as scarcely more than a convenient instrumentality for doing a work which she admitted ought to be done, but for which she declined taking more than an indirect responsibility.†

The second stage was reached in 1835, when the Board of Missions, as the representative of the Church, and acting under a new Constitution, widened out the basis of missionary obligation, by declaring that obligation to be a necessary inference from the baptismal vow, and so touching the conscience of the individual Christian.‡

The third came in 1859, when the Church, acting in her corporate capacity and through her highest council, put on record by formal resolution, as well as by solemn act, her conviction as to the true relation of the episcopate to all duly organized missionary work.

The fourth was embodied in the enactment of the General Convention in 1877, by which the Church re-absorbed into herself the Board of Missions, and reproduced it as an integral function of her own organic life—henceforth to see with her eyes, to work with her hands, and to throbb with the pulsations of her own vital circulation.§

*Among the proceedings of the General Convention of 1796 was an "Act for supporting missionaries to preach the Gospel on the frontiers of the United States." The provisions of this Act related mainly to the ordering and gathering of collections. The Act slumbered in the record, no formal notice or active effort being so much as attempted until 1816, when, under the auspices of Bishop White, "The Episcopal Missionary Society of Philadelphia," was instituted "with a view to extending aid to the members of the Episcopal Communion beyond the limits of the State of Pennsylvania." At this time there was not one Episcopal clergyman in the State of Ohio, and the society turned its attention to that quarter.

†The Board of Directors of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society in their report in 1820, announced that their purpose had been thus far "to explore rather than to occupy" missionary ground. The total contributions for all objects at home and abroad during 1804, 1805, and 1806 amounted to $5,296.57; and of this sum not more than one-fifth was for Domestic Missions. Most of the bishops written to on the subject thought it undesirable to have any agencies at work in their dioceses for collecting funds, because they would interfere with the support of local work. These facts will show how far the cause of missions up to 1820 was in an infant state, and how far it was a reality which stirred the heart of the Church.

‡In 1843-4, when it was thought that the Church had warmed up to the work, and when not a few fervid addresses were made in behalf of the cause, the amount expended in Domestic missions did not exceed $7,000. And yet at this time there were fully seven hundred clergy actively at work in parishes. Clearly, there was little general interest in the subject at this time, and what there was expended itself mainly in making constitutions and by-laws for the society. Really effective, well-sustained work in the home field was the product of an after period.

§At a missionary meeting in Baltimore in 1877, the wise and saintly Severyn said: "I am the more persuaded that this is the right mode when an extraordinary enterprise should be carried out, because we know that the command of our blessed Lord was not given to individuals; it was not left to be executed by voluntary zeal; it was a never-dying commandment, accompanied by a never-dying promise, that we should go into all the world, with the certainty that He would be always with us, even unto the end of the world."

Each stage has marked an advance, not in measures merely, or in revenues, or in the magnitude of the work, but in the sense of duty and of sound ecclesiastical principles. This sense has been won at a great price, but it is worth vastly more than its cost; for by it, more than by anything else, are we to grasp the future. Foremost, among the more recent fruits of it, is that promising, indeed already remarkable, organization—the Woman's Auxiliary. What it has done is scarcely less than astonishing, and what it will do, in view of its rapidly increasing means and growing moral power, none can tell. It has taken root in the most active dioceses. It works in parishes, but with sympathies and aims co-extensive with the Church. The light it has kindled reaches thousands of Christian homes, and the zeal it inspires, beyond any other sort of zeal that we know, tells on souls in the by-ways of our Church life. One aspect of its work, though not the most important, appears in its contributions in money or its equivalent, during the fifteen years of its existence, amounting to one million, six hundred and nine thousand, five hundred and forty-six dollars. But farther, this Auxiliary is no mere aggregate of individual wills—a society self-constituted and self-governed, knowing no law but its own choice. So soon as it grew strong enough to feel that it deserved notice, it asked to be taken under authority, and to be adopted into the living organism of the whole body. I have introduced this woman's work for missions just here—(1st.), because it would never have a being but for that quickening of the missionary spirit produced by the enunciation of the principle that every baptized person is bound to do something for the spread of the Gospel; and (2d.) because its organization would not have been what it is but for the other complementary principle, that the Church herself, the corporate whole of the baptized, is the true and only divinely instituted missionary society. So it is that sound principles, the intelligent perception of which may be a slow and labored growth, beget not only new energies, but as well, new and harmoniously adjusted channels through which those energies can work to the edification and expansion of the whole body.

"BE STILL, AND KNOW THAT I AM GOD."

BY E.

Dumb speech is often best:
A true heart is expressed
In every act of life,
In daily work or strife.

A noble example given
Will tell men more of heaven
Than all the words of power
In your most gifted hour.

To birds 'tis given to sing,
To flowers to bloom in spring,
But man must live and act,
Express not dreams, but fact.

Through prayer alone comes light;
Inspiration opened sight,
And loosened every tongue
That ever spoke or sung.

God's word in flower or tree
By Him revealed must be,
His thought you first must reach
Before you sing or teach.

SHOULD AMERICA HAVE A WESTMINSTER ABBEY?

BY FREDERICK W. FARRAR, D.D., LL.D.,
Archdeacon of Westminster.

I have been invited to write a few words for The Brooklyn Magazine in answer to the question "Should America have a Westminster Abbey?" so auspiciously discussed in its last issue by a number of distinguished Americans. The question, of course, means "Should the people of America endeavor, without further delay, to rear some sacred building which may concentrate all the memorials of national history, and serve the same purpose for the United States as Westminster Abbey serves for all members of the English speaking race?"

The only answer which can be given by one who has the honor to be Canon of Westminster, will hardly be doubtful. I live under the very shadow of the Abbey. I am present on many days of the year at its morning and evening services. I hear the sounds of rolling their mighty music under its vaulted roofs. I have been privileged to speak from its pulpit to many thousands of worshippers gathered from many lands. I have seen representatives of all the rank, the wealth, the beauty, the chivalry, the wisdom, the goodness of England gathered in its ample nave or storied transepts on great occasions of national joy or sorrow. I have seen princes and laboring men standing side by side, and united in a common grief when its best and greatest sons have been buried under its pavement. I have conducted hundreds of foreigners, of Americans, of artisans, of public-school boys, of choirs, of Sunday scholars, around its hallowed precincts.

"Silver Psalms and solemn

Its dim cloisters have been familiar to me at noon-day and at midnight, and I have knelt to worship in its ancient chapels, sometimes amid vast throngs of my fellow-Christians, sometimes when scarcely a human being but myself was kneeling there. I have drawn into my inmost heart its sweet and awe-inspiring influences. And therefore, I am in a position to testify to its priceless value as a national possession, and to express my belief that America would be showing a wisdom and a foresight worthy of her greatness, if, at a stage in her history not further removed from her origin than the present Abbey of Henry III. is removed from the Conquest, she endeavors to provide for future generations some place of worship and of solemn associations which may serve her both as a shrine and as a Valhalla—as an incentive to the efforts of the living, and a memorial to the high services of the dead.

I am not, of course, about to write a paper on Westminster Abbey. That has been done by many. The admirable book of our late beloved Dean, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, compresses into brief space a mass of the most interesting information. My predecessor, Canon Kingsley, made the abbey the topic of the lecture which he most frequently delivered during his visit to this continent, and that lecture is published among his other works. But Americans need hardly go further than the delightful sketch-book of their own Washington Irving. Much more is known about the abbey and its wealth of associations since Washington Irving's day, but to him the everyday services of the monks, and for great occasional processions and Te Deum. Nor was it originally meant for a burial-place for the dead. The bones of the sainted Confessor were there laid to rest, and during generation after generation kings and nobles, and great ecclesiastics, and victorious heroes, desired to be buried around his shrine. The great majority of the graves and cenotaphs which attract so many visitors are the accumulation of the last three centuries; and the worshippers, who often amount to many hundreds even on ordinary week days, have begun to frequent the choir and transepts and nave in comparatively recent times. America cannot, of course, create the impulses to which the abbey owes its present characteristics; but it is easily within her power to erect a shrine which generations hence may awaken in millions "who speak the tongue which Shakespeare spoke" the same absorbing interest which the Church of St. Peter's now awakens in every American and English heart.

Much of the spell exercised by the abbey depends on the beauty of its architecture. This can never be reproduced. A copy or an imitation produces but small effect, and does not spring from the same feelings which give grandeur to the original. The abbey is the visible expression of an intense absorbing faith. It reminds us of all that is solemn in life; it was meant to fill our minds with thoughts of Death, Judgment, and Eternity. It is symbolical in its minutest details. The predominance of the numbers three and seven had a mystic significance. They indicate the Triune God, and the "seven lamps burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God." To the mind of a thoughtful mediæval monk the whole building would appear to be a constant reminder of the Trinity in Unity, and of God in Christ. The triple height is largely due the flowing of that stream of pilgrims from this side of the Atlantic who during every week of the summer months throng to visit our venerable shrine.

It would, of course, be impossible for America to reproduce anything which exactly resembled the ancient Abbey of St. Peter's. One of the sources of its infinite charm rests in the fact that it grew gradually, and almost fortuitously, into its present form and its present uses. It serves the double object of a mausoleum for the greatest of our dead, and of a cathedral where many thousands are constantly assembled to join in stately choral services and hear the preaching of God's word. It was not originally designed to fulfill either object. It was the church of a monastery, not intended for the delivery of sermons to great crowds of people, or for the ordinary quiet worship of multitudes, but rather for —arches, triforium, clerestory; the triple length—nave, choir, sacarium; the triple breadth—nave and two aisles, choir and two ambulatories, lantern and two transepts—would speak to him of God, Three in One. The cruciform shape would continually remind him of the sacrifice of Christ. The nave represented the "ship" of the Church; the angels of the arches were the emblems of the Church Invisible; the hideous gargoyles stood for the excluded demons. The chapels clustering round the altar indicated the Apostles gathered round the Cross, and, generally, the Communion of Saints. So completely was the symbolism carried out, that the line of pillars at the altar, in the original Abbey of the Confessor, deflected a little to the right (as is the case also in some other cathedrals) to indicate the head of Jesus declining on the shoulder in the agony of death. To a sovereign like

Henry III., the builder of the chief part of the Abbey in its present condition, all this religious symbolism was as intensely real as it was to the monks themselves. When Henry was in France, he stopped so persistently to hear mass at every chapel which he passed, that he even wore out the patience of a saint like Louis the Ninth, who, to avoid the incessant delay, took him round by a route where there were fewer churches. It would be vain, it would even be impossible in an age like this, an age of religious divisions and of common skepticism, to imitate the architecture which expressed the devotional feelings of an age of uniform religion and universal faith. There, then, is an initial difficulty in the way of securing for America a Westminster Abbey. Could it be a sacred building? If so, to which of the sects or Churches would it belong? If the services of one Church were held in it, would not the representatives of all other religious bodies demand the same privilege? On the other hand, if the building were not consecrated to worship it would lose half of its sanctity.

Again, a Valhalla would lose the impressiveness which the abbey derives from the earnest lessons which great preachers in addressing the worshippers in our abbey constantly deduced from its various memorials. I will give but a single illustration. It was one of the beautiful thoughts which occurred to the loving heart of Dean Stanley to preach on Saturday afternoons a series of sermons on the beatitudes, and to point their lessons by illustrations derived from the lives of those who lay buried around the preacher as he spoke. His premature death cut short, alas! the completion of his design; but he preached four or five of these sermons, and one of them was the last which he ever preached. I happened to be "canon in residence" at the time, and I heard them. They were very short and exquisitely simple. Their very artlessness made them all the more precious as works of art, and they illustrated the character of the dean's peculiar genius which consisted in the heart of childhood taken up and matured in the powers of manhood. I remember how he pointed the lesson from the latitude of the pure in heart by the white soul of Sir Isaac Newton; and how in speaking of the beatitude of the meek he referred to the saintly Margaret of Richmond, the mother of Henry VII., and the greatest lady of her day, who yet said that if the princes of Europe would lay aside their dissensions and would join in a new crusade to deliver the holy sepulchre, she would go with them were it only in the capacity of their laundress. Any one will understand how much more force such lessons derived when uttered almost over the mortal dust of those to whom they referred. Could such lessons be given by the mere cicero of a building exclusively secular?

It is clear then that America could scarcely have a Westminster Abbey which should add the lessons of Christian holiness to those of common mortality. How far this element of sacredness and solemnity could be attached to such a building intended only for the commemoration of the dead must remain uncertain. But, meanwhile, such a building might still further many high and valuable ends. For instance:

First.—The mere fact that such a building was in contemplation would fire the imagination of many artists. It should be entrusted only to American genius, and only to the very best and highest which can be found available. Hitherto it may perhaps be said that the progress of America in art has fallen short of her progress in all other things. She has yet to fulfil the prophecy of Sir William Jones:

"Commerce with fleets shall mock the waves,
And arts that flourish not with slaves,
Dancing with every gale and muse Shall bid the valleys laugh and heavenly beams diffuse."

Architecture, sculpture, painting, mosaics, iron-work, are not born in a day. America has yet ample time in which to develop some heaven-born genius in these directions. But were it once known that she contemplated the erection of a building which was to attain as nearly as possible to the ideal of her beauty and magnificence, how intense a stimulus would be given to the toil and to the gifts of every native artist! Of course, the conception of such a structure should be of the grandest and stateliest description. There should be

"Nil parvo aut humilli modo."

The architecture should be of the most magnificent proportions; the floors of the most lustrous marbles; the mosaics enriched with precious stones, malachite, and lapis lazuli, and agate, and cornelian, and crystal, and every native gem, like those of the most splendid Russian cathedrals. No painting, no sculpture should be admitted into it which had not stood the test of time, or which did not satisfy the severest canons of contemporary taste. I believe that the commencement of such a building, the mere fact that such a building was in contemplation, would form an epoch in the history of American art. It is true that at the best there would be in your Valhalla, as in our abbey, many sepulchres which succeeding generations would condemn. But even these have their value. They visibly present to the student the history of art. They teach him what to imitate and what to avoid. They reflect with unflinching and unsuspecting accuracy the varying emotions and ideals of the periods by which they were produced. How significant in the history of religious feeling is the mere difference of manner in which the dead are represented on their tombs! In the tombs of the middle ages they are always lying on their backs, whether represented in life or in death, with their hands folded in prayer upon the breast, "two praying hands," says the Russian proverb, "and life is done." The pleureurs at their head are angels, and sometimes they are uplifting in their hands a draped figure which represents the soul of the departed. It is not till the sixteenth century that they raise to their knees. In the seventeenth they stand upright in full armor, and the battles of their lives are represented in bas-relief. In the eighteenth century they are sculptured amid the surroundings of earthly state or activity. They sit on the bench of justice in all their magnificence like Lord Mansfield, or gesture like Chatham in the passion of oratory. It is not till the nineteenth century that, like the statue of Wilberforce, they lool familiarly in their easy-chairs.

Second.—I should like in my remaining remarks to point out the certain incidental advantages which would accrue to the American nation from the possession of such a building.

I. It would fire the honorable passion for glory, the desire for earthly immortality won by the bestowal of great and lifelong services. America already feels the spell exercised over her imagination by the "modest mansion on the banks of the Potomac," by the memorial at Gettysburg, by the statues around her Capitol at Washington, by the monument on Bonker Hill. How much was expressed by the exclamation of Lord Nelson: "To-morrow a peerage, or Westminster Abbey!"

II. It would give a fresh impulse to literature. A complete literature has sprung up round Westminster Abbey, and it would be difficult to estimate how many valuable books have first been suggested to their authors by lingering in its precincts. One instance may suffice. The most interesting of Lord Macaulay's essays was suggested to the great historian as he stood talking to Dean Milman under the bust of the great proconsul, Warren Hastings. It is to that cenotaph that we owe so brilliant a chapter in our Indian history.

III. It would stimulate courage in the faint-hearted, and hopefulness in the despondent. To me history and biography have ever been books of God, and some of the most touching lessons of history and biography are recalled to the mind as we gaze on the memorials and stand upon the graves of the illustrious dead. "I have been born," said Montezuma, "let that come which must come." "I am a man," said Frederick the Great, "and therefore born to misfortune. But I will oppose to misfortune the constancy of a man. I will breast the storm." "Human courage," said General Robert E. Lee, "should rise to the height of human calamity!" Many, strange and terrible were the calamities which afflicted the great men whose bodies are now buried in peace under those ancient roofs, but they wrestled with them and they conquered. The lesson is not lost upon the minds of the young. One day, more than a hundred years ago, a poor bookseller's boy came into the abbey, groaning under the weight of a load of books which he had to carry to the house of his master's customer. Tired out, the poor boy came in at the great north door, and sat down to rest. And as he sat down he burst into involuntary tears as the thought came into his mind, "I am nothing but a poor bookseller's boy, and I shall have nothing to do all my life long, but to trudge the streets of London under those heavy burdens!" And then, lifting up his eyes, he caught sight of the statues of the great and good everywhere around him; and he thought "these men became great, many of them from positions of poverty and obscurity, why should not I?" The boy dried his tears, he shouldered his burden; and the sacred fire of a noble purpose was kindled in his heart. He grew up to be the eminent and saintly Dr. William Marshman, the first who translated the Holy Scriptures into the dialect of Hindostan; one of the earliest of our great missionaries to that new empire, and the father-in-law of the stainless hero, Sir Henry Havelock, who saved India in the terrible mutiny, and died like Wolfe in the hour of victory. But for that rest in the abbey, the story of India might have had a different ending, and a poor little human life might have been crused under its commencing difficulties. Longfellow sings, in words which, like so many of his words, have become proverbial :

"Lives of great men all remind us,
We may make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time

Footprints, which perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
Some forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing may take heart again."

But the "lives of great men" become infinitely more real and vivid to our memories when they are, as it were, brought before us in tangible presentment :

"Ever their statues rise before us,
Our loftier brothers but one in blood,
At bed and table they lord it o'er us,
With looks of beauty and words of good."

IV. And the lessons derived from these memorials may be both indirect and direct. They may be indirect, yet very precious. What nation, for instance, can afford to let go of any influence which may help to save it from vulgar and common-place views of life; from false types of excellence; from the paltry competition which strives above all things after material success; from the dedication of current popular opinion; from the desire to swim with the stream and to spread the sails to the passing breeze? The memorials of the great and good may tend to inspire purer hopes and loftier aspirations. They will show, as is shown over and over again in the abbey, that the best, the greatest, the most revered by posterity have often been, in their own lifetime, utterly unsuccessful as the world counts success. They have been often intensely unpopular and miserably poor. They have been surpassed in all earthly comforts and possessions by hundreds of common-place swindlers and gorgous criminals. They have enjoyed to the utmost the bitter beatitude of malediction. They have cut against the grain of indurated prejudices. Kings have frowned on them, and priests anathematized. But they would not throw away to-morrow forever, in order to secure to-day. "Fools counted their lives madness and their end to be without honor. How are they counted among the children of God and their lot among the saints!"

V. And the lessons of instructive human lives may be brought home, in such places, directly as well as indirectly. The picturesque sensibility of the late Dean of Westminster was shown again and again in the mottoes, texts, and titles which he selected to inscribe on various tombs and statues. On the cenotaph of John Wesley is carved his last utterance, "The best of all is, God is with us." On the grave of Livingstone are carved the last words found written in his diary, "All I can say in my solitude is, may Heaven's best blessing rest on everyone, Englishman, American, or Turk, who shall help to heal this open sore of the world,"—the slave-trade. On the bust of Lord Lawrence is the inscription, "He feared man so little, because he feared God so much." I might quote many other instances. The wisdom of Athens trained her youth in virtue by moral sentiments and inscriptions upon her Herme. The future Westminster Abbey of America, like that of England, might thus silently teach a thousand rich and memorable lessons.

VI. Once more; such a building is not without its blessed power in making for peace and unity, and brotherly love, amid the deplorable bitterness of political and religious warfare. In the abbey, Catholic bishop and Protestant dean lie side by side, and men who in their lifetime would have burnt each other. There is the memorial of Milton, and the tomb of Bishop Sprat who thought the name of Milton was a pollution to the abbey walls. There, side by side, "Regno Consortes et urna," in the stately tomb of the Tudors, lie the sister queens, Elizabeth, who burnt Catholics, and Mary, who burnt Protestants. There, side by side, are the memorials of statesmen whose lives were internecine warfare. The tear shed on the grave of Fox will trickle to the coffin of Pitt, and Disraeli stands side by side with Peel. The abbey is "the great temple of silence and reconciliation" wherein mingles the mortal dust of the fercest rivals, and where lie buried the animosities of thirty generations in that common grave to which glory and obscurity must alike descend. "Oh eloquent, just, and mighty death," exclaimed the brilliant and unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh, "whom none could advise tithed hath persuaded; what none hath dared thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered thou only hast cast out of the world and despised. Thou hast drawn together all the far-stretched greatness, all pride, cruelty and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, 'Hic Jacet.'"

It would be impertinent in me to add that every American can add far better for himself—the names of the statesmen, the heroes, the philanthropists, the poets, the orators, the eloquent men and fathers who begat us, who would already claim a proud place in a building devoted to the reception and memorial of the mighty dead. All your history would gradually crystalize round such a nucleus. It would become the eternal memorial of all your fame. Ingenious youth would there find the cenotaphs of men like Raleigh and Penn, and Governor Bradford and Miles Standish; and the names of the Pilgrim Fathers; and busts and statues of the civil and military heroes of the War of Independence; of Jefferson and Otis, and Patrick Henry and George Washington; and the heroes and martyred President of your Civil War. Just as the Church of "St. Paul outside the walls" of Rome has medallions of the long line of popes downwards from Saint Peter, so your Valhalla would have pictures of the lengthening line of presidents from Washington. And there would be the sculptured features of your sweet singers, Bryant and Longfellow; and of your eminent thinkers, Thoreau and Emerson; and of your great historians, Washington Irving, and Prescott and Motley; and of such orators as Henry Clay and Daniel Webster; and of your men of genius like Nathaniel Hawthorne and Edgar Poe; and of your great theologians, Jonathan Edwards and Channing; and of your earliest bishops like Seabury and White. And there, when they sink to the grave, full of years and full of honors, would be placed in due time the memorials of such writers as Bancroft and Parkman, and Lowell and Whittier and Holmes. But I must stop. Perhaps I have already said too much. But I have written only by special request and urgent invitation, and I believe that I shall be pardoned for words dictated by that profound admiration for America which with me is not a feeling of yesterday, but has been expressed by me in many public places in England for more than twenty years.—Brooklyn Magazine.

CHARITY TOWARD OTHER CHRISTIAN BODIES.

We must of necessity become more and more humble. In the light of the Spirit of Truth we must learn to recognize not only our own weakness and feebleness as a portion of Christ's Church, for this is evident enough to all the world, but we must learn also to recognize our own sinfulness and unfaithfulness, our own worldliness and lukewarmness.

This humble estimate of ourselves, if it is genuine, must manifest itself especially in our dealings with those who are not in communion with us. We are surrounded by multitudes of our fellow-countrymen who believe in our Lord Jesus Christ, who worship Him as God, who rely upon His atoning death, who hope for His return, and yet who seem to us not to be following Him fully in the ways of His Church. Let us never venture to lift up ourselves against such in a spirit of self-complacency. We may rejoice in possessing an apostolic ministry, and give thanks that the Divine Presence of Jesus in His Holy Sacrament has not been withdrawn from our altars. But what will these blessings avail us in the Day of Judgment, if, in spite of all, we ourselves shall then be weighed in the balances and be found wanting? In that great day it is to be feared that there will be many bishops, clergy, and Churchmen on the left hand who will receive only the sorer condemnation on account of their high privileges; while on the right hand, it is certain that multitudes will find mercy, who, though by devious paths, have at last attained unto Him in whom alone is eternal salvation, Jesus Christ the Lord. Let us see to it, then, that, realizing our own shortcomings, we shun all self-sufficient pride or arrogance in thought, word, or deed toward those of our brethren round about us who call upon the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and yet who follow not with us. What have we that we have not received? Shall we dare to boast? Can we show, at any rate in the recent history of our Church, any act of self-sacrificing faith greater than that manifested by the Free Church of Scotland at the time of the disruption? Can we boast that, according to our professedly high standard and requirements, candidates for Holy Orders among us are more carefully selected and better trained than are the theological students of the Established Church? Can we point in all our charges to congregations preparing for the reception of the Blessed Sacrament before the great festivals, with as much zeal and purpose as are frequently displayed among Presbyterians before the general communions? Can we boast of a laity giving, as a general rule, out of their substance more, or even as much, as is given by the lay members of the two great voluntary bodies of Scotland?

Reflections suggested by such questions as these must of necessity humble us, and, if we are being led by the Holy Spirit, we shall not only be contrite toward God, but also modest and charitable in all we say and do with regard to our Presbyterian brethren, remembering always that humility and charity are not only consistent with, but should be the necessary outcome of strong conviction, when that conviction is based upon truth.—Bishop of Argyll and the Isles.

FAITH.

BY FLORENCE ROWENA HILL.

I cannot see the loving Face above me,
Nor His great wisdom can I understand,
In the deep darkness here below
All that I cling to, all I know,
Is that He walks with me and holds my hand.

The way is dim, I cannot see before me,
I know that danger lurks on every side,
Through darkness pass I know I must,
What better can I do than trust I
His love protects me, whatso'er betide.

And through all doubt I follow Him so gladly,
Knowing if sin and sorrow must be passed,
Bravely I'll try to do my part,
It may be with an aching heart,
But I shall see my Father's face at last.

THE ART OF CATECHISING.

BY THE REV. GEORGE HODGES.

II.

The definition of catechising as a species of echo-getting suggests some obvious truths which one will do well to follow who aspires to be an A. C. M.—an Artium Catechisæ Magister—a master of the arts of catechising.

The first of which is, that he who will get an echo must have somewhat to say. The catechist must prepare himself. Children are keen critics, and always know when the instructor is teaching against time. Catechetical instruction, like all other effective teaching, must be logical—logical, not only in that the different parts of each lesson hold together, but in that the successive lessons themselves follow naturally one after the other. It is not a good plan to teach about Adam and Eve on one Sunday, the Tenth Commandment on the next, and, on the following Sundays, the apostolical succession, the Lord's Prayer, and the second missionary journey of St. Paul. The catechist must have a plan. He must teach on Sunday, as others do on Monday and Tuesday, by lesson after lesson. Indeed, the entire scheme of Sunday instruction will grow in efficiency in proportion as it is approximated nearer and nearer to the model of the modern graded school.

I need not say here, before you, what a deep and imperative necessity there is that the catechist speak not only out of a full mind but out of a full heart, burdened with a great sense of responsibility, urged by a "woe is me if I" teach "not the Gospel," in the consciousness of God's presence, after much prayer. I need not say, in view of the sacred duties and the solemn trusts of a teacher, that he must be a Churchman and a communicant, a lover of the Church which he is to bring others to love, one who has himself gone along the way by which he is sent to lead others, who does not venture upon work which demands more than human wisdom without a constant coming to that blessed Sacrament where help and blessing are to be abundantly found. Earnestness and reverence, loyalty to Christ and His Church, love for souls, a good life, do not enter into the "art" of catechising. They lie deeper than any "art." They are the very breath and life of catechising.

It is quite apparent, that if you wish to get a clear echo you must not talk too much yourself. You must give the echo a chance. Sometimes catechists answer all the questions themselves. Sometimes they use such long words that the echo misses them. You remember how it was said of Dr. Johnson that if he were to write a fable about little fishes he would make the little fishes talk like whales. We need to be reminded that little fishes cannot talk like whales, and cannot be expected to understand the whale dialect. Sometimes catechists say so much that they tire out the echo. A Berkeley divinity student was overheard endeavoring to take a class of little girls through the five books of Moses in thirty-five minutes. Teachers of experience say that one idea is as much as a Sunday-school can well get hold of in a lesson. Accordingly, it is a good plan to determine beforehand what one chief meaning you want your children to remember in the lesson, and to dwell on that at length. Too many children, if they should be asked after school what the teacher taught, would have to answer like the little girl who was always asked after service what the sermon was about, and who always replied that it was about "being good." Suppose the lesson is the plague of serpents in the wilderness. A dozen phases of the subject suggest themselves. You may talk of geography, plagues, snakes, prayer, types, history, minerals, Providence, temptation, or ritualism. Take only one of these; put the rest in the background. If you have read Baring-Gould's "Sermons to Children," you will choose Temptation as your topic; and by question and comment you will bring out a teaching like this: Here were God's people in the wilderness, smitten by a grievous plague. Before, the plague had fallen upon enemies, Egyptians; now, it was the Israelites themselves who were suffering. Their first thought seems to have been "Moses must pray." When he had prayed before—that God might take a mere discomfort, as frogs, away from a nation of heathen—an answer had come speedily; surely, if he pray again that from God's own chosen people may be taken away this fatal curse of snakes, he will be heard instantly, and the plague will cease. And so Moses prayed that God might drive these poisonous serpents away. God drove away not one. He left them there in (swarms) numbers. In the scant grass, under the stones, hidden in the sand, there they lay as before just as many and just as venomous. What God did do was to tell Moses to make a serpent of brass and set it on a pole, with the promise that whoever was bitten, if he looked there, would live. And the plague went on. The boy who was building castles in the sand felt a sudden sting; there was a little red mark, with a white circle around it; yesterday a boy who had that mark on his finger died in a few hours. But this boy runs away as fast as he can to the pole, and looks up at the image of brass, and by and by he goes back again to play, and is all well—just as well as St. Paul was after the snake bit him at Malta. God didn't take away the serpents, but He gave a cure for their (pardon) sting. We are surrounded with temptations, just as the Israelites were with snakes. Sometimes we wish that God would drive them all away. He does not do that. Temptations are close about us daily. But He gives us a way of escape. He points us to the Cross. He tells us to pray. He gives strength to resist. Remember that when you are tempted to say a bad word this week. A snake has stung you. Hurry to our Lord. Ask Him to help you, and He will.

To get a clear echo, you must not stand too far away. The catechist must get near to the children. St. Chrysostom's pulpit was so close to his congregation that he could touch the foremost man with his hand. But it is another kind of nearness I was thinking of—nearness of mind and heart. The catechist must be able to put himself in the children's place. He must be interested in what interests them. He must know what kind of games the boys play, and what the girls talk about at recess. He must begin from these things, and lead the children up to that which interests him. Here he has for an example our Blessed Lord Himself. Nothing was too homely or common for the Divine Teacher to notice—a grain of corn, the weeds among the wheat, a candle, a basket, a red sky, a penny, the birds, the lilies, men looking for the best seats, men drawing down long faces feigning piety, the poor woman putting in a farthing, boys and girls playing in the streets—He saw all, spoke about them, took them for texts. We fail to interest children when we are so far away from them, above them, that we do not know what the children are interested in.

Some of you will remember one of Mr. Stockton's ingenious stories called "The Queen's Museum." The queen built a museum, and filled its shelves according to her own taste. She was immensely pleased with it—much more pleased than her subjects were. When these disloyal people were enticed into the museum they stood before the cabinets and simply yawned. Forthwith the queen made a decree that every one who was not interested in her museum should have no opportunity to exercise the bad taste of being interested in anything else, but must go to prison. The population, being an uncommonly honest one, and declining to feign an interest it did not feel, was soon under lock and key. Large temporary jails had to be erected to hold the people. At last a benevolent stranger, desirous of mending this sad state of things, volunteered to discover some curiosity which, being placed in the museum, might attract an uninterested populace, and secure a universal jail delivery. He laid the problem before a magician. "What," inquired the magician, "are the people interested in?" "Indeed, I do not know." "Find out, and come back." So the benevolent stranger found out. He inquired of everybody what interested him most, and having noted down all the answers, from white elephants to fishing-tackle, he returned to the magician. "Abracadabra!" said the magician, and the museum was new-stocked. There was no more need for jails. Peace, happiness, and harmony reigned once more. Then it was revealed that the queen, at the beginning, had filled the cabinets with specimens of all known species of button-holes! Sometimes, when we are tempted to discouragement, and begin to think of juniper-trees, it may be well to remember the queen and her museum. No amount of scoldings, ominous silences, black looks, laid marks, desk-poundings, or bell-rings can compel children to be interested in theological ecclesiastical button-holes. The catechist must begin from the children's point of view. Let him talk to the school in his own words, without book, use plain words, draw his illustrations from familiar sources, tell a story whenever he can, telling it always as dramatically as possible, acting it out; let him never be afraid to make the children laugh; above all, including all, let him love children, and he is sure to master in due time the art of catechising.

WHY IS THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY WANING?

We are told that the waning influence of the ministry is due to the growing indifference of the people, and a want of proper respect for the priestly office.

This may be, doubtless is true, but yet this does not answer the question "Why?" The cause lies, mainly, with the ministry as a body, and the root of the matter is simply that the ministry—with only here and there a notable exception—no longer sets any worthy example of the Christ-like life.

They live, more or less luxuriously, as their means will permit. Many a poor Christian man or woman in the flock, who out of slender hard earned means help to pay the salary and build the rectory, leads a far more self-sacrificing life than his or her minister even dreams of, unless, perhaps, when he feels called upon to preach a stirring discourse to his people to increase their gifts towards the support of the Church. Why, some of our divinity students, as far as they can, live softly and fare sumptuously every day, and then get up in the pulpit and preach about their "high office," and call upon the congregation to deny themselves and take up the cross and follow in the footsteps of the lowly Jesus, all the time themselves setting no example of self-denial.

Verily, the scourge of small corals, with which He drove out in His holy indignation the profaners of the temple, would be needed again to eject those who now profane His Church by lives so directly in opposition to every precept which He laid down, and so glaringly opposed to the blessed pattern of His wonderful life.

Purify the priesthood, and the effect will soon be seen in the people.

There is nothing now in the Christianized world which so surely commands the deepest and most reverent respect amongst all classes of people, as the individual who is known to have laid aside self and all self-seeking, and whose life is truly consecrated to Christ-like work, regardless of personal ease or any other earthly consideration.

If any one should doubt this assertion, let that person seek its verification amongst those angels of mercy who go about doing good, and whose simple garb and sweet serene faces proclaim their mission. Learn of them how they go unharmed in the low and dark streets of New York. And why? Because the poor, vicious men and women there recognize the spirit of their lives, and know that any want of respect to them would be an act of violence to the spark of goodness in themselves and the purest memories of their past lives.

Thanks be to God that we still have, in the ministry and out of it, a few righteous souls who are trying to do God's work upon this earth. But we do need another Reformation, not now so much of doctrine as of life and example. Spiritual wickedness does, indeed, sit in high places. Vanity, luxury, self-indulgence, and overbearing pride mark too many of those who have taken upon themselves the special ambassadorship of the "meek and lowly One."

No wonder that Infidelity laughs, and Indifference shrugs its shoulders at the average Christianity of to-day, when a bishop of the Church rises in his place and preaches of the pure and holy One to young and old candidates for confirmation, and then goes from the pulpit to dine and wine with some wealthy parishioner.

A good woman once remarked, in view of this lamentable condition of things, that she thought it would help to eradicate the evil if, as a test of a young man's fitness for Holy Orders, he could be required, upon the completion of his theological course, to give himself to any missionary work in the far away wilds for five years, the field of his work to be assigned to him by his bishop, thus removing him from the pampering life of our large cities, with ample opportunity to prove himself; and any young man not willing to give himself, in the first flush of his enthusiasm, to such arduous work should be deemed unfit, through lack of ardor, for the office of the priesthood. Sooner or later some such test will have to be applied to each candidate for Holy Orders, or else we shall see worse disrespect than ever in the people who will not tamely submit to have a spurious priesthood foisted upon them. This sentiment of scorn and indignation may yet be the salvation of the very priesthood which now seems but feebly to realize the need of purification in its midst, in order to strengthen its influence and power for good abroad.

Not all the batteries of Infidelity, combined with scientific research in deadly assault, can possibly do the harm to Christ's religion and the great truths of His Written Word that is daily and hourly inflicted upon it by those who profess to love and live for God, and then perjure themselves, and bring scorn upon His Church and Bible by living in open contradiction of their solemn vows and the precepts of that Blessed Book which they proclaim to be their guide and rule of life.

See to it, then, ye solemnly ordained ones, lest, when you have preached to others, you yourselves be cast away.

WHAT GEORGE MACDONALD SAYS ABOUT "FAITH."

"To think a thing is only to look at it in a glass—to know it, as God would have us know it, and as we must know it to live, is to see it as we see love in a friend's eyes—to have it as the love the friend sees in ours. To make things real to us is the end and the battle-cause of life. We often think we believe what we are only presenting to our imaginations. The least thing can overthrow that kind of faith. The imagination is an endless help towards faith, but it is no more faith than a dream of food will make us strong for the next day's work. To know God as the beginning and the end, the root and cause, the giver and enabler, the love and joy and perfect good, the present one existence in all things and degrees and conditions, is life. And faith, in its simplest, truest, mightiest form, is to do His will in the one thing revealing itself at the moment as duty. The faith that works miracles is an inferior faith to this, and not what the old theologians call a saving faith."—Donal Grant (Chap. i.)

DEATH OF A FAITHFUL PRIEST.

BY A. H. N.

The Church in Mexico has just lost a most faithful presbyter, the eldest of the seven ordained in this city by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Lee in 1875. The Rev. Ignacio Maruri, rector of the Church of San Francisco, in the City of Mexico, passed away on Wednesday, the 7th inst., and was followed to the grave to-day. He had long been in feeble health, but remained "faithful unto death." Last Sunday he celebrated the Holy Communion in San Francisco, though scarcely able to stand, and his last words to his people were to exhort them not to neglect the Lord's Supper. His funeral to-day was attended by the Protestant ministers of all denominations in the City of Mexico. The burial service from the Spanish Prayer Book was used for the first time in the Mexican Church.

Mr. Maruri was born May 8, 1817, in Guadaluajara, of Roman Catholic parents. At a very early age he entered the Mexican army as a cadet and continued a soldier until about twenty years ago. He was among the first to join the Mexican Church movement in 1849. From the time of his ordination in 1875, he has not failed to read daily Morning Prayers in his church, unless prevented by illness. He was the first in Mexico to propose the reorganization of this work as a mission of the American Church, and labored diligently to the very day of his death to accomplish that end. He leaves a widow wholly unprovided for, and there were ten orphan boys under his care.

Although the name of this venerable clergyman was scarcely known outside of the work to which he devoted the last ten years of his life, it seems fitting that his death should be brought to the notice of Churchmen in America, and perhaps be the means of directing their attention to the efforts being made to place the Church in Mexico in a position to enable it to accomplish the good it set out to do. Letters to the Church papers, stating the present condition of the Church here, were being prepared when the news of Mr. Maruri's death was received. The loss of such an earnest worker will be sorely felt, especially at this time. The last words of Mr. Maruri to the writer were sad ones, full of disappointment and discouragement. God grant that the bright days for which he watched so long, but died before seeing, may speedily come to those who take up his work where he laid it down.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

ETHEL'S VISIT AT ROWDEN.

I.

"And I may stay two whole weeks, really and truly, mamma?" cried Ethel Ray, her eyes sparkling with delight.

"Yes, indeed, love!—that is," added her mother, wistfully. "I shall miss you every day dear ——" "Yes, indeed!" echoed Ethel's papa cheerily, "we have made up our minds to miss you; so you are not to show yourself here again in two weeks, remember! And now hurry and gather your traps, for it is full time we were starting."

"I'm quite ready, papa. Goodbye, mamma darling! Oh, you won't forget that your sleeping powders are in the little box with a glass top?"

"And here's the store book, in your drawer. Oh, and Dick's shoes will be done to-night; you'll send him for them, mamma?"

"Come along, child!" laughed her papa, you must leave us all to our fate now, or give up your visit to Rowden; the train is due in fifteen minutes."

"One more kiss then, mamma!" and Ethel snatched up her pretty satchel and tripped away. And when the important train left the station it had a bright-faced young passenger aboard, "duly ticketed and checked," as her papa said, and snugly settled for a pleasant journey.

"Goodbye, Chick!" said her papa; "Don't worry your little head about home matters, but have a real good time, mind!"

His little daughter felt like obeying this command to the letter. She could not help smiling to herself for very pleasure as the train sped away; it was such a delightful experience, setting off by herself in this way; and then the charming visit in prospect.

"Years ago," as she said, when but a mite of a child, Ethel had spent a few days at the home of her papa's cousin, Mrs. Mason, and her dim recollections of it were as of a fairy land. And now she was in-

"Here is my little cousin, all safe!" said Mrs. Mason, affectionately. "Now ponies, make haste and take us home! Do you remember how the old place looks, darling?"

"Oh, yes, Cousin Sybil, I remember the lake, and the boat-house, and the swing, and the soldier up on top of the barn that shows which way the wind is, and oh, ever so many things!"

They were all there, the lake, in all its tranquil beauty; the boat-house, with its tempting boats; the old soldier, still on guard; the terraced garden, and lovely grounds; and our dear little Cousin Harold, ready to do the honors and show Ethel all over the place. How charming it all was!

Before many hours had passed, Ethel's brow had quite lost its care-worn pucker, and she seemed a merry child again, as she rambled and frolicked with Harold.

"Oh, de'ar papa and mamma!" she wrote after her first two days at Rowden, "I am having such a grand time!"

"I go out rowing with Harold two or three times a day, and I can row quite nicely already, they say. And I am learning to ride horse-back, too. And the house is just full of pretty things; and Cousin Sybil and Col. Mason and all are so kind!"

"I thank you all the time in my heart for letting me come. And I hope mamma is feeling nicely, and does not want me very much. Your loving, ETHEL."

The second week of Ethel's visit had begun, and so far every day had brought her some new and unexpected pleasure, for her kind friends seemed determined that their little guest should enjoy her stay to the utmost. But the best of all, it seemed, was yet to come.

"IT WAS A VERY THOUGHTFUL FACE WHICH WAS FRAMED BY THE UPRAISED HOOP."

vised there for two whole weeks! "Cousin Sybil is just as kind as she can be!" thought the happy child.

"And there she is herself, waiting for me!" she exclaimed, when the train reached Rowden Station. And in her haste to get out she would have left her satchel on the seat if an old gentleman had not smilingly handed it to her.

Ethel was resting after a morning ride, and was amusing herself with a portfolio of fine engravings, when Harold came running to find her, his cheeks all aglow with excitement.

"Oh, Cousin Ethel," he cried, "where do you think we are going to-morrow?"

"You'll never guess! We're all going to Mount Wayne to spend the day. Oh, you can't think how lovely it is there! And the Eltons are to meet us, and we'll have a picnic dinner, you know; and we can see the cave, and oh, it will be so nice!"

"Papa said I'd better not think too much about it, for fear it might rain; but if it does, we can go the next day, you know. Now, aren't you glad?—as glad as I am?"

"Yes, indeed; I think it will be delightful!" cried Ethel, who had heard a good deal about Mount Wayne.

"There! Now I must go to old Mrs. Brown's with that basket of peaches. I almost forgot it! Don't you want to walk down there with me, Ethel? Oh no; you said you were tired, so I won't let you! But get all rested, so we can have a run with our hoops when I come back; that's a darling cousin!"

Ethel laughed, and promised the hoop race. Then, as Harold bounded away she went on with the portfolio, and was so much interested in the beautiful pictures that she did not notice when Colonel Mason entered the parlor with his wife. They did not see Ethel, and went on talking about a letter which Mrs. Mason held in her hand.

"It is quite too bad!" she said. "I don't think I ought to tell the child anything about it. She certainly needs this little change, if ever a child did—and deserves it, too!"

"Do you suppose Alicia is really any worse?" asked the Colonel.

"Probably not; but if she is a little more nervous than usual, I don't wonder they think so."

Ethel started, on hearing her mamma's name. What had happened? Her hands trembled as she laid the engravings aside; and, when Mrs. Mason saw her frightened face, she came hastily forward and kissed her.

"I did not know you were there, Ethel dear; you need be alarmed. Yes, I have just had a letter from Aunt Susan. She says your mamma seems very poorly; but I do not think it is anything serious, or your papa would have let us know."

"Poor mamma, I'm afraid she misses me!" said Ethel. "Do you know, Cousin Sybil, she always says I make her feel better, just stroking her head when it aches. Isn't it strange?"

"I have no doubt she misses you, dear; but she will soon have you at home again. And, in the meantime, you must run about, and play all you can, so as to go back bright and well. That is the best way to fit yourself to be a good nurse, you know."

Ethel smiled faintly, but she felt restless and uneasy. She went out to find her hoop, and was ready for her game with Harold, and then went downwards towards the gate to meet him.

It was a very thoughtful face which was framed by the upraised hoop, as the little girl sauntered slowly down the walk.

"Perhaps I ought to go right home, this afternoon!" was the feeling of her heart. But then came the thought of the picnic at Mount Wayne, and of the four more happy days which she had so counted upon.

"Papa said I mustn't think about home until the two weeks are up! Papa would write if he wanted me to come home!"

And seeing Harold running up the road, Ethel trundled her hoop down to meet him. A lively race followed, with Snap and Midget, the dogs both chasing the flying hoops.

"Oh, Ethel!" Harold exclaimed, as they were summoned to dinner; "it is the best fun in the world having you here. I wish you needn't ever go home!"

But this remark brought back very sober thoughts to Ethel's mind. She watched Cousin Sybil's face, while at dinner, and fancied that she looked rather grave and troubled in spite of the pleasant chat which she kept up.

After dinner Ethel followed her to the sitting-room. "Cousin," she said; "don't you think I had better go home to-day? Do you think mamma needs me? I'm afraid she does."

Mrs. Mason hardly knew what to reply, but after a moment she took from her pocket a telegram and gave it to Ethel, who read these words:

"Do not send Ethel if it grieves her very much. F. E. RAY."

"Why, this is from papa: what does it mean, Cousin Sybil?"

"I think, dear, he must have known what Aunt Susan had written; but he does not want you to shorten your visit if it will make you feel very badly. I am sure it would grieve us all, my darling!"

Ethel's eyes had rested upon a beautiful motto which hung over the lounge on which her cousin sat:

"Even Christ pleased not Himself."

The words seemed to help her to decide.

"If you please, dear cousin," she said, trying to smile, "I think I would rather go home this afternoon."

Mrs. Mason kissed her very fondly.

"You are a dear child!" she said. "But now run away and make much of the two hours before we must start for the station! I will pack up your things and you can have one more nice row on the lake."

"There comes Harold: I don't know what he will say to you!" she added, shaking her head playfully.

Harold had a good deal to say; but for all this, and her own many regrets, Ethel felt glad every moment on the way home, that she had not pleased herself by staying longer.

ART.

M. ALEXIS AXITELLE, a pupil of Gerôme, took this year the Grand Prix de Rome.

The frieze of the Hartford memorial arch is gray terra cotta, made of New Jersey clay. The arch itself is built of brown stone.

THIRTY-TWO artists have been knighted in England since the foundation of the Royal Academy; Sir J. D. Linton, a painter in water colors, is the last to receive the honor.

THE "Ornithologist," a picture by Millais, in the academy, has been sold to Australia for $25,000. That far-off country is coming to be one of the best markets for fine pictures.

A MONUMENTAL bust, in bronze, of Washington Irving has been finished by a sculptor in Brunn, Austria, for Dr. Werner, of this city, who will present it to Central Park.

DURING the discussion of "Aestheticism in Worship," at the Church Congress, on Wednesday morning, October 22, many suggestive and valuable ideas were advanced concerning the uses and relations of the beautiful in divine worship. Its mystical essence and its spiritual genesis were generally recognized. Yet not a little haziness, as might have been anticipated, was felt in the air during the elucidation of a subject that always fits from the grasp of a searching analysis.

The beautiful was recognized as a radiance from One Who hath appeared out of Zion in perfect beauty. But in the particulars of divine worship, the purely representative and symbolical ministry of the beautiful was, at best, very dimly recognized, if at all. The decorative office of the beautiful, even in the sanctuary, seemed to express the conclusion of most of the thinking, that is, the superficial graces and harmonies of color and form which refresh and stimulate the sensibilities and perceptions in finely considered artistic embellishments of houses and homes, are to reappear in costlier and better elaboration in the sanctuary of the Lord. Indeed, the Levitical prescriptions given under divine inspiration or command are referred to in favor of a religious aestheticism, while no one attempted to establish the spiritual significances and meanings which quickened every thought, and the minutest particular of construction, material, color, and texture, up to the jeweled, mystic splendor of the high priest's glowing breast-plate. It would have been quite in place to insist that God makes and does nothing without a substantive meaning. There is no such thing as a dumb, insignificant color, hue, tone, sound, form or perspective. There are neither cyphers nor zeros in the divine economy. A sanctuary adorned in a purely conventional spirit, under the direction of a refined and sensitive culture, is nothing holier and better than a drawing-room or state apartment, as to the offices of the beautiful.

In the sanctuary, a spiritual significance attaches to every particular of color, form, material and sound, or the beautiful has an earthy, meretricious flavor. The beauty of holiness is specific, necessary, constitutional. It is the definite and articulate expression of spiritual and heavenly truths, and experiences. It lies in the plane of that supernatural intelligence that makes the earth and all that is therein, as well as the firmament and the heaven's vocal and declarative of the glory of God. And unless the beautiful so set forth in the garniture of the sanctuary is found declarative of the divine glories, accordantly with the earthly and heavenly voices, we have nothing better than "sweet bells jangled out of tune," dispersed and unrelated elements untouched with life.

Here lies the inner distinction between aestheticism in its social or secular and its religious development. In its worship, its touchstone is disclosure—proclamation of the Divine Beauty after a mystic yet intelligible manner. We do not strain, vainly, after the evangel of the Dove, or the Lamb, or the Vine and its clusters, or the Sheaf of Wheat, or the ruddy blood-color, or the glistening whiteness of vestments for priest and altar, or the glow of silver and golden vessels, or the burning candles, lighted for Him who is verily and forever the Light of the World.

Anything outside and below this range of holy significances is mere bric-a-brac—an exploiting of the merest diletantism.

And there is neither room nor place nor use for prettiness, or sensuous or unspiritual grace, in that which sets forth the Eternal Holy of Holies in a living figure. Here is where we are endangered by the unconscious impiety and profanity of the mere decorator. Many a well-meaning clergyman and vestry have been unknowingly put off with the counterfeit presentment of religious art in church and chancel embellishment.

Spiritual significance is the secret of mediæval Christian art. The fervor of prayer, the breath of praise, the joy of faith, the aspiration for heaven, are all within it, and constitute its life. When we pray and adore and love and aspire as did our elder brothers, the cathedral builders and artificers of sanctuaries and their adornments, we shall begin to read them and their works aright, and learn how to take up and carry forward their beautiful labors of love and faith.

L'AVENIR A MONTELE. The only French Episcopal paper. Yearly subscription, $1.50. First issue begins October 15th, 1884. Editor Rev. C. MILL, pastor of Saint Saviour, Philadelphia. Address 315 South 21st St., Philadelphia, Pa.

PARAGRAPHIC.

NEAR Chatham, N. C., an oak tree has grown from the grave of a man who was buried seventy-five years ago. The tree is now five feet in diameter.

THERE was collected for the Ladies' Home Missionary Society last year, in cash, stores, etc., $807,802. It has labored at the Five Points for thirty-five years.

THE University of Heidelberg is to come into possession of the one hundred and twenty manuscripts and several thousand printed volumes which belonged to the noted bookseller, Mr. Trübner.

The Central Committee for protecting and perpetuating the separation of Church and State in the matter of freedom of worship are doing a good work. There needs to be a constitutional provision on the subject.

THE Norwood Institute is located at Washington, and it ranks many persons of prominence among its patrons. It is under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Cabell, and has an excellent course of instruction.

IN the proprietary medicine business there was invested at the last census $10,620,000, and the annual product is valued at $14,682,000. Some twenty-five of the medicines manufactured has a large sale in England.

THE British colonies have the largest and richest forests in the world, but in Great Britain the timber land is rapidly decreasing. In Scotland, of 20,000,000 square acres only from 700,000 to 800,000 acres are wood land.

ST. MARK'S Workingmen's Club and Institute, Philadelphia, in its fifteenth annual report, shows receipts to the amount of $2,061.01, and a library fund of $491.36. It has 488 members, and is, with its various instrumentalities, in a vigorous condition.

IN the late Franco-Chinese war in Tonquin it was noticed that the bodies of the Chinese, when slain, did not decompose, but merely became discolored and like mummies, and were left, except the eyes, untouched by birds of prey. It is attributed to the effect of the opium habit upon the body.

THE register of the Hannah More Academy, the diocesan school of Maryland, shows that last year there were sixty-three pupils in attendance, and that it has graduated seventeen classes. It is at Reisterstown, Maryland, and the Rev. A. J. Rich is rector. The register fully sets forth its many advantages.

IN the year 1865 the number of insane persons in the hospitals of Massachusetts, October 1, was 1,456. In 1885, at the same date, the number was more than 3,700, or two and one-half times as many, while the increase in the population has been hardly 60 per cent. It is estimated that nine-tenths of the present patients are incurable.

CRITICS in art are not infallible. Mr. Millais painted a picture of a flood in Scotland, and floating on the stream was represented a jug, which the Scotch call a pig. Thereupon the critic, who had not seen the picture, said that the pig was so painted as to seem to be cutting his own throat, as is often said of pigs when swimming. Millais received the intelligent praise.

INDIVIDUALS in this country have given magnificent sums in the interest of education. Stephen Girard devoted $8,000,000 to this object, John Hopkins, $3,148,000, Judge Packer, $3,000,000, Isaac Rich, $1,700,000, John C. Green and his residuary legatees, $1,500,000, and Commodore Vanderbilt and Ezra Cornell, each $1,000,000. Those who have given in the hundred thousands would make a long list.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1885.

The prominent feature of Church life during the week has been the mission held in St. Luke's church, Brooklyn. The workers from abroad who have been engaged in conducting the services are missionaries belonging to the Parochial Mission Society of the Church of England, an organization which has existed in that Church for thirty years, and has lately showed very great activity. The success attending the work in the single parish of St. Luke's gives promise of very favorable results for the more extended mission to be held during Advent in New York in connection with many parishes of the city. The Church in this country has heretofore hardly at all employed efforts of this kind, for the reason that in other bodies they have seemed to be carried to an extreme, and tend to an excessive individualism, and to end often in irreligion and infidelity. If they are controlled by the Church, and the fruits are carefully garnered into the Church, these extra agencies, sanctioned by ancient usage, seem not only legitimate, but very desirable as a proper method of quickening the spiritual life of the Church's members, and bringing in those who are without. It is necessary at times to "stir the fires," however well and smoothly the machinery may be running.

The first report of Governor Swineford of Alaska has reached Washington, and gives a most interesting account of the condition and resources of that hyperborean territory. Of the rich and various natural products of the country there is not space here to speak further than to say that they are so abundant that a large population will no doubt be attracted thither in the near future. The climate, moreover, of the entire littoral region south of Bering's Strait is so far modified by a thermal current that it is more favorable to crops than are many inhabited portions of Canada, the thermometer at Sitka, for instance, rarely indicating much less than zero. The part of Governor Swineford's report, however, which most interests us is that which speaks of the native inhabitants of the territory.

The Aleuts or native Alaskans are said to be altogether different from the Indians of the United States and Canada. They belong to the same race as the inhabitants of Kamchatka, but are described as more intelligent than their congeners of Asia. They are exceedingly anxious, it is said, for the establishment of English schools, and their children show more than the average aptitude for study. The whole people may be said to be nominally Christian, having been converted by missionaries of the Greek Church. Like most of the Pacific races, however, the Aleuts are described as exceedingly intemperate and immoral, and are therefore in peculiar jeopardy from the unscrupulous and unprincipled people of the white race who are likely to resort thither, in increasing numbers. There is special need of missionary effort in that quarter, and at once, not only for the sake of the natives, but also for the sake of the white settlers of that distant portion of our country. Certainly our own Church should realize its responsibility for the religious condition of Alaska. It is interesting to remember that one of the last communications which the late venerable Presiding Bishop ever made to the Church, was a letter on the subject of a mission to that territory, which was printed not long before his death, in the columns of this journal.

Among the notable essays toward unity which distinguish the Christian thought of the day, nothing of more significance and interest has appeared than the paper entitled "The United Churches of the United States," in the last number of "The Century," by Prof. Charles W. Shields. There is not space in these columns for a summary of Prof. Shields's argument. It must suffice to say that after discussing the various points of agreement in doctrine and worship between the different religious bodies in this land, he points out with much clearness that actual unity is likely to be realized first of all in the matter of worship, and that the Book of Common Prayer must be the basis upon which such unity shall be effected. [In response to this the learned divine, Dr. J. H. Egar, urges in our columns to-day that the words "according to the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America" be stricken from the title-page of the Prayer Book.]

As regards doctrinal agreement, it is hardly to be expected, perhaps, that a Presbyterian divine like Prof. Shields should readily discern the tendency among all confessions to abandon dogmatic standards in favor of the simpler and more profound creeds and symbols of which those standards were but the attempts of particular eras or schools to give philosophical expression; but it is much to observe the readiness with which the Professor makes little of doctrinal differences, and postpones their settlement until unity shall have been substantially reached on other grounds.

It is also very significant of his breadth of learning, as well as liberality, that he should see and point out, as he does, that of the three forms of ecclesiastical polity mentioned by him—the independent, the presbyterian and the episcopal, the last is the highest, and naturally the one in which unity is to be reached, inasmuch as it includes and comprehends all that is good in each of the others.

Finally, in arguing that liturgical agreement is even now being approached, and is likely soon to be reached on the basis of the Book of Common prayer, it is instructive to note that he is careful to mention the English Prayer Book rather than our own. The reason for this, apparently, is not that he faults our Prayer Book, or prefers the English service; but it is because it will be more logical and more easy for the various Protestant bodies in the land to return to the formularies of the English mother, whose children most of them are, than to nite on the ground occupied by the American Episcopal Church, which, though she be the one faithful daughter among all the English-speaking religious bodies of the country, has hitherto been, however unjustly, regarded by the rest more as a rival than as the lawful representative of the mother. Though the professor does not say this in words, yet it is, perhaps, a fair inference from what he does say; and we do not quarrel with it.

It is more than likely that, if the many sects of English-speaking Protestants are ever to be united, it must be not by a formal movement toward the Protestant Episcopal Church, but toward the seat of Anglo-Saxon Christianity, the chair of Augustine of Canterbury.

It is greatly to be hoped that the recent elections will not too much discourage the "independent voter; for he is a most desirable factor in politics, albeit not so potent or masterful, perhaps, as he has sometimes fancied himself to be. That the late elections did not altogether go as he would have had them is probably not an unmitigated misfortune so far as he is concerned; for it must be remembered that elections are carried by ballots and not by moral essays, no matter how edifying, published in the columns of ever so respectable newspapers; and it is quite likely that the independent voter needed to be taught that success in politics must be won by entering into sympathy with the masses, and working with the masses, both in the primary meetings and at the polls.

Such leadership, moreover, would save our independent voter from that tendency toward transcendentalism in politics which continually besets the doctrinaire, and continually tempts him to forget that half a loaf is better than no bread.

Moreover, it is not to be forgotten that he is not merely for what the independent voter does or even says that he is to be valued; but it is because the fear of him and the dread of him are a wholesome terror to the machine politician, and often compel nominating conventions to place better tickets in the field than they otherwise would.

We would say, then, to the independent voter: Be not cast down. You are really more useful than, at this juncture, you appear to be. You are really the "saving element" now and here, as always and everywhere. Continue to be virtuous, and you will be as happy as it is in your nature to be; but if you would be immediately and directly successful, do not disdain to study "practical politics," and to bring your better mind and better ethics to bear upon the primary meeting as well as upon "the country at large."

The endowment of three fellowships by Professor Tyndall, one at Columbia College, one at Yale College, and one at the University of Pennsylvania, for the promotion and encouragement of original study and research in physical science, is a notable event in the history of education. For some time past it has been evident to thoughtful observers that the study of natural science was being pursued with an enthusiasm so generous and high-minded, not to say devout, that it gives promise of rising into a cult that would have a definite and by no means unfriendly relation to Christianity.

The enthusiasm of propagandism, such as is evidenced by these foundations established by Professor Tyndall, is one of the evidences of this, and as such we welcome it most cordially. When men begin to feel such love for the truth which they know, and for their fellow men who as yet know it not, that they must needs proclaim it at the cost of real devotion and genuine self-sacrifice, they are already kindred in spirit with the preachers of the true Gospel of Jesus Christ; and such evangelists are to be welcomed, not resisted.

Indeed, it has been pointed out more than once, that modern science is becoming more and more theological in temper and tone. It rests largely with Christian teachers whether it may not speedily become more religious as well as theological. Instead of the bootless antagonism that has raged so long between science and religion, it is time that the proposed relationship of the two should be recognized. Already thoughtful divines clearly see that science is but a department of theology. The time is coming, and that soon, when Christian theology will be recognized by all philosophical minds as a matter of profoundest interest and concern to science.

The temptation to indulge in "fine writing" was too great for the Boston reporter when he would give an account of Canon Farrar. This is how he begins: "Bostonians who may have fancied they detected a trace of the Gallic passion for superlatives in the traditions that have come down to us from the generation of a Bossuet or a Massillon on the scenes attending the palm days of pulpit oratory, could have found analogies to warrant their credulity, at the appearance of Archdeacon Farrar at Trinity."

After describing the crowd and the opening service, he continues: "During the chanting of a hymn a striking surplised figure was seen to move from the inner part of the sanctuary, pass to the Gospel side, and mount the steps leading to the pulpit. Every eye was turned, and it is not unfair to presume that there was a manifest tincture of personal curiosity, for this was the man whom they had thronged to see and hear."

The following goes straight to the point: "The impression, based on a survey of form, features, and bearing, as well as pulpit utterance, is that one is in the presence of a man distinctively and before all things an ecclesiastic." How disappointing it would be, after a survey of Canon Farrar, to gain the impression that he was not an ecclesiastic! But the reporter was all the more sure he was looking upon an ecclesiastical personage when he saw that the preacher wore "around his neck, and reaching far down on his face (sic) surplice, a black stole, while just behind the shoulders hung a crimson scarf somewhat suggestive of the pallium worn by archbishops in the Catholic Church as insignia of their office."

Having got the canon into the pulpit and described his dress, the reporter proceeds to describe the canon's mind: "It is, perhaps, not too great a stretch of imagination to say that his mind, as well as expression, are of the eagle kind, without the hardness or the rapacity, but with the lofty range of vision and the incisive directness of pursuit." At this point of the reporter's notes it must have occurred to him that his readers would like to know how the canon's mind is like an eagle, and so he says: "In the treatment of the subject yesterday he opens with a comprehensive glance over the whole environment, and rapidly carries the mind, by narrowing circles, into its heart and meaning."

Well, of course, as Canon Farrar is a distinguished speaker and writer, how could he be reported without some fine writing?

The Secretary of the New England Divorce Reform League suggests that on the approaching Thanksgiving Day sermons should be preached "On the Family, the divine laws by which its purity is guarded, the dangers by which it is menaced, and the precious interests involved in the issue." We gladly give a place to this suggestion, with the expression of an earnest hope that it may be generally acted on throughout the entire country. With divorce statistics and the fearful lessons which they teach, there is not space here to deal. Our own Church is honorably distinguished by the high ground she has taken in this matter, and is not negligent, it is to be supposed, in giving to her people the right kind of teaching in regard to it. Nevertheless, the evil is one that cannot be counteracted by any one religious body, no matter how influential. It threatens not merely the religious but the civic interests of the whole people. No pains should be spared to secure and utilize an agreement among all patriotic and respectable people on a subject of such vital importance; and we trust that on the one day in the year when the civil authority bids the people to worship, and then commends them to family and domestic rejoicing, all the pulpits of the land may unite in teaching the sanctity and inviolability of the family tie, and the necessity of family purity to the nation's welfare and the nation's existence.

The arrest of the perpetrators of the dynamite outrages in St. Louis, and the reported espousal of their cause by a local society of the Knights of Labor, confirm what has been said in these columns concerning the responsibility of that organization for all such crimes committed by its members. It does not matter that the order, in its representative assemblies and through its officers, condemns offences against property and society. It is sufficient that it should excite passions which it cannot control, and propose objects to be obtained without power to prevent unlawful attempts to attain them on the part of its own adherents, to fix upon it the responsibility for all the wrong that shall ensue. It is to be remembered, moreover, that even this is not the measure of its responsibility. It is committed to methods that, in being extra-legal, are liable at any moment to become unlawful, and, in going outside of the law for redress of grievances, they to that extent discredit law and antagonize it. When to this are added its secrecy, by which it is exempted from the wholesome restraint of public opinion, the irresponsible and autocratic despotism of its leaders, and the despotic and barbarous subordination of the rights of the individual to the alleged interests of the class, it is evident that our free institutions, as well as the rights of property, and the order of society, are in grave jeopardy from the growing power of the Knights of Labor.

There is an old saying that corporations have no souls. We hear of one corporation in Canada, however, which proposes to use the agencies provided for the soul's cure and culture for the betterment of its business interests. The statement was telegraphed from Montreal, the other day, that "the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, which has lost considerably by the stoppage of travel, will have a mass said in the Church of Notre-Dame de Lourdes, on Tuesday, for the cessation of the epidemic." The reason thus candidly assigned for this act of devotion and intercession strikes one, at first sight, as rather grotesque. When hundreds of people are dying under the stroke of the pestilence, and many hundreds more are agonizing in the ghastly wards of St. Roch's and other lazaret-houses, it sounds odd to hear of an intercession for the stay of the plague on the ground that somebody "has lost considerably by the stoppage of travel." Perhaps, however, the mention of this motive, instead of a higher one, is only another way of affirming that corporations are soulless. We suppose that the only interest that the aforesaid navigation company—quoad a navigation company—can have in the epidemic of small-pox is the pecuniary interest it has in the matter of more or less travel, and that it is simply honest in pleading that interest and no other, which rare honesty, again, might argue for its having a rare soul. Whether such an interest constitutes a fit ground for religious intercession, under the circumstances, is one question, and whether a thing so soulless that it cannot honestly put forward any higher plea is capable of properly making or securing a religious intercession at all is another question, the answers to which depend on certain philosophical and theological considerations, which our readers may make at their leisure.

In a letter written for publication, Mr. Spurgeon denies having said or done aught in defense of the establishment. He then goes on to point out that in his opinion the longer continuance of the establishment is not defensible, since the union of Church and State is unscriptural. Of course it goes without saying that the distinguished Baptist preacher is only logical in holding this position. It is the honorable distinction of the religious body to which he belongs, that alone of the independent sects it has been consistent in refusing to accept to the civil magistrate for the support of religion, and in declining to aspire to civil domination in matters ecclesiastical. It is hardly possible to overestimate the value of such a distinction among the religious bodies of England, and of the freedom and dignity which have for this reason seemed to belong to the Baptists. With disestablishment, however, this distinction of the Baptists will pass away. While it can hardly be said that if there had been no establishment there would have been no Baptists, it is at least certain that when the establishment shall cease, there will remain no sufficient reason for the Baptists to continue as a separate body. Whether there is at this time any such reason, is, of course, another question, concerning the answer to which we have no doubt whatever. We only say that so long as Mr. Spurgeon continues to be a Baptist, he is logical in favoring disestablishment; and that with disestablishment, he will be equally logical in ceasing to be a Baptist.

It is not merely an illustration, perhaps, of the genius which the Irish have for organizing faction against faction, but it is a stroke of genuine statesmanship that an extensive political body should have been formed called "The Irish Defence Union," whose object is to counteract the "National League," and defend the existing union with England. The organized resistance which it opposes to boycotting in all its forms will of itself do much to invite the support of all the more intelligent and influential classes; and if the organization can be wisely and energetically worked, it is more than likely that it will effectually checkmate Mr. Parnell, whose misfortune is that his movement is supported by methods that are wholly indefensible, and that must sooner or later bring his cause into utter disrepute.

The Irish Defence Union held its first meeting in London last week, and certainly succeeded in parading a good deal of social and political influence. It is said that three dukes, four marquises, fourteen earls, a score of viscounts and barons, several M. P.'s and other prominent people were placed on the executive committee, to say nothing of the chairman, who was only an earl; and that large subscriptions of money were freely made without solicitation, for the suppression of boycotting, and the other objects of the body.

How far this formidable array of the aristocracy and gentry may strike terror to the hearts of Ireland's "fierce democracy," it is hard to say. One thing is certain, however, and that is that unless the National League shall somehow or other be able to suppress boycotting and other savagery among its adherents, it will not be difficult for the "Defence Union" or any other enlightened organization of earnest, law-abiding men to withstand its influence, and finally to put it down.

DISESTABLISHMENT AND DISENDOWMENT

There is at the present day one great element of uncertainty in the political horizon of England. The two million new voters, whose enfranchisement is now a fact, have yet to record their opinions and show where they stand. What their predisposition is, no one can say with certainty. Conservatives, Liberals, and Radicals, all hope to win them. In the present condition of affairs, it can easily be seen what an impetus is given by this uncertain element to all issues which could not be brought before the existing electorate with any sure hope of success. And so it is that the Liberationists have decided to make another earnest effort in the coming campaign. They hope to win over the new voters, and thus bring about the end for which they are so desirous—the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England. Here is an important issue, and the question naturally presents itself, how should Christians in the United States, removed as they are from the scene, view this movement?

It is to be noticed that it is not merely a question of disestablishment. There may have been a time when disestablishment alone was sought, but that time is past. Disendowment—the taking from the Church the property which at present she enjoys—is now an integral part of the whole scheme, and must be kept constantly in view in our consideration of it. In fact, disendowment is to be the main strength of the movement. It is this which will form the subject of many a tempting speech to the new electors. The hope that some of the wealth of the Church will in some way come to them, will, without doubt, allure many voters; and, further, no opponent of the Church wishes for disestablishment apart from disendowment, because it would create too powerful a body within the state free from the controlling power which the state at present possesses.

Disestablishment in this way, with the accompanying disendowment, would deal a heavy blow at the Church, weakening much her power for usefulness. One may say that the introduction of the voluntary system would heal the effects of this blow, and it might. But anyone who knows how people feel who have always been accustomed to receive their religious education without directly paying for it, will realize that it would take time to train them to the new system. This blow, moreover, would fall hardest just where it can least be borne, that is on the country parishes. The church, often of great architectural beauty, is the centre of life in most of the villages of England. The vicar is the connecting link between the squire and the cottage people. All houses are open to him and, through the connection of the Church with the state, he is in a measure a state officer, whose duty it is to bring religion home to all the people of the town. These villages are generally poor, but the vicar is not dependent upon the people for his stipend. It is the endowment that guarantees the continuous presence of a pastor.

Take away now this endowment and what follows? Certainly prostration of the religious life, at least for a time. In some villages it would be utterly impossible to support a vicar, and, if upheld at all, there would be need of outside help. An idea of what would happen in the poorer parishes may be gained from the fact that in East London at the present day Dissenters are not able to uphold churches, and it is the Established Church alone which is working to spread the Gospel there. The effect which disestablishment and disendowment would have upon the poorer parishes in the country and elsewhere, is with right being brought forward very distinctly. In the rich parishes there would probably be no especially marked change in the religious life, but men may well pause and consider before they decide to take a step which would place upon an insecure basis the opportunity which the poorer classes have of hearing the Gospel.

Most important, however, is the consideration of the proposal which lies at the root of the whole movement, and which needs to be made so clear that every one may realize what its success would mean. Disestablish and disendow the Church, it is said, and devote the money thus obtained to education. The burden of the school rates upon the poor would thus be lightened, and the spread of knowledge facilitated. This sounds plausible and attractive; but, looked at more closely, its plain and simple meaning is, sacrifice religion upon the altar of education. Would that education might become in every class more extensive and more intensive, but this would be a price far too dear. It seems to me that the thought of the results of this step should cause every Christian man to look unfavorably upon the present movement. The accumulations of past generations, from gift either of the state or of private individuals, for the purpose of religious instruction and training are to be taken away and turned into other channels. This would be a very great enmity not only to Christianity, but also to the cause of religion itself. No one doubts that education can be left to make its own claims felt; but it is no right thing to cast away an inheritance devoted to the spread of religion, to give up one single advantage which past generations have left to the Church of Christ. It would be a startling thing to have the English people record their approval of such a blow at the cause of religion. This issue cannot be dimmed or blurred over. The success of the present movement would not mean merely that the people of England wish to have Church and State separate. Its real meaning would be that they give their consent to the turning to other purposes of the money at present devoted to the religious training of the nation. It is hard to see how any earnest Christian man can give his vote for such a cause.

I have looked at the question solely from the Christian's standpoint, for it is the only side upon which there can be any discussion. It is but natural that the unbeliever should oppose to the utmost of his power the "extitabilis superstitio." Mr. Labouchere, in giving a list of pledges to be exacted from Radical candidates in the coming campaign, places at the head, "the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church." Another prominent leader frankly declares, that the place of the Liberatorist is not in the chapel or in the Sunday-school, but in the Radical Club. It is not in the least surprising to find these men doing their utmost to thrust the Church from her present position and deprive her of her resources. But the strength of the movement is not here. Important allies are found in the dissenters. The one solitary aim of the English Church is to bring Christ before men. Whatever may have been her shortcomings in the past, at the present she throbs with life. The most heartfelt wish of her clergy and instructors is to be able the more effectively to spread the Gospel. The Church is striving with renewed vigor to reach a people that has been increasing with great rapidity. And yet dissenters, who have been and are doing such good work in the same great course, consent to join in a movement which will strike such a blow at their fellow Christians. Surely here is brother ranged against brother, and there is a terrible misunderstanding somewhere.

The English Church has many sins to repent of. There are many things which one would gladly see changed, none more gladly than her most loyal members. And yet in recognizing these one must not forget her excellencies. With her historical position, her organization and her comprehensiveness, Protestantism can ill afford to have her crippled as she would be by the success of the present movement. With Romanism threatening on the one hand, and on the other Materialism which is endeavoring to numb every religious feeling which man possesses, it behooves Protestants to show in deed their brotherhood by uniting, and giving the greatest possible strength to their efforts against superstition, ignorance and sin. Would that the dissenters of England might unite upon the common ground which the English Church affords them; so that the Mother Church, appropriating the different elements of the truth which they each represent, might become the better able to perform the great work. But if this cannot be hoped for, all Christian men may at least be asked to consider, if they will be doing the cause of Christ any good by joining, or encouraging the present movement for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England.

PHILIP M. WASHBURN.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

Owing to the prevalence of small-pox in Montreal, the Church Congress, which was to have met there this month, has been postponed indefinitely. This is unfortunate, as the Congress was just beginning to attain permanency among us, without having as yet made itself an assured success. The small-pox panic is spreading over the Province of Ontario, and compulsory vaccination is being enforced in large towns and cities by school trustees and others in authority.

The Diocese of Qu'Appelle, under Bishop Anson, still continues the model progressive diocese of the Dominion.

During this year eight churches have been erected, all of which are nearly free of debt. The Church Farm, of which we have heard so much of late, was formally opened on the feast of SS. Simon and Jude. The bishop has formed a "Brotherhood of Labor" in connection with the farm, which has been "founded for those who desire to help the work of the Church by the devotion of their lives and the work of their hands." The rules are very simple, the object of the brotherhood being to afford a preliminary course of training to those whose age or attainments do not warrant their admission as candidates for Holy Orders. The brothers will be admitted at a special service. For the first year they will be probationers, after which if found faithful they will be admitted for three years, at the expiration again of which period a profession can be made for any number of years that may be desired. The following are the rules:

First.—To give themselves to any work which may be set by the superior, remembering that all work, however humble, is sanctified and made honorable by being done for Christ's sake. The most humble is often the most useful.

Second.—To yield implicit obedience to the superior in all things lawful.

Third.—To attend regularly such hours of devotion as may be appointed (probably three or four).

Fourth.—To use daily a special memorial prayer for the brotherhood.

Fifth.—To observe faithfully the fasts and festivals of the Church.

MOTTO.

Ora et Labora.

If any brother will not perform the work assigned to him, or if his conduct is in any way discredit to his profession he may be at once expelled from the community by the superior. At service in the chapel and at meals the brothers will be habited in cassocks. Probably this is the first attempt of the kind in connection with the Church on this continent, and its progress will be watched with much interest. Bishop Anson seems to have the rare faculty of infusing his own zeal and enthusiasm into all those with whom he comes in contact. Toronto, it appears more than likely, will soon have a cathedral worthy of the city and diocese. At a recent meeting of the chapter a report was presented, showing that the walls of the choir and chancel had already reached a height of nine feet. The crypt or basement is to be roofed in and used for worship during the winter. A see house also in close proximity to the cathedral is being erected.

The Cathedral Church of St. John the Baptist, in St. John, Newfoundland, has been formally consecrated by the Bishops of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, assisted by a large number of clergy. There was an immense attendance of the general public and much interest was manifested. The service included a processional and recessional. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Nova Scotia.

Bishop McLean, of Saskatchewan, has been visiting the older provinces on a collecting tour. He reports his diocese in a very prosperous condition, the work among the Indians being especially flourishing. His lordship has received a bequest of $4,000 for work in his diocese, from the executors of the late James Kyffin Haldemant, York county, Ontario. The Dominion owes an unrepayable debt of gratitude to the Church Missionary Society of England for its labors among the Indians of the Northwest during the last forty years. In the Cumberland district, where there are at least 2,000 communicant members of the Church, there was perfect peace during the late rebellion. All these Indians have been Christianized through the efforts of the C. M. S.

The bishop, during his visitation, did not fail to improve the occasion by pointing out to the Indians the advantages arising from peace and orderliness, and their happy lot, as contrasted with the Indians of the West who went on the war path.

The Board of Management of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada, met recently in Kingston, and voted various sums to the Diocese of Algoma, and those in the Northwest, and the English missionary societies. After the session of the board, a Woman's Auxiliary was formed.

The Rev. G. W. Hodgson, deceased, late of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, has bequeathed the reversion of $32,000 to King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, whence he graduated. A bequest also of $2,500 has been promised by an aged friend in England upon certain conditions, which the college council have unanimously accepted. The prospects of this venerable seat of learning appears to be brightening. A lectureship in memory of the late Mr. Hodgson is to be agitated, and has already received very influential support.

ENGLAND.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP-ELECT OF SALISBURY.—The Rev. John Wordsworth, Canon of Rochester and Oriol Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, the son of the late Bishop of Lincoln, and grand-nephew of the late Poet Laureate, was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury, in succession to the late Bishop Moberly, on Oct. 28, in Westminster Day, Wednesday, October 28, in Westminster Abbey.

ARCHBISHOP BENSON'S PRIMARY VISITATION.—The Archbishop of Canterbury began his primary visitation of his diocese on Tuesday, October 20. He preceded the visitation with the celebration of the Holy Communion in the cathedral, after which he delivered his primary charge to the clergy in the chapter house. The subject of the charge was the "Seventfold Gift of the Spirit."

REOPENING OF THE CATHEDRAL OF ST. ALBAN'S ABBEY.—On Wednesday, October 21, the magnificent cathedral of St. Alban's Abbey, which has been restored at a cost of $350,000, of which $250,000 was contributed by Sir Edmund Beckett, was reopened by the Bishop of St. Alban's (Dr. Cloughton), in the presence of the mayor and corporation, most of the leading county families, and a large number of clergy. The Archbishop of York preached the sermon.

THE TAIT MEMORIAL AT CANTERBURY.—The memorial of the late Archbishop Tait of Canterbury Cathedral, was unveiled by the Archbishop of Canterbury on Tuesday, October 20. The monument stands in the north transept, and consists of an altar cenotaph of elaborate design, resting on a projecting platform and bearing an effigy. The whole is of white marble and is a work of great artistic beauty. The ceremonial of unveiling was very simple. The Archbishop having unveiled the monument, brief addresses were made by the Bishop of Dover, the Dean of Canterbury, and Earl Sydney, all of whom referred to Archbishop Tait's great aim, to make the Church of England more and more the Church of the people.

SCOTLAND.

THE REPRESENTATIVE CHURCH COUNCIL.—The Representative Church Council of the Scotch Church held its tenth annual meeting in Inverness on October 14 and 15, the Bishop of Glasgow presiding in the absence of the primate. The only matter of general interest in the proceedings was the appointment of a deputation of bishops and clergy to attend the General Convention in Chicago, 1886.

JERUSALEM.

BOOKS FOR THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS.—The Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale, of Baltimore, Md., and the Rev. A. Carr, Vicar of Wokingham, Eng., have addressed a letter to the Guardian, stating that a parcel containing forty-nine volumes, chiefly English Theological works, has been despatched to the Patriarch of Jerusalem, for the use of the training school for clergy of the Greek Church at the Convent of the Holy Cross, near Jerusalem. Among those who have contributed copies of their own works and other books are the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop-elect of Salisbury, Canon Lidon, and others.

GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Monday, November 2, being the day following the festival of All Saints, was, according to the custom of this institution, matriculation day; the number of students admitted being thirty-two. The new class is unusually large, while the examinations which, for the first time were written, gave especial satisfaction.

The matriculation services took place in the seminary chapel, the students attending in a holy, together with a large number of clergymen and laymen. Among the former were the Assistant bishop of New York and the Bishops of Albany, Northern New Jersey, and Florida. The Assistant-bishop of New York celebrated the Holy Communion. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Albany. Taking matriculation for the subject of his discourse, he spoke of the motherly relation, as the word implies, of the seminary to its students. They were to be subject to its regulations, while the seminary was to act the part of a mother, taking them under her care and protection, and bringing her influence to bear in the formation and development of their characters. This, however, the mother could not do without the willing obedience of her children. The mother and child must cooperate if the right results were to be achieved, and such co-operation, he trusted, would be the case on the part of the seminary and its students. Speaking in regard to the Church, the bishop would not insist on minor matters, but felt that the students should have very clear and decided views in regard to the Church organization. At the conclusion of these services, the clergy, students, the faculty, alumni, and trustees, repaired to Sherred Hall, when they proceeded to the site of the new deanery, on the south-east corner of the seminary grounds. On reaching the approach to the corner-stone, the students formed into double lines, between which the bishops and others passed, Psalm xlviii. being read as a processional. The assistant-bishop, standing near the corner-stone, then said: "Christian brethren, it is the lesson of Holy Scripture that, 'except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build it.' Especially do we cast ourselves on this truth when we are about to lay the corner-stone of a building which is to be the house of the deans of the General Theological Seminary, and humbly supplicate upon this work, and all who are in any way to be connected with it, the Divine assistance, protection, and blessing." He then followed with the prayers and the laying of the corner-stone, in which was placed a box containing a Bible, Prayer Book, Hymnal, a history of the seminary, journals of the General Convention, of the convention of the New York diocese, a Church Almanac, copies of the New York dailies, etc. In a brief address, he spoke of the significance of the work in hand, and especially of its bearings on the domestic life of the clergy. Addresses were also made by the Bishops of Northern New Jersey, Florida, and the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Hall. The Gloria in Excelsis was then sung, when the bishop proceeded with the concluding prayers. The services being ended, the clergy, faculty, guests and students, were entertained at the house of the dean.

It is hoped to have the walls erected, and the deanery shant in by winter, the work being completed the following year. Whether the present dean will occupy the house is uncertain; but it will probably be occupied, in any case, by some of the professors.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Archdeacon Farrar's Visit.—Archdeacon Farrar's visit to Boston was remarkable beyond his visit to any other eastern city in the interest manifested in his lectures and in his person, but it was noted especially from something not likely to find its way into the secular papers, and yet of interest to all Churchmen. It is a Boston notion, which the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks inaugurated when Dean Stanley made his memorable visit to America in 1878, to bring the clergy together for a breakfast or luncheon when the presence of an English ecclesiastic makes it worth the while. The clergy of the diocese tried this plan upon Dr. Brooks himself two or three years ago, when he returned from his extended tour to the Antipodes. These receptions had an excellent effect in bringing the clergy together as members of a great society, and, working with other unifying agencies, exerted a constant but latent influence which was manifested more and more in the common work of the diocese.

The reception given to Archdeacon Farrar

last week by the rector of Trinity church, to which the bishop and clergy of the diocese were invited, was the third of these social gatherings, and had in it elements of good fellowship and united feeling which any diocesan might court, and which the Bishop of Massachusetts has much reason to be thankful for. When he accepted the episcopate of Massachusetts, it is said that he did so in the hope that he could unite the clergy and laity of that once discordant diocese in the great work that lay before it in the central part of New England. The mildness and gentleness of his active administration have largely, though slowly, brought about that unity, and the gathering to welcome Archdeacon Farrar was memorable, from the fact that it revealed to both bishop and clergy more clearly than ever before that their old-time differences had disappeared, and that they are more strongly united in common purposes, common sympathies and common labors. Wherever Archdeacon Farrar has gone he has done something to diffuse into our ecclesiastical life the best spirit of the English Church, but in Boston he found that spirit already in possession, and did something to kindle it into flame.

BOSTON—St. James's Church, Charlestown.—A beautiful dose of white Turkish sabin has been presented to this church by a member of the congregation, and was used for the first time on All Saints' Day. At the request of the rector many members of the parish brought flowers to the church as memorials of departed friends, to be placed on the altar in the morning, and carried to the graves of the deceased after the service.

A pair of massive brass altar-vases has recently been presented to the church by a parishioner.

BOSTON—Trinity Church.—The annual meeting of the various charitable societies connected with this parish (the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks, rector,) was held in the chapel on Saturday, October 31. The rector presided, and made an address. Reports from the different branches of the work of the parish were read. The Ladies' Missionary Society reported receipts to the amount of $2,179.51, and the Industrial School to the amount of $1,927. The Employment Society cut over two thousand garments, and distributed them to different homes and hospitals. Their receipts were $1,325.26. Besides this, $438 had been used in distributing necessary articles to the poor. After the reports were read the elections for officers and managers for the year were held.

BOSTON—All Saints' Church, Dorchester.—The tenth anniversary of the entrance of the Rev. George S. Bennett on the rectoryship of this parish was observed with appropriate services during October. On Thursday, October 15, the actual date, there was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which a large number of communicants received. On Friday there was a reception of the children of the parish at the rectory. On Sunday, October 18, the rector preached his tenth anniversary sermon, in which he gave a review of the growth of the parish from its feeble beginning, eighteen years ago, and dwelt especially on its increase during the decade of his own ministry, during which there had been an advance from twenty-five to one hundred and thirty families, and from twenty-nine to one hundred and seventy-two communicants.

On Sunday afternoon a commemoration service was held by the Sunday-school, at which addresses were made by Mr. George T. Stoddard, the first superintendent, Messrs. H. M. Snell and Thomas Mair, his successor. On Monday evening a reception was held in the Sunday-school room, at which a large number of past and present parishioners tendered their good wishes to the rector and his wife. During the evening the bishop of the diocese, in the name of the parishioners, presented to the rector a handsome silver private communion service in an oak case, to Mrs. Bennett a case of silver forks, and to both a liberal sum of money. The bishop congratulated rector and people on the good work accomplished during the past ten years, and stated that there was every reason to expect that by the end of another decade the parish might hope to see a stately stone edifice standing among the trees that adorn the church grounds.

BOSTON—Free Church Association.—The annual service of the Free Church Association was held on Sunday, November 1, All Saints' Day, in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Boston (the Rev. G. J. Prescott, rector). The service was said by the rector, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. G. S. Converse and W. C. Winslow. The sermon was by the Rev. E. H. Howe.

The annual meeting was held on Monday afternoon, at the Church Rooms, Boston. The bishop of the diocese read the prayers, and Dr. G. C. Shattuck presided. The Rev. W. C. Winslow read the report of the executive committee, which showed a gratifying diocesan and general growth in the objects of the association. A letter from Archdeacon Farrar was read. It was resolved that the executive committee be permitted to regulate their own times of meeting. The present officers and directors of the association were unanimously re-elected. The treasurer reported $187.99 in the treasury. There was a two hours session, during which interesting questions with regard to the free church system were discussed by the Rev. Dr. F. Courtney, the Rev. Messrs. L. B. Baldwin, A. C. A. Hall, J. M. Peck, Andrew Gray, G. S. Converse, G. W. Winslow, J. T. Magrath, Messrs. A. J. C. Sowden, H. M. Upham, E. R. Humphreys, and others.

BOSTON—The Clerical Association.—A large number attended the first meeting for the year, on November 2, at the Church Rooms in Boston. Dean Gray presided, and the Rev. W. C. Winslow reported the arrangements made by the committee, after which the Rev. J. Milton Peck read a paper on "Church Guilds."

CONNECTICUT.

NORWICH—St. Andrew's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. W. H. Dean, rector,) on Sunday, November 1, All Saints' Day, preached and confirmed twelve persons, one of whom was from Trinity church. The bishop's sermon was from I Cor. iv., 2, and was a masterly presentation of the truth that every man's life is a trust from God, to be administered faithfully and with self sacrifice for the good of man and the glory of God. The large congregation listened with deep interest. This parish is mainly composed of Englishmen from Lancashire, and as a natural result, its music is hearty and earnest. As an expression of affection for the bishop, the lay choir was vested for the first time, and with the rector rendered the choral service so effectively and impressively that the bishop could not refrain from expressing his satisfaction.

St. Andrew's has been organized as a parish a little over three years, and but for the depression in business, would have erected a chapel this year, so that the many youths, who in factory towns need increased education, could secure it; and the many agencies, such as lectures and a reading-room, could be used for their elevation.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—St. Marks-in-the-Bowery.—This church, which was closed for repairs, was reopened on Sunday, November 1. There was a large congregation present, and the services were conducted by the rector (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Rylance), assisted by the Rev. Dr. D. C. Weston, and the Rev. Messrs. Brocktholp Morgan, J. L. Johnson, and J. W. Bonham. The rector's sermon was from Psalm cxlii., 1. Alluding to the congregation's desire to return to their newly renovated and beautified church, and his own and their appreciation of the work of the committee who had so faithfully superintended the repairs and adornments, he went on to show that as the works of God in nature are beautiful, houses in which to worship Him should be beautiful also. The sermon closed with a touching allusion to beloved ones departed, who no longer worship God in temples made with hands, but are in joy and felicity, and worship with the spirits of the just in Paradise. In the evening the rector was assisted by the Rev. Messrs. B. Morgan and J. W. Bonham. The sermon was from Hebrews xiii., 2, and set forth how strangers were entertained by the primitive Christians. The hearty reception given to eminent English Churchmen by American ministers of all denominations, and the great respect paid to Archdeacon Farrar, he considered a hopeful sign of the times, and foreshadowing the day when revered Christendom shall be reunited, and all will worship God in spirit and in truth.

To one entering the church and calling to mind its time-honored plainness, the changes wrought must have seemed somewhat surprising. Not only is the work on all sides characterized by brightness and light, but it has given the structure the appearance of greater size.

The scheme of color adopted by the decorators was evidently chosen for the purpose of giving airiness and effect to the building, without interfering with its architectural or constructive features. The domed ceiling divided into numerous rectangular panels of pale greenish blue, each panel being embellished with a quaint golden sun in relief; the dull cream-colored walls, with here and there the symbolic grape-vine and palm; the subdued treatment of the gallery front and pews—all tend to convey a pleasing sense of coolness and distance to which the church was formerly a stranger.

This effect is much heightened by the quiet green-tinted glass occupying the newly placed windows. Of these windows there are five on either side above the galleries, and three or four below.

The treatment of the chancel consists of bright "old ivory" tints relieved by a judicious use of gold upon prominent moldings and carvings, producing a soft, yet sparkling effect. This work serves admirably as a frame for the large picture above the altar, the subject of the picture being what is technically known as "The Majesty."

Beneath the altarpiece the walls are covered with brocade draperies, subdued in color, but adding much to the general effect and forming a good background for the altar and other furniture. This work of decoration was done by the Messrs. Stent & Co.

Other improvements have also been effected, as a new method of gas lighting, principally by circlets around the columns. The placing of a handsome perforated brass screen at the front of the organ gallery, as, also the placing of brass work around the chancel, furnishing the pews and aisles with new covering, carpeting, etc.

Among the new decorations is an imported English painting, representing Christ enthroned. Above it in gold letters is "Sanctus, Sanctus, Sanctus," and beneath, "Thou art the King of Glory." The beautiful cross just above the altar is a gift from Dr. and Mrs. Rylance, as a memorial of their son.

NEW YORK—American Church Building Fund Commission.—At a meeting of the board of trustees of the commission, held October 13, loans were voted to aid in church building, as follows: to Seahury chapel, Broadhead, Diocese of Wisconsin, $250.00; mission at Cedar Rapids, Diocese of Nebraska, $500.00; Grace church, Alexandria, South Dakota Mission, $500.00; Church of St. Mary Magdalen, Fayetteville, Diocese of Tennessee, $1,000.

NEW YORK—St. Ann's Church.—On St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, October 28, two ladies were received as probationers into the Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd, by the rector (the Rev. Dr. Thomas Gallaudet). The service was at 11 A. M. The rector celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. E. Krans. The address was made by the Rev. J. Haughton. The large number present at this service evidenced the interest felt in this sisterhood and its work.

NEW YORK—Home and Training School for Girls.—The Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd has opened a training school for girls in the Sisters' House, 191 Ninth Avenue. They have at this time fifteen children under their care. Their desire is to train them in house-work, so that as soon as they are old enough they can earn their own living.

The Sisters' House will be open for visitors every day, except Sunday, after 10 A. M. The sisters trust that all who are interested in this blessed work of rescuing children from their wretched homes, and training them as Christian children "to learn and labor truly, to get their own living, and to do their duty in that state of life into which it hath pleased God to call them," will aid in this work and labor of love. It is truly a work of faith. There is no endowment. A friend has become responsible for the first year's rent.

As the Sisters' House will be a home for the sisters who visit in hospitals and prisons, and the sick and poor in tenement houses, donations of half-worn clothing will be most useful. All money for the use of the sisterhood should be sent to Sister Ellen, Sisters' House, 191 Ninth Avenue, and marked for "Sisters' House," "House of the Good Shepherd," "Sick and Poor," "Fresh Air," "Coal," or "Sisterhood Fund" as the donor may prefer.

HIGHLAND—Church of the Holy Trinity.—On Sunday, October 25, the rector of this church (the Rev. Henry Tarrant) baptized four adults, and on the following Sunday, All Saints' Day, he baptized eight more, in preparation for an expected visit from the assistant-bishop.

ROSENDALE—All Saints Church.—On Friday evening, October 31, the first Harvest Home festival ever held in this village took place in this church (the Rev. Edward Ransford, rector). The interior of the church was beautifully decorated with wheat, oats, rye, and the choicest fruits and flowers. At the ends of the nave selected vegetables were arranged, and on each side and above the reredos were sheaves of wheat. When the Eucharistic and Vesper lights were lit, the altar stood out beautifully, and was the most conspicuous object. The service was beautifully rendered, and a strong appeal was made by the rector in favor of the religious education of the children. The decorations were kept up until the evening of All Saints' Day, when the service was repeated, and the rector preached from 1 Cor. iii. 9.

WHITEPORT.—Mission Services.—Church services have been resumed at this place in the hall attached to the cement works. For the present they are conducted by the Rev. Edward Ransford, in charge of All Saints' Mission at Rosendale, who purposes giving an evening service on a week day once a fortnight, with an occasional Sunday morning celebration of the Holy Communion. There is a large district here, including the villages of Hickory Bush, Bloomingdale and Whiteport, whose inhabitants, not but Romanians, as the majority are, have been lately neglected in things spiritual. A favorable opening for the beginning of evangelistic mission work has been afforded through the kindness of Mr. E. Doremus of Whiteport.

HAVERTHAW—Trinity Church.—The seventh anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. A. T. Ashton, was observed in this church on Sunday, November 1, All Saints' Day. The rector preached from Philipp. i. 8-11.

The following are the parochial statistics for seven years: Baptisms, 140; confirmations, 56; marriages, 27; burials, 55; offerings for all purposes, $12,625.01.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Calvary Church.—This parish, through its vestry, having recently elected as their rector the Rev. Cornelius L. Twigg, of St. Thomas's Mission, received from him on Saturday, October 24, a letter of acceptance which was read from the chancel the next day by the Rev. Francis Peck, who for about twenty-five years was rector of the church. After reading the letter Mr. Peck added words of hearty commendation of the action which has thus been taken by the parish, and said: "But, my dear friends, I want you to feel that it would be a cruel wrong to take him from his little flock that love him tenderly, and from the parish where he is held in high esteem and expect him to build up a congregation here without your aid. It would be cruel to do it. I want you to understand that the feeling between you and Mr. Twigg must be harmonious. He is worthy of your confidence. He will preach the Gospel purely."

BROOKLYN—St. Thomas's Mission.—At the morning service in this church, on Sunday, October 25, the minister in charge, the Rev. C. L. Twigg, announced that he had forwarded to the bishop his resignation, to take effect November 2, in order to accept the rectorship of Calvary church. In explaining his reasons for this step Mr. Twigg said that he entered on this work, in October, 1874, as a lay reader, being at that time employed in the Mission Rooms in New York on a salary. In February, 1876, he surrendered his position in New York in order to give his time wholly to this work, the Missionary Committee and the late Rev. Dr. Twigg providing the necessary support. Up to July 1882 he himself and his father had contributed in this way $6,000. At that date he received the appointment of Immigrants' Chaplain of the port of New York, on a stipend which, in addition to that received from the Missionary Committee, enabled him to live. The revoking of that appointment in September last makes this present change necessary. St. Thomas's Mission being still far from affording a sufficient salary to a clergyman. Friends in the diocese and elsewhere have contributed during these years $3,000, which has saved the property and put it in its present excellent condition. Mr. Twigg further announced that the Church of the Messiah, Brooklyn, had promised $1,000 to provide for an extension to the chapel.

RICHMOND HILL—Missionary Association.—The quarterly meeting of the Queens County Missionary Association was held in the Church of the Resurrection, Richmond Hill, on the Festival of St. Simon and St. Jude, Wednesday.

October 28. A celebration of the Holy Communion was begun at 12 o'clock the Rev. Dr. W. A. Matson, late rector of the parish, being the celebrant. He was assisted by the minister in charge, the Rev. Robert S. Carlin, and by the Rev. Messrs. W. M. Geer and R. B. Snowden. There were many communicants. The offertory, amounting to $29.50, was for the foundation of a fund with which to build a rectory.

An address was made by the Rev. Josiah Kimber, who was the first rector of this parish, his especial purpose being to give an account of a visit lately made by him to Hampton Institute, near Fortress Monroe, Virginia. He said: "On I should think about ten acres of ground finely situated on a bay opening out into Hampton Roads, are grouped more than a dozen substantial buildings, most of them brick, in which are housed and educated a total, at present, of 605 pupils, of whom 137 are Indians, and of these the great majority are from Bishop Hare's jurisdiction. There are two farms worked by the students, one hard by known as the Home or "Whipple" Farm, of 100 acres, the other four and a half miles distant known as the Hemenway and Coneybrake Farms of 550 acres. About 350 acres are under close cultivation and the remainder is used as pasture for twenty horses, twenty-five head of cattle and two hundred and twenty-five sheep." He proceeded to describe the other industrial branches of this institution for Freedmen and Indians, giving a very interesting report of the various and very skillful work done. Twelve thousand dozen pairs of mittens were knit by machines last year; shoes even of fine grades are made in large numbers, also clothing for the students and for the trade. Attention is given to wood carving, the work being largely of a churchly character and executed with remarkable taste. Other trades which are here pursued are printing, blacksmithing, wheelwrighting, tinsmithing and harness making. In all these the Indians as well as Freedmen are employed. This industrial training, by which the support of the institution is in a degree secured, accompanies and does not interfere with the educational work of the youth. Mr. Kimber briefly described the school life as he saw it exhibited by thirty different classes that he visited. General S. C. Armstrong is principal and in charge of the whole institute, and is succeeding admirably in imparting a practical education in ordinary studies to these wards of the nation.

Mr. Kimber closed his excellent address by describing the work of the board's missionary, the Rev. J. J. Gravatt, who is active and busy in fulfilling the duties of his office, holding daily Evening Prayer and services every Sunday. He is pastor of the Indian department and has as assistants in this labor sixteen teachers who are Churchwomen. In summer his position is made still more important by the addition of at least three hundred persons, who make a stay there at that time, and his influence is in general extensive and increasing.

After the service the association were entertained at the residence of Mrs. Palmer, adjoining. The business meeting followed, the Rev. Dr. Matson, presiding. The different parishes were largely represented by lady delegates, and besides the clergymen named there were present the Rev. Dr. Samuel Cox, and the Rev. Messrs. Rice, Sayres, and Martin. Reports were received from the missionary committees of the parishes through their representatives, and a report was given of the progress of the work at Barnard's Island, which is under the care of the association.

BROOKLYN—St. Paul's Church.—The feast of All Saints was observed in this parish (the Rev. W. C. Hubbard, rector,) with the usual solemnity. The church was filled at both services. The decorations were very beautiful. The altar, vested in white, stood out before the violet dossal, and was covered with floral memorials, in the midst of which rose the massive brass altar cross, and vases, which were filled and trimmed with flowers. In the morning the music of the service was Stainer in C, the offertory being Gounod's "Unfold Ye Portals." There was a celebration of the Holy Communion, at which a large number received. In the evening the rector preached the usual memorial sermon.

SAG HARBOR—Christ Church.—This parish has just received a very handsome coronal light of sixteen burners for the nave the gift of Mr. Craig.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Christ Church.—By invitation of the rector, the Rev. Dr. James H. Darlington, St. Mark's, Calvary, and Grace churches of the Eastern District of the city, will unite in a series of mission services during Advent, to be held in this church on Sunday evenings. The singing will be led by the combined choirs of the four parishes named, part of them being supplanted. The missionaries who have been secured are all from New York and are, First Sunday in Advent, the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, of St. George's; Second Sunday, the Rev. Edgar Johnson, of St. Marks; Third Sunday, the Rev. Parker Morgan, of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, and Fourth Sunday, the Rev. Lindsay Parker, of St. George's. It is believed that this effort will greatly promote the spiritual life of the parishes represented and of the community generally.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Atonement.—On All Saints' Day a lecture and Bible were set up in this church (the Rev. Dr. A. C. Bunn, rector) as memorials of the late Mr. William Brown, a vestryman and superintendent of the Sunday-school. The lecture is of brass and very handsome. It was made by the Messrs. Lamb of New York.

Improvements in the church are in progress which will considerably increase its seating capacity. The congregation is rapidly growing, and the number of communicants has more than doubled in the past few years. The church is free, and is supported by the envelope system.

The rector of the parish has undertaken the charge of the mission at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, New York, in connection with the Advent Mission.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—A mission began in this parish (the Rev. G. R. Van De Water, rector), on Sunday, November 1, to be continued for two weeks. It is conducted by the Rev. Messrs. W. Hay Aitken, and James Stephens. The mission is proving its value every day. Those to whom the "after meeting" was a novelty, and the extemporized prayers an unusual proceeding, are constrained to admit that these extraordinary methods are appealing to souls and influencing them in the ways of godliness. The work of the "after meeting" has proved the wisdom of the plan. The mission is stirring up people; not only those who have never attended church before, but many who have acknowledged that they had not hitherto experienced the intensity of the life that is hid with Christ in God.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

MEDINA—St. John's Church.—The services on All Saints' Day in this church (the Rev. W. W. Walsh, rector) were rendered doubly interesting by the unveiling of two memorial windows. On the sloping sill of one window is a brass plate with the legend—"To the Glory of God, and in Memory of Providence Kibbourne Weld." Mrs. Weld was an early inhabitant of Medina, and her son is, and has been for many years, a vestryman of the parish. The subject, that of Dorcas dispensing gifts to the orphan and destitute, is beautifully presented by the artist, and aptly suggests the character of her in whose memory the window is erected. The other window is in memory of Mrs. Delia Ann Fairman and Mrs. Delia Ann Ives. Mrs. Fairman was an active member of the parish at the time of its organization, sixty years ago, and her daughter, Mrs. Ives, was the wife of one of the present wardens, and, like her mother, continued a zealous worker in the parish till her last painful illness. The unity of their lives, their faith, devotion and resignation under sore trials are strikingly given in the touching scene of Ruth clinging to Naomi, when the latter is starting on her journey from the land of Moab. The windows were designed and executed by E. Colgate of New York, and are among the best specimens of his workmanship.

The windows of this church are now all memorials save one. The interior has been recently renovated and decorated. A surprised choir of thirty men and boys renders the music of the service very heartily and well. The increasing interest in parish work manifested by the people is gratifying and encouraging. The present rector has returned to this charge after an interval of thirteen years.

NEW JERSEY.

BORDENTOWN—Memorial Service.—On Wednesday, November 4, in the Octave of All Saints, a memorial service was held in Christ church, Bordentown, in memory of the Rev. Nathaniel Pettit, late rector of the parish, and president of the Standing Committee. There were present the bishop of the diocese, the rector-elect of the parish (the Rev. C. W. Knapp), the minister in charge (the Rev. Ezra Isaac), the Rev. Drs. G. Morgan Hills and Samuel Cox, and the Rev. Messrs. Hannibal Goodwin, C. M. Parkman, G. M. Murray, J. L. McKim, H. E. Thompson, H. M. Oberly, C. M. Pyne, A. B. Baker, J. B. Trevelt, J. Dows Hills, L. W. Norton, W. E. Daw, and G. Heathcote Hills. The bishop and clergy, preceded by the vested choir, and marshalled by the Rev. H. E. Thompson, master of ceremonies, entered by the centre door of the church, singing, as a processional, Hymn 187. The bishop then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, the minister in charge reading the epistle, and the Rev. Dr. Samuel Cox, a former rector, reading the gospel. A memorial sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. G. Morgan Hills, from St. Luke xii., 36. The offerings were devoted to the organ fund, the new organ being part of the intended memorial of the late rector. In the distribution of the elements, the bishop was assisted by the Rev. Dr. Hills and the rector-elect. After the service the bishop and clergy visited the grave of the late rector, and there the bishop said the prayer, "O God, Whose days are without end," and the collect for All Saints' Day. By the unanimous vote of the clergy and other visitors, the sermon of Dr. Hills was requested for publication.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK—St. Barnabas's Church.—This church (the Rev. S. H. Granberry, rector) was closed during the summer for renovation. The nave has been painted in two colors; the wainscoting is olive bronze, with an ornamental dado; the wall above is light old gold. The chancel is more ornately decorated in polychrome. The ceiling, which is throughout of natural wood, panelled, was thoroughly cleaned and given a coat of hard oil, producing a bright and rich effect. More recently a carpet has been placed in the chancel, nave, and transepts, of fine quality and beautiful design.

St. Barnabas's is one of the two out of nine churches in Newark that has rented pews. These, as far as they are available, are all taken, and some embarrassment is felt as to what shall be done for those who want pews and cannot obtain them.

NEWARK—Trinity Church.—In connection with the mission to be held in this church (the Rev. J. S. Reed, rector) from November 14 to November 25 inclusive, the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, the missionary, will hold a retreat for the clergy in St. Paul's chapel, corner of Market and High streets, on November 16, 17 and 18. The retreat will open on Monday, November 16, with the celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 A. M. Matins will be said at 10:30 A. M., followed by silent prayer. At 11 A. M. the address will be given with hymns and prayers. From 2:30 to 4:30 P. M. there will be addresses, with intervals for self-examination and prayer. At 8 P. M. the clergy will attend the mission service in Trinity church. The same order will be followed on Tuesday. The retreat will close on Wednesday, with the celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 A. M. All the clergy of the diocese and the vicinity are invited. Those purposing to attend are requested to notify the rector of Trinity church.

The week-day services of the mission include meeting for intercessory prayer at 11 A. M.; address on the Christian Life, 11:30 A. M.; meeting for women only, (Rector Street Chapel) 3 P. M.; address to children and young people, 4:45 P. M.; mission service, 8 P. M. The Holy Communion will be celebrated on Tuesday and Thursday, at 8 A. M., on Wednesday and Friday, at 11:30 A. M. On Saturday, November 14, the mission will open in Rector Street Chapel, at 8 P. M., with an address to Christian workers. On Saturday, November 21, the only service of the day will be held in the church at 8 P. M., and will be followed by an address to Sunday-school teachers. All the services, when not otherwise stated, will be held in Trinity church. The hymns to be used may be purchased at Plum's bookstore, on Broad street, near Market street.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Memorial Church of the Holy Comforter.—The branch of the Girls' Friendly Society in connection with this parish has grown in a little more than a year to be the second largest in this country, the largest being that of St. George's church, New York. It has eight associates and one hundred and sixty-nine members and probationers. The officers have been obliged to raise the age of admission to fifteen years, in order to limit its numbers to its accommodations. Yet this parish is especially fortunate in having so large and well-equipped a building for parish work, the different rooms of which are alive every Thursday night with young girls, playing at games or talking with one another. They teach the members singing, writing, object-drawing, dress-making, millinery, knitting, embroidery, etc. One associate gives instruction in the Prayer Book, or reads to such girls as are too tired from their day's work to care to go into any of the classes. Upon the first Thursday of every month the work of the classes is suspended, and the evening is given up to social pleasure. It closed last season with an anniversary service in the church, at which the Rev. J. De Wolf Perry, rector of Calvary church, Germantown, preached the sermon. It opened the work of the present season with a like service on the evening of All Saints' Day. The girls and their associates marched into the church singing "For all Thy Saints." All wore their badges, each band having a distinctive color. The service, which was partly choral, was very hearty. The sermon, on "The Aims and Duties of Members," was preached by the rector, the Rev. Stewart Stone, from St. Matthew vi. 4. The recessional hymn was "Hark, hark, my soul."

PHILADELPHIA—Evangelical Educational Society.—The twenty-third annual meeting of the Evangelical Educational Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church was held in the Church of the Epiphany on Tuesday, November 3, the Hon. Felix R. Brunot presiding, and the Rev. R. N. Thomas acting as secretary. The general secretary submitted his report, from which it was learned that the receipts during the year were $13,161.96, the disbursements $12,857.51, a balance of $904.45 remained in the treasury on October 1, 1885, that there were at the beginning of the year twenty-six students on the roll, and that fifteen more were added, making forty-one in all who were aided during the year. Of these, one has died, three have been dropped, three have found other support or are supporting themselves, two have withdrawn on account of ill-health, ten have been ordained. Twenty-five still remain on the roll.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Clement's Church.—Lord Brabazon, the president of the Young Men's Friendly Society of the Church of England, delivered a lecture in the Parish Building of St. Clement's church on Monday evening, November 2, upon "The Life of Young Men and Women," giving an account of the aims, methods, and results of the Girls' Friendly Society, the membership of which in England is 110,000. Its associate society, the Young Men's, numbers about 14,000. These societies aim to secure purity of thought and speech and general moral conduct. Addresses were also made by the rector (the Rev. B. W. Matrian) and the Rev. C. N. Field.

PHILADELPHIA—Holy Trinity Memorial Chapel.—The tenth anniversary of the opening of the buildings now occupied at the corner of Twenty-second and Spruce streets was celebrated on All Saints' Day. In the morning the minister in charge (the Rev. George F. Bugbee) preached a special sermon. The Rev. Dr. W. N. McVickar, rector of Holy Trinity parish, addressed the Sunday-schools in the afternoon. In the evening addresses were made by the Rev. Drs. W. N. McVickar and C. G. Currie, and the Rev. Messrs. Robert A. Edwards and Henry S. Gets.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Crucifixion.—The Church in this diocese has at length been aroused to make a special effort in behalf of the poorest, the lowest, and most neglected class of this city. To this end the handsome church building of this mission has been lately built. The old building, which, with the new, forms an L, will be torn down and rebuilt as for parish purposes, as soon as about $10,000 has been raised. It is in a region where poverty and crime luxuriate, where there are many thousands of godless colored people. It was for them that the church was especially built. How great a benefit to many it has been we cannot know. Such generally move away to other localities, but their places are taken by others. The good work goes on under the Rev. H. L. Phillips, who is indefatigable amid unpleasant surroundings. It is entirely supported from without as though it could contribute little or nothing to its maintenance. During the thirty years of its existence it has gathered hundreds of families from the lowest depths of degradation and brought them to the Master. This work ever needs and is most deserving of earnest workers, prayers and contributions.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

MAUCH CHUNK—St. Mark's Church.—A few days ago Mrs. Charles H. Cummings, the only surviving daughter of the late Hon. Asa Packer, presented to this parish, (the Rev. M. A. Tolman, rector) a very handsome and spacious brick house, to be used as a rectory. It is situated in the center of the town, about three minutes' walk from the church, and is a very commodious building, admirably adapted to its use. The rectors of the parish have always been provided with a residence by the Packer family, but until now, no property has been deeded to the Church for this purpose. This is a notable gift from one who seems never to be "weary in well doing," and with many other valuable gifts to the parish and its rector this will long serve to keep in memory an honored name. St. Mark's is now one of the most completely equipped parishes in this country.

READING—Sunday-school Institute.—The first division of the Church Sunday-school Institute of this diocese, embracing the parishes in the counties of Lancaster, York and Adams, held its first annual meeting in Christ Cathedral Parish, Reading, on Thursday, November 5. The meeting was held here in response to an invitation from the officers of the Reading Convocation, who were anxious to become familiar with the institute's methods with a view of organizing a branch association.

There was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10:30 A. M., at which the bishop was assisted by the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair, and the Rev. R. R. Swope, and the rector of the parish (the Rev. Dr. W. P. Orrick). After the service the institute assembled for business in the chapel.

The annual report of the executive committee was read by the secretary (the Rev. John Graham), showing a good work done during the year, and good fruit already resulting. This was followed by an examination on the Church Catechism of a class of thirty children from the Church Orphanage, in Jonestown, by the Rev. A. M. Abel, which was an illustration of how children can be made not only to learn but understand the catechism.

At noon, during a recess, the institute and visitors were entertained by the ladies of the parish. When the institute reassembled the bishop made a hearty address of welcome. The Rev. F. J. Clay-Moran then gave a model lesson to an infant class, on "The Feeding of the Four Thousand." The Rev. R. R. Swope made an address on "The Place of the Sunday-school in our Church System." This was followed by a brief discussion. The Rev. John Graham explained the Church Teaching of the Tabernacle, illustrating it with a complete model of the Tabernacle and its furniture. The Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair made an address on "How to Work a Sunday-school;" and the Rev. Dr. C. F. Knight spoke on "The Canon of Holy Scripture."

After a resolution of thanks to the ladies of the parish, the officers of the past year were re-elected, and with prayer and benediction from the bishop, the institute adjourned to meet next in Lancaster.

PITTSBURGH.

EPISCOPAL ACTS.—The bishop of the diocese has just finished the round of autumnal visitation, in course of which he visited nineteen parishes, attended two convocations, confirmed about one hundred persons, ordained two priests, consecrated one church, instituted one rector.

There have been lately received into the diocese the Rev. Messrs. T. J. Danner, H. Cruikshank, and T. D. Pitta.

During Advent special services are to be held in St. Stephen's, Wilkinsburg, St. John's, Pittsburgh, and St. Stephen's, McKeesport.

The bishop will make Advent visitations at New Castle, Sharon, Conneautville, North East, Youngville, Clarendon, and St. John's, Erie.

RIDGWAY—Concocation.—The Northern Convocation met in Grace church, Ridgway, (the Rev. J. H. Burton, rector) on Tuesday, October 20. After Evening Prayer the convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. G. A. Carstensen. On Wednesday there was an early celebration of the Holy Communion; after which a business meeting was held. The Rev. E. D. Irvine read an essay on "Current Literature," which was followed by a discussion. At 10:30 A.M. there was Morning Prayer and a sermon from the general missionary of the diocese. At 2:30 P.M. a private clerical conference was held, at which the Rev. Dr. Henry Purdon read a paper on "The Kingdom of God." Evening Prayer was said at 4 P.M., and at 5 P.M. a parish reception was given the bishop and clergy present. At 7:30 P.M., addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. H. Cruikshank on "The Church's Faith" by the Rev. H. L. Yewans on "The Church's Ministry," and by the Rev. H. G. Wood on "The Church's Worship."

On Thursday morning the bishop and eight of the clergy took the train for Brockwayville, and rode thence four miles in wagons to Sugar Hill. The church here stands on the top of a high hill, with no village near, and in the midst of a farming population. Until within a few years it was twenty-five miles from a railway. Services have been kept up for upwards of twenty years, chiefly through the exertions of the Rev. Joseph Barber, a deacon living on a farm in the neighborhood. At present the rector of Grace church, Ridgway, has charge. It was nearly noon when the bishop and clergy reached the church. The bishop said some collects, and addresses were delivered by five of the clergy, the bishop saying a few concluding words. Four of the clergy remained to hold evening service, and the rest of the party returned to Ridgway for the closing services of the convocation.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—Mount Calvary Church.—The new chancel in this church (the Rev. R. H. Paine, rector,) was opened for the first time on Sunday, November 1, All Saints' Day. The chancel, which is in the north end, is now thirty feet square. It is built of red brick, rimmed with Ohio sandstone. The walls go up twenty-six feet, to correspond with those of the church, to allow any future additions to the church to be made without destroying the proportions of the building. The roof is an open timber one, finished in hard wood and oiled to show the grain of the wood, and the beams are of oak. Light reaches the chancel from above through six stained glass windows. At the ends of the oaken beams above the altar are the figures of six adoring angels, their faces directed toward the altar. The altar remains as it was before the improvements were made. The whole floor of the chancel is laid with costly English tiles in beautiful figures. On either side of the altar are high, handsome brass candleabra, each holding forty-one lights, showing off the altar floor and surroundings with fine effect.

On the right of the altar, to one entering the church, close to the wall, is a credence-table and piscina, with the head of a cherub existently carved in stone, the eyes depressed at an angle of about forty-five degrees. Near the base are the words, "In memoriam, C. F. B." The whole is of Caen stone. This was a gift. Over the arch at the entrance to the chancel is a circle of lights. The organ has been removed into the choir and reversed, the organist now facing the chorists. By the improvement about ninety sittings have been added to the church. Choir stalls of oak, to correspond with the pews, will be added. To compensate for the space taken from the clergy-house for the enlargement of the chancel, a lot on the west side of the church has been utilized, and a choir-room and nine other rooms added to the clergy-house. About one-half the clergy-house was torn down. The new rooms will soon be completed. A private stairway from the choir-room to the organ has been erected. The cost of the whole work has been about $10,000. Mr. T. B. Ghequier is the architect, and Mr. Edward Brady the contractor.

At 6:45 A.M. there was a service of thanksgiving and benediction. The Holy Eucharist was celebrated at 7 and at 9:15 A.M. There was Morning Prayer at 10:30 A.M., followed at 11 A.M. by a full choral celebration, at which the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Richey. There was Evening Prayer at 4 P.M., when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. J. S. B. Hodges, and a service at 8 P.M., at which the Rev. Dr. W. F. Brand preached. The evening service had special reference to the work of the All Saints' Sisters of the Poor.

WESTERNPORT—St. James's Church.—This church, after an interval of a few months, was reopened for regular Church services on Sunday, September '22, under charge of the Rev. F. Humphrey. The new brick church is a beautiful edifice, with a seating capacity of 350.

On Tuesday, October 27, several clergymen, a good choir, and a large congregation began a four days' mission in the parish, with morning, afternoon, and evening services. The interest deepened, broadened, and increased from the beginning to the close of the mission. Sermons were delivered by the Rev. Dr. James Stephenson, and the Rev. Messrs. J. W. Nott, Alexander Haverstick, and P. N. Meade. The people are much strengthened by the work, and pleased with the results of the mission.

OHIO.

GAMBER—Kenyon College.—"Founders' Day" was observed this year on Tuesday, November 3. Divine service was held at 10:30 A.M. There were present in the chancel the Bishops of Ohio, Pittsburgh and Indiana, the Assistant-bishop of Mississippi, and a large number of clergy, among them the Rev. Dr. S. A. Blomson, who had just celebrated the fifth anniversary of his ordination. The list of the founders of Kenyon College is a very long one. The memorial of the founders and donors was most impressively read by the bishop. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion. A good number of students were matriculated.

The "Bedell Lectures" this year were delivered by the Assistant-bishop of Mississippi. They were of great interest and power. The subject of the first lecture was "The Universe is a Rational Universe," that of the second, "The Universe is a Moral Universe."

SOUTHERN OHIO.

DEAF-MUTE SERVICES.—The Rev. A. W. Mann officiated at Christ church, Dayton, and St. Paul's church, Cincinnati, on October 10 and 11 respectively. At the latter service two adult deaf-mutes were baptized.

On Sunday, November 1, he held two services at Columbus, baptizing four children of deaf-mutes. Immediately after the last service he took the train for Springfield, where a combined service was held at Christ church.

MICHIGAN.

DETROIT—Ordination in St. John's Church.—On Sunday, November 1, All Saints' Day, the bishop of the diocese advanced to the priesthood in St. John's church (the Rev. J. N. Blanchard, rector,) the Rev. H. M. Kirkby, son of Archdeacon Kirkby. The sermon was preached by the rector of the parish.

At Evening Prayer the Bishop of Nebraska preached the annual sermon before the St. John's Church Union of Men. This union numbers over one hundred men, over eighty of whom marched in the procession, followed by the parish clergy.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

SHERMAN—Missionary Work.—Sherman is a flourishing village, of about five hundred population, in the north-west corner of Wexford county. Land is offered for a church wherever it can be built. The missionary from Manistee (the Rev. W. S. Hayward) visited this portion of his charge on Sunday, October 25, preached, baptized, and celebrated the Holy Communion. He also did pastoral work in other towns, all of which caused him a journey of three hundred miles.

SPRINGFIELD.

DEAF-MUTE SERVICES.—The Rev. Mr. Mann conducted services at Alton, Greenville and Jacksonville during the latter part of October. At the latter point he baptized two children of deaf-mute parents. The latter were confirmed two weeks previously at Trinity church.

JACKSONVILLE—Deaf-Mute Services.—Rev. A. W. Mann held a service for deaf-mutes at Trinity church, and baptized two children of deaf-mute parents. The place is the seat of the Illinois Institution for the Education of Deaf-Mutes.

MISSOURI.

DEAF-MUTE SERVICES.—Owing to a change in the running of trains, it was necessary for the Rev. A. W. Mann to cancel an appointment for Fulton, the seat of the State school for deaf-mutes, and go on to Boonville, where a combined service was held on Wednesday evening, October 21, at Christ church. The next point in the series of appointments was Macon, the seat of the flourishing school under the charge of the Rev. Eichelbert Talbot. Service was held at St. James's church, with a large congregation.

Christ Church, Boonville, is enjoying excellent prosperity under the Rev. J. J. Wilkins, minister in charge, who was ordained July 17. During his incumbency of this parish, as well as that of Clinton, sixty persons have been baptized, and fifty-one confirmed. Mr. Wilkins was a successful business man before his entrance into the ministry.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

THE WHITE CROSS.—The Rev. Frederic Gardiner, Jr., has been appointed by the convocation of South Dakota its agent, under the following resolutions: Resolved (1) That this convocation earnestly urges on the attention of rectors the importance of adopting special methods of counteracting the alarming increase of intemperance, impurity and blasphemy among our people, and recommend them to make every effort to establish on a permanent footing in their parishes and missions, the "Church Temperance Society," and the "White Cross Society." (2) That an agent be elected by this convocation whose duty it shall be to inform himself thoroughly of the details of these societies, and to hold himself in readiness at the call of any clergyman of the jurisdiction to assist in starting such societies in his parish. (8) By and with the advice and consent of the bishop, a standing committee shall be appointed to take such other measures as shall advance the cause of temperance and purity of life and conversation.

ELK POINT—St. Andrew's Mission.—A correspondent at Elk Point, the centre of the work of the venerable Rev. J. V. Himes, writes us as follows:

In June last the Chapel of St. Andrew's Mission was blown from its foundation and wrecked. The houses and barns of the mission families were all more or less damaged so that all were embarrassed, but with the hopefulness and courage of Father Himes, our rector, we all united, and resolved to reconstruct the chapel by contributing of our own small means to the object. We have done so, and our rector has carried the work of reconstruction through, so that we now have a more beautiful and substantial chapel than before, for which we are all glad and thankful.

Besides the general reconstruction, our rector determined to place a memorial window in the chapel. One of our members, Mr. S. W. Hoffman, gave the window. And it being ordered of Welles & Brothers, Chicago, it so happened that some of its members were among the parishioners of Bishop Clarkson, at St. James's church, Chicago, before he was called to the bishopric. And so they gave us a more costly and beautiful window than we had paid for. It is now placed in the chapel, and is a very beautiful window, and a creditable memorial to one of the best of bishops, and the finest in Dakota. We wish all our chapels in the Territory had within them such a memorial.

The additional expense, by an addition to the chapel on account of the memorial window, we have not been able to meet in full, and this rests upon our rector, who has also done much of the work.

Our mission was begun about eighteen years ago. It has passed through many changes. Seven years ago when Father Himes received it from the late lamented Bishop Clarkson, it was desolate. We are now blessed with a good and beautiful chapel, with a growing congregation and Sunday-school. Our prospects were never better. Our rector, at eighty-one, is doing good work for the mission. And our new bishop has been very kind to us. Bishop Hare is fully filling the place of the lamented Clarkson.

PARAGRAPHIC.

FROM October 1, 1884, to September 22, 1885, the Manhattan Railway Company carried over the elevated roads 100,975,356 passengers.

A FAMILY School for Young Ladies has been opened by F. M. Tower at Cornwall-on-Hudson. It will be known as the Storm King School. Mr. Tower has had much experience as a teacher in Boston.

ON a series of cheap pocket books in England called Britannia, the first eight volumes were by American authors. In the Ross Library, twenty-seven out of the twenty-nine volumes were by American authors.

THE many summer tourists that have made the pilgrimage the past season to the wonderful Underwood Spring, on the coast of Maine, will be interested in an important archaeological discovery that has recently been made, in the vicinity of the spring, of various relics of the Sokokis, the ancient people that inhabited the shores of Casco Bay.

ART.

THE Metropolitan Art Museum has set itself in order for the season, and, as "the masses" have to look to it for their aesthetic instruction and recreation, this column is much interested in what the directors have accomplished to this end. Not only citizens, but visitors from all quarters, make the Art Museum a rendezvous. It is of the first consequence, then, that it should at all times be instructive, entertaining, and never chargeable with trivialities and offences against either good taste or moral sensibilities.

The Watts' collection—one of the strongest ever exhibited in New York—has gone back to London. It was received with apathy, simply because our community has become so saturated with types of art which may be generalized as Parisian, that Mr. Watts' ideas and methods were both incommensurate.

This is a humiliating admission, but it is substantially the truth. The epic, allegoric, and profoundly idealistic cannot flourish in the same soil with Benjamin Constant, Cabanel, Henne, and the manipulators of renaissance bric-a-brac. The second or inner saloon at the west, therefore, is a test of the season's outlook. And it is certainly very depressing.

The average excellence touches a low point. Mediocrity prevails. The strongest piece of work is Mackart's transcription of "The Midsummer's Night Dream," steeped in a mirage of voluptuousness, and heavy with the weird fantasia of that enigmatical drama. It is almost realistic in its unwholesome frankness, and certainly a strong reminder of the poverty and dryness of our own poet painters.

Since Mr. Hunt's decease imagination and indeed fancy seem to have taken flight from American art. Close at hand is Mr. Bierstadt's panoramic "Lake Donner," a dreary, distasteful attempt at impossibilities. Thomas Moran is the only artist among us, with possibly Wm. T. Richards, whose technical skill and mastery of aerial perspective are sufficient for such enterprises. The directors do equal honor to Mr. Bierstadt in hanging his productions in contrast with better art.

A little canvas by George Innes, "Evening," is a good place for a long rest. Baffled by the miserable glass which swallows up half its fascinations, it will hold and refresh the intelligent observer, much as such an out-of-doors picture would. It is full of poetry, tenderness, and a Hebraic devoutness toward the landscape as declarative of the divine glory and wisdom. Such a picture is a gallery in itself to such as have seeing eyes. But in this connection it is not clear why Mr. Whittredge's old-timer a birch canoe falling to pieces in the margin of a pool encircled by its group of living birches, should again be placed on the walls. Its excellences hardly justify a stated reappearance.

An agreeable surprise, and perhaps the most interesting novelty, is found in J. Rollins Tilton's masterly Spanish landscape, giving the Alhambra, with its towering background of the Sierra Nevada, and foreground of open meadow intervals, gray olive groves, glimpses of tranquil blue rivulets and wraith-like jets of thin blue smoke standing perpendicular in the still atmosphere. There is wonderful subtlety and refinement in this artist's methods, together with poetical interpretation. His pictures are at the same time compositions in the classical sense—an element mostly vanished from the current landscape. There is a brilliant renaissance tableau by Gonzalez, worth study, a very tame "Indian Funeral" by Alexander Harrison, some very interesting souvenirs of Mr. Hunt's fine genius, a "bit" by S. R. Gifford, another by David Johnson, of whom we see too little, and a few other objects of value.

The eastern galleries are enriched by one gift of positive value from Mr. Wm. H. Webb, by Dietrich, "Christ Healing the Sick," a true pearl of devout suggestion, nearly buried in much avian rubbish. Why it is hung so closely to the repulsive "Lot and his Daughters," or why that most sorrowful "Scourging of Christ," should hang immediately above the "Dance" of Titian are problems hard of solution. It's like placing the "Decameron" and the Gospels on the same shelf, side by side.

Ten thousand dollars have been presented to the association by an unknown donor, and other evidences concur in showing that public interest in this institution continues unabated.

THESE are now projected thirteen Grant monuments, and we fear the number will be fatal to any hope of seeing a monument commensurate with his worth. Small sums are collected in many places, and in want of union there is want of beauty and strength. Petty rivalries and jealousies obstruct all progress. In religion each man must have his own palm, and why not in art let each locality have its own pitiful monument.

MR. SELDERS COLLIER.

At a special meeting of the Vestry of Trinity church, Utesa, N. Y., the following minute was adopted:

Resolved, In the all-wise providence of God, Mr. SELDERS COLLIER, for thirty-four years a member of our vestry, serving the past twenty years of this time as warden, and also having been treasurer of the parish for twenty-seven years, has been removed from our midst by death.

Resolved, That we place on record an expression of heartfelt sorrow over the loss which we have sustained; and most tender sympathy for his bereaved widow and the other members of his stricken family.

Resolved, That we desire to bear our testimony to his Christian faithfulness as a heart-true party of life and perfect integrity of his best—an Israelite indeed in whom was no guile.

Resolved, That these resolutions be incorporated in the records of the parish, and a copy presented to Mrs. Collins.

C. H. GARDNER, Rector.

F. D. WESTCOTT, Clerk.

CHARLES STUART REWERY.

At a meeting of the Vestry of the Church of the Reformation, Brooklyn, N. Y., held on Thursday, Nov. 5, 1885, the following minute was read and adopted:

This vestry learn with profound sorrow of the decease of their fellow vestryman, CHARLES STUART REWERY, who died at his late residence in this city on Monday, October 26, 1885, aged 31 years.

Elected to the vestry at Easter, 1884, he was chosen clerk and succeeded in his duties with a most praiseworthy brief period of service; he proved a true and devoted servant of this Church; manifesting a deep and sincere interest in Church and diocesan affairs; every duty assigned him with the utmost fidelity and cheerfulness. His death deprives the vestry of a most agreeable and faithful associate, and the Church of an active and generous officer. Recalling his loyalty to his Christian vocation, his service in the Master's service, his exemplary life, there seems abundant reason for the belief that he was ready for the entrance that culminate in the eternal home.

To his beloved family, this vestry extend their warmest sympathy and condolence, and direct that a copy of this notice be forwarded to them, and that the same be entered in full in the records of this meeting, and published in THE CHURCHMAN.

JOHN G. BACCHIUS, Rector.

APPEALS.

"BORN FOR OLD MEN AND AGED COUPLES," No. 407 Hudson Street.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

An old couple, desirous of entering our Home, but entirely without means to meet the admission fee, ($500) this appeal is made in their behalf. They are good New Yorkers, highly respectable and educated people. The only relatives living are two nephews of the wife, who are not in prosperity, and can render but little help. The committee of our party in investigation, light them worthy.

Any one desirous to contribute may communicate with Mr. B. H. GAMMAN, Treasurer, 4 Pine St. THUS P. CUMMING, Chairman of Committee on Admissions, November 7, 1885.

NASHOTAN MISSION.

It has not pleased the Lord to endow Nashotah. The great and good work entrusted to us requires, as in times past, the offerings of His people.

Offerings are solicited:

1st. Because Nashotah is the oldest theological seminary north and west of the State of Ohio.

2d. Because the instruction is second to none in the land.

3d. Because it is the most healthfully situated seminary.

4th. Because it is the best located for study.

5th. Because everything given is applied directly to the work of preparing candidates for ordination.

Address: Rev. A. COLK, D. D., Nashotah, Waukesha County, Wisconsin.

SAVES FOR SALE.

For sale, in aid of the Building Fund of Holy Trinity church, Jacksonville, Florida, some of the choice land of Alachua Co. Twenty acre lots, unenclosed, $100; ten acre lots, unenclosed, $50; and five acre lots, unenclosed, $25. The title is all perfect. The lands high and dry. Alachua County is now the most populous in the State, and is the best vegetable and small fruit county, raises more oranges than any county, save one, and more vegetables than all others. High and healthy midland climate. Galvanize in the county seat and railroad centre. For information, maps, &c., address: F. E. DUNHAM, Gainesville, Fla.

The Epiphany offerings asked for last summer have fallen behind those of last year; so that my expenses incurred in the prosecution of the Western Debt Mission have not been covered. The appeal is, therefore, renewed. By travelling every week one year round, I reach 3,000 destitute with the United States in sign language. Offerings may be sent to the Rev. A. W. MANN, St. Woodland Court, Cleveland, Ohio.

COLORED WORK.

Three hundred dollars is needed in our school for colored children. The Church must begin with the young if it would do its duty by these people. Any assistance will be duly acknowledged.

THE CHURCH A BEGGAR.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In place of brother Wilson's caption to his timely communication, I suggest the above. It is not profane. It, possibly, more nearly expresses the great evil of our financial system which he exposes. It is impossible, by any custom of Christians, however degrading, to the clergy, that a reformer, as we are, God cannot be dishonored or charged with folly by any action of ours, but the Church can. Therein the evil which he speaks is greatly aggravated. The Church, in spite of her inherent and acquired forces to accomplish her Master's work, gives tacit consent to a system, or want of system, in gathering the needed capital, which would be ample ruinous to any other corporation. It lays open a large body of her people—bishops, clergy, and laity alike—to a charge of mendacity. Their eloquent and pathetic appeals excite, in some of their hearers, disgust. Her collectors are regarded, it is claimed, as "pests" and "veritable leeches," and a parish is exempt from the charge. Even the wealthiest parishes of the East adopt the system for the maintenance of sundry charities. It is no uncommon thing to hear such a bishop characterized as "a good beggar," or "the prince of beggars."

per contra there is another side to the question. It is claimed that the epithet "begging" comes from the grumbling discontent of Judas-like disciples, ever ready to cry "waste" whenever a dollar is diverted from their own bag, from men who would sacrifice general good to private interests, who would banish, if they could, the slim basin from the Church, having no conception of the sweet privilege of giving, and no room in their weezened, scrouge-like, dried-up souls for the divine blessing promised to the simple, honest-hearted giver. There are men who will earnestly contend for the voluntary system as it is, and as readily point out their bags of gain for the Master at the feet of the apostles, as they gladly listen to the narrative of "labors abundant" from the voice of the living preacher. They point, and with reason, to all our great general institutions—to the General Seminary, Nashotah, Fairbault, etc.—and the immense missionary field as the result of the practical blessing from hearts burning with zeal for Christ and His Church. They want no iron-clad system which will rule out the opportunity for God to work in them as He will, and manifest, by the spontaneity of the sacrifices, in whom the spirit dwells.

But, in truth, I am inclined to believe the greater evil lies in the fact that the Church is so saturated through and through with a spirit of worldliness that there are few to care whether a custom is right or wrong, so long as it produces results, however meagre, and things move on smoothly in their own parishes. And the meagreness of results brings little sorrow of heart, because of distance of vision to the Master and hindrance to the general Church. The immediate happiness of individual Christians depends too much upon their income and a good market to be disturbed by the watchman's cry that the Church's honor is in danger. Each day's cheerful content is more apt to be the result of the labors of the clothier's servant breakfasting from hearty contentment of the "Bread which cometh down from heaven" upon the soul that hungers and thirsts after righteousness.

But not to press this point, nor to discuss the financial matter here, I write mainly to modify the suggestion of your correspondent a little. He suggests "let a few of the clergy band together and hind themselves to have nothing more to do with begging for God's work."

The clergy are already bound together by the most solemn vows to do and teach all that he suggests. To assume, voluntarily, additional obligations in a matter which concerns the honor of the Church would be tantamount to us a reflection upon vows already taken, as well as a reflection upon the integrity of the whole Church, as if it would not break a shackle when fully persuaded of its sinfulness.

Then, too, the lines must be clearly drawn and accepted as to what is, and what is not, "begging for God's work" and reformer suggest this—"Let a few of the clergy and laity band together for a consideration of the reformation of the Church's financial system."

In this shape it is reasonable. It could not justly excite opposition. The time for opposition would come when the consideration should be developed that a reformation was needed and its terms proposed for conciliar action. It would open up the whole subject of tithes and offerings, and the marked distinction between them. It would, or it should, call forth the best talent of the Church, and the laity would be instructed without being injured by individuals forcing a reformation upon them before they were convinced of its necessity.

While some, during the next five or six years, are tinkering the liturgy as to how the words of our lips may be enriched when we approach the throne of grace, others may be considering how the heart and life may be cleansed so that a reformer, as we are, will utterly close His ear to our prayers. There will be few to dispute that the latter is not the more important of the two. If it should be proven by the light of scripture and history and ordinary reason that a reformation was clearly necessary for the preservation of the Church, and that the slightly Father may withstanding the Church should refuse to consider it or reject it, then there will be no lack of faithful souls, clergy and laity, to range themselves on the side of their crucified Lord to fight spiritual wickedness in high places—it matters not who may occupy them—and cry out with Him: "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees—hypocrites! how can ye escape the damnation of hell!"

Whether, then, the answer came in stones of rage, or showers of money, the grace of God would come with them; the Church would be cleansed and the saints saved.

To make the matter practical, will THE CHURCHMAN be the medium for their consideration proposed above? THOS. W. HASKINS.

HINDRANCES TO DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In the able and interesting article of the Bishop of Long Island, published in THE CHURCHMAN of last week, I fear that the closing item under the head of "Hindrances to Domestic Missions," may convey an erroneous impression.

In the first place it is hardly fair to suggest the Schools of the Prophets as at fault for unfit men in the ministry of the Church, while failing to mention those who stand immediately at the door of entrance.

In the nature of the case the former must receive most of those who come to them with the necessary mental qualifications, while the latter having the keys of admission placed in their hands must accept the responsibility it involves. The principal objection, however, to the article above referred to lies in the implied defective qualification of those already in the missionary work of the Church in the West.

From a somewhat extended acquaintance, we are convinced that the percentage, if any, of Long Island, published in THE CHURCHMAN of last week, I fear that the closing item under the head of "Hindrances to Domestic Missions," may convey an erroneous impression.

The beautiful rhetoric of the writer has, we fear, obscured his mind to the degree of failing to hinder missionary work in the West, and deserts, if it does not destroy, the inspiration to great efforts on the part of those already there, or others desirous to go. It is not the lack of zeal, or knowledge, but the consciousness of a lack of sympathy on the part of the Church in general; the absence of that esprit de corps in the Church with which the apostle had in mind when he declared that if one member suffers the whole body suffers. Unlike

David, many in the present day are content to dwell in ceiled houses with luxurious appointments and all that wealth and influence can procure, numifund of those confined to the scantiest means and an atmosphere more chilling and deadly than the frigid zone. It is the terrible isolation the missionary endures, cut off, to all appearance, from sympathy with his brethren in more sumptuous conditions, and forced to toil on without any apparent interest on their part. This it is that paralyzes missionary zeal and renders the efforts of those distant fields as ineffectual as the struggle of a shipwrecked mariner in mid-ocean. Let the unity and oneness of the Church be manifest in some degree as it was in early days; let the consciousness of the one body in Christ be realized as it was then, and as noble monuments of sacrifice and devotion to the cause of Christ will be as common as ever they were in the times of St. Paul or St. Augustine. We are glad to believe that there is one now entrusted with the practical work of our missionary boards to whom this grand ideal of the Church's true character is a reality; who will seek to make her unity manifest in a sympathy felt for all her members reaching to the farthest corners of the earth and as the life-blood of a healthy man pulsates in every particle of the body and sends vitality to every member, so shall it be his purpose to make all feel the unity and oneness of that body which draws its life and spirit from Him Who is seated at the right hand of the throne of the Father.

Can the ideal of unity and oneness of the Church be aroused to her true oneness and trinity, and the noble examples of early missionary zeal again manifest to the world the power and excellence of our holy religion!

For this purpose we may well pray the prayer of the distinguished Christian Father: "Lord, give what Thou commandest and command what Thou givest." R. SCOTT.

STOP RIGHT THERE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

I have just finished reading the remarkable article of Mr. Shields in the November-Number, and I desire to give you a suggestion that I have been thinking about for some time. That article is truly remarkable, not merely in itself, but as being admitted into a periodical which keeps its finger upon the public pulse so constantly as the Century does. Passing over what a Churchman cannot sympathize with, we cannot but feel that he has hit the mark, when he recognizes in the issue of the liturgical movement "among the sects, and bravely acknowledges that "it must have its logical conclusion in the English Prayer-Book." Surely we cannot grudge their coming nearer to us, even though, as wise Bishop Hobart is reported to have said, the last thing they adopt is that which gives life to all the rest—the Apostolic Ministry. Why not help them to the use of the Prayer-Book by an amendment of the title-page, which will also satisfy a good many among us, who think our own communion is mis-named; while, at the same time, it will securely guard our claim to an Apostolic Ministry and polity. Why not let the title-page read thus:

"THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER,

AND

ADMINISTRATION OF THE SACRAMENTS;

AND OTHER

RITES AND CEREMONIES OF THE CHURCH,

TOGETHER WITH

THE PSALTER OR PSALMS OF DAVID.

AND

THE FORM AND MANNER

BISHOPS, PRIESTS AND DEACONS."

And stop right there. There is but one Book of Common Prayer, just as there is but one Holy Bible. Why need we say that it is "according to the use of" anybody? JOHN. H. EGAR.

Rome, N. Y.

[It will occur to many readers that Dr. Eggar's purpose would be largely gained by dropping the words "Protestant Episcopal" from the title page.—Ed. CHURCHMAN.]

CONSECRATION SERMONS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Having been for some time interested in the subject of the consecration sermons of American bishops, I have sought to learn the name of the preacher at the consecration of Bishop Madison at Lambeth, England, September 19, 1790. It is well known that all records of his consecration brought to America have been lost. The original convention journals of Virginia contain no allusion to the sermon at all. I have just obtained through Canon W. R. Churton of England the following information from one of the Lambeth librarians:

"I have referred to Bishop Moore's register, but cannot find the name of any preacher. The Rev. N. Radcliffe, Doctor in Divinity, one of the chaplains of his grace, and the Rev. William Morice, Doctor in Divinity, rector of All Hallows, Broad street, were stated to be present. I do not find the consecration sermon among the many which you know are here. The page relating to the consecration of Bishop Madison is p. 210. Register American Bishop Moore."

It would thus seem that no sermon was preached at Bishop Madison's consecration—certainly a rare exception, and indicating that the consecration itself was performed in private, in the presence of a very small congregation.

It may interest some of your readers to know that the Maryland Diocesan Library and my own contain, together, a full set of the sermons preached at the consecration of American bishops, and afterward printed in newspapers or in pamphlet form, with one exception, that of Bishop Cox's sermon at the Walker consecration, which we both lack, but hope to secure soon.

NEW BOOKS.

PHILISTINES: Plain Words Concerning Certain Forms of Modern Scientific Materialism. By the Rev. Rector of All Souls' Protestant Episcopal Church, New York City. [New York: G. F. Putnam's Sons, pp. 322.]

In these sermons Mr. Newton undertakes to answer the lectures of Ingersoll, and to provide a rational faith, as he deems it, for his congregation. There is no question as to Mr. Newton's entire sincerity; but he labors under the great disadvantage of by no means understanding the power of words. He is a brilliant rhetorician, without apparently being able to see at all whether his positions will logically lead. Interpreted as any other man would justly be interpreted, he would pass for a Unitarian of a rather advanced type. But he evidently has no idea that his views of the Old and New Testament Scriptures are fatally destructive, not merely of what he considers superfluous in them, but of their essential character. It is not easy in many passages to see what he does mean, but his language implies that he regards the miracles of our Lord as being of doubtful authority, and to be explained, if accepted, on natural grounds. His conception of religion is purely subjective, and his tests of truth are simply those which are founded in the mind of the disciple. Of the laws of evidence, as such, he has the vaguest possible ideas. The very title of this book is an inaccuracy. "A Philistine," in the original German student college slang, is any one outside the universities. The "Bureau" going out from the university becomes a "Philistine." Some modern English writers have taken up this term and applied it to the commercial classes of society. But, as it appears in Mr. Newton's pages, it is a long way off from any original or secondary meaning which anybody else has ever given it. Again, he quotes Dr. Hodge, the Unitarian, as saying something concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, which we are morally certain the doctor never did say and could not. The implication is, that the doctor could accept the Nicene Creed, and thought that the Unitarians had made a mistake in not retaining it. If the doctrine is not held according to this creed, it is not held at all. The mere term Trinity simply signifying that the three names, Father, Son and Spirit are accepted, but with no idea of their equality, would be an evasion or a blunder. Mr. Newton in some parts of these sermons uses language which, fairly understood, questions the actual slowness of Jesus, and which implies that one may regard as interpolations and myths whatever one is not prepared to accept in the pages of the Gospels. We do not say that he would reject very much. His temper is a believing temper. But he has read a good deal of German criticism, and is manifestly greatly impressed by views which the later and sounder scholarship of the age has exploded—the views of the reckless and fantastic Tübingen school.

We have called Mr. Newton a rhetorician. There are passages of doubtful taste in these pages of his, but there is a warmth, an earnestness and a devoutness to which the book will owe not a little of its attractiveness. In one way it may do good. It appeals to the class who feel but do not reason. It may save some such from the gulf of infidelity. It may persuade them that it answers the doubts suggested by such men as Ingersoll. Mr. Newton is encamped on the "debatable land" between a sound faith and a thorough unbelief, but his face is set toward the home he has left. He cannot help a man who has really thought and has struggled with serious doubts. But there are not a few whose wish is to believe, and who will be satisfied with any answer which saves them the trouble of really analyzing their ideas, and which has the semblance of a reasonable solution. It bears the impress of the lovely, personal character of its author, and that will suffice many who will not look beyond.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY. Edited by Leslie Stephen. Vols. II, III, and IV. (Ansonby-Ilber). [New York: Macmillan & Co., 1884.] Pp. 62, 465, 624.

On the appearance of the first volume of this work we gave a resumé of what was proposed, and expressed freely our sense of its great importance and of the manner in which its promises were thus far fulfilled. It is a very great undertaking, and though confined to English names, and the sketches are given in condensed form, it will extend to more than fifty volumes, and will be in reality a cyclopædia of biography rather than a dictionary. In the fourth volume it has hardly more than begun upon the letter B, the last name being Biber. It is edited by Leslie Stephen, and that is a guarantee that no cost or labor will be spared to make the work worthy of its name—the "National Biography." He has secured the aid of able and learned contributors in its various departments, giving, as far as possible, separate portions of it to specialists, and the articles thus prepared are carefully revised and corrected where corrections are needed. There are in the second volume ninety, in the first ninety-two, and in the fourth ninety-seven contributors, besides the editor. The biographies are of course condensed, but for the most part authorities are given, so that researches, if desired, can be further pursued, and the initials of the names of the writers are appended to the articles, to carry such weight as they are entitled to. There is a law of proportion in regard to the length of the articles which is generally satisfactory, though it will be found that literature and the State have the preference over the Church, though Bishop Berkeley receives no less than sixteen columns, and Richard Bentley about the same. Many names are found which are scarcely entitled to the honor, and doubtless others are omitted that might well have had place. It being a dictionary of English biography, some will be surprised at the prominence given to Judah P. Benjamin, some time United States Senator from Louisiana, then prominent in the councils of the Southern Confederacy, and lastly a most successful lawyer in London, and one who did not fear to turn his back upon the House of Lords when he thought the occasion demanded it; and compelled that body to make him an apology; but he was born in St. Croix, an English island, and so fairly comes within the rule. These volumes, handsomely printed, are full of interest, and make a most valuable work of reference.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS. (American Version.) Translated out of the Hebrew: Being the Version set forth A. D. 1613. Compared with the most Ancient Authorities, and Revised A. D. 1885 with the Readings and Readings preferred by the American Committee of Revision Incorporated into the Text. Those retained or adopted by the English Committee being specified in the Appendix. Edited by John G. Lanning, D. D., Professor of Old Testament Languages and Exegesis in the Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N. J. [New York: Foris, Boston, 1885.] Pp. 717.

We have always taken the ground that it did not fall within the province of the Revising Committee to do anything more than to correct manifest mistakes. All changes as such were to be deprecated, and only to be made when clearly justified. Therefore, while the language of the older version is largely retained, there are alterations here made which are clearly uncalled for. Our principle is that where of two words to be employed one now seems the better, the question is no longer an open one, as it would have been at the time of the first translation. Mere improvement is not a sufficient reason for disturbing that which is settled. Correction is proper, but nothing further, because the familiar word has attained through time a value which the unfamiliar word cannot have. This, however, only applies to the version considered as a substitute. As a paraphrase, a commentary, every careful version is of use. We can give, in a single illustration, our meaning. In Psalm I the word "wicked" is used for "ungodly." Now there may be a slight shade of difference of sense in this, though we are not able to see it. But what is the gain! Not one in a thousand of Bible-readers will get any different idea. Again we do not see the force of the change of "Jehovah" for "Lord" throughout the version. The psalms are eminently devotional, and the habit of the English speaking peoples is in devotional use to employ not the Hebrew, but its English equivalent. No one would dream of making the alteration in the Collects. No one would say Jehovah's Day or Jehovah's House for the Lord's Day or the Lord's House. It seems to us hypercritical to use it here.

A LABORER HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA to the close of President Jackson's Administration. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Author of "Young Folks' History of the United States." Illustrated by Maps, Plates, Portraits and other Engravings. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] Pp. 679.

We do not like to find fault with a book we have greatly enjoyed. To one who is familiar with the events, who has the whole detail of the American annals at his fingers' end, this book is simply charming. But we cannot help feeling that the average youth, trained in the superficiality of the public school system, or in the scarcely less imperfect education of our most private schools, would be most bewildered to make out not a little of Mr. Higginson's pages. We doubt if he has any idea of the wondrous ignorance of what they ought to know, which prevails among the rising generation. On the other hand, for the instructed reader this volume is like the conversation of a brilliant and finished literary man. It is never prolix, never dull—an allusion, an anecdote, a little bit of hitherto unrevealed history, and from the subject is dismissed and the next topic taken up. But we feel that the uneducated reader must be very much in the condition of

READY NOVEMBER 15th.

The Living Church Annual
And Clergy List Quarterly.

THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL, as the public have been advised, has now become a Quarterly Magazine, as its full name indicates. The Advent number will be issued November 15 and will contain the same amount of valuable matter as in the past. The most important addition is a Glossary of Ecclesiastical Terms.

This feature will be continued year after year, till a complete Glossary of the Church's nomenclature has been given. The present installment comprises upwards of relating to the Altar, and the rites and ceremonies connected therewith. This feature alone is worth more than the year's subscription price.

THE CLERGY LIST

Has been carefully revised, and at greater expense, to secure accuracy, than has ever been incurred by any similar publication. However, knowing how utterly impossible it is to give a list once each year that can be correct for any length of time, the publishers have begun the issue of the Clergy List Quarterly.

The subscription price for THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL & CLERGY LIST QUARTERLY is 35 cents per year, advance payment. All who subscribe now will receive, in addition to the Advent number, a Quarterly corrected Clergy List, which will be issued on the 15th days of the months of February, May and August, 1886. Read subscription at once by Postal Note, if possible, for fractional amounts, to

TWO BRILLIANT NOVELS.

ON BOTH SIDES.

By Miss FANNY COURTNEY RAYLOR. Containing "The Perfect Treasure" and "On This Side," the whole forming a complete story. 7ms. Extra cloth, $1.25.
"No such faithful, candid, kindly, brilliant, and incisive presentation of English and American types has before been achieved. The wit of the story is considerable. It is written brilliantly, yet not dimly. It is the best international novel that either side has hitherto produced. It is written by an able hand who really knows both countries, and who has shown that she possesses powers which ought to put her in the front rank of fiction."—New York Tribune.

AURORA.

A Novel. By MARY AGNES TINKER, author of "The Jewel in the Lotus," etc. Illustrated. 12mo. Extra cloth, $1.25.

"A novel of extraordinary power and merit. One of the most powerful parts of the book is that in which the earthquake and its effects is described. But other parts are as beautiful as genuine water-painting could make them."—Hartford Courant.

THE GREAT MULTITUDE OF THE REDEEMED.*

BY EMILY SEEVER.

Oh, Zion, lift thy lofty gates,
Thy portals open wide,
Behold the myriad throng that wait
Those gates of pearl beside!

Three gates look on th' advancing morn:
From Persia's ancient plain,
As once to hail the Virgin-born,
The wise men come again!

To worship their victorious king;
And Asia's farthest coast,
From under the Red Dragon's wing
Sends up her mighty host.

Three southern gates with radiance glow;
And from the golden strand;
From the dark continent of woe
Ascends the dusky band.

From many a soft sea island bower,
From Orinoco's plain—
Where India's ancient cities tower Comes up the mighty train.

Three gates upon the northern side
Look o'er the realm of snow;
And all the Russia's swelling tide
Joins them and Esquimaux.

Three gates look to the glowing west,
And lo! a royal race,
Made up of every nation's best,
Mounts to the holy place.

Within, the King of Glory longs
His ransomed saints to meet,
And welcome all the eager throng
To worship at His feet.

Oh, Zion! open all thy gates
Unfold thy portals wide;
Receive the countless host that wait
Those gates of pearl beside!

CHAPTER I.

How Come They There?

The room was handsomely furnished, but such as I would quarrel with none for calling common, for it certainly was uninteresting. Not a thing in it had to do with genuine individual choice, but merely with the fashion and custom of the class to which its occupiers belonged. It was a dining-room, of good size, appointed with all the things a dining-room "ought" to have, mostly new, and entirely expensive—mirrored side-board in oak; heavy chairs, just the dozen, in fawn-colored morocco seats and backs—the dining-room, in short, of a London house, inhabited by rich middle-class people. A big fire blazed in the low round-backed grate, whose flashes were reflected in the steel fender and the ugly fire-irons that were never used. A snowy cloth of linen, finer than ordinary, for there was pride in the housekeeping, covered the large dining-table, and a company, evidently a family, were eating its breakfast. But how come these people there?

For, supposing my reader one of the company, let him rise from the well-appointed table—its silver, bright as the complex motions of butler's elbows can make it; its china, ornate though not elegant; its ham, huge, and neither too fat nor too lean; its game pie, with nothing to be desired in composition or in flavor natural or artificial;—let him rise from these and go to the left of the two windows, for there are two opposite each other, the room having been enlarged by being built out; if he be such a one as I would have for a reader, might I choose—a reader whose heart, not merely his eye, mirrors what he sees—one who not merely beholds the outward show of things, but catches a glimpse of the soul that looks out of them, whose garment and revelation they are:—if he be such, I say, he will stand, for more than a moment, speechless with something akin to that which made the morning stars sing together.

He finds himself gazing far over western seas, while yet the sun is in the east. They lie clear and cold, pale and cold, broken with islands scattering thinner to the horizon, which is jagged here and there with yet another. The ocean looks a wild, yet peaceful mingling of lake and land. Some of the islands are green from shore to shore, of low yet broken surface; others are mere rocks, with a bold front to the sea, one or two of them strange both in form and character. Over the pale blue sea hangs the pale blue sky, flecked with a few cold white clouds that look as if they disowned the earth they got so high—though none the less her children, and doomed to descend again to her bosom. A keen little wind is out, crisping the surface of the sea in patches—a pretty large crisping to be seen from that height, for the window looks over hill above hill to the sea. Life, quiet, yet eager, is all about; the solitude itself is alive, content to be a solitude because it is alive. Its life needs nothing from beyond—is independent even of the few sails of fishing boats that here and there with their red brown break the blue of the water.

If my reader, gently obedient to my thanksgiving, will now turn and cross to the other window, let him as he does so beware of casting a glance on his right towards the place he has left at the table, for the room will now look to him tenfold commonplace, so that he too will be inclined to ask, "How come these and their belongings here—just here?"—let him first look from the window. There he sees hills of heather rolling away eastward, at middle distance beginning to rise into mountains, and farther yet, on the horizon, showing snow on their crests—though that may disappear and return several times before settling down for the winter. It is a solemn and very still region—not a pretty country at all, but great—beautiful with the beauties of color and variety of surface; while, far in the distance, where the mountains and the clouds have business together, its aspect rises to grandeur. To his first glance probably not a tree will be discoverable; the second will fall upon a solitary clump of firs, like a mole on the cheek of one of the hills not far off, a hill steeper than most of them, and green to the top.

Is my reader seized with that form of divine longing which wonders what lies over the nearest hill? Does he fancy, ascending the other side to its crest, some sweet face of highland girl, singing songs of the old centuries while yet there was a people in these wastes? Why should he imagine in the presence of the actual? why dream when the eyes can see? He has but to return to the table to reseat himself by the side of one of the prettiest of girls?

She is fair, yet with a glowing tinge under her fairness which flames out only in her eyes, and seldom reddens her skin. She has brown hair, with just a suspicion of red and no more, and a waveness that turns to curl at the ends. She has a good forehead, arched a little, not without a look of habitation, though whence that comes it might be hard to say. There are no great clouds on the sky of the face, but there is a soft dimness that might turn to rain. She has a straight nose, not too large for the imperfect yet decidedly Greek contour; a doubtful, rather straight, thin-lipped mouth, which seems to dissolve into a bewitching smile, and reveals perfect teeth—and a good deal more to the eyes that can read it. When the mouth smiles the eyes light up, which is a good sign. Their shape is long oval—and their color when unlighted, much that of an unpeeled almond; when she smiles, they grow red. She has an object in life, which can hardly be called a mission. She is rather tall, and quite graceful, though not altogether natural in her movements. Her dress gives a feathery impression to one who rather receives than notes the look of ladies. She has a good hand—not the doll hand so much admired of those who can judge only of quantity and know nothing of quality, but a fine sensible hand—the best thing about her: a hand may be too small just as well as too large.

Poor mother earth! What a load of disappointing women, made fit for fine things, and running all to self and show, she carries on her weary old back! From all such, good Lord deliver us!—except it be for our discipline or their awaking.

Near her at the breakfast-table sits one of aspect so different, that you could ill believe they belonged to the same family. She is younger and taller—tall indeed, but not ungraceful, though by no means beautiful. She has all the features that belong to a face—among them not a good one. Stay! I am wrong; there were in truth, dominant over the rest, two good features—her two eyes, dark as eyes well could be without being all pupil, large, and rather long like her sister's until she looked at you, and then they opened wide. They did not flash or glow, but were full of the light that tries to see—questioning eyes. They were simple eyes—I will not say without arrière pensée, for there was no end of thinking faculty, if not yet thought, behind them,—but honest eyes that looked at you from the root of eyes, with neither attack nor defence in them. If she was not so graceful as her sister, she was hardly more than a girl, and had a remnant of that curiously lovely mingling of grace and clumsiness which we see in long-legged growing girls. I will give her the advantage of not being further described, except so far as this—her hair

There is one truth about a plain face, that may not have occurred to many: its ugliness accompanies a condition of larger undevelopment, for all ugliness that is not evil, is undevelopment; and so implies the larger material and possibility of development. The idea of no countenance is yet carried out, and this kind will take more developing for the completion of its idea, and may result in a greater beauty. I would therefore advise any young man of aspiration in the matter of beauty, to choose a plain woman for wife—if through her plainness she is yet lovely in his eyes; for the loveliness is herself victorious over the plainness, and her face, so far from complete and yet serving her loveliness, has in it room for completion on a grander scale than possibly most handsome faces. In a handsome face one sees the lines of its coming perfection, and has a glimpse of what it must be when finished: few are prophets enough for a plain face. A keen surprise of beauty waits many a man if he be pure enough to come near the transfiguration of the homely face he loved.

This plain face was a solemn one, and the solemnity suited the plainness. It was not specially expressive—did not look specially intelligent; there was more of latent than operative power in it, while her sister's had more expression than power. Both were lady-like; whether they were ladies, my reader may determine. There are common ladies and there are rare ladies; the former may be countesses; the latter may be peasants.

There were two younger girls at the table, of whom I will say nothing more than that one of them looked awkward, promised to be handsome, and was apparently a good soul; the other was pretty, and looked pert.

The family possessed two young men, but they were not here; one was a partner in the business from which his father had practically retired; the other was that day expected from Oxford.

The mother, a woman with many autumnal reminders of spring about her, sat at the head of the table, and regarded her queen-don with a smile a little set, perhaps, but bright. She had the look of a woman on good terms with her motherhood, with society, with the universe—yet had scarce a shadow of assumption on her countenance. For if she felt as one who had a claim upon things to go pleasantly with her, had she not put in her claim, and had it acknowledged? Her smile was a sweet white-toothed smile, true if shallow, and a more than tolerably happy one—often irradiating the Governor opposite—for so was the head styled by the whole family from mother to child.

He was the only one at the table on whose countenance a shadow—as of some end unattained—was visible. He had tried to get into parliament, and had not succeeded; but I will not presume to say that was the source of the shadow. He did not look discontented, or even peevish; there was indeed a certain radiance of success about him—only above the cloudy horizon of his thick, dark eyebrows, seemed to hang a thundery atmosphere. His forehead was large, but his features rather small; he had, however, grown a trifle fat, which tended to make up. In his youth he must have been very nice-looking, probably too pretty to be handsome. In good health and when things went well, as they had mostly done with him, he was sweet-tempered; what he might be in other conditions was seldom conjectured. But was that a sleeping thundercud, or only the shadow of his eyebrows?

He had a good opinion of himself—on what grounds at all I do not know; but he was rich, and I know no better ground; I doubt if there is any more certain soil for growing a good opinion of one's self. Certainly, the more you try to raise one by doing what is right and worth doing, the less you succeed.

Mr. Peregrine Palmer had finished his breakfast, and sat for a while looking at nothing in particular, plunged in deep thought about nothing at all, while the girls went on with theirs. He was a little above the middle height, and looked not much older than his wife; his black hair had but begun to be touched with silver; he seemed a man without an atom of care more than humanity counts reasonable; his speech was not unlike that of an Englishman, for, although born in Glasgow, he had been to Oxford. He spoke respectfully to his wife, and with a pleasant playfulness to his daughters; his manner was nowise made to order, but natural enough; his grammar was as good as conversation requires; everything was respectable about him—and yet—he was one remove at least from a gentleman. Something hard to define was lacking to that idea of perfection.

Mr. Peregrine Palmer's grandfather had begun to make the family fortune by developing a little secret still in a remote highland glen which had acquired a reputation for its whiskey, into a great superterrene distillery. Both he and his son made money by it, and it had "done well" for Mr. Peregrine also. With all three of them the making of money was the great calling of life. They were diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving Mammon, and founding claim to consideration on the fact. Neither Jacob nor John Palmer's worst enemy had ever called him a hypocrite; neither had been suspected of thinking to serve Mammon and God. Both had gone regularly to church, but neither had taught in a Sunday-school, or once gone to a week-day sermon. Peregrine had built a church and a school. He did not now take any active part in the distillery, but employed money variously—in making more money, for he had a genuine turn for business.

Jacob, the son of a ship-chandler at Greenock, had never thought about gentleman or no gentleman; but his son John had entertained the difference, and done his best to make a gentleman of Peregrine; and neither Peregrine nor any of his family ever doubted his father's success. He had not quite succeeded. I would have the blame laid on Peregrine, and not on either father or grandfather. For a man to grow a gentleman, it is of great consequence that his grandfather should have been an honest man; but if a man be a gentleman, it matters little what his grandfather or grandmother either was. Nay—if a man be a gentleman, it is of the smallest consequence, except for his own sake, whether the world counts him one or not.

Mr. Peregrine Palmer rose from the table with a merry remark on the prolongation of the meal by his girls, and went towards the door.

"Are you going to shoot?" asked his wife.

"Not to-day. But I am going to look after my guns. I darsay they've got them all right, but there's nothing like seeing to a thing yourself."

Mr. Palmer had this virtue, and this very gentleman-like way—that he always gave his wife as direct an answer as he would another lady. He was not given to marital brevity.

He was there for the grouse-shooting—not exactly, only "as it were." He did not care very much about the sport, and had he cared nothing, would have been there all the same. Other people, in what he counted his social position, shot grouse, and he liked to do what other people did, for then he felt all right; if ever he tried the gate of heaven, it would be because other people did. But the primary cause of his being so far in the north was the simple fact that he had had the chance of buying a property very cheap—a fine property of mist and cloud, heather and rock, mountain and moor, and with no such reputation for grouse as to enhance its price. "My estate," sounded well, and after a time of good preserving he would be able to let it well, he trusted. No sooner was it bought than his wife and daughters were eager to visit it; and the man of business, perceiving that it would cost him much less if they passed their summers there instead of on the continent, proceeded at once to enlarge the house and make it comfortable. If they should never go a second time, it would, with its perfect appointments, make the place unusually attractive!

They had arrived the day before. The journey had been fatiguing, for a great part of it was by road; but they were all in splendid health, and not too tired to get up in reasonable time the next day.

CHAPTER II.

A Short Glance Over the Shoulder.

Mr. Peregrine was the first of the Palmer family to learn that there was a Palmer coat of arms. He learned it at college, and on this wise.

One day a fellow-student, who pleased himself with what he called philology, remarked that his father must have been a bit of a humorist to name him Peregrine:—"except indeed it be a family name!" he added.

"I never thought about it," said Peregrine. "I don't quite know what you mean."

The fact was he had no glimmering idea of what he meant.

"Nothing profound," returned the other. "Only don't you see Peregrine means pilgrim? It is the same as the Italian pellegrino, from the Latin, perigrinus, which means one that goes about the fields—which in Scotland you call a landlouper!"

"Well, but," returned Peregrine, hesitatingly. "I don't find myself much wiser. Peregrine means a pilgrim, you say, but what of that? All names mean something, I suppose! It don't matter much."

"What is your coat of arms?"

"I don't know."

"Why did your father call you Peregrine?"

"I don't know that either. I suppose because he liked the name."

"Why should he have liked it?" continued the other, who was given to the Socratic method.

"I know no more than the man in the moon."

"What does your surname mean?"

"Something to do with palms, I suppose."

"Doubtless."

"You see I don't go in for that kind of thing like you!"

"Any man who cares about the cut of his coat, might have a little curiosity about the cut of his name: it sits to him a good deal closer!"

"That is true—so close that you can't do anything with it. You can't pull it off however you criticise it."

"You can change it any day. Would you like to do that?"

"No, thank you, Mr. Stokes," said Peregrine, dryly.

"I didn't mean with mine," growled the other. "My name is an historical one too—but that is not in question. Do you know your crest ought to be a hairy worm?"

"Why?"

"Don't you know the palmer-worm? It got its name where you got yours."

"Well, we all come from Adam."

"What I worms and all?"

"Surely. We're all worms, the parson says. Come, put me through; it's time for lunch. Or, if you prefer, let me burst in ignorance. I don't mind."

"Well, then, I will explain. The palmer was a pilgrim: when he came home, he carried a palm-branch to show he had been to the holy land."

"Did the hairy worm go to the holy land too?"

"He is called a palmer-worm because he has feet enough to go any number of pilgrimages. But you are such a landlouper, you ought to blazon two hairy worms saltier-wise."

"I don't understand."

"Why, your name, interpreted to half an ear, is just Pilgrim Pilgrim!"

"I wonder if my father meant it!"

"That I cannot even guess at, not having the pleasure of knowing your father. But it does look like a paternal joke!"

His friend sought out for him the coat and crest of the Palmers; but for the latter, strongly recommended a departure: the fresh family-branch would suit the worm so well—his crest ought to be two worms crossed, tufted, the tufts ouch'd in gold. It was not heraldic language, but with Peregrine passed well enough. Still he did not take to the worms, but contented himself with the ordinary crest. He was henceforth, however, better pleased with his name, for he fancied in it something of the dignity of a double surname.

His first glance at his wife was because she crossed the field of his vision; his second glance was because of her beauty; his third because her name was Shelley. It is marvellous how whimsically sentimental common-place people can be where their own interesting personality is concerned: her name he instantly associated with scold-top-shell, and began to make inquiry about her. Learning that her other name was Miriam, one also of the holy land—

"A most remarkable coincidence!—a mere coincidence, of course!" he said to himself. "Evidently that is the woman destined to be the companion of my pilgrimage!"

When their first child was born, the father was greatly exercised as to a fitting name for him. He turned up an old botany book, and sought out the scientific names of different palms. Chamerops would not do, for it was a dwarf-palm; Borassus might do, seeing it was a boy—only it stood for a fan-palm; Corypha would not be bad for a girl, only it was the name of a heathen goddess, and would not go well with the idea of a holy palmer. Cocca, Phoenix, and Arecia, one after the other, went in at his eyes and through his head: none of them pleased him. His wife, however, who in her smiling way had fallen in with his whim, helped him out of his difficulty. She was the daughter of nonconformist parents in Lancashire, and had been encouraged when a child to read a certain old-fashioned book called "The Pilgrim's Progress," which her husband had never seen. He did not read it now, but accepted her suggestion, and named the boy Christian. When a daughter came, he would have had her Christiana, but his wife persuaded him to be content with Christina. They named their second son Valentine, after Mr. Valentine-for-truth. Their second daughter was Mercy; and for the third and fourth, Hope and Grace seemed near enough. So the family had a cool glow of puritanism about it, while nothing was farther from the thoughts of any of them than what their names signified. All, except the mother, associated them with the crusades for the rescue of the sepulchre of the Lord from the pagans; not a thought did one of them spend on the rescue of a live soul from the sepulchre of low desires, mean thoughts, and crawling selfishness.

CHAPTER III.

The Girls' First Walk.

The Governor, Peregrine and Palmer as he was, did not care about walking at any time, not even when he had to do it because other people did; the mother, of whom there would have been little left had the sweetness in her moral, and the house-keeping in her practical nature, been subtracted, had things to see to within doors; the young people must go out by themselves; they put on their hats and issued.

The temperature was keen, though it was now nearly the middle of August, by which time in those northern regions the earth had begun to get a little warm: the house stood high, and the atmosphere was thin. There was a certain sense of sadness in the pale sky and its cold brightness; but these young people felt no cold, and perceived no sadness. The air was exhilarating, and they breathed deep breaths of a pleasure more akin to the spiritual than they were capable of knowing. For as they gazed around them, they thought, like Hamlet's mother in the presence of her invisible husband, that they saw all there was to be seen. They did not know nature; in the school to which they had gone they patronized instead of revering her. She wrought upon them nevertheless after her own fashion with her children, unheeded whether they knew what she was about or not. The mere space, the mere height from which they looked, the rarity of the air, the soft aspiration of earth towards heaven, made them all more of children.

But not one of them being capable of enjoying anything by herself, together they were unable to enjoy much; and, like the miser who, when he cannot much enjoy his money, desires more, they began to desire more company to share in the already withering satisfaction of their new possession—to help them, that is, to get pleasure out of it, as out of a new dress. It is a good thing to desire to share a good thing, but it is not well to be unable alone to enjoy a good thing. It is our enjoyment that should make us desirous to share. What is there to share if the thing be of no value in itself? To enjoy alone is to be able to share. No participation can make that of value which in itself is of none. It is not love alone but pride also, and often only pride, that leads to the desire for another to be present with us in possession.

The girls grew weary of the show around them because it was so quiet, so regardless of their presence, so moveless, so monotonous. Endless change was going on, but it was too slow for them to see; had it been rapid, its motions were not of a kind to interest them. Ere half-an-hour they had begun to think with regret of Piccadilly and Regent street—for they had passed the season in London. There is a good deal counted social which is merely gregarious. Doubtless humanity is better company than a bare hill-side; but not a little depends on how near we come to the humanity, and how near we come to the hill. I doubt if one who could not enjoy a bare hill-side alone, would enjoy the hill-side in any company; if he thought he did, I suspect it would be that the company enabled him, not to forget himself in what he saw, but to be more pleasantly aware of himself than the lone hill would permit him to be: for the mere hill has its relation to that true self which the common self is so anxious to avoid and forget. The girls, however, went on and on, led mainly by the animal delight of motion, the two younger making many a diversion up the hill on the one side, and down the hill on the other, shrieking aloud at everything fresh that pleased them.

The house they had just left stood on the projecting shoulder of a hill, here and there planted with firs. Of the hardy trees there was a thicket at the back of the house, while towards the south, less hardy ones grew in the shrubbery, though they would never, because of the sea-breezes, come to any height. The carriage-drive to the house joined two not very distant points on the same road, and there was no lodge at either gate. It was a rough, country road, a good deal rutted, and seldom repaired. Opposite the gates, rose the steep slope of a heathery hill, along the flank of which the girls were now walking. On their right lay a piece of rough moorland, covered with heather, patches of bracken, and coarse grass. A few yards to the right, it sank in a steep descent. Such was the disposition of the ground for some distance along the road—on one side the hill, on the other a narrow level and abrupt descent, gradually descending towards a valley.

As they advanced they caught sight of a ruin rising above the brow of the descent:

the two younger darted across the heather towards it; the two elder continued their walk along the road.

"I wonder what we shall see round the corner there!" said Mercy, the younger of the two.

"The same over again, I suppose!" answered Christina. "What a rough road it is! I've twice nearly sprained my ankle!"

"I was thinking of what I saw the other day in somebody's travels—about his interest in every turn of the road, always looking for what was to come next."

"Time enough when it comes, in my opinion!" rejoined Christina.

For she was like any other mirror—quite ready to receive what was thrown upon her, but incapable of originating anything, almost incapable of using anything.

As they descended, and the hill-side, here covered with bracken and bowlders, grew higher and higher above them, the valley, in front and on the right, gradually opened, here and there showing a glimpse of a small stream that catered steadily towards the sea, now tumbling over a rock, now sullen in a brown pool. Arriving at length at a shoulder of the hill round which the road turned, a whole mile of the brook lay before them. It came down a narrow valley, with scraps of meadow in the bottom; but immediately below them the valley was of some width, and was good land from side to side, where green oats waved their feathery grace, and the yellow barley was nearly ready for the sickle. No more than the barren hill, however, had the fertile valley anything for them. Their talk was of the last ball they were at.

The sisters were about as good friends as such negative creatures could be; and they would be such friends all their lives, if, on the one hand, neither of them grew to anything better, and, on the other, no jealousy, or marked difference of social position through marriage, intervened. They loved each other, if not tenderly, yet with the genuineness of healthy family-habit—a thing not to be despised, for it keeps the door open for something better. In itself it is not at all to be reckoned upon, for habit is but the merest shadow of reality. Still it is not a small thing, as families go, if sisters and brothers do not dislike each other.

They were criticizing certain of the young men they had met at the said ball. Being, in their development, if not in their nature, commonplace, what should they talk about but dress or young men? And why, although it was an excellent type of its kind, should I take the trouble to record their conversation? To read, it might have amused me—or even interested, as may a carrot painted by a Dutchman; but were I painter, I should be sorry to paint carrots, and the girls' talk is not for my pen. At the same time I confess myself incapable of doing it justice. When one is annoyed at the sight of things meant to be and not beautiful, there is danger of not giving them even the poor fair-play they stand in so much the more need of that it can do so little for them.

But now they changed the subject of their talk. They had come to a point of the road not far from the ruin to which the children had run across the heather.

"Look, Chrissy! It is an old castle!" said Mercy. "I wonder whether it is on our land?"

"Not much to be proud of!" replied the other. "It is nothing but the walls of a square house!"

"Not just a common square house! Look at that pepper-pot on one of the corners!—I wonder how it is all the old castles get deserted!"

"Because they are old. It's walled to desert them before they tumble down."

"But they wouldn't tumble down if they weren't neglected. Think of Warwick castle! Stone doesn't rot like wood! Just see the thickness of those walls!"

"Yes, they are thick! But stone, too, has its way of rotting. Westminster palace is wearing through flake by flake. The weather will be at the lords before long."

"That's what Valentine would call a sign of the times. I say, what a radical he is, Chrissy!—look! the old place is just like an empty eggshell! I know, if it had been mine, I wouldn't have let it come to that!"

"You say that because it never was yours; if it had been, you would know how uncomfortable it was?"

"I should like to know," said Mercy, after a little pause, during which they stood looking at the ruin, "whether the owners leave such places because they get fastidious and want better, or because they are too poor to keep them up! At all events a man must be poor to sell the house that belonged to his ancestors!—It must be miserable to grow poor after being used to plenty!—I wonder whose is the old place!"

"O, the governor's, I suppose! He owns all hereabout for miles."

"I hope it is ours! I should like to build it up again! I would live in it myself!"

"I'm afraid the governor won't advance your share for that purpose, Mercy."

"I love old things!" said Mercy.

"I believe you take your old doll to bed with you still!" rejoined Christina. "I am different to you!" she continued, with Frenchified grammar. "I like things as new as ever I can have them."

"I like new things well enough, Chrissy—you know I do! It is natural. The earth herself has new clothes once a year. It is but once a year, I grant!"

"Often enough for an old granny like her!"

"Look what a pretty cottage!—down there, half way to the burn! It's like an English cottage! Those we saw as we came along were either like a piece of the earth, or so white as to look ghostly! This one looks neat and comfortable, and has trees about it!"

The ruin, once a fortified house and called a castle, stood on a sloping roof or spur that ran from the hill down to the bank of the stream, where it stopped abruptly with a steep scarp, at whose foot lay a dark pool. On the same spur, half way to the burn, stood a low, stone-built, thatched cottage, with a little grove about it, mostly of the hardy, contented, musical fir—a tree that would seem to have less regard to earthly prosperity than most and looks like a pilgrim and a stranger: not caring much, it thrives where other trees cannot. There might have been a hundred of them, mingled, in strange contrast, with a few delicate silver birches, about the cottage. It stood towards the east side of the sinking ridge, which had a steep descent, both east and west, to the fields below. The slopes were green with sweet grass, and apparently smooth as a lawn. Not far from where the cottage seemed to rest rather than rise or stand, the burn rushed right against the side of the spur, as if to go straight through it, but turned abruptly, and flowed along the side to the end of it, where its way to the sea was open. On the point of the ridge were a few more firs: except these, those about the cottage, the mole on the hill-side, and the plantation about the New House, up or down was not a tree to be seen. The girls stood for a moment looking.

"It's really quite pretty!" said Christina with condescension. "It has actually something of what one misses here so much—a certain cosy look! Tidy it is too! As you say, Mercy, it might be in England—only for the poverty of its trees. And oh, those wretched bare hills!" she added, as she turned away and moved on.

"Wait till the heather is quite out: then you will have color to make up for the bareness."

"Tell true now, Mercy: that you are Scotch need not keep you from speaking the truth: do you think heather just—well—just a leetle magentaish?—not a color to be altogether admired?—just a little vulgar, don't you know? The fashion has changed so much within the last few years."

"No, I don't think so; and if I did I should be ashamed of it. I suppose poor old mother Earth ought to go to the pre-Raphaelites to be taught how to dress herself!"

Mercy spoke with some warmth, but Christina was not sufficiently interested to be cross—though she made no answer.

They were now at the part of the road which crossed the descending spur as it left the hill-side. Here they stopped again, and looked down the rocky slope. There was hardly anything green betwixt them and the old ruin—little but stones on a mass of rock; but immediately beyond the ruin the green began: there it seemed as if a wave of the meadow had risen and flowed over the spur, leaving its turf behind it. Catching sight of Hope and Grace as they ran about the ruin, they went to join them, the one drawn by a vague interest in the exuvia of vanished life, the other by mere curiosity to see inside the care-worn, protesting walls. Through a gap that might once have been a door, they entered the heart of the sad unhoping thing dropt by the Past on its way to oblivion: nothing looks so unlike life as a dead body, nothing so unfit for human dwelling as a long-forsaken house.

Finding in one corner a broken stair, they clambered up to a gap in the east wall; and as they reached it, heard the sound of a horse's feet. Looking down the road, they saw a gig approaching with two men. It had reached a part not so steep, and was coming at a trot.

"Why?" exclaimed Christina, "there's Val!—and some one with him!"

"I heard the governor say to mamma," returned Mercy, "that Val was going to bring a college friend with him:—for a pop at the grouse!" he said. I wonder what he will be like!"

"He's a good-big-looking fellow," said Christina.

They drew nearer.

"You might have said a big good-looking fellow!" rejoined Mercy.

"He really is handsome!—Now mind, Mercy, I was the first to discover it!" said Christina.

"Indeed you were not!—I was the first to say it, anyhow," returned Mercy. "But I don't mean to like him, so you can have him."

It was vulgar—and yet the girls were not vulgar—they were only common. They did and said vulgar things because they had no sensitive vitality to make them shrink from them. They had not been well taught—that is roused to live: in the family was not a breath of aspiration. There was plenty of ambition, that is, aspiration turned helwards. They thought themselves as far from vulgar as any lady in any land, being vulgar essentially in this—that they despised the people they called vulgar, and thought much of themselves for not being vulgar. There was little in them the world would call vulgar; but the world and its ways are vulgar; its breeding will not pass with the ushers of the high countries. It was more a fast, disagreeable way of talking than anything worse: they owed it to a certain governess they had had for awhile.

They hastened to the road. The gig came up. Valentine threw the reins to his companion, jumped out, embraced his sisters, and seemed glad to see them. If he met them after a like interval at home, he would have given them a cooler greeting; but he had travelled so many miles that they seemed not to have met for quite a long time.

"My friend, Mr. Sercombe," he said, jerking his head towards the gig.

Mr. Sercombe raised his pot-lid—the last fashion, in headgear—and acquaintance was made.

"We'll drive on, Sercombe," said Valentine, jumping up. "You see, Chris, we're half dead with hunger! Do you think we shall find anything to eat?"

"Judging by what we left at breakfast," replied Christina, "I should say there would be enough for one of you; but you had better go and see."

CHAPTER IV.

The Shop in the Village.

Two or three days have passed. The sun has been set for an hour, and the night is already rather dark notwithstanding the long twilight of these northern regions, for a blanket of vapor has gathered over the heaven, and a few stray drops have begun to fall from it. A thin wind now and then wakes, and gives a feeble puff, but seems immediately to change its mind and resolve not to blow, but let the rain come down. A drearier-looking spot for human abode it would be difficult to imagine, except it were as much of the sandy Sahara, or of the ashy, sage-covered waste of Western America. A muddy road wound through huts of turf—among them one or two of clay, and one or two of stone, which were more like cottages. Hardly one had a window two feet square, and many of their windows had no glass. In almost all of them the only chimney was little more than a hole in the middle of the thatch. This rendered the absence of glass in the windows not so objectionable; for, left without ordered path to its outlet, the smoke preferred a circuitous route, and lingered by the way, filling the air. Pest smoke, however, is both wholesome and pleasant, nor was there mingled with it any disagreeable smell of cooking. Outside were no lamps; the road was unlighted save by the few rays that here and there crept from a window, casting a doubtful glimmer on the mire.

One of the better cottages sent out a little better light, though only from a tallow candle, through the open upper half of a door divided in two horizontally. Except by that same half-door, indeed, little light could enter the place, for its own window was filled with all sorts of little things for sale. Small and inconvenient for the humble commerce, this was not merely the best, it was the only shop in the hamlet.

There were two persons in it, one before and one behind the counter. The latter was a young woman, the former a man.

He was leaning over the counter—whether from weariness, listlessness, or interest in his talk with the girl behind, it would not have been easy, in the dim light and deep shadow, to say. He seemed quite at home, yet the young woman treated him with a marked, though unembarrassed respect. The candle stood to one side of them upon the counter, making a ghastly halo in the damp air; and in the light puff that occasionally came in at the door, casting the shadow of one of a pair of scales, now on this now on that of the two faces. The young woman was tall and dark, with a large forehead—so much could be seen, but the sweetness of her mouth, the blueness of her eyes, the extreme darkness of her hair, were not to be distinguished. The man was also dark. His coat was of some rough brown material, probably dyed and woven in the village, and his kill of tartan. They were more than well worn—looking even in that poor light a little shabby. On his head was the highland bonnet called a glengarry. His profile was remarkable—hardly less than grand, with a certain aquiline expression, although the nose was not roman. His eyes appeared very dark, but in the daylight were greenish hazel. Usually he talked with the girl in Gaelic, but was now speaking English, a far purer English than that of most English people, though with something of the character of book-English as distinguished from conversation-English, and a very perceptible accent.

"And when was it you heard from Lachlan, Annie?" he asked.

After a moment's pause, during which she had been putting away things in the drawer of the counter—not so big as many a kitchen dresser—

"Last Thursday it was, sir," the girl answered. "You know we hear every month, sometimes oftener."

"Yes; I know that. I hope the dear fellow is well?"

"He is quite well and of good hope. He says he will soon come and see us now."

"And take you away, Annie?"

"Well, sir," returned Annie, after a moment's hesitation, "he does not say so."

"If he did not mean it, he would be a rascal, and I should have to kill him. But my life on Lachlan's honesty!"

"Thank you, sir. He would lay down his life for you."

"Not if you said to him, Don't!—eh, Annie?"

"But he would, Macruadh!" returned the young woman, almost angrily. "Are not you his chief?"

"Ah, that is all over now, my girl! There are no chiefs, and no clans any more! The chiefs that need not, yet sell their land like Esau for a mess of pottage—and their brothers with it! And the Saunnach who buys it, claims rights over that which never grew on the land or were hid in its caves! Thank God, the poor man is not their slave, but he is the worse off, for they will not let him eat, and he has nowhere to go. My heart is like to break for my people. Sometimes I feel as if I would gladly die."

"Oh, sir! don't say that!" expostulated the young woman, and her voice trembled. "Every heart in Glenruadh is glad when it goes well with the Macruadh."

"Yes, yes; I know you all love my father's son and my uncle's nephew; but how can it go well with the Macruadh when it goes ill with his clan? There is no way now for a chief to be father of his family; we are all poor together! My uncle—God rest his soul!—they managed it so, I suppose, as to persuade him there was no help for it! Well, a man must be an honest man, even if there be no way but ruin. God knows, as we've all heard my father say a hundred times from the pulpit, there's no ruin but dishonesty! For poverty and hard work, he's a poor creature would crouch for those!"

"He who will goe down hill, holds his head up!" said Annie, and a pause followed.

"There are strangers at the New House, we hear!" she said.

"From a distance I saw some young ladies, and one or two men. I don't desire to see more of them. God forbid I should wish them any manner of harm! but—I hardly understand myself—I don't like to see them there. I am afraid it is pride. They are rich, I hear, so we shall not be troubled with attention from them; they will look down upon us—"

"Look down on the Macruadh!" exclaimed Annie, as if she could not believe her ears.

"—not that I should heed that!" he went on. "A cock on the barn-ridge looks down on you, and you don't feel offended! What I do dread is looking down on them. There is something in me that can hate, Annie, and I fear it. There's something about the land—I don't care about money, but I feel like a miser about the land!—I don't mean any land; I shouldn't care to buy land unless it had once been ours; but what came down to me from my own people—with my own people upon it—I would rather turn the spigot of the molten gold and let it run down the abyss, than let a rood of that slip from me! I feel it a disgrace to have lost it, though I never had it!"

"Indeed, Macruadh," said Annie. "It's a hard time! There is no money in the country! And fast the people are going after Lachlan!"

"I shall miss you, Annie!"

"You are very kind to us all, sir."

"Are you not all my own? And you I have to take care of for Lachlan's sake besides. He left you solemnly to my charge—as if that had been necessary, the foolish fellow, when we are foster-brothers!"

Again came a pause.

"Not a gentleman-farmer left from one end of the strath to the other!" said the chief at length. "When Ian is at home, we feel just like two old turkey-cocks left alone in the yard."

"Say two golden eagles, sir, on the cliff of the rock."

"Don't compare us to the eagle, Annie. I do not love the bird. He is very proud and greedy and cruel, and never will know the hand that tames him. He is the bird of the monarch or the earl, not the bird of the father of his people. But he is beautiful, and I do not kill him."

"They shot another, the female bird, last week! All the birds are going! Soon there will be nothing but the great sheep and the little grouse. The capercaillie's gone, and the ptarmigan's gone!—Well, there's a world beyond!"

"Where the birds go, Annie?—Well, it may be! But the ptarmigan's not gone yet, though there are not many; and for the capercaillie—only who that loves them will be here to see!—But do you really think there is a heaven for all God's creatures, Annie? Ian does."

"I don't know what I said to make you think so, sir! When the heart aches the tongue mistakes. But how is my lady, your mother?"

"Pretty well, thank you—wonderfully cheerful. It is time I went home to her. Lachlan would think I was playing him false and, making love to you on my own account!"

"No fear! He would know better than that! He would know too, if she was not belonging to Lachlan, her father's daughter would not let her chief humble himself."

"You're one of the old sort, Annie! Good-night! Mind you tell Lachlan I never miss a chance of looking in to see how you are getting on."

"I will. Good-night, Macruadh."

They shook hands over the counter, and the young chief took his departure.

As he stood up, he showed a fine-made, powerful frame, over six feet in height, and perfectly poised. With a great easy stride he swept silently out of the shop; nor from gait any more than look would one have thought he had been all day at work on the remnant of property he could call his own.

To a cit it would have seemed strange that one sprung from innumerable patriarchal ancestors holding the land of the country, should talk so familiarly with a girl in a miserable little shop in a most miserable hamlet; it would have seemed stranger yet that such a one should toil at the labor the soul of a cit despises; but stranger than both it would seem to him, if he saw how such a man was tempted to look down upon him. Less cleverness is required for country affairs, and so they leave more room for thinking. There are great and small in every class—here and there a ploughman that understands Burns, and here and there a large-minded shopkeeper, here and there perhaps an unselfish duke. Doubtless the youth's ancestors, almost all, would likewise have held such labor unworthy of a gentleman, and preferred driving to their hills a herd of lowland cattle; but this, the last Macruadh, had now and then a peep into the kingdom of heaven.

THE REV. GEO. R. VAN DE WATER.

The Rev. George Roe Van De Water, rector of St. Luke's, Brooklyn, in which parish a mission is being conducted this week, was born in Flushing, Long Island, April 25, 1854. He prepared for college at the Flushing Institute, and entered Cornell University in 1870, where he took the regular course, and was graduated in 1874. His part at commencement was the philosophical oration, the subject treated being "The Materialism of the Present Age."

Having the ministry of the Church in

In February, 1880, the subject of our sketch assumed the rectorship of St. Luke's church, Brooklyn, a parish where the venerated Dr. Diller had ministered for thirty-five years, laying a foundation in character and good works, in Christian love and zeal on the part of his faithful flock, that furnishes a solid basis for its present Church life. In this new field Mr. Van De Water has been eminently successful. In the five years past the communicants have increased from three hundred and seventy to one thousand and nineteen; a chapel has been started in an unsupplied quarter, giving promise of speedy development into a self-supporting parish; a new Sunday-school room has been erected adjoining the church, a beautiful rectory property has been added on the other side of the house of worship, the old rectory being converted into a parish hall; and a costly new chancel with marble altar and reredos has been constructed. Over $50,000 have been expended on these additions to the property, independently of the sums that have been raised for parochial expenses and charitable offerings. The parish contributes to all the objects of the Church, diocesan and general. The church building sadly needs a new front, but before this is more than thought of, the parish under the lead of their rector, is enlisted in the enterprise of securing a fine new parish hall which will be of immense service in a practical way, while the other improvement will be mainly for aesthetic effect.

St. Luke's, which has always been a free church, is very thoroughly organized for Church work. First to be named is St. Luke's Guild, having ninety-eight members. This is a comprehensive society, having oversight of all work done by men in many distinct departments. These embrace charitable visitation of the sick, reception of strangers, the publishing of a parish view, he entered the General Theological Seminary in October, 1874.

Two years later, October, 1876, the Bishop of Long Island, according to an urgent request of the wardens and vestrymen of Christ church, Oyster Bay, L. I., ordained Mr. Van De Water a deacon, and placed him in charge of that parish. This temporarily interrupted his theological preparation, but a year later he resumed study at the seminary, continuing his charge of Christ church, and graduated by the seminary in 1878. He was admitted to the priesthood the same year.

His ministry and rectorship, the latter beginning upon his ordination as priest, had marked results at Oyster Bay. A new church building was erected and paid for, a mission was established, a surpliced choir introduced, and a church life infused which found scope in these organizations and efforts. There was also a free public library and reading room established in the village, which has been prosperously continued since.

paper, care of the parish library, workmen's meetings, and support of a bed in St. John's Hospital. It makes collections in the entire parish for the general missions of the whole Church, and offers the same on Easter Day. Ushers are provided at the services with the especial view of making personal calls on strangers who attend, and bringing them into acquaintance with the rector; and in connection with this, three receptions in the year are held to further this end of extending acquaintance. The anthems which are used in the services of the Church are also published by the Guild a month ahead. This organization raised $4,000 at the time the chapel in Pacific street was started for the purpose of beginning that enterprise on a proper financial footing. Membership in the Guild is at no fixed rate, but voluntary, each one pledging only what he can give.

While the general organization has ninety-eight members the subordinate departments above specified enlist the activities of a very large number of others.

The same is true of the Woman's Auxiliary, numbering one hundred and sixty members. This includes and has general direction of all work done by women. The several departments cover the ground of charity, and missionary efforts in which cooperation is had with the diocesan branch and the general Church Missionary Society. City and Church charities are aided. Mother's Meetings, Young Girls' Friendly Society, Children's Missionary Guild, and a sewing school are also included. Altar and church decoration is provided for. Employment is secured for the needy. There is a weekly distribution of clothing. A committee for social improvement helps in an important line of Church life.

The Chapel of St. Luke's, which is rapidly coming forward into self-support, is organized similarly to the parent church.

There are three choirs, all of them supplied; the church choir numbering forty and having Mr. S. Lasar organist and leader; the chapel choir numbering thirty-six and having Mr. Narracott of Bristol, England, organist and leader, a gentleman who generously gives his services gratuitously, holding three rehearsals a week, and the Sunday-school choir numbering sixteen and having Miss Bolton organist and leader. All the weekday service music is under the charge of Miss Craske.

The Sunday-school and children's service are complete and separate. At three the children assemble in the church, where a shortened form of Evening Prayer is used, the singing being by the children's choir, the offertory taken by boys, a five minutes' sermon given by the rector, and all the features of worship observed from beginning to the end at half-past three, when all pass to the school-room for study till half-past four, when they are dismissed. This arrangement secures church as well as Sunday-school for the children.

Last summer Mr. Van De Water took charge of the Cathedral Schools at Garden City as chairman of the Cathedral Board of Trustees and of the Committee on Education. He is still supervising the work which has resulted in placing the Cathedral Schools on the most promising basis they have yet enjoyed. He was this year elected a trustee of Cornell University, and he is active in the business of the diocese as a member of many of its committees and boards.

Travelling two summers in Great Britain, Mr. Van De Water became interested in the work of the Parochial Mission Society, believing that great possibilities existed in this country for a similar work. It was his conviction that methods other than ordinary ones are necessary at times to stimulate interest in spiritual things and reach souls that are not otherwise to be secured for Christ. Acting on these views, he has invited the Rev. Mr. Aitken and his three assistants, the Rev. Mr. Stephens for children, Mrs. Crouch (widow of an English clergyman) for married women, and Miss Pardee for young women, to conduct the mission that is now in progress at St. Luke's.

The results have fully confirmed the judgment under which the work was undertaken. While many conservative Churchmen feared the novelty of after meetings and extemporized prayers, and many were apathetic if not opposing, all must acknowledge that the fruits which have been realized vindicate the course pursued. The spiritual life of professing Christians has been in many instances deepened and quickened, sinners have been awakened, and every day there have been presented about forty requests for prayer, indicating a great variety of needs, and many of them are very tender in their appeals for Christian intercession. No one is approached, unless by his remaining he has thereby invited the approach. Then the missionaries or the rector go quietly and talk to the one so remaining, and ascertain the particular need, endeavoring by God's direction to suggest the proper remedy. It seems likely to be proved that the American Church can make the best use of such evangelizing work.

Without approving all the methods of any particular missionary, it is certain that every one in the Church may well pray for God's blessing on mission efforts, which are in themselves right, the methods of ministering being matters of individual taste.

The sermons of the Rev. Mr. Aitken are of a very searching character. Among the texts chosen for his discourses have been: "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come," "Thou God seeest me," "I thank Thee that I am not as other men are," "God be merciful to me a sinner," "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh."

These figures are intended to show the rate of increase during the 40 years past. It is estimated that during this period not less than $3,000,000 have been given for various purposes in the domestic field, but not reported in our statistics.

But these figures are only the skeleton of the reality; they amount to no more in this than in all like cases, when dealing with forces that spring from the unseen and eternal things of God's Kingdom. Certainly they give no adequate idea of the actual influence of the American Church to-day. In what she is and what she represents there is a moral power that numbers of any sort cannot gauge. Many (and some among them comprising not a little of what is best in the life of the country) are awayed by her, though not counted within her fold. Deaf as may be the outside multitude to her voice, and for a reason already assigned, she has characteristics that tell upon people of culture who have any religion at all, and especially upon leading minds in society and politics who think deeply on the problems which American life is ordained to solve one way or the other.

VI.

Lessons of Experience.

This outline of our missionary history in this land suggests lessons that should be taken to heart. It has a pregnant moral with many sides, though it have but one point. (1) Our missions have succeeded in proportion as they have presented Christianity in the way that the original Apostolic Church presented it in the most illustrious of all the missionary ages: i. e., the Gospel in the Church, the truth in organic union with its pillar and ground, its witness and keeper—the very Body of Christ. When tempted to divide them, as it sometimes has been, its labor has been for naught, its investments of time, money and men have been as water on the sand, the arrow's path through the air.

(2) Our missions have triumphed in proportion as the Church has treated them as the outgrowth and expression of her own corporate being, filling them with her own life, endowing them with her own gifts, directing them by her own episcopate, stamping on them her own universal commission. Individual zeal, apart from Church order, voluntary associations—the brittle issues of transient schools of thought, taking into them at once the intensity and the narrowness of embryonic sects, have won no lasting conquests. Permanent results are the fruits of permanent forces, and permanent forces in the kingdom of Christ are of divine origin.

(3) God does not mean that it shall be an easy thing to plant a new Church. This and that priest, this and that bishop, this and that committee have often become impatient, dissatisfied, discouraged because missions remained missions; because self-supporting parishes would not grow in five years or ten years from the first planting. Sometimes the soil, sometimes the seed, sometimes the sower has been faulted, as though each and all had lost their virtue, because the harvest was delayed. Now, it seems to be God's will that no real work laid upon us can be well done, or even done at all, without the consecrating touch of self-sacrifice. Where has a Church been founded and brought into practical service without pain and sorrow, denial and hardship built into the walls? Have we forgotten how solemn a meaning was in the custom of the primitive Christians when they used to bear some martyr's bones and reverently lay them in the trenches deep under the cornerstone of the edifice they were about to raise, as if to testify that whatever was to abide, whatever was to witness, though only the mute stone, to the Crucified Master, must be rooted and grounded in suffering. The law that wrought in the redemption of humanity has wrought equally after its kind in every redeemed will, and in every work truly done by such a will. It is woven into the core of the Church's life; and in every mission in the city or the wilderness, it is still the golden girdle of strength, however wet with tears, or shadowed by broken hopes and wasting trials.

(4). It has been the moral of all our mistakes and failures in devising or in handling all secondary means of growth, that they have driven us back more and more on the only source of genuine power—the quickening Spirit of God. Had all the wheels worked well that we have invented, had the funds come in as they were called for, and the men as they were wanted, had obstacles vanished before our adjustments and mechanisms, then it would have been the old story over again—God's children forgetting that they have neither wisdom nor power save from Him, God's Church exchanging her own divine and invisible energy, the immediate continuous gifts of His Spirit, for carnal and mechanical means of growth.

VII.

The Outlook.

Turning, finally, to the future, never had any branch of the Catholic Church an outlook over such an age, or such a life, or such a battle for the subjugation of both to Christ. The field widens out into continental dimensions. Not unlikely within its limits will meet, in a strife that, if not final, will be the parent of new epochs, the good and the bad in the humanity of the world—forces industrial, monetary, social, political, intellectual; passions hot with the life of the flesh, aspirations bright with the radiance and strong with the strength of the life of the Spirit, all interlocked in a gigantic struggle that shall be the sum of all past conflicts. What part is this Church to take in that struggle? Surely if it be other than the foremost, she will dishonor her inheritance and discredit her unrivalled equipment. She has the promise of Christ; she has the commission of Christ; she has the truth of Christ; she has the organization in all essential particulars of the Apostolic age; her worship breathes the very spirit of true Catholicity; her fundamental teaching bears the stamp of universal consent; her corporate administration is in harmony with the twofold demand of organic authority and individual liberty; her attitude toward the age has the stability of a fixed belief and a fixed constitution, combined with abundant capabilities of adaptation to the ever-changing phases of modern life; she has behind her a century of the most varied and suggestive experience; and nothing is wanting to insure the highest range of spiritual power, but a new baptism of the Holy Ghost, which shall set all in motion, giving to each its needed energy, and to all the fire and unction from above.

In the judgment of many, it is hardly to be doubted that out of all the competitions and conflicts among the various forms of Christianity now at work upon American life, some one of them will, sooner or later, emerge into preponderance, perhaps into an unchallenged supremacy. It can hardly be that of any, or of all the denominational systems, for it is their tendency, organized as they are on the basis of individualism, to develop and intensify many of the disintegrating forces now at work in Religion, in Society, and in the State. Themselves given to constant change, they help to increase the chronic and wide-spread instability which is already the disease and the danger of our life. It ought not to be the religion of the Vatican, for its supremacy would imperil, if not destroy every form of Christian and civil liberty. It should be, and God giving us the needed grace and strength, it will be the Ancient Faith and Order of the Reformed Catholic Church that has already given to this country not a few of the elements of moral greatness, and has uplifted and blessed every land that has accepted its authority and been imbued with its spirit.

Viewed in the light of such a probability, or even possibility, the missions of the Church, during the coming century, are clothed with a significance, irradiated with a promise that should lift every conscience to a loftier conception of duty, and put upon every tongue a watchword of battle that shall be as a live coal from the altar of sacrifice.

WHY THE INFLUENCE OF THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY IS NOT WANING.

BY THE REV. WM. M. HUGHES.

Please permit me to enter a somewhat weary protest to the article in your last issue, entitled "Why is the Influence of the Christian Ministry waning?" I say weary because one is becoming surfeited lately with like Jeremiahs.

If the Rev. Dr. Jno. H. Hopkins' article on Church statistics in the Church Review be reliable, and I presume it is, the very raison d'être of these endless attacks on the efficiency of the ministry is swept away.

A sufficient answer to them is already furnished in the fact that the "influence of the ministry" is not waning but waxing.

If there be, as Dr. Hopkins shows, more communicants to the population now than ever in the history of the American Church, more giving of means, and, as other sources indicate, more works of mercy and charity, more services, and of greater efficiency, then it follows, in spite of all assertions or assumptions to the contrary, that such attacks on the character of the ministry as the one protested, are both ill-timed and, in the main, unjust.

Of course, there was a day when the average minister touched the social organisms on many more sides than at present; but the narrowing of his circle of influence must not be mistaken for its weakening. I think the facts will bear out the assertion that the narrowing of this influence is accompanied with a deepening. What it has lost in extension it has more than gained in intension. What does all this talk that we are hearing of retreats and missions, of brotherhoods and sisterhoods, indicate but a deeper insight into, and a closer grappling with, the spiritual problems of the age. Signs are multiplying on all sides of some influence at work at the heart of the Church greater than ever before. Who is doing this, apart from the Divine Source, if not the body of the clergy? But, apart from this vindication of facts as to the waxing instead of the assumed waning influence of the clergy, there is further need of some such protest as this on another ground.

Even allowing that there are features of our social life which seem to indicate a weakening hold of the Church on the social organism, it does not follow that the writer of this article, now criticised, is to be excused, much less justified. There is a lack of intellectual morality and honesty about it; a sweeping positiveness of denunciatory statement that make it a duty to challenge its truth and its justice, aside from everything else. If words are to have their proper force, and are to be interpreted according to the generally-accepted standard, then the writer of that article is guilty of both exaggeration and injustice. "The root of the matter," he says, "is simply that the ministry—with only here and there a notable exception—no longer sets any worthy example of the Christ-like life." These are very sweeping assertions. I have taken the liberty of italicizing the quotation to bring out its bitter strength.

Of course we understand that there is lurking here a private and party interpretation of the words "Christ-like," and under it, no doubt, there is hid a self-justification of this remarkable indictment. So far, we must excuse its severity. But then, these narrow and school or party interpretation of words are not to be permitted to justify an attack of this kind, unless plainly specified as such. If the writer had said, "I am, in writing this indictment, using words as an ascetic who believes that asceticism (viz., voluntary poverty, and forced self-denial) is the only true standard of Christ-likeness," we should have sympathized with his honesty, while tolerating his mental narrowness. But nothing of the kind appears here. The assertions are dogmatic without any proofs, and without any justification except that of a purely personal conviction, due to a purely partisan attitude of mind.

The plea here made is for intellectual honesty in matters of this kind. In only this way can we mutually attack and solve the problems that are before us. This hasty indulgence in sweeping assertions that involve whole bodies of men is the especial mental vice of too many good and earnest people.

Of course I shall attempt no answer or refutation of the charge I have quoted. The ministry of the Church does not need to prove its innocence. And until such reckless denunciations of its members be followed up by approved facts they must be permitted to go for what they are worth, viz., as the somewhat morbid results of morally earnest writers to whom, as to Hamlet, the "times are out of joint," and that because their personal coloring of the facts that come under notice distorts them out of their normal proportions.

But there is weightier cause for protest yet remaining. I wonder if the writer of this hard indictment has had much experience in the average parish priest's life and work.

If so, I wonder still more that he could find the heart to add this burden of bitter denunciation on his already overburdened shoulders. It seems like the refinement of satire to speak of a body of men whose average salary is less than $800 per year as "living more or less luxuriously." And the charges of "vanity, luxury, self-indulgence, and overbearing pride" that are but thinly veiled, as brought against our American bishops, seem like the device of the enemy to one who knows their ceaseless round of anxious care and toil.

False or narrow as they are, however, they do no good, but only harm. They are seized upon by too-ready readers, and made an excuse for further neglect of the Church and the ministry. They unrighteously make the work of the clergy and bishop ten-fold greater if at all believed. Is it nothing to this condemnatory writer that some such experience as the following is by no means unusual, viz.: that out of twenty-four clergymen whom I have known well in the last ten years three have died from the direct effects of too much parish work; six others have been commanded, by their physicians to stop work and rest, two of whom have never recovered, and never will, while all of the nine were under thirty-six years of age? It seems bitter things to say of men of this kind that because they are not of some favorite party type they are therefore lazy, luxurious and shams. However, such men as these whom I have mentioned can remember the words of the Master in the Gospel for last Sunday.

One word in conclusion. Could anything be a greater non sequitur, and more amusingly exhibit a narrow mental and emotional bias than the paragraph which asserts that "Infidelity and Indifference" join in a "shrug" and a "laugh"? Why? Because, indeed, the courteous bishop goes "to dine and wine with some wealthy parishioner." Pray, why should not the bishop do so if he be properly invited? Is a wealthy parishioner's house a den of Satan or an abode of vice?

I suppose our good earnest friend who finds the secret of infidelity in the bishop's courtesy has forgotten who it was that was called "a wine-bibber and a glutton." But it is quite useless to prolong this discussion. My sole object and purpose is accomplished in kindly denying both the assumption, the statements and the ethical standard of its writer, and also in a spirit of weariness wondering when writers who enter on wholesale denunciations will remember that not every Jeremy is a prophet. I have assumed that the writer of the article under criticism is of the masculine gender, but am I correct?

For my own part, I only know one absolute sovereignty that respects the liberty of the humble; it is that of the Almighty; He oppresses no one.—Gasparrin.

THE LATE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.

BY ROBERT GRAHAM.

Five years ago, had I been called upon to say who, of all the public men I knew, would be most likely to stand the strain of overwork and reach a green old age, I should have said, without hesitation, the Bishop of Manchester.

He was then sixty-two, five feet ten inches in height, broad-chested, lime-limbed, with the ruddy hue of health in his cheek, and such a capacity for consecutive, vigorous work that no one would have suspected that the springs of life had already been sapped, and that within five short years would come udden collapse and death from over-work and worry.

Looking back over his episcopate of fifteen years' duration, it is well to note the special nature of his work and his fitness for it. Manchester is the centre of the densest part of the most populous county in England. I doubt whether, in the whole of Great Britain, there is to be found a keener, shrewder body of artisans than the men who thirty years ago made the Rochdale Equitable Pioneers, a model co-operative movement, and who to-day own the largest co-operative spinning manufactories in the world at Oldham, amongst whom may be found scientific botanists and geologists, and who possess a racy and humorous local literature.

The experience of Bishop Fraser had been a thorough education at Shrewsbury School, tutor, fellow, and Ireland scholar at Oxford University, a member of the Education Inquiry Commission, to which he had given an exhaustive report on the common school system of the United States and Canada, a member of the commission for inquiring into the condition of agricultural laborers, and for eleven years vicar of a small Wiltshire parish.

He was genial, approachable, and frank, a ready and vigorous speaker, and had a power of applying religious truths and the wants of every-day life which exactly suited Lancashire working-class audiences—I have heard him address with equal readiness and felicity of illustration, an audience of actors, actresses, and superns from the stage of a theatre; 2,000 skilled mechanics in an engineering shop; 1,000 truckmen in a railway goods shed; and a learned and critical audience in the Temple church.

Hugh McNeill and Canon Stowell had leavened Lancashire with a strong element of intense and intolerant Protestantism; and the Church Union had earnest devotees in Dean Corrie Knox Little, and Sidney Green. The Bishop was tolerant by nature and disposition, never willing to bear hardly on any man who honestly tried to do his duty with energy and will.

His sympathy was ready; his time was at the disposal of any man who wanted guidance and help, and I know that he was a poorer man as Bishop of Manchester than as vicar of a small country parish.

The wave of internecine strife reached the Diocese of Manchester, and he was called upon to deal with the unhappy ritualistic case at Miles Platting, and at its close sternly to inhibit Mr. Green's successor. I know that these were unhappy years, and that the man who suffered most was probably the bishop, who was tender as well as strong; and forgiving as well as firm.

I believe that these five years of trouble, especially painful to a tender and sensitive mind, together with unceasing labor, toil without rest, and burdens without relief have been the joint cause of that sudden collapse and unexpected death.

In the fierce struggle for life, and against national spoliation now hanging over the Church of England, and which will be exceptionally keen and bitter in the manufacturing districts of the north, the Church is better and stronger to meet the onset of the foe because James Fraser has been Bishop of Manchester.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

ETHEL'S VISIT AT ROWDEN.

II.

Ethel's young brother stood ready to meet her as she stepped down from the train.

"Why Dick!" she exclaimed, greeting tone that sounded as if he were used to it. "But I say, Ethel, it's too bad that you had to come home! I don't see how you could come away and leave such grand good times. I wish Cousin Sybil would just ask me to spend two weeks; I'd stay to the last day in the afternoon, you may believe!"

all right!" called Master Dick. And Ethel's thoughts flew on ahead of the horses, forgetting all but her suffering mother. She met old Aunt Susan in the hall, and the good woman nearly dropped the tray she was carrying. "You blessed child! Who'd ha' thought it. Well, I am glad to see you, sure's my name is Susan."

"AFTER HE HAD GONE MRS. RAY SAT STILL, THINKING."

him, "where is papa? Did he get Cousin Sybil's telegram?"

"Of course; that's why he sent me!" said the small boy, grandly. "I'll take your check and see to things. You see papa couldn't get away; they were all in such a state over mamma just then."

"Oh!" said Ethel, with a little gasp, "poor mamma!"

"Yes, I'm sorry," responded Dick, in a

"I dare say," answered his sister, a little absently. In spite of her anxiety about her mother, she could not help pitying herself for the loss of that delightful trip to Mount Wayne, and of the "four more days at Rowden." Poor Harold, too, how disappointed he was. "It was worse than a dozen rain storms," he declared, "to have Ethel go away so soon."

"Here's the hack, sis; and your trunk is Ethel laughed. "But aunty, how is mamma? What made her worse?"

"Ah, poor dear, I can't exactly say; but we couldn't seem to quiet her anyway. She's quiet now, but her head aches dreadfully. You see——"

But Ethel had laid aside her things, and was half way up the stairs.

Her mamma opened her eyes as a cool little hand was laid on her forehead. "Oh, darling! Are you come?" she said. "Now I shall feel better."

She closed her eyes again, and Ethel began gently stroking the aching head with both hands. For more than an hour she sat on the side of the bed, patiently keeping on with this soothing motion, until at last her mamma fell asleep.

That was a hard week for Ethel. Waiting upon her mamma, and quieting her in this way two or three times a day, besides consulting with Aunt Susan over the house-keeping perplexities which must not be carried to the invalid; not to speak of Dick's many demands. No wonder that the willing young feet began to lag again, and a weary look came into the bright eyes.

Good Dr. Brett shook his head as he watched his young favorite; he had watched her for some time past when he came to see her mamma; and it was partly because of a word from him that the visit to Rowden had been planned.

"Well, little woman," he said, one morning, "are you going to begin school next month?"

Ethel shook her head and smiled.

"I don't think mamma can spare me now," she said, with a little quiver in her voice; and then she ran out of the room and tried not to think of the doctor's question, lest she should cry.

The doctor grunted; and he did so three or four times while his patient was telling him her symptoms.

"What do you think, doctor?" Mrs. Ray asked, at length; she began to doubt if he were listening to her at all.

"I think, madam," said the doctor, gravely, "that something must be done, for your sake and for Ethel's sake, too."

"Ethel's?" said the mother; "why, doctor, she is very well. Indeed, you don't know how much that child helps me."

"Yes, I know; but it is at her own cost, I am afraid."

The good doctor talked on very earnestly for some time; and after he had gone Mrs. Ray sat still, thinking over what he had said. Presently her watchful little daughter came softly into the room.

"Oh, mamma, I was afraid you might be wanting something."

"I do, darling; I want you to take those books back to the library for me."

"And get some more, mamma?"

"No, my love, I have not read these; the doctor does not want me to read any more at present—any more novels, at least."

Ethel did not say anything, but she looked very happy as she took up the books.

"You think it is time for me to begin minding the doctor, do you, Pussie?" said her mamma, smiling. "Be sure and get back in time for dinner," she added, "for I want to go down to the table to-day if I can."

"Oh, that will be splendid!" and Ethel kissed her mamma and fairly danced out of the room.

There was truly a surprise party at dinner that day, for the mother was in her place, which had been vacant for some weeks. How happy they all were!

"Stay down here a little while, mamma darling!" pleaded Ethel after dinner; "you can rest on the lounge, you know."

So it happened that Mrs. Ray was yet in the family room when the door-bell rang; and who should be ushered in but Cousin Sybil—"her own dear self," as Ethel said.

"Alicia! why, how much better you look to-day!" she exclaimed affectionately. "Really, I have hopes of succeeding in my errand better than I had expected!"

"And pray, what may your errand be?" Mrs. Ray asked, laughing.

"To carry you off home with me, my dear, and Ethel too. The colonel charged me to stay until I had persuaded you."

"You see, we felt ourselves defrauded of a part of this girl's visit, and we want to have you make amends in the only way that will satisfy us!"

"But, my dear Sybil, this is the first time I have been downstairs for weeks!" began Mrs. Ray, looking distressed.

"Yes; didn't I say that was better than I expected? Now I am going to stay here until to-morrow, and I know I shall win your husband and Dr. Brett over to my plan. And you are not to think or worry at all about it; all you have to do is to say 'yes.' You cannot guess how nicely we have planned the journey for you."

Mrs. Ray shook her head in a doubting way. The journey and absence from home seemed truly appalling to the weak and nervous invalid.

She was on the point of saying: "I cannot think of going," when a look at Ethel's hopeful face checked the words.

"You are very kind, cousin," she said at last, "and if the doctor really thinks I ought to try—"

"You will consent? That is all I ask," said Mrs. Mason merrily, "for I feel pretty sure of his verdict!"

Dr. Brett declared at once that the plan was just what he would like best for his patient; and so, to Ethel's wonder and joy, it was all settled.

"I'm glad you are going again, Ethel," said Dick heartily; then he pulled a long face, and added: "I wish I might go too; but I suppose I'm one of the 'cares' that must be left behind."

He did not think that Cousin Sybil heard this, but she did, and laughed:

"Yes, Dick, we must all plan together to give your dear mamma the best chance to get well, must we not? But I mean to beg for you when the winter holidays come, then it shall be Harold's 'care' to see that you have all sorts of good fun!"

Mrs. Ray did grow stronger and better every day at Rowden. Ethel's task as nurse grew very light, and she had plenty of time to run about and finish her pleasant visit.

She was looking up at Ethel's favorite motto one day when her little daughter came lovingly to her side.

"Is not that beautiful, mamma?" she said; "and I like the words so much, don't you?"

"Yes, darling! and I have heard how they sent me back my little comfort, when I wanted her so much."

"Oh, mamma, I've been so glad ever since that I went home!"

"And you are happy here now, dear? You must lay up plenty of strength for school; for I do not mean to 'please myself' by keeping you from your studies when we go home."

"Oh, mamma!" exclaimed Ethel softly. "God is so good to make you so much better!"

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1885.

The Right Rev. John Freeman Young, S.T.D., died suddenly in this city on Sunday, November 13, 1885. It was hardly known that he was ill of pneumonia before his death was reported. The second Bishop of Florida, he was consecrated to his high office in 1867, and had for eighteen years faithfully served his diocese and the Church. He had won his way to the episcopate by his missionary labor and zeal in several dioceses of the South, and as assistant-minister of Trinity Church in this city. He was secretary of the Russo-Greek Committee, editing its papers and visiting Russia, and he did much to improve the music of the Church. His death is a serious loss to the episcopate, following so soon upon that of Bishop Lay, and his life and services will long be held in grateful memory by the Church at large and by his diocese. We are this year celebrating our centennial, and nearly one-half of all our bishops have gone to their reward—a fact to remind us that the time is short, and that the Son of Man cometh.

By the annual report of the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions, it appears that the annual contributions of the Church for that object have increased, since the reorganization of the Board in 1835, from $18,758.37 to $219,400.14. There is great reason in the retrospect to thank God and take courage, but the contributions are not yet proportioned to the vast extent of the work nor to the wealth of the Church. The field now embraces not only the white population of the country, but the negroes and the Indians, and the thousands of dollars should be increased many fold. The First Sunday in Advent is appointed for offerings for Domestic Missions, and now, at the close of the fifty years since the reorganization of the Board, there should be generous thank-offerings from all the parishes.

The committee appointed by the recent Conference at Lake Mohonk, the proceedings of which were noticed in these columns, has had an audience with the President of the United States, at which the Hon. Erastus Brooks, of New York, read an exceedingly able and interesting address on the best method of improving the condition of the Indians. It is to be hoped that Mr. Brooks's paper will be published, for it will be an important help toward the formation of a sound and intelligent public opinion on the subject of which it treats. It is evident that the peculiar economical and humanitarian views of the Conference have been presented to the President with much force and completeness. The breaking up of the tribal relation, the giving of the reservation lands to the Indians in severalty, the granting of the privileges of citizenship with its responsibilities, the extending of the ordinary protection of the law to persons and families, with a corresponding amenability to civil punishment; the result of which would be the speedy settlement of Indians in homes, and the cultivation of the land; all this was urged with much cogency of argument. The attention which the President is reported to have given to these recommendations was marked by dignified and earnest consideration. While he expressed his own sympathy with the views of the committee, and declared that, in his opinion, the result which they proposed would eventually be reached, yet he warned them that so important a change would take time. With becoming reserve he contented himself with stating some of the difficulties of the problem, and declared that the question which most seriously engaged him was "what is the most useful thing to be done now? what practical step should be first taken for the improvement of the condition of the Indians?" The interview which the committee had with the President must have been entirely satisfactory, and may be understood as giving a promise that the best and most intelligent consideration of the government will be given to the Indian question.

The same committee then proceeded to the Interior Department, and laid the views of the Conference before Secretary Lamar. The reply of the Secretary of the Interior, while distinguished by the same earnest thoughtfulness as characterized that of the President, was rather more outspoken in regard to the obstacles to be encountered. Mr. Lamar seems to have taken issue with the Conference in regard to the wisdom of breaking up the reservations, and diffusing the Indians among the whites, declaring that the whites should be rigorously excluded from the reservations, and prevented from entering into an association with the Indians which would work nothing but evil to the weaker race. The breaking up of the tribal relation at this time, he said, would be premature, as would be the abandonment of the reservation system. In order to make these changes, the Indians must be "improved out of their present condition into civilization, and this would be a gradual process." The secretary was impressed, he declared, with "the belief that the Christian religion was the instrumentality for the elevation of this race." Altogether, the opinions of Mr. Lamar as expressed to the committee in regard to this most important matter, are likely to enhance the reputation he already enjoys for thoughtful and farseeing statesmanship.

Meantime the Baptist Autumnal Conference in New York has been taking a hand in the discussion of the Indian, the Mormon, the Socialist, and other questions, though it does not appear that the Baptists have done anything as yet to organize a special propaganda of their economical and social views. Indeed, there was a notable lack of unanimity on the Indian question, at least, which leaves us rather in doubt as to what their views are. Several speakers indulged in a good deal of that kind of denunciation of existing methods with which we are all familiar, and more than one contended that the tribes should be broken up, the Indians admitted to citizenship and converted to Christianity. To this it was replied by one speaker that the Cherokees and other civilized tribes did not want to become citizens or to accept land in severalty; and another speaker seems to have ended the discussion of the Indian question by declaring that the Indian race differed widely from all the others, and that he, for his part, considered their evangelization a hopeless task. It would seem that the net result of this very commendable attempt to settle the Indian question was nil, since every proposition that was affirmed was presently denied. Nor was there absolute unanimity among the members of the Autumnal Conference, on the Socialist, or even on the Mormon question. We have not space to summarize the differences which emerged in the discussion of Socialism. What we desire to call attention to is the contention of one of the speakers who discussed Mormonism, and who is reported to have maintained that the divorce question in the East is not less urgent than the Mormon question in the West. Calling attention to the fact that in Connecticut there is one divorce to every nine marriages, he is reported to have said, "Here we practice Polygamy, but are so mean as to support only one wife at a time. The Mormon is honest enough to support all he has." The calling of things by their right names is often a most salutary thing to do. Portentous and execrable as Mormonism is, it is not the only evil that is threatening the foundations of society.

The Methodists have a vigorous way of saying things, which sometimes excites the wonder, not to say admiration, of more staid and sober folk. At a Methodist missionary conference which was held in New York the other day Bishop Foster of that denomination made a speech on foreign missions, which is said to have produced a profound impression upon the large audience assembled to hear it. After giving some striking statistics, and paying a cordial tribute to England for her part in the evangelization of the human race, declaring that the English flag protected missionary work on more than one-third of the globe, he turned his attention to what the Methodists of this country have done, and what they ought to do. "Here we come," he said, "from our palaces and princely farms, and subscribe fifty cents a head for this great undertaking. It is a burning disgrace that excites pity and disgust. Here we have been, our own board of twelve bishops and forty laymen, incubating for a week. Now we find that our nest has been filled with rotten eggs, and a world waiting to be conquered." Such rhetoric is too burning and, withal, too timely to be coldly criticized. One refrains from too curiously inquiring into the relation between egos and conquest when one remembers what reason the speaker had for the ire that possessed him. "Palaces and princely farms" surely ought to do more than "fifty cents a head" for any good cause, not to speak of the one cause which should be nearest every Christian heart. But the Methodists are not the only people whose dereliction deserves fiery denunciation. Though we cannot claim that our bishops have "palaces," or that our laymen have "princely farms," yet our people have not yet learned to give in proportion to their means much better than the Methodists have. We wish that we could see even half as many dollars as there are members of our Church go into our foreign missionary treasury.

The Exposition was opened at New Orleans last week with imposing ceremonies, and under auspices that promise much success, addresses being made by Bishop Galleher and other distinguished dignitaries. It is encouraging to note that though the crowd in attendance was over fifty thousand in number, the transportation facilities between the city and the grounds were ample. In addition to the very inadequate facilities of last year, there is now a steam railroad which runs quarter-hourly trains, to and from the Exposition. It is also significant that, although the present Exposition receives no financial or other assistance from the government, it is not only unembarrassed by the financial straits to which the management were reduced last year, but has a surplus of $25,000. It is another evidence of the better management which is always achieved by private enterprise, as compared with undertakings which are subsidised by the public treasury. The commercial advantage which may be looked for from this Exposition, in the matter of opening up a trade between the United States, and South America, Central America and Mexico, will be quite sure to engage the attention of our commercial classes, and does not need to be here set forth. What is not so obvious, perhaps, but not less certain and desirable, is the educating and liberalising influence which the Exposition will exert on all the people who take part in it. Certainly all who see the remarkable exhibitions made by Mexico and some of the Central and South American States must come away with a more generous estimate of the capacities and civilization of these countries; and every Spanish American who visits the Exposition, and becomes acquainted with our ideas and our ways, will be a missionary of progress and of order when he goes back to his own land. We trust that the good people of the Crescent City will take pains that their visitors shall see a genuine American civilization while they sojourn on the banks of the "great river;" and not a mere imitation of what can be seen in Paris, in Mexico or in Rio Janiero. A quiet Sunday, for instance, with deserted marts and crowded churches might be an edifying spectacle to the strangers who come from other shores.

The pope has written an encyclical letter which is soon to be published, and which is looked forward to with much interest, because it is supposed that it will undertake to effect a readjustment of the relation between the papacy and modern progress, both political and scientific. A correspondent of the New York Herald has telegraphed a summary of it in advance of its publication, which proposes to give an outline of the principal matters contained in it. Of course it would be unwise to form an opinion of the latest utterance of the Roman pontiff until it is officially promulgated, and can be considered as a whole. The wisdom of waiting for this is well illustrated by the diverse and contradictory views of the meaning of it which are said to be entertained by the Romish clergy of New York. One clergyman is reported as saying that "the exhortation of the Holy Father to Catholics to devote careful attention to public matters, to take an active part in all municipal affairs and elections, and to make themselves felt as active elements in daily political life, is an admonition of true wisdom," and he goes on to say that this is urged by the pope, not as a departure from the traditional policy of the Papal See, but in accordance with that policy; and that it is the pope's "desire that it should be brought about by the exercise of an influence on legislation and legislators that shall be consistent and in perfect harmony with the true principles of the Church." Another Romish clergyman says, "that that part of the encyclical letter referring to the attitude of Catholics with regard to politics marks a new departure." It would require an adroit exercise of that casuistry for which the Roman clergy are famous, to reconcile these and other conflicting views of the forthcoming encyclical, which are reported in the Herald.

Meantime, another daily paper of New York points out with much force that if the telegraphic summary of the papal letter is correct, it has a significance for the people of this country which it will be well for all patriotic citizens to ponder. It does not at all matter that the encyclical should declare that "the Church is in perfect harmony with all modern progress, and leaves intact the legitimate liberty of the people." What concerns us to observe is that the letter goes on to exhort all Catholics "rigidly to adhere to the teachings of the Roman pontiffs, especially in the matter of modern liberty, which already, under the semblance of honesty of purpose, leads to error and destruction." What follows is not less significant. All Catholics are urged "to take an active part in all municipal affairs and elections, and to further the principles of the Church in all public services, meetings, and gatherings. All Catholics must make themselves felt as active elements in daily political life. They must penetrate wherever possible in the administration of civil affairs. . . . They must do all in their power to cause the Constitution of States and legislation to be modelled on the principles of the true Church. All Catholic writers and journalists should never lose for an instant from view the above prescriptions." If, when the encyclical comes out in due form, it shall be found to speak in this way, then it will be clearly seen indeed that no loyal member of that alien communion can give an individual allegiance to his country, or deserve to be trusted as a patriotic citizen. It will no longer be a question whether Romanism is dangerous to the Republic. For the ascendancy of Romanism will mean the subversion of the Republic, and the erection in its stead of a despotism whose irresponsible ruler will reside on the banks of the "Yellow Tiber."

Mr. Gladstone has been making two speeches at Edinburgh: one an impromptu on his arrival at the station, and which is described as a "long and unexpected speech in response to repeated calls of the immense crowd which gathered to welcome him;" the other, the speech which he went to Edinburgh to make, and which was delivered accordingly on the day after his arrival in the Free Assembly Hall. As is often the case, it was the impromptu speech that was the most clever and the most telling. Indeed it may be doubted whether even Mr. Gladstone, who is undoubtedly the most skillful political leader alive, ever made a more adroit and effective political utterance than his "unexpected speech" at the station in Edinburgh. After pointing out that the Liberal party in the past has removed all the real grievances of Ireland, and that when the real wishes of the Irish people shall be enunciated by the enlarged constituencies in the coming elections, it will be the policy and the will of the Liberal party to give them all that they ask provided it do not jeopardise the integrity of the empire; he then goes on to say that in order to do this, not only is it necessary that the Liberals should outnumber the Tories, but that "the Liberal vote in the next Parliament should exceed that of the Tories and Parnellites combined. If it does not the empire will be endangered." The effect of this speech upon the councils of the Irish Nationalists is immediate. The more moderate are already beginning to doubt the wisdom of Mr. Parnell's alliance with the Tories. As for the "unworn king," it is evident that he sees the danger to which Mr. Gladstone's strategy has exposed him. In a speech at Liverpool the next day he called on Mr. Gladstone to formulate a scheme of self-government for Ireland, embodying the concessions which the Liberals would make, so that if, on such a definite platform, the Liberals should return to power, the House of Lords would not dare to reject it. That Mr. Parnell would be extremely fortunate in getting such a hostage from the great Liberal leader cannot be doubted; but he is not likely to get it. For Mr. Gladstone to give it him "would be magnificent, but it would not be war."

The ex-Premier's set speech at Edinburgh the day after his arrival, while not so telling, perhaps, was a much more careful and deliberate utterance, no doubt. If we may judge from the lengthy telegraphic report that has come to us, it dealt almost entirely with the question of disestablishment. The plea which he makes against the raising of this question at all during this election is exceedingly ingenious; and he displays all his characteristic adroitness in avoiding the expression of any opinion on the subject that could be criticised by any section of his party. Indeed the absence of all evidence of devotion to principle, and the subordination of all personal conviction to the service of party and the exigency of the existing emergency, impresses the reader of Mr. Gladstone's Edinburgh speech most painfully. One could wish that such a man should speak out of his heart once more on the great issue that must come sooner or later. It may be true that that issue is not near at hand; but it is present, at all events, to men's thoughts, and already stands in the court of the conscience of the nation. All other men have opinions on the subject, and many smaller men express their opinions. Why should not Mr. Gladstone have his opinion, too, and express it, and abide by it? It might cost him his return to power, but it would restore to him the confidence of the English-speaking world.

It would seem that British soldiers in Ireland have not only ceased to be formula-ble, but that they are becoming helpless. Perhaps it is another illustration of the old adage about the effect of long familiarity. The telegraph brings a report of the following curious state of things. At Limerick, "a mob of two hundred men stoned a battalion of soldiers without provocation. The disturbance threatening to become serious, a strong force of police had to be called out to quell the rioters. Three soldiers were wounded." There is no telling what would have become of those soldiers if the police had not protected them. That people so evidently harmless should be exposed to the risk of being stoned by a bloody-minded mob, and actually wounded by them, and that too "without provocation," is too bad. Evidently the police force of that country will have to be doubled, if the soldiers are to remain there at all. Seriously, while we hope that the soldiers may not be wounded any more, we are glad to see that they are so harmless. As long as they are "ornamental" merely, they can be tolerated, and ought to be protected. It is when they become "useful" that they are apt to be considered a nuisance.

THE PLACE AND METHODS OF BIBLE STUDY IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.*

BY THE REV. GEO. WM. DOUGLAS, S.T.D.

The Word of God is not straitened. Bible study has a place far beyond the bounds of the Christian life proper. But it is to the earnest professors of the Christian faith that this study peculiarly belongs, and to such our title confines us. What does that Christian lose who does not study the Bible? For that it is possible to live and die believing in Christ and belonging by Baptism to the Church without real study of the Bible, few would care to dispute. What, then, is there lacking to the Christian life in such cases? Why should we urge such persons to make great sacrifices in order that they may study the Bible? This, I presume, is the subject assigned for our discussion.

When we consider the machinery of Christianity in the world, it is evident that the very fact of its organization, necessary though it be, leads to the danger that the members of the Church should neglect the Bible. For within the pale of organized Christianity the Bible is the reference-book, not the text-book, of the Faith. Our own experience attests that we who were born of Christian parents may have verified, intensified, enlightened our faith in God and Christ by recourse to God's written Word; but not so in most cases did our faith begin.† Whatever theory one may hold as to the original relations of the Church to the Bible, it will be generally admitted that the Church as now existing anticipates the Bible in the ordinary Christian life. The Christian Faith is in the atmosphere that the Christian child breathes. A man bred upon our Book of Common Prayer, for example, acquires unconsciously, from childhood upward, a fine spiritual sense of the facts, the proportions and the habits of the Christian Faith; and this is what Christ intended. In organizing His Church our Lord was careful that Christianity should be vital in the Christian's mind from the beginning. The devil and his instruments had taken pains enough to bias human souls in the wrong direction. Through the institutions of the Church Christ was minded to bias them aright. Therefore we are brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Therefore the Church has, in one sense, taken the pith out of the Bible beforehand, and made it current among Christians. Therefore we are brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Therefore we have a Creed, a Liturgy, a Catechism, and Rule of life.

Nevertheless, as far back as we can go in the history of the Church, it seems to have been wrought into the Christian consciousness that the Bible should be an open book and should be studied. I remember seeing in my childhood a family Bible with a large woodcut entitled "The Discovery of the Bible by Lutlier," and that it thence derived a vague impression that the Bible was really come upon by Luther much as America was by Christopher Columbus. Far be it from me to detract from the spiritual power and genius with which Luther did actually discover the Bible to thousands in his day; but that is a narrow reading of history which does not recognize that whenever there has been a revival of religion there has been a revival of Bible study. It is well known how familiar with the Bible the primitive and mediæval fathers were, and how earnestly they set about translating the Scriptures into the vulgar tongues. But the noteworthy article on "Bibellesen," in the new edition of Herzog's "Real-encyclopædie," proves by a catena of witnesses that far into the Middle Age the ecclesiastics of the Church urged the laity to study the Scriptures—in fact, that the disposition to withdraw the Bible from the laity sprang, in the first instance, from the laity themselves, who were disposed to leave all learning to the clerks. For instance, Gregory the Great says, "Let no man offer me that had excuse that Bible study is not his business, but belongs to those who have renounced the world and stand far above us. What sayest thou, my friend? that thou oughtest not to read the Bible because thou hast so many cares? Why, for this very reason thou oughtest to read the Bible more than the monks." Whence it appears that even a Pope of Rome used to recommend the Bible as a book for the people. So far, too, from attributing heresies to the fact that the laity undertook to study the Bible for themselves, Gregory rather declares that heresies had spread for the very reason that laymen would not make a practice of Bible study; and that the layman's claim that the Scriptures are hard to understand was a mere excuse for laziness—a line of thought, by the way, which is in striking agreement with Dr. Mozley's paper "On the Supposed Obscurity of Holy Scripture," in which that keen thinker remarks: "Before we pronounce the Bible to be an obscure book, we must be sure that there is no distinction between its omission, its silence, its reserve on some points, and its substantial clearness and openness on others; and we must be sure, too, that those two styles of treatment in Scripture do not respectively attach to fundamental matter of belief on the one hand, and to non-fundamental on the other. If you have to be clear on any subject, you must first have to speak about it."

Unquestionably there was a decided decline in Bible study in the common Christian life during the Middle Age, but at this time there was a decline in all study; and that the tradition of Bible study was kept up in the Church is evident from the work of Uffilas, Bede, Wyclif, Erasmus, and other pre-Reformation scholars. The main cause why the reading of the Bible fell into neglect was that such reading came by no means easily to rough, untutored folk; and the sudden revival of Biblical learning at the period of the Reformation was but part and parcel of that wider and providential revival of all learning, of which the invention of printing was at once the means and the indication. Nay, if we to-day, with all our sense of the value of Holy Scripture and our helps to the study of it, had to depend on Bible study by the people for the preservation and spread of Christianity, where should we be? And is it not for this reason that some of the looser religious bodies are crying out for a liturgy and a creed? Nor is the difficulty with the uneducated classes only. Few even among intelligent Christians know the Bible well. Our ordinary critics are often unfamiliar with the very Bible that they are criticising. Men read all sorts of books, and pamphlets, and newspaper essays about the Bible, not the Bible itself. They criticise the criticism, ignoring the thing criticised. Above all, of how many of us could that be said which Dr. Taylor of the Broadway Tabernacle remarks of Dr. Pusey's Commentaries: "This critic seems always to be studying the Bible on his knees?"

Surely, then, when the Church of earlier ages is accused of neglecting the Bible, we should remember the difficulties of her task. Shaken by the terrific centrifugal forces that followed the barbaric invasions of the Roman Empire, the Church was compelled to make many sacrifices in order to maintain at all her homogeneous organization. And when we consider how much depended on the visible unity of her worship in those dark and troublous days, we may condone the decision not to allow the vulgar tongues of the warring nations to supplant the old liturgical language, which, to those who had any education, was still intelligible. After all, the use of the Bible in a form "understood of the people" was but relegated from the sphere of public worship to that of private edification; and that the clergy continued their effort to bring the Bible close to the thinking and the living of the people is evident from the pains they took with the paraphrases and metrical versions of the Scriptures,* which are so striking a feature of the work of the Western Church in the Middle Age. True, a prohibition of the Bible in the vulgar tongue was put forth at the Council of Toulouse A. D. 1229, and repeated at several subsequent provincial councils. But this action of certain districts of the Church, frightened by local difficulties, might be paralleled by edicts, no less short-sighted and panic-struck, published in modern times by certain parts even of our own communion; and that such provincial enactments had small power over the Christian conscience, and were never generally accepted as the utterance of the true Catholic voice, is plain from the whole history. For instance, within less than a hundred years from this same Coun-cl of Toulouse, a complete literal translation of the Vulgate was made into German for the use of the German people.* It is not to be denied that since the rise of the peculiarly papal claims, a tendency to withdraw the Bible from the laity has been shown by the hierarchy of Rome; but, in view of all the facts, it appears that the disease of Holy Scripture began from the illiteracy and unwillingness of the laity, and that it was not until near the Reformation, when the Bible became so telling and accessible an argument against the assumptions of the papacy, that the popes themselves tried of set purpose to withdraw the Bible from general use. Furthermore, who that is familiar with the biographies of the more earnest laymen of the modern papal obedience, has not observed that not even the stress of the Ultramontane spirit has withheld these good men from studying the Bible.

The result of our survey is this: that sometimes, from the general state of intellectual dulness or distraction, sometimes from the erring tendencies of certain schools of theology, sometimes from political disturbances, and always from the religious apathy that follows upon movements of religious zeal, Bible-study has been neglected in the Christian life; but notwithstanding, that the conscience of Christians has persistently warned them; and the influence of the devout has incited them, to be studious of God's Word. We have then to revert to the question with which we started. If in the stress and distraction of this workaday world the Christian omits the regular and mature study of the Bible on his own part; if he goes through life in much the same relation to the Bible that the unscientific man holds to the natural world—appreciating some of its superficial beauty, admiring vaguely its mysteries, aware through others of some-what of its truth, appropriating indirectly its vitalizing forces, but not bringing his own intellect directly to bear upon this written revelation of God to man—what is lacking to this Christian's life? what forfeits must he pay in the Resurrection morning? Certainly, when we consider how deep and mysterious and multifarious the Bible is, how many sides of many men it touches, how variously useful it has been—certainly, we shall be slow to offer any rigid answer to this question. But is not one large answer found for it, when we recollect what, to the Christian, the Bible is? The Christian religion is not a string of abstractions; it is personal attachment to a Divine Person, to a concrete character, revealed among men by the Son of Man—it is personal knowledge of Jesus, communion with Him, devotion to Him. But the danger of our religion, as of all religions, is, that we should treat it as an abstraction, an idea, a mere theory of human existence. And the danger of our creed is that we should use it somewhat as the hasty student uses his primer of botany, learning by rote (and by no means by heart) its brief formulas, but never opening his mind to the living flora of which the primer tells. And the place of Bible study in the Christian life is to counteract such a tendency—to make real and vivid to our souls the historic Person and Character of Christ, our Living Master. Even those Christians who do make some devotional use of the Scriptures, too often miss their essential power. Many Christians read the Bible once a year, from end to end, as a task; or they take up the Psalms and Prophets, the Gospels and Epistles in a vague way, as they would take up a book of moral maxims or religious allegories, trusting that therein they will happen upon some appropriate warning, or direction, or solace for their souls. This is better than nothing; but you can find not a little of good warning, direction, solace, in the Hindu Vedas, in Plato and Marcus Aurelius and Epictetus, in Shakespeare and La Rochefoucauld. Religion did not begin 1,900 years ago, nor 4,000 years ago. It has always been. This is what Matthew Arnold means when he declares that poetry, that literature can never be outdone by science, because poetry is the criticism of life. But the Christian who gets no more out of his Bible than that forfeits his best privilege: he is using God's Word as if it were no more than a republication of natural religion. It is that, as Bishop Butler shows; but it is so much more than that. Rightly understood, the Bible from beginning to end is the revelation of that Divine-Human Person without Whom there could be no such thing as religion—without Whom the soul, whether aware of it or not, could have no solace, no abiding stimulus, no aspiration that is not a sentimental delusion—without Whom the only outcome of the criticism of life would be the Pessimism that even now prevails so largely in our civilization. This is what St. Paul's Epistles insist on: that, as things are actually in this sinful world, natural religion could afford no sufficient consolation apart from Jesus Christ, "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world"; that whatever we learn about God or man or nature in the Scriptures can be rightly understood only in the light of the Person and Work of Jesus. The Incarnate Christ is the essential ground of all human life toward God—

The one far-off Divine event
To which the whole creation moves—and the Bible is the record of this Christward movement. If Christ is the Light of the World, He must be also the Light of the Bible.

LETTER FROM ROME.

The current year will remain remarkable in the annals of archaeology for the number of fine bronze statues discovered in the soil of Rome. This time the Tiber has yielded up a buried treasure. In driving the piers of a new bridge connecting the Regola quarter with the Trastevere, the workmen struck upon what they imagined a metal plate or basin, but which was really the plinth of a most beautiful statue of Bacchus, in wonderful preservation notwithstanding the centuries which have rolled by since it was flung, apparently head foremost, into the river.

I have been to see this gem of imperial Roman art in the atelier on the Palatine mount, where the skilful hands of Signor Pennell, who restored so carefully the two bronze athletes still exhibited there, are busy in removing the incrustations of mud and sand from the beautiful limbs of the youthful wine god, and from his ivy-wreathed head bound with a fillet inlaid with silver. The statue is little over five feet in height. The face is exquisitely chiselled—fine as if a cameo—and of supreme beauty. The eyeballs are ivory; at first it was rumored they were silver; the hollow pupils were probably filled with gems. When this masterpiece came from the sculptor's hands in the brightness of the golden bronze, it was indeed fit for an imperial dining-room! Conjecture is busy as to whereof it was cast into the Tiber.

Whether the Christian zeal in the early centuries against the pagan images, or the preservation of an art treasure during a barbarian invasion prompted the deed? I remember when, nearly twenty years ago, the great bronze Hercules Mastai (so called after the late pope) was discovered buried deep below the courtyard of a large house in the middle of the city, it was at once decided that it must have been purposely concealed from the invading Goths. But to throw a valuable statue into the Tiber in similar circumstances, seems more like the action of despair on the part of the possessor.

Many interesting historical associations group themselves round the monument which has been lately erected in commemoration of the Vatican (Ecumenical council of 1870. The site originally intended was the terrace on the janiculum in front of San Pietro in Montorio, the church built upon the spot where it is said the Apostle Peter was crucified. Even after Rome had become the capital of Italy, Pius IX. had entered into negotiations with the Roman municipality on the subject, and for a long time the stones which were to form the base of the monument lay waiting beside the church. But the municipality hesitated because of the vicinity of the Porta S. Pancrazio, where Garibaldi defended Rome against the French, fighting for the papacy in 1849, and it was intimated to the pope, that to persevere in placing the monument of the council there was unadvisable. Pius IX. then resolved to erect it within the vatican grounds, and warmly expressed his hope that his successor would carry out his design as speedily as possible, in the place indicated by himself—the garden of the pine cone—Giardino della Pigna. This spacious court, familiar to all who have visited the vatican sculpture gallery, derives its name from the colossal bronze pine cone which once stood on the summit of Hadrian's tomb, the emblem of a future life. A pope in the early centuries placed it in the atrium of old St. Peter's, where Dante saw it in the Jubilee year of 1300, and mentions it in the "Divina Commedia" as a simile of the size of Lucifer's head. When the new St. Peter's was built, in the sixteenth century, the Pigna was removed to its present place, the enclosed garden called after it, and which is twice as large as the Piazza Colonna.

The monument consists of a pedestal surrounded by marble bas-reliefs, on which stands a column of the colored marble, called Africano, which dates from the reign of Nero, when it was quarried and brought to the Tiber quays, where it lay for ages in the ancient emporium among the great store of precious marble which was gradually covered with sand and clay in the successive Tiber inundations, and was discovered twenty years since.

So this column, wrought in Nero's time, when the Christians were persecuted, is now surmounted by the bronze statue of one of those same martyrs during his reign—St. Peter—in this strange epoch, when, although despoiled of the temporal dominion, the spiritual sway of his successor is more extensive than ever before in the long annals of the papacy.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER ON RITUALISM—In his charge at his second visitation, the Bishop of Rochester made use of the following language:

In my Pastoral of 1878 some of you may remember these words: "A Church with a foreign body inside it, such as the Ritual policy declares itself to be, must very soon absorb, modify or expel it." Seven years have passed a way, and a good deal has happened. Promotions on the one hand, and prosecutions on the other; an intense and growing weariness of Intestine strife, an increasing and merited appreciation of diligence, character and sacrifice on the part of some who represent the advanced school; last, but not least, the deepening conviction in some minds, which value truth even more than superficial consistency, that "Ritualism does represent a side of truth which needs recognition." have without dispute changed the attitude of public opinion toward the movement in a very material degree. Ritualism is not expelled—probably never will be. Ritualism is in this sense modified, that while some have passed through it, grateful for what they feel it has taught them, others are less resolute in insisting on non-essentials of worship at the risk of forfeiting some of its essentials—not valuing ceremonial less, but prizing unity more. It is impossible for me to escape the conviction that Ritualism may soon become absorbed. Very many indeed have gone so far as to say that on the day when the first vicar of St. Alban's, Holborn, was instituted to St. Peter's, London Docks, the famous memorial which prayed for a tolerant recognition of the divergent ritual practice began formally to be heard. Of course this does not mean that there can be never again a judicial interference with grave irregularities of ritual. To grant a coercive authority on the understanding that it is never to be used is not more foolish than dishonest. Still, I doubt if there is a Churchman in England who has not been disappointed by the results of past prosecutions, who would not deplore the necessity for their being renewed, who would not admit that to suppress error by force rather than by truth is sometimes the surest way of aggravating and disseminating it; who would not confess that the corroding discontent, and the chilly defiance, and the hard exclusiveness of Church people when driven by themselves into a corner, as they think, for conscience' sake, frequently prove very sore temptations for truly earnest Christians, as well as grave perils to Church and realm. It does not seem to me that in this question of ritual, doctrine is the first matter at stake. Of course we know that our brethren value it because it expresses doctrine, and that they contend for it as essential to their principles. Their affirming this claims respect for their consistency; it need not compel assent to their position. To concede this plea is to beg the whole question at issue, and to involve those who resent the doctrine, far more than the ritual which is the vehicle of it, in an inconvenient dilemma. We cannot prevent their preaching the doctrine. The Court of Appeal, to which the opponents of Ritualism must of all people in consistency bow, has found itself unable to forbid it. If we forbid it, we go as much against the law as they. With or without their ritual, by those who simply wear sniprice and stole, as much as by those who wear all the vestments, the truths they devoutly cherish, and inflexibly maintain, are constantly declared in hundreds of English pulpits. . . . My own personal feeling about ritual is what it always was. I belong to the first age. But if I do not care for it more, I think I fear it less, because a man's voice means much more than his garments, and his doctrine more than his ceremonial. Amid all the clang of turbulent discords and external strife, the Church's need of peace is greater than ever. The true wisdom is for us all, in honest and true charity, to try to understand each other, and to discover the proper instruments for the highest ends. Should I ever come to see that my attitude of isolation has done its work, through helping to a better appreciation of the reasonableness of discipline, and that the Church can be better ruled and served by my abandoning it, be sure that I shall abandon it with the same sense of duty and the same determination to stand on my own feet, which induced me in the first instance to assume it. My first aim must be to endeavor after that trust, though not blatant, Protestantism, which best justifies itself by keeping the English Church together.

* Cf. Kætzke, Brit., new edit. vol. III, p. 647.

IMPORTANT CLERICAL CONFERENCE.—A private conference of clergymen favorable to large constitutional reforms in the Established Church, was held in London, on Friday, October 30, Canon Fremantle in the chair. The reforms which were advocated at the conference may generally be thus described: (1) The application, where desired, of the principle of local self-government to the parishes; (2) the reform of patronage, the effectual safeguarding of the interests of the parishioners in the appointment of the parochial clergy, and the providing stringent measures against ministerial inefficiency; (3) the removal of the glaring inequalities now found in many cases between the work and the remuneration of the clergy; (4) the facilitating the interchange, under proper control, of pulpit ministrations between clergy, Nonconformist ministers, and laymen; (5) the modification of subscriptions which prevent many excellent men from becoming clergymen; (6) the reform of Convocation, so as to make it representative of the whole Church; (7) the adaptation of the Church system to present needs by greater freedom in various ways.

The result of this conference has not yet reached us.

ETHNICIZATION OF BISHOP WORDSWORTH.—The Right Rev. John Wordsworth, D. D., Lord Bishop of Salisbury, was formally enthroned in the cathedral of that diocese on Wednesday, Nov. 4. The clergy of the diocese were present in large numbers, most of them vested.

THE DISESTABLISHMENT ISSUE.—The question of disestablishment which was made an issue for the coming elections, in order to please the Radicals and Non-conformists, has roused the Church feeling so in England that the Liberals have become frightened and are seeking to withdraw the question as an election issue. The telegraphic reports of Mr. Gladstone's latest speech at Edinburgh represent him as saying that disestablishment is no issue in the present election, and that it was unnecessarily brought forward by the Tories. It is evident, however, that the subject will not be quiescent at the ex-premier's bidding, and the approaching elections will, doubtless, hinge largely on this issue.

DEATH OF THE REV. WILLIAM PALMER.—The Church Times reports the death at a very advanced age of the Rev. Sir William Palmer, Baronet. This leaves Cardinal Newman the sole survivor of the famous group which initiated the celebrated "Oxford Movement." Sir William Palmer, though lately living in retirement and obscurity at one time made his personality felt in the English Church. His "Origines Liturgicæ" was the first work to deal adequately with the sources and character of the Book of Common Prayer. His "Treatise on the Church of Christ," published three years later is confessedly the ablest book on its subject in the English language. He was a learned and powerful controversialist, and encountered Cardinal Wiseman more than once, signally defeating him.

SCOTLAND.

THE SCOTTISH COMMUNION OFFICE.—At the synod of Moray, Ross and Caithness, a petition was unanimously agreed upon to be presented to the Primus, as follows: "We, the clergy of the Diocese of Moray, Ross and Caithness, humbly pray that your Lordship in your place in the Episcopal College, will take such canonical steps as are necessary so to modify Canon xxx as to secure perfect equality for the English and Scottish rites." The general desire of the synod seemed to be for the restoration of the Scottish Communion Office to its former primary position, but it was thought best to seek at first merely for equality, that is the removal of all restrictions with regard to the use of the Scottish Office.

AUSTRALIA.

DEACONESSES IN SYDNEY.—At the Sydney Diocesan Synod held in August last, a resolution in favor of Deaconesses' Institutions was carried by a large majority. The synod then proceeded to adopt a resolution declaring it undesirable to establish Sisterhoods in the diocese. This was adopted in spite of an energetic protest of the bishop (Dr. Barry), who in vain reminded the synod that Sisterhoods in England had fought their way against a bitter opposition to a position of powerful and growing influence. The Church Times says of this action, "One might have hoped that the daughter communions would have spared themselves the heat and worry through which we had been obliged to pass, but that hope is far from being always realized."

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

FUNERAL OF QUEEN EMMA.—From the Honolulu papers we learn that the remains of the Queen Dowager Emma, after lying in state for a week in her own residence, were removed to Kawaiahao Church, where on Sunday, May 17, the building being thronged with worshippers, the bishop read the opening part of the burial service, first in Hawaiian, afterwards in English. The lesson was also read in both languages. After each reading a hymn was sung. The funeral procession then took its way to the royal mausoleum—consecrated by Bishop Staley to hold the remains of Queen Emma's husband, Kamehameha IV.—where the bishop read the remainder of the service, and after the hymn, "Now the Labourers Task is O'er," had been sung, pronounced the benediction. The death of Queen Emma, removing the strongest pillar of the Church in Hawaii, has happened disastrously for the completion of the cathedral. The deceased lady was very liberal to the Church of her baptism and choice. Only shortly before her death she had given a valuable piece of land, to allow of entrance being had to the new cathedral; and at different times she had subscribed towards its erection, out of contracted means, no less than three thousand dollars. What is left of her property, after paying annuities to her dependants, is to go to the Queen's Hospital, founded by her late husband.—Church of England Messenger.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Church Temperance Society.—The annual meeting of the Diocesan Church Temperance Society was held in Horticultural Hall, Boston, on the evening of Monday, November 9. The bishop presided, and made an address. Addresses were also made by the Rev. Messrs. C. Eliot, E. Abbott, and A. C. A. Hall, and the Hon. C. C. Coffin.

The secretary's report showed seventeen societies, with fourteen hundred members, and no debts.

The bishop presented a formidable array of statistics relating to the liquor traffic, one point being that the cost of drink is more than all the money expended for provisions, education, and missions. One of the speakers alluded to the good results of the law recently adopted requiring the drinking places to be closed on election day.

The laws of this State with regard to the liquor traffic are now very stringent. They cover the following points: (1) Each seller must have a license; (2) he must close his saloon all of Sunday and every night at 11; (3) he must not open on election day; (4) the windows of his saloon must be so arranged that the interior can be seen from the street; (5) he must not sell to a minor, and (6) he must not open a saloon within a certain distance of a public school.

BOSTON—Archdeacon Farrar.—The visit of Archdeacon Farrar to Boston must have been in every way as gratifying to him as it was to the thousands who flocked to hear his sermons and lectures. Trinity church, where he preached, was crowded to the doors, and the great Tremont Temple, where he lectured twice, was equally full. There were many receptions given for him, one of which was attended by one hundred and fifty of the clergy of the diocese, and another by many distinguished laymen and ministers of all religious bodies. His noble utterances and genial warmth deepened the admiration previously felt for him by the many who had read his works.

BOSTON—The Rev. Mr. Hareis.—The Rev. Hugh Reginald Hareis, well known as a writer on "Music and Morals," came to Boston to deliver a course of lectures on "Music," at the Lowell Institute. They are now in progress, and are attracting considerable interest. On Sunday, November 8, he preached in Trinity church, the topic of the sermon being "Prayer." The sermon was listened to by a very large congregation, who admired its simplicity and strength and the fervor of the preacher.

LOWELL—Missionary Meeting.—The twentieth semi-annual missionary meeting, under the direction of the Diocesan Board of Missions, was held in St. Ann's church, Lowell, (the Rev. Dr. A. St. J. Chambré, rector,) on Tuesday and Wednesday, November 10 and 11. The sermon was preached by the Rev. William Lawrence, on "The Future of the American Church." The bishop's address was stirring and pointed, and the other addresses and papers were carefully prepared and practical. The Sunday-school and its work secured a full share of attention, while decided effort was made in the meetings for adults to explain the plans, work, and needs of the board, and to awaken an interest in the extension of the Church to new places and to build it up upon the old foundations. These missionary meetings are always helpful both to the parishes and the board.

CONNECTICUT.

BIRMINGHAM—Convocation.—The one hundred and ninety-second convocation of the clergy of New Haven County was held in St. John's church, Birmingham, (the Rev. O. Witherspoon, rector,) on Tuesday, November 10. There were present, besides the rector, the Rev. Dr. Edmund Rowland and the Rev. Messrs. H. P. Nichols, C. C. Camp, C. E. Woodcock, E. S. Lines, A. T. Randall, F. H. Church, R. W. Mico, S. R. Bailey, M. K. Bailey, C. W. Ives, W. Lusk, Jr., J. E. Wildman, W. G. Andrews, and W. C. Robetta. Morning Prayer was said by the rector and the Rev. Dr. E. Rowland. The rector celebrated the Holy Eucharist, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. Nichols and Camp. The sermon was preached by the Rev. R. W. Mico, from Exodus xii. 21. The vested choir of Christ church, Ansonia, rendered the musical part of the service. At 3 P. M. an essay was read by the Rev. S. H. Church, on "Constancy," followed by a discussion. The Rev. E. S. Lines read an exegesis of Coloss. i. 18-20, followed by papers on the same subject from the Rev. Messrs. H. P. Nichols, C. C. Camp, and the rector.

In the evening there was a missionary service, at which addresses were made by the rector and the Rev. Messrs. H. P. Nichols and W. G. Andrews.

The business meeting was held on Wednesday morning.

FAIRHAVEN—Golden Wedding.—The golden wedding of the rector of St. James's Church, the Rev. Dr. W. E. Vibbert, was celebrated on Wednesday, November 11. Dr. Vibbert was ordained in 1845 by Bishop Brownell, and is the only rector this parish has ever had. He was married to Miss Mary Cook in 1835 by the Rev. Dr. Harry Crosswell. Among the presents were a cake from the ladies of the parish, adorned with one hundred gold dollars, the Rev. Dr. E. E. Beardsley making the presentation. A beautiful service of silver plate from the Bible class was presented by Mr. G. S. Hitchcock, and there were many other gifts. A large number of clergy from New Haven and vicinity were present.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—St. Barnabas's House.—Thanksgiving Day will be observed at St. Barnabas's House, 304 and 306 Mulberry street, on November 26. There will be Divine Service at 10:30 A. M., and Dinner at 2 P. M. The children of the Day Nursery, the Sunday and Industrial Schools, the Free Reading Room, etc., with their poor mothers, are expecting their usual Thanksgiving Dinner. It is desired to satisfy all the hungry who may come, and fill every heart with joy and gladness.

It is requested that money and provisions for this purpose may be sent at once to Sister Ellen, or to the Rev. C. T. Woodruff, superintendent of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society, 306 Mulberry street.

NEW YORK—Clergymen's Mutual Insurance League.—The seventeenth annual report of this institution has been published. During the seventeen years of the league's existence the number of members has been 1,647. During that time 272 have died during their membership, and in each case their families have received the amount stipulated in the covenant with the league. This consists of an assessment of two dollars on each surviving member. The amount thus coming to the families of the decedents has varied from $550 to $2150. The aggregate amount distributed to representatives of deceased members in seventeen years is $351,859. Fifty-seven members were added during the past year, while the loss by death was but four.

NEW YORK—Church of the Holy Spirit.—The first of a series of choral Litany services, with a surpliced choir, was held in this church (the Rev. E. Gnilbert, rector,) on the afternoon of Sunday, November 13. The choristers and clergy entered the church, singing a processional. The Litany was intoned by the rector, after which the anthem "Go in Peace" was sung by a quartette, the chorus "Hear our Prayer" being sung by the choristers. The sermon was preached by the Rev. George Bringham, from Acts iii. 12. The offertory Hymn 335, was sung antiphonally. The Magnificat was sung by the choir, and the benediction intoned by the rector. The processional was "Daily, Daily Sing the Praises."

The choral Litany service is to be held each Sunday at 4 P. M., with a choir of twenty-four men and boys, under the direction of Mr. S. F. Le Jeune.

NEW YORK—Church Missionary Society for Seamen.—The forty-first annual service of The Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City and Port of New York was held in Christ church (the Rev. Dr. J. S. Shipman, rector,) on Sunday evening, November 15. There were present, besides the rector, the Rev. Messrs. C. W. Ward, A. Mason, J. W. Bonham, R. J. Walker, L. Maguire, and Thomas Hyland, the three last missionaries of the society. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. W. Ward.

HIGHLAND—Church of the Holy Trinity.—On Sunday, November 15, the rector of this church (the Rev. Henry Tarrant) baptized nine persons, making twenty-two persons baptized in four weeks.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Mark's Church.—The formal opening of the new chapel of this parish (the Rev. S. S. Roche, rector), which has been under construction and is now completed, took place on Wednesday evening, November 11. Before service opportunity was afforded all to inspect the new building. A large colored design has been prepared and was shown representing the entire edifice—church and chapel—as it will appear when all the contemplated improvements are completed. The chapel in two stories is now finished and a finely proportioned tower rising between it and the church is carried up to one-half its intended height. The entrance to the new structure is through the tower. On the left is a rector's study, back of it a kitchen, and in the rear of this are an almondy and an oratory, the former accommodating one hundred and the latter one hundred and fifty persons, the two being connected by doors which can be opened so as to throw both into one. On the floor above, reached by a wide stairway, is a spacious ball running the entire length of the building, with platform and desks at the western end, and capable of seating four hundred. This will be used for the Sunday-school and for lectures, concerts, and other gatherings. A small room for the library is at the north side. Two windows of the hall are conspicuous; a large window in rich colors with five lancets and tracery, opening on the street, and in the rear of the hall a rich rose window. All the windows are of stained glass. This important addition to the property of the parish has a width in front of thirty-three feet and a depth of eighty-five feet. Without the ground it has cost nearly $12,000. The full amount of the estimated cost was subscribed before the work was begun. The expense of construction through changes of plans has exceeded the original calculation; but arrangements are now maturing whereby the entire sum will be speedily raised and the chapel be presented free of debt. It is of cut stone of gray color, and when the church is built into harmony with it and the tower fully completed, the effect will be very attractive and beautiful. Ground was formally broken on St. Mark's Day, April 25, 1883. The first money towards its cost was raised by the Sunday-school, and they have rendered effective aid in securing a large part of the sum required to complete it.

At the service hearty words of congratulation were spoken by the bishop of the diocese, who then introduced the Rev. Dr. C. E. Hall, rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, who expressed pleasure that the parish had ceased to be a mission and had become now an active and working church. The Rev. Dr. William A. Soively followed. After mentioning features that are noticeable in the chapel, and the faithful work of the rector, he referred to the beautiful appearance which the entire edifice will present when the tower is finished and the church built over into its intended style. The desired result he believed would be reached at no distant day.

BROOKLYN—Woman's Auxiliary.—The thirteenth anniversary of the Long Island Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held on Thursday, November 12, in St. Peter's church, Brooklyn (the Rev. C. A. Tibbals, rector). At 10:30 A. M. the Holy Communion was celebrated by the bishop of the diocese, the address being given by the Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington. His subject was "Motives and Methods in Woman's Work."

The report, written by Miss Lonina S. Gilbert, and the treasurer's statement prepared by Miss Elizabeth S. Cromwell were read by the Rev. Joseph Reynolds.

Lunch was served in the committee room of the church.

At two o'clock the congregation reassembled in the large chapel, completely filling it. The Missionary Bishop of Montana spoke in place of the Bishop of Minnesota and the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas, who were unable to be present. The Missionary Bishop of Montana has now nine clergy at work in his jurisdiction, but could use many more. He has a school of a very promising character, that may grow into a fine boarding-school. He described a trip which he recently took through a portion of his vast territory, passing over many hundred miles by rail, stage, and horseback. He found many places where the people are willing and anxious to have services held, and where they will cheerfully contribute to maintain clergy who will render such duties.

The Rev. Dr. C. Ellis Stevens spoke on "Mission Work in Cities." Brooklyn, he said, has three-quarters of a million of people. Twelve States have not so many souls—all the Territories taken together have not so many. It is the eighth city in the world; its dockage the largest in the world. Its shipping is larger than that of New York, and its manufacturing interests put it in the position of one of the greatest centres of manufacture in the country. Forty years ago Brooklyn had less than 60,000 people. At the present rate, a city of that size would be built every two years. Last year the growth was 31,000. What is its religious provision for such a growth? It has smaller provision than any other city in the country. It is the city of the fewest churches. Five wards containing 140,000 people have no church or mission of the Church. Take all the provision of every kind made by all religious bodies, and there remains in Brooklyn one-third of the population not touched. In a word that has the largest population where there is no church, and where the denominations provide only scanty religious service, out of 600 families visited 450 were found without a Bible or any religious book or means of instruction. He enlarged on the dangers of this growing atheism and the importance of planting the Church effectively in the great cities.

At the evening service Bishop Brewer presided, and addresses of a very interesting character were made by the Rev. C. A. Tibbals and by the Rev. Dr. William S. Langford.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

THE CHURCH IN ALLEGANY COUNTY.—In this county there are now many signs of encouragement for the Church's progress. While there was not in any of the parishes what may be called settled ministers, yet in all, excepting Angelica, there are ministers in charge, and regular Sunday services are kept up.

At Cuba there is a renewal of life consequent on the payment of a debt which has long been a burden to the parish. On St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, October 28, the beautiful church of Christ Church Parish, was consecrated by the bishop of the diocese. Many clergymen came from other parts of this and other dioceses, among them three former rectors. The church is of brick, of Gothic architecture, with a corner tower. It is handsomely furnished throughout with black walnut chancel furniture and pews, and has a fine large bell. The Rev. F. Thompson is in charge here.

At Belfast, a place hitherto unoccupied by the Church, there is a very promising opening for a mission. There are eleven Church families, among them seven communicants. This station will be supplied from Cuba.

Belmont and Belvidere are in charge of the Rev. Michael Scofield, and Caneseraga is supplied by the Rev. A. J. Warner.

At Wellsville, where the Church has suffered very much, there is still a great deal to encourage. There are some here yet who are exerting every nerve to revive the work, for love of the Church. Owing to circumstances, which it would take too long to relate, the parish lost its church under foreclosure. It was bought by a man who turned it into a meat market, and it is now used for that purpose. Lately a movement has been started for the purchase of the property and its restoration to sacred uses. To secure this end, which meets the hearty approval of the bishop, the few and scattered Church people, none of them wealthy, have raised $1,600, of the $2,700 needed to purchase and restore the building. This is all they can do of themselves, and it is to be trusted that outside aid will be given them, for as soon as they obtain a suitable place, regular services will be maintained. The church thus restored could not be built on such a lot for less than $1,500. The congregation has all the church furniture, and a fine pipe organ to place in the building as soon as it can be purchased and made ready. As soon as the church can be recovered it will be decided to the diocese, so that the former blunder will not be repeated. Wellsville is a growing place of four thousand inhabitants, and the Church, if established here, will grow.

There are many other large villages in the county where the Church will be introduced as fast as an opening comes. It is the purpose of the bishop and the convocation firmly to establish the work, and put it in the hands of a general missionary who shall work from some central point.

PULASKI—Convocation.—The convocation of the Fourth Missionary District held its autumn meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday, November 3 and 4, in St. James's church, Pulaski. There were present, besides the bishop, twenty-two clergy. There was a missionary service on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday there was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 9:30 A. M. The rest of the day was devoted to the discussion of four topics selected by the bishop, and introduced by appointed writers and speakers. At the business meeting the Rev. W. L. Parker was made president, the Rev. J. E. Catbell, secretary and treasurer, and Messrs. G. J. Gardner and G. C. McWhorter, lay members of the Board of Missions.

NEW JERSEY.

ELIZABETH—Festival of Choir Guild.—The fifth annual festival of the Choir Guild of the Diocese of New Jersey was held in Christ church, Elizabeth (the Rev. H. H. Oberly, rector), on Tuesday, November 10. The choirs participating in the festival were the surpliced choirs of Christ church, Elizabeth, St. Mary's, Burlington, Christ church, Bordentown, Christ church, South Amboy, Trinity, Princeton, and St. James's, Long Branch. The organist was Mr. Charles Walker of Elizabeth. There were present of the clergy, the bishop of the diocese, the rector of the parish, the dean of the General Theological Seminary, the Rev. Drs. Morgan Dix and George Morgan Hills, and the Rev. Messrs. A. B. Baker, R. B. Post, C. M. Parkman, G. F. Breed, H. E. Thompson, N. Barrows, W. E. Wright, C. M. Stewart, E. D. Tomkins, E. B. Joyce, B. F. Thompson, C. M. Pyne, G. M. Christian, W. M. Pickets, W. M. Geer, G. H. Hills, and R. G. Osborne. The Rev. H. E. Thompson acted as master of ceremonies.

The bishop and clergy entered the church by the main entrance, the clergy preceded by the crossbearer, and the vested choir of one hundred and fifteen choristers, preceded by a banner, singing the processional hymn, "Daily, daily, sing the praises," and the rector of the parish proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. A. B. Baker and R. B. Post. The music is noticed in our Art column.

After the service the clergy and visitors were entertained by the ladies of the parish. A business meeting of the guild was held at 2:30 P. M., at which resolutions were adopted expressive of the regret of the guild at the loss of one of its members, the late Rev. N. Pettit, and officers were elected for the ensuing year.

At 4 P. M. there was a choral Evensong, conducted by the rector, the Rev. E. D. Tomkins and the Rev. Dr. G. M. Hills reading the lessons. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix.

The Choir Guild of the Diocese of New Jersey is formed of eight volunteer vested choirs from different parts of the diocese, and its object is the cultivation and improvement of Church music in the various parishes. New Jersey has taken the lead in this organized work, and already some other dioceses are forming guilds on the same general plan. The improvement effected by this instrumentality has already become marked.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

JERSEY CITY—St. Paul's Church, Bergen.—This church (the Rev. Dr. F. C. Putnam, rector.) was consecrated on Sunday, October 25. The day completed twenty five years since the rector assumed the spiritual charge of a congregation composed of a few families in Old Bergen, that had just been organized into a parish, so that he has been its sole pastor. The personal kindness of many friends enabling him to extinguish a chronic debt, there was peculiar satisfaction in being able to crown a quarter of a century of hard work and many trials by the consecration of the church. The day was perfect, the loveliest of a glorious autumn. The services, participated in by a large congregation, were replete with solemn interest, deepening into the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, which brought them to a close in the morning; a beautiful confirmation service concluding the whole in the evening.

NEWARK—Hospital of St. Barnabas.—This institution, the benediction of whose new buildings we reported last spring, has published its nineteenth annual report, showing that on June 11, 1884, there remained in the hospital 20 patients, and during the year 457 have been admitted, making 477 in all. There have been 11,680 cases treated, making a daily average of 32, of various nationalities. The physicians have made 1,496 visits. Nine births and 36 deaths have been reported. The chaplain reports 2 adults and 11 children baptized; 3 confirmations, and 3 burials, and the Holy Communion celebrated twice a month by another clergyman, thus giving the sisters and inmates the privilege of a weekly Eucharist.

The Hospital of St. Barnabas is in charge of the Sisterhood of St. Margaret. The bishop of the diocese is president ex officio, and the trustees are from eleven parishes. The work it is doing, as may be seen from the above abstract of the report, is a great and valuable one, and the benefit it is to the community is incalculable.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Messiah.—A short time since ground was broken for the erection of a new school building connecting with and forming an enlargement of the Church of the Messiah (the Rev. F. H. Bushnell, rector), which will ultimately be the nave of a large church, when the present church will form the transepts. The addition will be of stone, with a low roof for the present. All the money necessary for its entire completion has been subscribed and the larger part of it already paid in, so that there will be no indebtedness incurred.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Jude's Free Church.—The rector of this parish (the Rev. W. H. Graff.) began on Sunday, November 8, with the celebration of the Holy Communion, a series of special services and sermons to stir up a hearty participation in active parochial labors. This was presented as a duty to Christ; to the rector; to one's self. The preachers enforcing these lessons and urging greater earnestness in the Christian life. Here the rector, the Rev. Drs. R. F. Aloop, Sidney Corbett and W. N. McVicker, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Upjohn, and C. N. Field.

PHILADELPHIA—Home of the Merciful Saviors for Crippled Children.—The corner stone of this Home at Forty-fourth street and Baltimore avenue was laid on Monday afternoon, November 9, by the warden, the Rev. Robert F. Innes. A short and appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. Dr. John P. Peters. The clergy present were the Rev. Drs. T. C. Yarnall, W. H. Meade, J. P. Peters, T. S. Rumney, S. E. Appleton, and the Rev. Messrs. R. N. Thomas, C. W. Dnane, Stewart Stone, Gideon J. Barton, Wm. M. Jeffers, C. N. Field, Benjamin J. Douglass, J. K. Murphey, Simeon C. Hill, George Yarnall and R. F. Innes.

There is already under roof, and adjoining the chapel, a dwelling-house which will accommodate twenty-five children. The object of the Home is to receive those children who are discharged from hospitals as hopeless cases. It gives the preference to the extremely poor, taking them without board or entrance fee. It is entirely supported by voluntary contributions. The buildings will be finished and ready for occupancy early next spring. The Home is now located at the corner of Forty-fifth street and Osage avenue.

PHILADELPHIA—Standing Committee.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, held on Tuesday, November 8, Joseph Shantz Hartzel was recommended for ordination to Deacon's Orders; Mr. Wm. Emott Maison and W. Leggett Kolb were recommended as candidates for Holy Orders; and Mr. Joseph Alexander Firth applied to be admitted as a candidate for Holy Orders.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Incarnation. During the first week of this month a gilded bronze cross, seven feet high, was placed at the top of the stone spire of this church, which has been in course of erection for some months, thereby completing the work, and adding a prominent feature to that section of the city in which it is located.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON—St. John's Church.—The twenty-seventh anniversary of the consecration of this church (the Rev. Dr. T. Gardiner Littell, rector,) was observed on Tuesday, November 3. The clergy and choir rooms in the new parish building were occupied for the first time. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. J. L. McKim and R. H. Wright, after which the rector gave a sketch of the history of the parish. The Rev. Dr. Charles Breck, who labored earnestly, in addition to his other duties in Trinity parish, to sustain services until the church was finished, gave a most interesting sketch of the life of Mr. Alexis Irenée du Pont, the founder of the parish and a devoted Churchman. He was followed by the Rev. Robert F. Innes, who earnestly urged the need of real life Church work. The music by the choir of men and boys was very hearty and inspiring.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Woman's Auxiliary.—Regular meetings for business are held each month, with an average representation of six parishes. In connection with the work in this district there are now nine parishes. The Ascension parish has prepared and sent three boxes of the value of $332; the Holy Cross one box, value $45; the Incarnation three boxes, $150; St. John's ten boxes, value $1,100, and Trinity one box, $175; total, $1,800. Total receipts for the year just ending about $100. Disbursements, Chinese, Japan, Domestic Missions, Mrs. Brent's Colored School, $100. From the impulse given by this auxiliary have sprung the House of Mercy and the Friendly League for Girls. The aggregate value of the boxes and money sent by the league during the year has been $1,000—an advance of $667 over the year before.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—House of Mercy.—The scope of this charity is neither parochial nor sectarian, and all who need the aid of the home are received, although the religious instruction given is after the mind of the Church. No exact time is fixed for the stay of an inmate, and it depends on each to prove that she intends to reform before she can be commended to service in any household. In addition to the sum of $3,315.79 given, and $1,286 pledged annually, forty-eight subscribers have pledged various sums each, and $300 in "additional donations" are reported. Servants were employed at first, but latterly the women work on wages, and including this outlay $1,277 per year is expended in the support of the institution.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Mark's League.—The second anniversary of the Ascension Branch of St. Mark's Friendly League was observed in the Church of the Ascension (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Elliott, rector,) on the afternoon of All Saints' Day. The report of the work accomplished during the year was read by the rector. An interesting and instructive address was made by the Rev. F. B. Benzor, on "The Duties of Work and Prayer." He gave a special charge to each of the orders into which the league is divided, and said that in working for others it should not be forgotten that it is, above all things, work for Christ, and, in order to do His work with the right spirit, there must be frequent and earnest petitions for His help and blessing.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Epiphany.—The parish directory of this parish, (the Rev. Dr. S. H. Giesy, rector), covers nearly two pages and a half of fine print, and is devoted exclusively to a list of officers of the parish. Two homes, six Sunday and sewing-schools, three societies, men's meeting and women's meeting, besides teachers' class, ushers, trustees, visitors, choir, vestry, etc., constitute the working corps, which, added to the parish clergy, embraces in all two hundred and fifty persons. A normal class, conducted by the rector, is held each Friday for the teachers of the Sunday-schools.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Woman's Auxiliary.—The opening series of the District of Columbia Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary for the working year was held in St. John's church, Washington (the Rev. Dr. W. A. Leonard, rector,) on Tuesday, November 8. The service consisted of a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Rev. J. A. Back, and an address by the Rev. Dr. S. H. Giesy. Two new parishes were admitted into this branch. Seven of the city clergy were present in the chancel, and several others in the congregation.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Paul's Church.—This parish (the Rev. W. M. Barker, rector) has expended, or contracted to expend $9,000 in the enlargement and beautification of its church, all of which is either contributed or has been pledged. An anonymous gift enabled the committee to double the size of the proposed organ. The size and beauty of the chancel is a source of frequent comment, while the furnaces and other conveniences have vastly added to the comfort of the congregation. A house has been obtained for a reading room, on Twenty-fifth street, between I and K streets. A resident will be in charge, and good reading matter, games, and other amusements will be provided for boys and girls, and others who may care to attend.

The offerings in this free church were, for July, $191; for August, $112; for September, $145; for October, $264. Hereafter there will be a Thursday 11 A. M. celebration of the Holy Communion. During the month of November the Rev. Drs. Giesy, Leonard, Lindsay, and the Rev. Mr. Pond will deliver special sermons in this church. On the first Sunday of December, the bishop will be present and preach.

FLORIDA.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP.—The Bishop of Florida died at the Clarendon Hotel, New York, of pneumonia, on the morning of Sunday, November 15. He was taken sick on Saturday, but the progress of the disease was so rapid that he died in a few hours. The remains were taken immediately to Jacksonville for interment.

The Right Rev. John Freeman Young, S. T. D., was born in Pittston, Maine, October 30, 1830. He was graduated at the Theological Seminary of Virginia in 1845, and ordained to the diaconate in April of the same year by Bishop Henshaw of Rhode Island. He removed to Florida, and became minister in charge of St. John's, Jacksonville, and on being advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Elliott of Georgia, in January, 1846, was made rector of that parish. He served in Texas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and New York. In 1867 he was consecrated Bishop of Florida in Trinity church, New York.

GAINESVILLE—Holy Trinity Church.—The new rectory of this parish (the Rev. F. B. Dunham, rector), now completed and occupied, gives another assurance of the stability of Church work in Florida. It is a commodious, comfortable house of ten rooms, an ornament to the city, and a memorial of the earnest workers of a struggling mission parish. The cost was $2,500. One half was raised by the congregation, an additional sum was obtained from the sale of donated land. Many who had land but no money, placed this land in the rector's hands for sale, giving a good percentage of the proceeds to the Building Fund. When all the lands are sold, the rectory debt will be extinguished, and a handsome balance left toward a new church building.

The rector is now looking for some good friend of Church schools to come forward with $10,000 to enable him to place one on a sure foundation. The plan is simply to erect a comfortable boarding hall for the accommodation of students attending the State Military and Normal Academy, the title to be held by the Church. A good Churchman will be placed in charge to make a "Church Home" for students coming from all parts of the State. The State Military Academy is well officered, fairly endowed, and furnishes all that can be desired in school-room work. The students board wherever they can in the city. With a good boarding hall under the control of the Church, a self-supporting Church school will at once spring into existence without any cost or trouble of mere scholastic work. It is just such a plan as the Bishop of Michigan so wisely advocated for his diocese.

The tide of emigration has how fairly turned toward Midland Florida, and it strains every nerve to keep pace with the growing population. A few more clergy who can work on faith for a year or two can find fields which will give as complete returns to the venture as has Gainesville.

ALABAMA.

MONTGOMERY—St. John's Church.—All Saints' Day will long be remembered by the members of this parish (the Rev. Dr. Horace Stringfellow, rector). The late Bishop Cobbs often during his life had expressed a desire to see, besides institutions of learning and charity growing up around, a cathedral church in this capital, a chime of bells to give the beautiful and inspiring invitation to the world to enter the courts of the Lord's house. That which the good bishop desired to see was brought about on All Saints' Day. The rector labored hard for its accomplishment, and a $2,000 chime of bells was suspended, and played on that day, after a solemn dedication and blessing by the bishop of the diocese. The services were all in accord with the occasion. On the evening of Tuesday, November 3, there was a musical of the chimes, which delighted all hearing it.

On Thursday, November 5, was observed the golden wedding of the venerable Col. C. T. Pollard, now in his eightieth year, the senior warden of the parish. Col. Pollard, fifty years ago, married the daughter of General Scott, settled in Montgomery, then a mere village, and raised a large family. He was, before the civil war, a man of very large fortune, and was kind and generous in a more than commensurate degree. For half a century he has lived in one place, and borne a character for honor, honesty, and manliness. He has been a vestryman of this parish for forty-nine years, and the senior warden for the greater part, if not the whole, of that time. The rector and vestry presented him, on the occasion, with resolutions expressive of their affectionate regard, and with two finely-executed portraits of himself and his wife.

TENNESSEE.

MEMPHIS—Work Among the Colored People.—The work among the colored people here has been vigorously carried on during the past twelve months, and has made fair progress. It has been carried on at two different centres, both under the control of the Dean of St. Mary's Cathedral, the Rev. William Klein. At the Canfield Orphan Asylum there has been a large day school, averaging in attendance during the year about eighty children, under the immediate charge of Mr. Willis T. McNeal, who has proved himself an efficient teacher. Most of these children have also attended Sunday-school, and all receive training in the Church's teaching and worship. The other centre of work is at Emmanuel church, in the heart of the town, where services are held every Sunday, and on some other days. Here the Rev. A. R. Anderson, colored deacon, officiates, and the Dean of St. Mary's also preaches once every Sunday. The congregation averages about forty, but is steadily growing in numbers. This church was purchased in February last for $3,000, something more than half of which amount has yet to be raised. The colored people are poor, but are doing what little they can, hoping confidently to receive help from without to complete the payment. If the debt could be got rid of, a great impetus would be given to the work. By the help of some of the ladies of the cathedral congregation a sewing society has lately been organized amongst the colored people, in which they work very zealously. There have been during the year twenty-five baptisms and five confirmations.

INDIANA.

DELPHI—St. Mary's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. H. L. C. Braddon, rector) on the evening of Friday, November 6, and confirmed four persons. In the afternoon the rector baptized two adults.

The parish is receiving a new impetus, and the parishioners are working unitedly. The church has been reshingled; the Ladies' Guild has purchased a new carpet for the church, and chairs for the choir; a handsome clock has been presented; the children's Sewing Guild has presented a Bishop's Chair, and the Prayer Desk and Stall; the Altar Guild has given a carved Alms Basin, and a handsome Prayer Book and Hymnal for chancel use. All this is the result of scarcely eighteen months' work, prior to which time the church had been closed, except for occasional services, for five years. The outlook for the future is bright and hopeful.

Services have been held by the rector at Pittsburg and Monticello, and there is every prospect of an opening for the Church in both places.

CHICAGO.

CHICAGO—Northeastern Deanery.—The annual meeting of this deanery was held on Tuesday, November 10, in the chapel of Grace church, Chicago (the Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke, rector). The Holy Communion was celebrated by the rector, who is also dean, assisted by the Rev. W. E. Toll. There was a large attendance of clergy, the bishop also being present. At the business meeting, the Rev. R. F. Fleetwood was elected secretary, and the Rev. Dr. W. H. Vibbert treasurer of the deanery. Reports were heard from, and aid extended to several of the Chicago and suburban mission churches and stations. Remarks were made by the bishop and dean, and the Rev. Messrs. J. Rusleton, M. Lane, J. M. Gregg, W. W. Steele, T. N. Morrison, Jr., A. Lechner, and H. G. Ferry, on the progress and increasing demands of the work in the city and elsewhere. An essay on "The Sacramental Teaching of the Lord's Prayer" was read by the Rev. Edward Larabee.

SPRINGFIELD.

DECATUR—St. John's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. W. H. Moore, rector), on All Saints' Day. In the morning he celebrated the Holy Eucharist, and confirmed eight persons. The musical portions of the service were rendered with great precision and expression by the excellent choir of the parish, the organ being assisted by violins. This service was especially interesting from the fact that a new communion service was presented at the offertory, and blessed by the bishop for its sacred use. The vessels are all pure silver, heavily plated with gold, the chalice adorned with precious stones. They are memorials of a late rector, who died ten years ago, leaving the memory of a life filled with good works. Both paten and chalice bear the inscription "In Memoriam W. W. D'Wolf, Priest, 1875." The material used was made up of keepsakes and other pieces given by the congregation for the purpose.

In the afternoon the bishop preached in the House of Prayer, a promising mission at the east end of the city; and in the evening he preached a glowing sermon on "The Communion of Saints," at the parish church.

MINNESOTA.

WELLS—Ordnation.—On Friday, November 6, the bishop of the diocese advanced to the priesthood in the Church of the Nativity, the Rev. Edward Huntington Clark, a graduate of the last class at Seabury Hall. Four of the neighboring clergy were present, and joined with the bishop in the imposition of hands. In the evening the bishop preached from Rev. vi., 11.

MISSOURI.

KANSAS CITY—Grace Church.—This enterprising parish (the Rev. Cameron Mann, rector), has nearly completed a handsome and well-managed rectory building, into which the rector and his family expected soon to move. It is of red brick, and cost $8,000. Preparations are also making to erect a new church edifice. Several handsome windows have already been received, and, until they are needed for the new building, will be used in decorating the present church, which the parish is steadily outgrowing.

COLLEGIATE AND ACADEMIC.

THE NEW YORK DISTRICT, WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Norwood Institute, 114 Fourteenth street, which has taken a high place among the educational institutions of the District, will begin the new year with the promise of even greater usefulness and excellence than in the past. The studies are arranged so that young ladies can obtain every accomplishment to fit them for a useful and excellent position in the present or future. The principal, Mr. and William D. Cabell, are assisted by a corps of teachers chosen for their excellence in various specialties. The Institute is highly recommended by its present and former patrons.—Washington, D. C. Reviewer.

DIED.

Departed this life at Louisville, Ky., at one o'clock P. M. Sunday, November 11, 1885, IRONIA M., the beloved and last surviving daughter of W. Geo. Anderson, and Nannie Colston Anderson, deceased; aged 27 years.

It was on All Saints' Day, when all the blessed saints were gathered around the throne of God, that the spirit of a beautiful being, pure and lovely, fled from earth to join the heavenly throng, and sweetly sing with them the "song of glory."

Fell asleep in Jesus, suddenly, Nov. 10, 1885, in Detroit, Mich., WILLIAM NATHAN, widow of Mrs. Andrew, in the 50th year of his age.

In Brockton, Mass., November 11, very suddenly, FRANCIS, eldest son of James M. and Henrietta Codman, aged 25 years.

At her residence, Florida's Point, Retanek, L. I., Elizabeth F. Floss, widow of D. Van Hosen Flord, in the 62d year of her age.

Entered into the rest of Paradise, on Sunday, October 25, 1885, at Norfolk, Va., MEBECA A. GAPP-REY, widow of the late Francis W. Seabury, in the 56th year of her age.

"Numbered with thy ascins in glory everlasting."
At Cologne, Ge many, on Thursday, November 4, 1885, the Rev. HENRY F. HARTMAN, P.R.D., Chaplain of the English Church in Cologne, in the 98th year of his age.

Entered into rest, on the 14th of November, 1885, at the residence of her brother-in-law, Dr. Montgomery, in Cambridge, New York, ANNA MAY, second daughter of the late Hon. Peter Hill, of Jacksonville, Fla.
"He giveth His beloved sleep."

Entered into rest at Stamford, Conn., on Sunday, November 1, 1885, JOHN W. HUBBARD, in his 78th year.

In Southampton, England, October 31, WILLIAM T. LORWORTH, formerly of New York City, aged 78 years.

Suddenly at the residence of his son, 34 Cambridge place, Brooklyn, on Saturday, Nov. 14, EDWARD N. PIERCE, in the 61st year of his age.

Entered into rest, Nov. 12, 1885, Orange, N. J., CARLETON CULVER HYMAN, son of the late Charles E. and Kathleen Byder, aged 19 years.
"Soon, soon to faithful warrior comes the rest."

On Friday, Nov. 13, FROESICUS SCHUBERT, in the 52d year of his age.
Suddenly of pneumonia, at ten minutes before 8 Sunday morning, November 15, at the Grand Hotel in this city, the Right Reverend JOHN FERRAS YOUNG, D.D., Bishop of Florida.
The body has been taken to Jacksonville, Fla.

WILLIAM N. CARPENTER.

For the third time, within an easy year, the Vestry of Christ Church is called upon to record the death of one of the wardens of this parish. Mr. Carpenter died early in 1885. Mr. Adams toward the end of the year, and now the length of day, November 4, A. D. 1885, Mr. WILLIAM N. CARPENTER, SENIOR Warden, is taken to his rest. All full of years and serene in the Communion of the Catholic Church. In the confidence of a certain hope in the gracious promise, have entered into life.
Mr. Carpenter was one of the members of this parish church in the year 1845. From the date of organization he has been a member of its vestry; since that time he has been one of its officers for the past three years one of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, and on several occasions a deputy in the General Convention. Devoted, patient, untiring in his efforts to promote the interests of the Church, always courteous, considerate and kindly in his demeanor toward all men, now after passing the allotted limit he is called away by a sudden and most painful summons.
His approach has been one of its weakness and labors of a quiet and unostentatious worker, such as Mr. Carpenter has been, in the "Halls of the parish, and how his co-laborers will miss his familiar presence, as well as his substantial help and encouragement, one needs to search the records of the parish, and how the day of his organization in May, 1845, and see on almost every page his name appearing connected with every enterprise of parish movement and advancement, and to witness the fruits of a life's devotion which tells more truly than any words what he has done, and how sorely he will be missed.

The foregoing minute was ordered to be spread upon the records, and a copy of the same sent to A True Copy. JOHN H. BISSELL, Christ Church, Detroit, Nov. 10, 1885.

APPEALS.

NAHOTAH MISSION.

It has not pleased the Lord to endow Nahotah. The great and good work entrusted to her requires, and she lacks, the offerings of His people. Offerings are solicited:
1st. Because Nahotah is the oldest theological seminary in the west of the State of Wisconsin.
2d. Because the instruction is accorded to those in the land.
3d. Because it is the most beautifully situated seminary.
4th. Because it is the best located for study.
5th. Because everything given is applied directly to the work of propagating the Christian religion.
Address, WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D., Nahotah, Wausau County, Wisconsin.

As appeal is made for aid in erecting small chapels and preaching-stations in the Savannah Convention, Diocese of Georgia. With four energy we fill thirty-two stations. From all white, some colored, but our funds are exhausted when the stipends of the missionaries are paid, and buildings are essential if any work permanent. We need to erect some fourteen chapels, costing in all six thousand dollars, half or more of which can be raised in the State. For the three thousand, or at the least twenty five hundred dollars additional, we must look outside, and if the help is not forthcoming, we will be crippled with much gratitude by Rev. ANSON DODGE, Jr., of St. Albans, Vt.

The work in which the Rev. Mr. Dodge and his associates are engaged in Southern and Southwest Georgia has my hearty approval, and I trust the friends of the Church will extend to him such aid as may be in their power.
J. W. BECKWITH, Bishop of Georgia.

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.
The theological department of the University of the South, dependent upon the offerings of the Church, now makes its semi-annual appeal to those who would aid in the extension of the kingdom of Christ in the South and Southwest. The undersigned trusts that the contributions will be very prosperous, and is now self-supporting. But the theological department, with about twenty students, has no support beyond that which Church people may be disposed to give. Contributions may be sent to Rev. J. W. Telfair Hodgson, D.D., Savannah, Tenn. Vice-Chancellor.

I HAVE for sale, in aid of the Building Fund of Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, Florida, some 500 acres of land in Alachua Co. Twenty acre lots, unenclosed, $100; ten acre lots, enclosed, $200; 100 acre lots, enclosed and improved, from $1,000 to $500. The titles are all perfect. The lands high and dry. Alachua County is now the most populous in the State, and is rapidly increasing. It is the only county, raises more oranges than any county, and one, and more vegetables than all others. High and healthy market, and improved. Gainesville is the central seat and railroad center. For information, mya. Ac., address, F. B. DUNHAM, Gainesville, Fla.

COLORADO WARD.
Three hundred dollars is needed in our school for colored children. The Church must begin with the right. If it will not do its duty by the poor, any assistance will be duly acknowledged.
Rev. A. W. KNIGHT, Palatka, Fla.

THE EPISCOPAL EDUCATION SOCIETY aids young men who are preparing for the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church. It sends a large amount for the work of the present year. Give and it shall be given to you.
Rev. ROBERT C. MATTLE, 1224 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

SOCIETY FOR THE INCREASE OF THE PHILISTINE. Remittances and applications should be addressed to the Rev. ELISHA WYLLIAMS, Corresponding Secretary, 47 Spring St., Hartford, Conn.

A MISSIONARY in the southwest can give services three new stations of promise if he can purchase a few more men who are prepared for the ministry. Missionary, care of CHURCHMAN'S Office.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The undersigned most gratefully acknowledges receipt of the following amounts for the rectory at Lawrenceville, during October and November: Mrs. A. E. Holstein, $5; Miss E. B. and another friend, $2; Mrs. Geo. H. Webster, $30; Mrs. J. A. Brown, $100; "Thank offering," $2; Mr. J. Sturgis, Jr., $5.
J. S. RUSSELL, Missionary.

BISHOP NEELY gratefully acknowledges the receipt in October, of $100 from "Tithe," Trinity Church, Hartford, for Church work in Maine.

The editor of THE CHURCHMAN gladly acknowledges the receipt of $2 from an anonymous sender in aid of the mission at Reading, Mass.

The Committee on the Mission to be held in a number of churches in the City of New York give notice that the Mission will begin (D. V.) November 27th, that the names of the members of the committee, previous to and during the Mission, will be at the store of E. P. Dutton & Co., 39 West Twenty-third St., in New York, and in Philadelphia, will be presented, where information may be obtained, and the literature of the Mission will be found.
H. V. SATTLECKE, Chairman.
HENRY MOTTET, Corresponding Secretary.

THE American Church Missionary Society will hold its annual meeting on Monday, November 17, at 11 o'clock, in the City of Philadelphia. Philadelphia is half-past one o'clock. Interesting business to be presented.

The Rev. Dr. Huntington, rector of Grace Church, will preach in St. Peter's church on Sunday evening, December 6, in aid of the Charity Fund.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

All "Letters to the Editor" will appear under the full signature of the writer.

THE BOOK ANNEXED.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I have read with more or less interest the criticisms which from time to time have appeared in THE CHURCHMAN on this book, favorable and unfavorable, wise and otherwise, and while I am inclined to think that, on the whole, the work of the Committee on "Liturgical Enrichment" is not fully appreciated by all of your correspondents, nevertheless the objections to some of the changes are so weighty that it hardly seems possible that the book can be adopted at the next General Convention. There is in the minds of the laity especially a great aversion to change, and the Prayer Book has answered a good purpose so long that the feeling quite strongly prevails that it is wise to "let well enough alone." Amid constant ecclesiastical unrest and change we have, at least so far as our liturgy is concerned, represented stability, and it is said, and perhaps truly so in the main, that all we need is liberty to use the Prayer Book as it is, to adapt it to circumstances, and use the three services separately and independently, under certain limitations. At the same time, however, a shortened service, complete in itself, to differentiate the services, or making the evening service entirely distinct from the morning, for the sake of variety and freshness, some occasional prayers, the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis. All these are desirable, and may be considered justly as enrichments of the liturgy.

In regard to some of the offices, perhaps the committee did not go far enough. In the Confirmation Office, for example, it seems as if there should be some clause in the Preface recognizing the fact that a number of the candidates, as is frequently the case, never had any godfathers or godmothers, though they have been avowed Christians for years.

Again, it seems as if we should have an alternate Burial Service. We cannot well refuse to bury the dead in any circumstances. But certainly no one is entitled to this service who has not died in the "true faith of Christ's Holy Name." It is simply mockery to read this solemn and impressive service over an infidel, or atheist, or any notoriously wicked man, even though he has been baptized, and is neither a suicide nor a person who has been excommunicated.

Again, in the private administration of the Holy Communion, if the sick person is a woman, the epistle is very inappropriate: "My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord," etc. This should be changed, or an alternate one provided. Some other occasional prayers, it seems to me, are needed, especially in regard to the conversion of God's ancient people, the Jews, the religious training of the young, and the sanctity of the Lord's Day. There are no prayers particularly appropriate to these subjects, though they call for especial sermons and especial efforts.

But I am well aware of the impossibility of meeting every one's ideas in view of changes or additions to the liturgy, and my main object in writing this communication was not to criticize or discuss the book proposed, but to suggest the propriety of a three-years' trial, or, in other words, to make the Book Annexed tentative for three years as were the Hymnal and Lectionary.

Is not this possible? How can the real merits of the proposed alterations and additions be tested but by use? Would it be wise to adopt any amended book without such a trial? Is there anything in the constitution or canons of the Church to prevent such a test? I grant that the inference from the eighth article of the constitution is that after any amendments or alterations are acted upon by one General Convention and made known to the dioceses that final action shall be taken at the next General Convention. But is there anything here at all that implies that the General Convention has not power to permit the use of an amended service for the three years? We might say, perhaps, that the book has been before the Church for consideration for this time! But practically this amounts to very little. The book is expensive, few of the clergy or laity have given it any critical examination, thousands have never even seen it, and really no practical test whatever has been made in its merits. How different the case would be if there had been permission to use it; then both the clergy and laity would be prepared to render an intelligent judgment, then the decision of a diocesan council would be of some value! But as the case now stands, no diocesan council or convention is competent to instruct its delegates, and hence the reference to the synods and their provisions of three years have very little if any practical value. It would certainly be great wisdom to adopt any change without the most thorough consideration throughout the whole Church; and it would be also unwise to reject as a whole the changes proposed, thereby losing some things that certainly enrich the liturgy and tend to make it more effective as well as more attractive. Both the Hymnal and Lectionary were put to a practical test for three years, and while there may still be room for criticism in regard to both, yet no one, I presume, will deny the great value of such a trial. But if such a test was deemed advisable in regard to them, how much more in reference to the liturgy itself, when changes and additions are proposed affecting the whole worship of the Church.

In speaking of the Book Annexed being tentative for three years, I do not mean to imply that the whole book should be printed; this would be a venture which no publisher would be likely to make, but that the additions and changes should be printed on leaflets, or thrown into a pamphlet form, something like our mission services. This could be done at a small expense, and would answer the end proposed. The additional hymns were printed and used for six years. I think, before the Hymnal in its present form was adopted. And so the proposed alterations of, and additions to the Prayer Book could be prepared for use and trial, and thus time and opportunity be given for an intelligent opinion, both on the part of clergy and laity.

INCREASE OF CLERICAL STIPENDS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Frequent mention has been made in your columns of the inadequate support of some of our clergy.

Some of your proposals proposed have so far fallen short of their object.

I am at present the guest of a Baltimore clergyman (I withhold the name at his urgent request), who has in successful operation a plan whereby this difficult question can be happily solved, if other clergy will adopt it in their parishes.

The organization is based on the true principle, that the strong should help to bear the burdens of the weak.

The following outline will give some idea of how my brother works his Parochial Society:
Objects Proposed.—To help by pecuniary and other assistance the following clergy in particular: a. Those whose stipends are now below the average. b. Those who may be placed in circumstances of exceptional expense, such as removal, furnishing, clothing, books, birth or death in family, needed rest, etc. c. Those clergy whose stipends are under $1,000 from all sources.

Mode of Operations.—1. Funds will be collected in the following ways: a. Offerings in church. b. Annual subscriptions. c. Donations for special cases in cash, books, clothing, subscription to current literature, etc. 2. The funds will be distributed as follows: a. Clergy coming under the classes marked "a, b, c" in "Objects Proposed," will be assisted in the order there stated. b. Each case presented will be helped according to number in family, location, demands, amount given by parish, mission committee, etc. c. The payment will be made half yearly, probably about July and Christmas, except special cases, (those marked "b") under "Objects Proposed" which shall receive immediate attention when possible. d. The most considerate privacy shall be exercised in the distribution of funds, the names of recipients being known only to the president of the society, (who shall be its almoner) except when necessity shall compel otherwise. Officers, Meetings, etc.—1. The society shall have the following officers: 1. President and almoner—the rector of the parish. 2. Two vice-presidents. 3. Treasurer. 4. Secretary. 5. Collector. (Their duties shall be such as usually appertain to such officers.) 2. The officers shall constitute a council for the transaction of business, together with the members of the society, at the meetings of the meetings. 3. Monthly meetings shall be held on the last Wednesday in every month, after the 8 P. M. service. The January meeting shall be the annual meeting for the election of officers, and presenting the year's report.

This one sympathizing clergyman has materially helped twenty-three suffering brethren during the year.

Who will follow in his lead?

B. F. BROWN.

"DE MORTUIS NIL NISI BONUM."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Not long since a writer in the columns of THE CHURCHMAN asked the source of this expression. The Philadelphia Library contains books of quotations which afford an answer. In "Beautiful Thoughts from Latin Authors," by Craufurd Tait Ramsay, LL. D., published at Liverpool by Edward Howell, is the statement: "This is a saying of Solon in Plutarch."

Gover's "Handy Book" refers to a proposed amendment. It should be said to the English reader that the phrase is thus translated: "Concerning the dead, nothing except good." The suggested change would put veritas in place of bonum (good). Gover thinks this improper, but "Ancient and Modern Familiar Quotations," published by Lippincott, approves it.

J. C. Grocott's "Index of Quotations, Ancient and Modern," simply refers the saying to "Riley's Dictionary of Latin Quotations."

In Alfred Henderson's excellent and extensive "Latin Proverbs and Quotations" Virgil is referred to for a like thought, as follows: "Nulium cum victis, certamen at aetheri casus"; "There should be no strife with the vanquished or the dead," "Pour not water on a drowned mouse." Also Virgil is quoted: "Pugna sumi finem cum faceret hostis, habet"; "The battle is over, when the foe has fallen," "It is a base thing to tear a dead hero's beard off."

He adds another Latin saying: "Cum larvis luctari," "To fight with ghosts," (To speak against the dead.) "To fight with windmills."

It should be added for the English reader that Henderson's translations immediately follow the above Latin phrases, the additions to them are cumulative and illustrative.

THE BOOK ANNEXED PROPERLY

LEGISLATED UPON.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

An article by Mr. James Parker, in the Church Review for October, raises the point that the Book Annexed is not properly before the Church in accordance with Act VIII of the Constitution, because the House of Bishops failed to notify the House of Deputies, for the concurrence of that house, its "resolve" that the alterations as reported by the Committee of Conference be communicated to the several dioceses, etc.

The fact must have escaped the writer of the article that such "resolve" is included, in terms, in every one of the thirty resolutions reported by the Conference Committee and adopted by both houses, and that therefore, after these thirty resolves of the one house, and thirty concurrences of the other, there was no need to lump them all in a thirty-first.

GOSHEN AND PITHOM.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

At the meeting of the Egypt Exploration Fund, Messrs. Poole and Naville said that they felt obliged to admit that San-Taris forged no part of Goshen. Its chief city was Heliopolis (Cairo). The Wadi Tumilat was only added after the oppression commenced. It was stated from the chair that no discussion would be permitted, and M. Naville read a formal paper declining to answer the questions asked in England and America about the genuineness of the Pithom find.

NEW BOOKS.

THE PEACE OF UTRECHT. A historical review of the first treaty of 1713-14 and of the principal events of the war of the Spanish Succession. By James W. Gerard. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons,] pp. 420.

The epoch which this book covers is the most interesting in the history of modern Europe. It is far enough away to have the romantic charm of the past. It is near enough to be placed in the full light of historical study. It is one of those periods which are transitional just as others are continuous. The Peace of Utrecht is one of the mile stones of European progress. It marks the rise of that principle which has ever since ruled continental policies, the principle of the "balance of power." Up to that time war had represented different ideas. For a season it was the great strife for supremacy between the pope and the emperor. Lesser powers fell in beneath the one banner or the other. War, when not a crusade, was a private brigandage between neighboring princes. Then came the Reformation, and with it the end of the "Holy Roman Empire," as a real arbiter in Europe, the rise of the Austrian power, as, in fact, its successor. Up to that time the nations had looked to pope or kaiser with some sort of hopefulness that in the one or the other would be found an arbiter who would keep the peace or do rude justice between the weak and the strong. With the Reformation the empire ceased to be European and became Austrian. It gained in efficiency but lost forever its prestige. With the Reformation came the struggle between France and Spain, the latter lying down as the former arose. For the first time the question was fairly presented of the need of a balance of power, that no state be suffered to have a dominating influence in Europe.

The same development is true of the military art. Hitherto battles had been decided by fighting, by courage, by luck. Discipline went only as far as to, marshal a phalanx of pike-men so as to hold their ground; to hurl a squadron of cavalry with crushing force upon an enemy's flank. But the art of war, the chess-like combination by which a small force is made to do the work of a large one; the art by which battles like Rosebach and Lenton, Austerlitz and Sadowa have been won, now, for the first time since the days of the Caesars, began to be revived. Scientific warfare dates from the age of Marlborough. Knight-errantry went out with the white plume of Henry of Navarre.

In like manner the history of this time is a history of Courts. Everywhere in Europe the powers were crystallizing round a national centre. As feudalism expired, the importance of the monarchy grew. During the Wars of the Roses, a foreign foe would have sought to win over one of the great barons, to gain the good will of a Warwick or a Percy. In the war of the Spanish Succession the intrigue is for influence over the mind of the sovereign. The king's or the queen's ear is everything. One begins with the struggle around the moribund last years of Charles II, of Spain, and then goes to the squabbles wherein Sarah Jennings and Abigail Hill made or marred the fate of kingdoms, while contending for the favor of the weak-minded Anne of England. If in France a firmer will and a stronger intellect bore sway, there is plenty of backstairs gossip, and ignoble influence. All through the history of the time, the fate of the exiled Stuarts runs like a dark thread. This may not furnish the most heroic examples of history, but it certainly makes the most entertaining reading. For it brings all the interest to the focal point of individual lives, at the same time it places these lives where they are made to be representative of great movements.

One cares much about the men of that time, more for fear than they personally deserve, because they are linked with great events. The men of that time are men not too remote from the men of this. One would probably find the most estimable baron of the days of the Plantagenets, if not a dull, at least a perplexing acquaintance. Even a gentleman of Shakespeare's time (as judged by journals and letters), would have very much not in common with this day. But nothing is easier than to imagine a chat with Addison or Swift, with Bolingbroke or Prior. Bating the periwig and the snuff-box, one finds them entirely on the level of a present society.

All these reasons combine to make the era of the Peace of Utrecht a choice era in history. Just now the popular taste has settled back upon the external life of the times of Queen Anne. Perhaps it will do no harm for the dweller under the many gabled roofs which imitate that period, to know something about the men and women of that day.

In this volume Mr. Gerard has brought together a great mass of information. He has distilled this into a clear and easy-flowing, if not very brilliant narrative. The style is good, and except for a little outburst here and there of comparison of that past with the glories of to-day, we have no fault to find with it. Mr. Gerard should know that the best art of an historian is to efface his own personality. His worst offence is to moralize, especially when the morality is an anachronism. But we do not care "to look a gift horse in the mouth." We are thankful enough for a detailed account of that period, and for a history that is not tedious because confused. Given the story of those times honestly told, and one ought to be satisfied. Mr. Gerard has in the main done that, and we are glad to put his volume on our shelves beside Earl Stanhope's.

THE PENTATEUCH. Its Origin and Structure. An Examination of Recent Theories. By Edwin Cove Bisell, D.D., Professor of the Hebrew Language and Literature in the Hartford Theological Seminary. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons,] pp. 484. Price $2.

The "recent theories" mentioned in the title page are those of Graf and Wellhausen. In his introduction Professor Bisell states these, and, in so doing, gives a remarkably fair and thorough summary of the course of argument which has been directed against the Pentateuch. He does not press the point, as he fairly might, that each of these is primarily destructive of its predecessor. But he shows this while doing the most scrupulous justice to the rationalistic criticism. The theory of that criticism began with the notion of a double authorship of the Pentateuch, and that it was possible to separate it into its two component parts of Jehovistic and Elohist authorship. This theory has been enlarged gradually, until the division has been made into an earlier and a later Elohist, a Deuteronomic, a Jehovistic, a priestly code and an editorial work. The whole Pentateuch, thus reconstructed, is assigned to the times of Ezra and the return from the Babylonian exile. In this disposal of the Pentateuch all its historical parts are treated as simply fictions thrown in to give "local coloring" to the real object of the books, the priestly code found in Leviticus, and which was invented after the exile to enhance the authority of the priesthood. It is as if the "false decretals" had been incorporated into the New Testament and the New Testament forged to sustain the decretals. Of course this is no easy task even for German critics, but Wellhausen has accomplished it by an audacity of surmise which passes all previous attempts. Where the record stands inconveniently in the way of his theory, he reconstructs the record, declares it a blunder of the editor, and proceeds to show how it should read.

It is with such criticism that Professor Bisell has to deal. While he pays tribute to the learning and study of the German critics, he makes a point of exceeding importance, and which has been greatly overlooked, viz.: the entire distinction between a knowledge of facts and a right reasoning from facts. Just where the English and American mind is at its best, the right estimation of evidence, the German mind is often at its worst. It has the gift of arguing to a vicious circle in an astonishing degree. It forms its theory, and then adapts all facts to it. If they do not fit, so much the worse for the facts.

We should like to take up much more space than we have at command in giving an outline of the masterly argument with which the Hartford professor has disposed of his German opponents. We cannot do this, but our advice is to our readers in general, and to biblical students in particular, to read with care every word of this volume. Its clear, concise, and vivid style will make this an easy and pleasant task. That which Professor Green of Princeton has done in the matter of the Hebrew Feasts, Professor Bisell has done with the entire Pentateuch. Whatever else he has not succeeded in doing, he has at least shown up the preposterousness of the Wellhausen theory. Whatever may be the difficulties of accepting the Pentateuch as the work of Moses (and these are fairly stated and ably met in this volume), it is shown that the latest attempt at solution is the least worthy of regard. In this connection we wish to say that the random assertion often thrown out that all scholars are agreed to deny the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch amounts to just this—that it is made the test of scholarship to deny it. All scholars hold rationalistic views, because no one who does not can be a scholar. The appearance of such a book as this settles that point so far as America is concerned.

POETS OF AMERICA. By Edmund Clarence Stedman, Author of "Victorian Poets." [Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Company,] pp. 216. Price, $2.25.

"Victorian Poets" is properly a first volume of which "Poets of America" is the second. The two are quite intimately connected, especially as Mr. Stedman recognizes the same influences at work in both hemispheres upon the development of modern poetry. There are probably few men better qualified to write these books than Mr. Stedman. He has written good verse himself, and knows well what good verse should be, even to the difficulty of producing it.

We regard this book as an admirable critical study, and it certainly makes a delightful volume for leisure hours. He has taken as his leading American poets, Bryant, Whittier, Longfellow, Emerson, Poe, Holmes, Lowell, Bayard Taylor and Walt Whitman. We agree in the main with his estimate of each, and the specimens he gives of their best work are our own favorites.

But the charm of the book is in its delicate, discriminating criticism. One reads a good deal of heavy praise in the review work of the day. Indeed the operator often feels it necessary to emulate the layer of a corner-stone and put the laudation on with a trowel.

It is infinitely preferable to be shown with deft and subtle mastery of the subject why this is pleasing and that powerful; to be pointed to the arts of harmony and melody by which the verse lingers for ever in the memory, a thing of joy and beauty.

We do not mean by this that Mr. Steedman is only a critic of the art of the poet. He is all that, but beyond he does full justice to the inner soul by which the best poetry is inhabited. In the range and breadth of his judgment he has well considered both manner and matter, and neither pardons a dull verse for a good sentiment, or a vicious thought because enshrined in brilliant language.

There are two schools of criticism in this day, diametrically opposite, one of which sees only art, and the other sees only purpose. It is the good fortune of Mr. Steedman (as well as of his readers) that he belongs to neither.

A MISSION FLOWER: An American Novel. By George H. Picard, Author of "A Matter of Taste." [New York: White, Stevens & Allen.] pp. 32.

Mr. Picard has fairly earned his right to be held as the author of "An American Novel." The characters are, to be sure, nearly all of them of foreign nationality. There are a young Englishman and his sister, Roger and Nellie Paradise, who play chief parts; there is Silvia, a Spanish marquis; Father Caron, a French Jesuit; Madame Clement, a French mother-superior; and the scene is laid apparently in New Mexico, about the latest territorial acquisition of the United States. The heroine—the Mission Flower, Dona Solace—is American, so far as being brought up, first on a Mexican rancho and next in a convent school, will let her be. The American personages are, to make up for this, very thoroughly American. The characters are well discriminated; but by far the most perfect study is that of the old French Jesuit, Père Caron. He is evidently drawn from the life, and very well drawn. The story is well told, without any flagging, and the local color is well used. The psychological interest is mainly with the two personages, Dona Solace and Père Caron, who are the centre of interest throughout. Altogether, the novel looks very like being founded on fact, for none of its incidents are in the least unlikely or strained. It is pleasant reading, and, so far as we can see, not objectionable in tone. In fact, it is decidedly above the average of novels, and, in the large sense we have indicated above, American. It has one test of a good novel—it keeps the unity of place very thoroughly, and one may say the unity of time, since there is no break from the beginning to the end.

THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND: An Historical and Speculative Exposition. By the Rev. Joseph Miller, B.D., Curate of Newbold-on-Avon, Rugby. The Ninth Article—"Heresy." [Hansley, England: Albion & Daniel.] pp. 345.

Mr. Miller has brought to bear upon his subject abundant learning. He has discussed quite a number of kindred topics, and in fact whatever bears upon the question of original sin. He does not appear to take a new view of the Ninth Article from that usually held, though it is not always easy to see what his own opinion is, he states so many conflicting views in giving the history of religious thought in the matter. Our impression is that he is what would be considered in England a moderate Evangelical; but we cannot undertake to positively decide from his book what he is. But we can say that the book is well worth reading, is clear, direct, and full of suggestive thought. It would be a good move for some American publisher to take it up. There are many readers outside the Church who have great need to know something about the Thirty-nine Articles, especially so long as they persist in mistaking them for the Creed.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Messrs. Roberts Brothers' NEW BOOKS.

MRS. HERNDON'S INCOME.

A Novel, By HENRY CARROLL, author of "The What-to-Do Club." One volume, 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.50.

This is a story with a purpose—a purpose to do good—and it must take its place beside "Ramona." Mrs. Jackson, who was reading it during her sickness, was so impressed with it that she wrote to the author: "I am so ill to write; but I must thank you for your eloquent plea for the downtrodden. Your story is tremendously strong."

NATURE'S TEACHINGS.

Human Invention Anticipated by Nature, By Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A., author of "Homes Without Hands," "Natural History," etc. With nearly 750 illustrations. 8vo. Cloth. Price, $3.00.

"A glance at almost any page of this work will disclose its object. It is to show the close connection between Nature and human inventions, and that there is scarcely an invention of man that has not its prototype in Nature; and it is worthy of notice that the greatest results have been obtained from means apparently the most insignificant."—Preface.

THE ALCOTT CALENDAR FOR 1886.

Containing a selection for every day in the year, culled from the writings of the author of "Little Women," by F. ALCOTT PARTR ("Demijohn"), mounted on a card illustrated with a portrait of Miss Alcott and a view of her present residence in Concord. Price, $1.00.

A Magnificent Gift Book.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

The complete Bible text beautifully engrossed and engraved, page with a decorative border, the whole illustrated by the most gifted artists with scenes in the Holy Land, and imaginative interpretations of the reading. Says the Art Amateur: "It is not inferior to any American publication we know of similar scope." An instructive historical introduction by Rev. Edward E. Hale adds greatly to its interest and value.

One royal quarto volume, printed on satin-finish paper, and bound in cloth, with elaborated cover design. Price, $7.70; morocco antique or tree calf, $15.00.

FAVORITE POEMS.

BY JEAN INGELWOL.

Containing three of this gifted author's most admired poems:—"The Songs of Seven,"—"The High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire,"—"The Shepherd Boy," with many her shorter pieces, in one royal 8vo volume. TIRYNS:

THE PREHISTORIC PALACE OF THE KINGS OF TIRYNS. THE RESULTS OF THE LATEST EXCAVATIONS.

By HENRY SCHLIEMANN, author of "Mycenæ," "Troy," etc. The Preface by Professor F. Adler, and contributions by Dr. Wilhelm Dörpfeld. With 100 woodcuts, 24 plates in chromolithography, 1 map, and 4 plans. 1 vol., royal octavo, $10.

Published simultaneously in England, France, Germany, and America.

In this work, so long in preparation, and so long for so special interest, Dr. Schliemann has given the most complete and perhaps the most accurate and important result of his great investigations on the site of Argos, the uncovering of a typical ancient citadel, of a complete palace with its and the defensive walls, and a group of buildings, and even drainage system connected with it, in one second epoch; and the magnificent presentation here given by Dr. Schliemann of his discoveries makes this book a worthy record, like his former works, of those splendid "finds."

AFTERNOON SONGS. By JESSIE C. R. DORR.

1 vol., 16mo. $1.50.

The new volume contains Mrs. Dorr's poems of the years since her former collection,—"Pious Annetta." The title emblem is a fancy of the author's that she has afternoon songs of life.

CHILDREN'S STORIES IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

By HENRIETTA CHRISTINE WATSON. Illustrated by J. STREPLER DAVIS. 1 vol., 16mo. $1.50.

The spirit and romance with which the stories, from those of Columbus and Balboa, and Ponce de Leon and De Soto down to those of the old French War and the Revolution, are presented to the fancy of a child, remind one of nothing so beautiful as the treatment of the old myths in the "Wonder Book" and "Tanglewood Tales," there so admirably spiritual, and so admirably arranged illustrations of the stories drawn by Mr. J. Stieple Davis.

STORIES BY AMERICAN AUTHORS.

"Cabinet Edition," 30 vols., beautifully bound, gilt top, in a box, $7.50.

This fine edition has been made necessary by the repeatedly expressed demand for the standard collection of American short stories in a form suitable for preservation on the library shelf or for gifts.

FAITH AND RATIONALISM.

With short supplementary essays on Related Topics. By GEORGE F. FISHER, D. D. 1 vol., 16mo. 70 cents.

A new edition of this valuable book for popular circulation. Prof. Fisher has thoroughly revised his text and added notes and much interesting new matter.

"Wanted: A New Crusade."

A recent article in the "S. S. Times," under this heading urges the need of a new uprising and a vigorous crusade against the great and spreading habit of reading trash, particularly among young people, and asks what can be done to rid the young of this habit of literary delinquency and to remove the temptation from them.

A ANSWER.—We know of no better way than to place in their hands books which set before them a high aim and purpose in life, which inculcate by force of notable example the worth of patient industry, strict adherence to integrity, and the adoption of Christian principles as the elements of success. Among such books are:

- 1700 BOYS WHO BECAME FAMOUS. 75c.
- PRINCES, AUTHORS, AND STATESMEN. 75c.
- BIRCHWOOD. 12mo, 41.25.
- FITCH CLUB. 12mo, 41.25.
- LOYAL TO THE KING. 12mo, 41.50.
- GENERAL GORDON, the Christiana Hero. 12mo, 41.25.
- PULPIT AND EASEL. 12mo, 41.25.
- ROB CLAXTON'S STORY. 12mo, 41.25.
- LITTLE ARTHUR'S ENGLAND. 41.25.
- LITTLE ARTHUR'S FRANCE. 41.25.
- ROLLO BOOKS. 16 vols., $12.00.
- JONAS BOOKS. 6 vols., $5.00.
- LITTY BOOKS. 6 vols., $5.00.
- AGEST STORIES. 4 vols., $4.50.
- JUNG STORIES. 4 vols., $4.50.
- ABBOTT'S AMERICAN HISTORIES. 4 vols., $6.25.

And many other helpful books for young people, a full catalogue of which will be sent on application to the publishers.

DRIVEN BACK TO EDEN. A book for Young People of All Ages. 12mo, cloth, with many illustrations.

"Driven Back to Eden" is one of those idyllic books redolent of the country life and out-door atmosphere which the author knows so well how to make attractive. Mr. Ives describes nature always with a loving hand, and in "Driven Back to Eden" he has succeeded in making a book attractive, not only to young people, but which will be read with interest by those of riper years.—Baltimore Herald.

THE BEST PERIODICALS FOR FAMILY READING.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

Departments by
G. W. Curtis, W. D. Howells, C. D. Warner.
Subscription per Year, $4.00.

The SEVENTH VOLUME commenced with the Number for December, 1885.

It is the purpose of the publishers to make HARPER'S MAGAZINE for the new year of unprecedented interest. On the conclusion of Miss WOODSON'S novel, "East Angels," and Mr. HOWELL'S "Indian Summer," there will be commenced serials from R. D. BLACKMORE and Mrs. D. M. CRAIK. A new editorial department, discussing topics suggested by current literature, will be contributed by W. D. HOWELLS, beginning with the January Number. With three departments, under the charge respectively of GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, W. D. HOWELLS, and CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, the editorial portion of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will claim the attention of every intelligent reader.

Among other attractions for the year may be mentioned a series of papers in the form of a story—depicting characteristic features of American society—written by CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, and illustrated by C. S. KENNEDY; the continuation of the papers on "Great American Industries" and "American Cities;" the continuation and completion of Mr. E. A. ABBEY'S series of illustrations for "She Stoops to Conquer;" "Sketches of the Avon," by ALFRED PARSONS; papers on "The Navies of Europe," by Sir EDWARD REED, illustrated; curious studies of American Colonial History, by Colonel T. W. HIGGINSON; more sketches of "Frontier Military Life," by F. ZOGRAFF, with the author's illustrations; "Southern Sketches," by REBECCA HARDING DAVIS; illustrated sketches of adventure connected with the hunting of "Large Game in America," etc.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

A SIXTEEN-PAGE
ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.
Subscription per Year, $2 00.

The SEVENTH VOLUME commenced with the Number issued November 3, 1885.

The position of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as the best juvenile weekly is firmly established.

It is a miscellany of the choicest reading for boys and girls, and it contains the best literary and artistic work anywhere to be purchased.

Every line is subjected to rigid editorial scrutiny, in order that the paper shall contain nothing harmful, and that it shall be an effective agency for the mental, moral, and physical education of its readers. Its stories have all the dramatic interest that juvenile fiction can possess, without anything pernicious. Its articles on scientific subjects, travel, and the facts of life, are by writers whose names insure accuracy and value. Its historical stories, biographical tales, etc., present attractively the most inspiring incidents in history, and in the early lives of notable men and women; in every number appear stirring poems, amusing riddles, and ingenious puzzles, and occasionally articles on embroidery and other forms of needle work. Papers on athletic sports, games, and pastimes have their place, while fine pictures by the foremost artists and engravers lavishly illustrate its pages. There is nothing cheap about it but its price.

That HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE fulfils the requirements of young readers is proved by its large circulation in this country and in Great Britain, and this circulation is a scarcely less emphatic testimonial to the fact that it has won the approval of parents also. Pastors, teachers, and the press are united on this point with parents and children.

PRESS NOTICES.

It deserves a place in every home blessed with children, whose lives it will make brighter and brighter with its weekly visits.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

This bold venture in the field of juvenile literature has proved a victory. . . . It deserves a welcome as every freemind.—REV. J. H. VICCENT, D.D., in the Sunday-School Journal, N. Y.

A model juvenile. A boy or girl can have no purer and brighter magazine as a weekly quest.—Independent, N. Y.

Its tone, variety, and general excellence of literary workmanship are admirably sustained.—Christian Union, N. Y.

It continues to lead the weekly publications for youth.—The Living Church, Chicago.

A sort of necessity in juvenile life. . . . So Army has the little weekly magazine taken hold upon its readers that one can scarcely conceive of the time when it was not.—N. Y. Evening Post.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

BY MARY D. BRINE.

Dear Lord, true Lord, there is no day
 That should not a "Thanksgiving" hold,
 For mercies, more than I can say,
 Increasing as the years grow old.
 There's not a moment of each day
 That is not laden with thy love,
 Nor e'en a second which is born
 Of bounty from the Hand above.

Do we forget! Dear patient King,
 Whose subjects err from Thy commands,
 Have patience yet a longer while,
 And stoop to reach the eager hands
 Held up to clasp Thine own, when men—
 Grow timid—seek at last a guide,
 As they go stumbling on their way.
 From the right path, so oft aside.

Seed-time and harvest come again,
 And yet again upon the earth.
 Oh, Lord, who died that we might live,
 Let heart of man give glorious birth
 To thoughts of prayer, and praise, and love
 For Thee, Who, come storm or shine,
 Dost ne'er forget the wants of those Whom Thy dear blood made ever Thine.

Gather the harvest of our prayers—
 The harvest of our gratitude—
 For life, and all that makes it sweet,
 For health and strength, for air and food,
 And let the incense of this day—
 Set thus apart for joy and praise—
 Burn in our loving hearts thro' all
 The year's gift-crowned days.

WHAT'S MINE'S MINE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

CHAPTER V.

The Chief.

The Macruadh strode into the dark, and down the village, wasting no time in picking his way—thence into the yet deeper dark of the moorland hills. The rain was beginning to come down in earnest, but he did not heed it; he was thorough-bred, and feared no element. An umbrella was to him a ludicrous thing; how could a little rain—as he would have called it had it come down in torrents—hurt any one!

The Macruadh, as the few who yet held by the sore-frayed, fast vanishing skirt of clanship, called him, was the son of the last minister of the parish—a godly man, who lived that which he could ill explain, and was immeasurably better than those parts of his creed which, from a sense of duty, he pushed to the front. For he held devoutly the root of which he spoke too little, and it supplied much sap to his life and teaching out of the pulpit. He was a genial, friendly, and by nature even merry man, always ready to share what he had, and making no show of having what he had not, either in wisdom, knowledge or earthly goods. His father and brother had been owners of the property and chiefs of the clan, much beloved by the poor of it, and not a little misunderstood by most of the more flourishing. For a great hunger after larger means, the ambition of the mammon-ruled world, had arisen in the land, and with it a rage for emigration. The uncle of the present Macruadh did all he could to keep his people at home, lived on a couple of hundreds a year himself, and let many of his farms to his gentlemen-tackmen, as they were called, at lower rents; but it was unavailing; one after another departed, until his land lay in a measure waste, and grew very poor, mourning far more over his clan and his country than his poverty. In more prosperous times he had scraped together a little money, meaning it, if he could but avoid spending it in his old age, for his brother, who must soon succeed him; for he was himself a bachelor—the result of a romantic attachment and sorrow in his youth. But he had placed it in a bank the managers of which became dishonest, and so he lost it. At length he believed himself compelled, for the good of his people, to part with all but a mere remnant of the property. From the man to whom he sold it, Mr. Peregrine Palmer bought it for twice the money, and had still a good bargain. But the hopes of the laird were disappointed. In the sheep it fed, and the grouse it might be brought to breed, lay all its value in the market, and more and more of the peasantry emigrated, or were driven to other parts of the country. But such ownership of land as causes human life to ebb from it works directly counter to the creative God, and when the stone falls upon them, it will grind them to powder.

The laird retired to the humble cottage of his brother the pastor, just married rather late in life—where every comfort love could give waited for him; but the thought that he could have done better for his people by retaining the land soon wore him out; and having made a certain disposition of the purchase-money, he died.

What remained of the property came to the minister. As for the chieftainship, that had almost died before the chief; but, reviving by union with the reverence felt for the minister, it took thereafter a higher form. When the minister died, the idea of it transmitted to his son was of a peculiarly sacred character; while in the eyes of the people, the authority of the chief and the influence of the minister seemed to meet reborn in Alistair notwithstanding his youth. In himself he was much beloved, and in love the blessed rule, blessed where understood, holds, that to him that hath shall be given, he only who has being fit to receive. The love the people bore to his father, both pastor and chief, crowned head and heart of Alistair. Searc men and women of the poor remnant of the clan did not love young Macruadh.

On his side was true response. With a renewed and renovating conscience, and a vivid sense that all things had to be made new, he possessed an old strong heart, clinging first to his father and mother, and then to the shadow even of any good thing that had come floating down the ages. Call it a dream, a wild ideal, a foolish fancy—call it what you please, he was filled with the notion of doing something in his own person and family, with the remnant of the clan for a nucleus of endeavor, to restore to a vital reality, let it be of smallest extent, the most ancient of governments, that of the patriarch, which all around had rotted into the feudal, in its turn rapidly disintegrating into the mere dust and ashes of the kingdom of the dead, over which mammon reigns supreme. There may have been youthful presumption and some folly in the notion, but it sprang neither from presumption nor folly, but from simple humanity, and his sense of the responsibility he was bound to undertake as the person upon whom had devolved the headship, however shadowy, of a house, ruinous indeed, but not yet razed.

The ruin on the ridge stood the symbol of the family condition. It had, however, been a ruin much longer than anyone alive could remember. Alistair's uncle had lived in a house on the spot where Mr. Peregrine Palmer's now stood; the man who bought it had pulled it down to build that which Mr. Palmer had since enlarged. It was but a humble affair—a great cottage in stone, much in the style of that in which the young chief now lived—only six times the size, with the one feature indispensable to the notion of a chief's residence, a large hall. Some would say it was but a huge kitchen; but it was the sacred place of the house, in which served the angel of hospitality. There was always plenty to eat and drink for any comer, whether he had "claim" or not: the question of claim where was need, was never thought of. When the old house had to make room for the new, the staves of the last of its half-pipes of its claret, one of which used always to stand on tap amidst the peat-smoke, yielded its final ministrations to humanity by serving to cook a few meals for mason and carpenter.

The property of Clauruadh, for it was regarded as clan-property because belonging to the chief, stretched in old time away out of sight in all directions—nobody, in several, could tell exactly how far, for the undrawn boundary lines lay in regions of mist and cloud, in regions stony, rocky, desert, to which a red deer, not to say a stray sheep, rarely ascended. At one time it took in a portion at least of every hill to be seen from the spot where stood the ruin. The chief had now but a small farm, consisting of some fair soil on the slope of a hill; some very good in the valley on both sides of the burn; and a hill-pasture that was not worth measuring in acres, for it abounded in rocks, and was prolific in heather and ling, with patches of coarse grass here and there, and some extent of good high-valley grass for the small black cattle and black-faced sheep in summer. Beyond periodical burnings of the heather, this upfitted portion received no attention save from the mist, the snow, the rain, the sun, and the sweet air. A few grouse and black game bred on it, and many mountain-hares, with martens, wild cats, and other vermin. But so tender of life, was the Macruadh that, though he did not spare these last, he did not like killing even a fox or a hooded crow, and never shot a bird, for sport, or would let another shoot one, though the poorest would now and then beg a bird or two from him, sure of having their request. It seemed to him as if the creatures were almost a part of his clan, and that he had to take care of them too from a greedy world. But as the deer and the birds ranged where they would, it was not much he could do for them—little almost as for those that had gone over the sea, and were lost to their country in Canada.

Regret, and not any murmur, stirred the mind of Alistair Macraadh when he thought of the change that had passed on all things around him. He had been too well taught for grumbling—least of all at what was plainly the will of the Supreme—inasmuch as, however man might be to blame, the thing was there.

Personal regrets he had none beyond those of family feeling and transmitted sentiment. He was able to understand something of the signs of the times, and saw that nothing could bring back the old way—saw that nothing comes back—at least in the same form; saw that there had been much that ought not to come back, and that, if patriarchal ways were ever to return, they must rise out of, and be administered upon loftier principles—must begin afresh, and be wrought out afresh from the bosom of a new Abraham, capable of so bringing up his children that a new development of the one natural system of government should be possible with them. Perhaps even now, in the new country to which so many of his people were gone, some shadowy reappearance of the old fashion might have begun to take shape on a higher level, with loftier aims, and in circumstances holding fewer temptations to the evils of the past!

Alistair could not, at his years, have generated such thoughts but for the wisdom that had gone before him—first the large-minded speculation of his father, who was capable even of discarding his prejudices where he saw they might mislead him; and next, the response of his mother to the same: she was the only one who entirely understood her husband. Isobel Macraadh was a woman of real thinking-power. Her sons being but boys when their father died, she at once took the part of mediator between the mind of the father and that of his sons; besides guiding them on the same principles, she often told them things their father had said, and talked with them of things he used to say. They had not many books, and no new ones were for a long time accessible to them.

One of the chief lessons he had left them wrought well for the casting out of all with which the feudal system had debased the patriarchal; and the poverty shared with the clan had powerfully helped: it was spoken against the growing tainonic regard of human relations—that, the conditions of a bargain fulfilled on both sides, all is fulfilled between the bargaining parties.

“In the possibility of any bargain,” he had said, “are involved eternal conditions: there is relationship—there is brotherhood. Even to give with a denial of claim, to be kind under protest, is an injury, is charity without the love, is salt without the saltiness. If we spent our lives in charity we should never overtake neglected claims—claims neglected from the very beginning of the relations of men. If a man say, ‘I have not been unjust; I owed the man nothing;’ he saides with Death—says with the typical murderer, ‘Am I my brother’s keeper?’ builds the tombs of those his father slew.”

In the bosom of young Alistair Macraadh, the fatherly relation of the strong to the weak survived the disappearance of most of the outward signs of clan-kindred: the chieftainship was sublimed in him. The more the body of outer fact died, the stronger grew in him the spirit of the relation. As some savage element of the race will reappear in an individual of it after ages of civilization, so may old ways of thinking and feeling, modes long gone out of fashion and practice, survive and revive modified by circumstance, in an individual of a new age. Such a one will see the customs of his ancestors glorified in the mists of the past; what is noble in them will appeal to all that is best in his nature, spurring the most generous of his impulses, and stirring up the conscience that would be void of offence. When the operative force of such regards has been fostered by the teaching of a revered parent: when the influences he has left behind are nourished and tended, with thorough belief and devoted care, by her who shared his authority in life, and now bears alone the family sceptre, there can be no bound set to their possible potency in a mind of high spiritual order. The primary impulse became with Alistair a large portion of his religion: he was the shepherd of the much ravaged and dwindled Macraadh-fold; it was his church, in which the love of the neighbor was intensified in the love of the relation and dependent. To aid and guard these his flock, was Alistair’s divine service. It was associated with a great dislike of dogma, originating in the recoil of the truth within him from such that was commonly held and taught for true.

Call the thing enthusiasm or what you will, so you believe it there, and genuine.

It was only toward the poor of a decayed clan he had opportunity of exercising the cherished relation; almost all who were not poor had emigrated before the lands were sold; and indeed it was only the poor who set store by their unity with the old head. Not a few of the clan, removed elsewhere, would have smiled degenerate, and not without scorn in their amusement, at the idea of Alistair’s clinging to any supposed reality in the position he could claim: Among such nevertheless were several who, having made money by trade, would each have been glad enough to keep up old traditions, and ready even to revive older, had the hardship fallen to him. But in the hands of a man whom, from the top of their wealth, they regarded as but a poor farmer, they forgot all about it—along with a few other more important and older-world matters; for where Mammon gets in his foot, he will soon be lord of the house, and turn not merely Rank, his rival demon, out of doors, but God himself. Alistair indeed lived in a dream; he did not know how far the sea of hearts had ebbed, leaving him alone on the mount of his vision; but he dreamed a dream that was worth dreaming; it comforted and help flowed from it to those about him, nor did his own soul fall to drink refreshment also. All dreams are not false; some dreams are truer than the plainest facts. Fact at best is but a garment of truth, which has ten thousand changes of raiment woven in the same loom. Let the dreamer only do the truth of his dream, and one day he will realize all that was worth realizing in it, and a great deal more and better than it contained. Alistair had no far-reaching visions of anything to come out of his; he had, like the true man he was, only the desire to live up to his idea of what the people looked up to in him. The one thing that troubled him was, that his uncle, whom he loved so dearly, should have sold the land.

Doubtless there was pride mingled with his devotion, and pride is an evil thing. Still it was a human and not a devilish pride. I would not be misunderstood as defending pride, or even excusing it in any shape; it is a thing that must be got rid of at all costs; but even for evil we must speak the truth; and the pride of a good man, evil as it is, and in him more evil than in an evil man, yet cannot be in itself such a bad thing as the pride of a bad man. The good man would at once recognize and respect the pride of a bad man. A pride that loves cannot be so bad as a pride that hates. Yet if the good man do not cast out his pride, it will sink him lower than the bad man’s, for it will degenerate into a worse pride than that of any bad man. Each must bring its own divinely-ordained consequence.

There is one other point in the character of the Macraadh which I must mention ere I pass on; in this region, and at this time, it was a great peculiarity, one that yielded satisfaction to few of the clan, and made him even despised in the strath: he hated whiskey, and all the drinking customs associated with it. In this he was not original; he had not come to hate it from noting the degradation and crime that attended it, or that as drunkenness grew, poverty grew, and that men who had used it in moderation took more and more when circumstances were adverse, turning sadness into slavery; he had been brought up to hate it. His father, who, as a clergyman doing his endeavor for the welfare of his flock, found himself greatly thwarted by its deadening influences, rendering men callous not only to the special vice itself, but to worse vices as well, had banished it from his table and his house; while the mother had from their very childhood instilled a loathing of the national weakness and its physical means into the minds of her sons. In her childhood she had seen its evils in her own father; by no means a drunkard, he was the less of a father because he did as others did. Never an evening passed on which he did not drink his stated portion of whiskey-toddy, growing more and more subject to attacks of bad temper, with consequent injustice and unkindness. The recollection may have made her too sweeping in her condemnation of the habit, but I doubt it; and anyhow a habit is not a man, and we need not much condemn that kind of injustice. We need not be tender over a habit which, though not all bad, yet leads to endless results that are all bad. I would follow such to its grave without many tears!

Isobel Macraadh was one of those rare women who preserve in their youth the influence gained in youth; and the thing that lay at the root of the fact was her justice. For though her highland temper would occasionally burst out in hot flame, every one knew that if she were in the wrong, she would see it and say it before any one else would tell her of it. This justice it was, ready against herself as for another, that fixed the influence which her goodness and her teaching of righteousness gained.

Her eldest child, a girl, died in infancy. Alistair and Ian were her whole earthly family and they worshipped her.

CHAPTER VI.

Work and Wage.

Alister strode through the night, revolving no questions hard to solve, though such were not strangers to him. He had not been to a university, like his brother, but he had had a good education beginning—who ever had more than a beginning?—chiefly from his father, who for his time and opportunity was even a learned man—and better, a man who knew what things were worth a man's human while, and what were not; he could and did think about things that a man must think about or perish; and his son Alister had made himself able to think about what he did not know, and by doing the thing he did know. But now, as he walked, fighting with the wind, his bonnet of little shelter pulled down on his forehead, he was thinking mostly of Lachlan his foster-brother, whose devotion had done much to nourish in him the sense that he was the head of the clan.—He had not far to go to reach his home—about a couple of miles.

He had left the village a quarter of the way behind him, when through the darkness he spied something darker yet by the road-side. Going up to it, he found an old woman, half sitting, half standing, with a load of peats in a creel upon her back, unable, apparently, for the moment at least, to proceed. Alister knew at once by her shape and posture who she was.

"Ah, mistress Conal," he said, "I am sorry to see you resting on such a night so near your own door. It means you have filled your creel too full, and tired yourself too much."

"I am not too much tired, Macruadh!" returned the old woman, who was proud and cross-tempered, and had a reputation for witchcraft, which did her neither much good nor much harm.

"Well, whether you are tired or not, I believe I am the stronger of the two!"

"Small doubt of that, Alister!" said mistress Conal with a sigh.

"Then I will take your creel, and you will soon be home. Come along! It is going to be a wild night!"

So saying he took the rope from the neck of the old woman right gently, and threw the creel with a strong swing over his shoulder, dislodging a few of the topmost of the peats which the poor old thing had been a long way to fetch. She heard them fall, and one of them struck her foot. She started up, almost in a rage.

"Sir! sir! my peats!" she cried. "What would you be throwing away the good peats into the dark for, letting that swallow them they should swallow!"

These words, as all that passed between them, were spoken neither in Scotch nor English, but in Gaelic—which, were I able to write it down, most of my readers would no more understand than they would Phœnician; we must therefore content ourselves with what their conversation comes to in English, which, if deficient compared with Gaelic in vowel-sounds, yet serves to say most things capable of being said.

"I am sorry, mistress Conal; but we'll not be losing them," returned the laird gently, and began to feel about the road for the fallen peats.

"How many were there, do you think, of them that fell?" he asked, rising after a vain search.

"How should I be knowing! But I am sure there would be nigh six of them!" answered the woman, in a tone of deep annoyance—nor was it much wonder; they were precious to the cold, feeble age that had gone so far to fetch so few.

The laird again stooped his long back, and searched and searched, feeling on all sides around him. He picked up three. Not another, after searching for several minutes, could he find.

"I'm thinking that must be all of them, but I find only three," he said. "Come, let us go home. You must not make your cough worse for one or two peats, perhaps none."

"Three, Macruadh, three!" insisted the old woman, in wavering voice, broken by coughing; for, having once guessed six, she was not inclined to lower her idea of her goods.

"Well, well, we'll count them when we get home," said Alister, and gave his hand to her to help her up.

She yielded, grumbling, and, bowed still, though relieved from her burden, tottered by his side along the dark, muddy, wind-and-rain-haunted road.

"Did you see my niece to-night at the shop?" she asked; for she was proud of being so nearly related to those who kept the only shop in the hamlet.

"That I did," answered the chief; and a little talk followed about Lachlan in Canada.

No one could have perceived from the way in which the old woman accepted his service, and the tone in which she spoke to him while he bent under her burden, that she no less than loved her chief; but everybody only smiled at mistress Conal's rough speech. That night, ere she went to bed, she prayed for the Macruadh as she never prayed for one of her immediate family. And if there was a good deal of superstition mingled with her prayer, the main thing in it was genuine, that is, the love that prompted it; and if God heard only perfect prayers, how could he be the prayer-hearing God?

Her dwelling stood but a stone's-throw from the road, and presently they turned up to it by a short, steep ascent. It was a poor hut, mostly built of turf; but turf makes waru walls, impervious to the wind, and it was a place of her own!—that is, she had it to herself, a luxury many cannot even imagine, while to others to be able to be alone at will seems one of the original necessities of life. Even the Lord, who probably had a room to Himself in the poor houses He stayed at, could not do without solitude; therefore, not infrequently spent the night in the open air, on the quiet, star-strewn hill; there, ever for Him, it would seem to have been easier to find an entrance into that deeper solitude which, it is true, He did not need in order to find His Father and His God, but which, apparently, He did need in order to come into closest contact with Him who was the one joy of His life, whether His hard life on earth, or His blessed life in heaven.

The Macruadh set down the creel, and taking out peat after peat, piled them up against the wall, where already a good many waited their turn to be laid on the fire; for, as the old woman said, she must carry a few when she could, and get ahead with her store ere the winter came, or she would soon be devoured; there was a death that always prowled about old people, she said, watching for the fire to go out. Many of the Celts are by nature poets, and mistress Conal often spoke in a manner seldom heard from the lips of a lowland woman. The common forms of Gaelic are more poetic than those of most languages, and could have originated only with a poetic people, while mistress Conal was by no means an ordinary type of her people; maybe her ill temper and gruffness, she thought as well as spoke like a poetess—which fact, conjoined with the gift of the second sight, had helped her to the reputation of a witch.

As the chief piled the peats, he counted them. She sat watching him, and then from a stone that made part of a rude rampart to the hearth.

"I told you so, Macruadh!" she said, the moment she saw his hand return empty from the bottom of the creel. "I was positive there should be three more!—but what's on the road is not with the devil."

"I am very sorry!" said the chief, who thought it wiser not to contradict her.

He would have searched his sporan for a coin to make up to her for the supposed loss of her peats; but he knew well enough there was not a coin in it. He bade mistress Conal good-night, shaking hands with her of course, and went, closing the door carefully behind him against a great gust of wind that struggled to enter, threatening to sweep the fire she was now blowing at with her wrinkled, leather-like lips, off the hearth altogether—a thing that had happened before, to the danger of the whole building, itself of the substance burning in the middle of its floor.

Macruadh ran down the last few steep steps of the path, and jumped into the road. Through the darkness came the sound of one springing aside with a great start, and the click of a gun-lock.

"Who goes there?" cried a rather tremulous voice.

"The Macruadh," answered the chief.

The utterance apparently conveyed nothing.

"Do you belong to these parts?" said the voice.

A former Macruadh might have answered, "No; these parts belong to me," Alister curtly replied, "I do."

"Here then, my good fellow! take my game-bag, and carry it as far as the New House—if you know where I mean. I will give you a shilling."

One moment the chief spent in repressing a foolish indignation; the next he spent in reflection.

Had he seen how pale and tired was the youth with the gun, he would have offered to carry his bag for him; to offer and to be asked, however, most people find different; and here the offer of payment added to the difficulty. But the word shilling had raised the vision of the old woman in her lonely cottage, brooding over the loss, real or imaginary mattered nothing, of her three far-borne peats. What a happy night, through all the wind and the rain, would a silver shilling under her chaff pillow give her! The thought for the chief's pride, and warmed his heart. What right had he to deny her such a pleasure! It would cost him nothing! It would even bring him a little amusement! The chief of Clannruadh carrying his game-bag for a Sasunnach fellow to earn a shilling!—the idea had a touch of humorous consolation in it. I will not assert the consolation strong enough to cast quite out a certain feeling of shame that mingled with his amusement—a shame which—it is not odd?—he would not have felt had his sponan been full of sovereigns. But the shame was not altogether a shameful one; a fanciful fear of degrading the chieftainship, and a vague sense of being an imposter, had each a part in it. There could be nothing dishonest, however, in earning a shilling for poor mistress Conal!

"I will carry your bag," he said, "but I must have the shilling first, if you please."

"Oh!" said Valentine Palmer, "You do not trust me! How then am I to trust you?"

"Sir!" said Alister—and, again finding himself on the point of being foolish, laughed.

"I will pay you when the job is done," said Valentine.

"That is quite fair, but it does not suit my purpose," returned Alister.

They were walking along the road side by side, but each could scarcely see anything of the other. The sportsman was searching his pockets to find a shilling. He succeeded, and, groping, put it in Alister's hand, with the words—

"All right! it is only a shilling! There it is! But it is not yours yet: here is the bag!"

Alister took the bag, turned, and ran back. "Hillo!" cried Valentine.

But Alister had disappeared, and as soon as he turned up the soft path to the cottage, his steps became inaudible through the wind.

He opened the door, went in, laid the shilling on the back of the old woman's hand, and without a word hurried out again, and down to the road. The stranger was some distance ahead, tramping wearily on through the darkness, and grumbling at his folly in bribing a fellow with a shilling to carry off his game-bag. Alister overtook him.

"Oh, here you are after all!" exclaimed Valentine. "I thought you had made off with work and wages both! What did you do that for?"

"I wanted to give the shilling to an old woman close by."

"Your mother—eh?"

"No."

"Your grandmother?"

"No."

"Some relation then!" insisted the stranger.

"Doubtless," answered the laird.

They walked on in silence. The youth could hardly keep up with Alister, who thought him illbred, and did not care for his company.

"Why do you walk so fast?" said Valentine.

"Because I want to get home," replied Alister.

"But I paid you to keep me company!"

"You paid me to carry your bag. I will leave it at the New House."

His coolness roused the weary youth.

"You rascal!" he said, "you keep alongside of me, or I'll pepper you."

As he spoke he shifted his gun. But Alister had already, with a few long strides, put a space of utter darkness between them. He had taken the shilling, and must carry the bag, but he did not feel bound to personal attendance. At the same time he could not deny there was reason in the man's unwillingness to trust him. What had he about him to give in pledge? Nothing but his watch, his father's, a gift of the Prince to the head of the family!—he could not profane that by depositing it in pledge for a game bag! He must yield to his employer, moderate his pace, and move side by side with the Saunnach!

Again they walked for some distance in silence. Alister began to discover that his companion was weary, and his good heart spoke.

"Let me carry your gun for you," he said.

"See you damned!" returned Valentine, with an angry laugh: he knew a trick or two of that!

"You fancy your gun protects your bag?"

"I do."

The same instant the gun was drawn, with swift, quiet force through the loop of his arm from behind. Feeling himself defenceless, he sprang at the highlander, but he eluded him, and in a moment was out of his reach, lost in the darkness. He heard the lock of one barrel snap: it was not loaded. The second barrel went off, and he gave a great jump, imagining himself struck. The next instant the gun was below his arm again.

"It will be lighter to carry now!" said the Macruadh; "but if you like I will take it."

"Take it, then. But no! By Jove, I wish there was light enough to see what sort of a rascal you look!"

"You are not very polite?"

"Mind your own politeness. I was never so roughly served in my life!—by a fellow too that had taken my money! If I knew where to find a magistrate in this beauty place—"

"You would tell him that I emptied your gun because you threatened me with it?"

"You were going off with my bag!"

"Because I undertook to carry your bag, was I bound to endure your company?"

"Alister" said a quiet voice out of the darkness.

The highlander started, and in a tone strangely tremulous, yet with a kind of triumph in it, answered, "Ian."

The one word said, he stood still, but as in the act to run, staring into the darkness. The next moment he flung down the game-bag, and two men were in each other's arms.

SPEAKING evil of dignities is a vice ever to be condemned. For all in authority in the Church the greatest amount of respect is due, and we are glad to note that it is generally rendered throughout the Church by those of the Church. Yet her authority is not like that of a court-at-law, and contempt of court with penalties is as foreign to her claims as it is unlikely that she would resort to anything resembling it if she could. Trials are rare, and are not likely to become less so. A bishop is a father. "Hear the Church," yet not in the sense as "Obey this, or that judge." Love of law and veneration for order are the best "rules of court," and the best "trials" those in which there is neither plaintiff nor defendant, and the "forum conscientiae" the real Christian tribunal.

LAST SICKNESS OF BISHOP YOUNG.

I feel sure that the many friends of the late lamented Bishop of Florida, both in this city and elsewhere, will be glad to have some information relating to his sudden death, which occurred at the Clarendon Hotel, in this city, at ten minutes before eight o'clock, yesterday morning, that being the Twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity.

Bishop Young caught a slight cold about a week or ten days ago, which gave him little inconvenience. On Wednesday last he was out and seen in the street by friends. A predisposition to pneumonia, the sequel to recovery from a very severe attack of that disease some years ago, existed in his system, and late in the week symptoms of that malady appeared. On Thursday a physician had been consulted, but on Saturday the bishop was bright and cheerful, and apparently much as usual, ailing rather than ill. On Sunday morning, about one o'clock, a sudden change occurred; he soon became unconscious, and before eight o'clock he had breathed his last.

It was known to very few, if any, of the bishop's friends, that he was ill; to none, that he was seriously ill. My first intimation of it was on Sunday morning, about seven o'clock, less than an hour before he died, and before I reached his bedside he was gone. No one was notified of his sickness, because he had given directions to that effect, and because no one at the hotel had any idea that he was in immediate danger.

Fortunately, an intimate friend of the bishop's, Mr. J. P. Taliaferro, of Florida, was staying at the hotel at the same time; this gentleman was with him at the last, and took charge of all the arrangements to be made here subsequently to the bishop's death.

In the course of the day, dispatches were received from Florida, in reply to those which had been sent by Mr. Taliaferro and myself, directing that the body should be sent to Jacksonville, but leaving it to our discretion to fix the time. It was thereupon arranged that a service should be held in this city on Monday, at which it was expected that the Assistant-bishop, Dr. Satterlee, and others would officiate, before the removal of the body. But this design, to do honor to the departed prelate, and to afford his many friends in New York an opportunity of expressing their sorrow and sympathy, was frustrated, by a second telegram, directing us to send the body away, if possible, that very night. This was done, in compliance with the positive instructions received; and at midnight the remains were on their way south.

In the death of Bishop Young, the Church, the House of Bishops, and his own diocese, have sustained a great loss. In addition to his many unusual gifts and attainments, he was conspicuous for his profound knowledge of liturgical science and his skill in ecclesiastical music. My own acquaintance with him dates from the year 1855, when we came to Trinity Parish together, as junior assistant ministers, and lived under the same roof, thereafter, for several years, at 137 Hudson Street, opposite the then beautiful St. John's Square. My memories of him are most kindly and grateful, and, with others, I mourn his loss, and express deep sympathy with his widow in her sorrow.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING.

We give an illustration of the building for the Young Women's Christian Association which it is proposed to erect at 7 East Fifteenth street in this city. It is planned expressly for the uses of the association, and will cost, with the furnishing, $125,000, one-fourth of which is already provided. The remainder should be easily forthcoming, for the pressing need and utility of such an association in this great city must commend itself to all minds. It is un denominational in character, and the limit of its usefulness is fixed only by its means. There are thousands upon thousands of young women who need the assistance and counsel of the association, and the vast army is ever increasing. Already the disproportion in the male and female population in New York is marked as it is in Massachusetts, and the young women of the country, like their brothers, are still thronging to the city. They are met here by the association, young girls from fourteen to eighteen years of age, they are instructed in those arts best calculated to enable them to care for themselves; employment is found for many; there are free educational classes, a free library, a board directory, an employment office. Last year instruction was given to 683 girls, and nearly as many more were turned away for want of room and means, 17,679 volumes were loaned from the library, 1,225 positions were secured, and $1,805.52 were paid to seamstresses, and this is only part of the year's work, which has been carried on with many hindrances. The class-rooms have been small and ill ventilated, the library and reading room overcrowded, and health and eyesight have been tried. There are no rooms for social converse, where friends can greet friends and speak kindly and cheering words. Better accommodations must be had, and the ladies in charge appeal for the money with which to provide them. How many men there are who could draw a check for the needed amount, to how many portions of it might be a thank-offering for the unspeakable gift of virtuous mothers, sisters, wives, and daughters. Whatever is done to elevate womanhood is done for the cause of humanity itself. The Young Women's Christian Association deserves a Godspeed, and Mr. James Talcott, Treasurer of the Building Fund, 108 Franklin street, should soon announce that it has a full reservoir and a worthy home.

ELTERWATER AND ITS HOME-SPINNING.

BY MARY HARRISON.

Among the great piles of soft green wooded slopes and scarred, gray, rock-crowned summits forming the hills of Westmoreland and Cumberland, within sight of the Pikes of the Langdales, in a little scattered village on the edge of one of the smallest of the many lovely waters there, in a small cottage, dwells an apostle of English home-life, whose work, humble as it is, is grander than her grand surroundings. A little delicate London child, thin and pale as ever London courts contained, whom

There are far too few who even yet believe that to make industrious men, pure wives, and loyal sons and daughters, is a greater work than to make sun-lighted mountain and valley, and that those who share in such home work have more than creative honor and joy; but, believed or unbeliever, it is a fact forever, and once in the world's heart it will set the world right.

Entering Elterwater through a gate from a field-path by a stream one came upon a group of sturdy men quietly resting in the dinner hour, sitting and reclining about on the grass and stones in the shadow of a barn which stood on the patch of common around which the irregular village was built. They were strong of limb, could lift weights, and do a day's work with the best, had frank faces, with the look which all the world knows as the look of men with a mountain home, who love their wives and bring home their wages and carry the little ones "a fairing" from the great Michaelmas fair at the town ten miles away, and as for bestial vice, they have hardly heard even the names of them.

They were workers at the powder factory close by. Their fathers had been that before them, and had rested in the same grateful shadow in the hot noon till life's silver thread had broken; and then they had been followed by their sons up the scarred hill yonder to a grave where the little spire casts its shadow, respectful neighbors bearing their bodies, made light by the long wear of an industrious life, and Elterwater knew them no more.

Their fathers' wives too had been powder-workers. They had gone to the factory most of the years of their life to do the work that women could do there.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING — 7 EAST FIFTEENTH ST. — NEW YORK. — R. H. ROBERTSON ARCHT.

so kindly soul in that big city had sent to grow up for one long month at a cottage high up on the wild hill-side of a lovely valley hard by this village, in her first solemn little walk along the steep road opened her wide eyes first upon the hills, then upon the fleecy sky, then upon the woods and the sunned mists and glittering, glassy waters in the cup of the hills below, and then she turned them full into the face of the big farmer, who gently, pitifully led her, and, clinging closer to his hand, said in awe, bated, almost frightened breath, "Is this heaven?" But, fair as are the strong bright hills, and like as the green-fringed lake lit with the intense fires of a July sun, seen from the heights, is to "the sea before the throne;" a sunny heart, an unpolluted home—that is the best likeness this earth contains of the place where God dwells.

As the works were a comparatively small affair, the women might not have lost much of feminine tenderness and youth and gentleness, which all factories imperil and mostly utterly destroy where women and girls promiscuously mingle with men. Even where woman's cardinal virtues are not jeopardised, her lovely graces are pitifully spoiled by the exchange of a domestic sphere for a public. Down to her very laughter for silver is given brass.

But the lot of the wives is changed.

This is the whole meaning of Elterwater to me. It was because there had been brought about a change in its homes that I was not on the Ulleswater coach but here—and because I want you to rejoice in it and to help on a like change in other places I am going to tell you about it; for when women and maidens go into factories, their most natural instincts are perverted, they take a dislike to home ways of living, they break off all that which makes rooms snug and gives them that delicious feel to man, the feel of home. They acquire a manish independence, and carry in their pockets money that is theirs. They have too many comrades and town ways to find any more their world in a family and their heaven in being the affectionate wife of a contented man. Whatever may be said for the unhappy necessity of woman's labor, with things all wrong as they are, it remains for ever true that woman never does what is really her own special work in the world but for love. When she has once heard the voice of her baby paying her, and felt the hand of its father on her shoulder cheering her and calling her to still more devotion, never again can she turn to the beggary elements of workshops; her wage is human music—that living heart's love her.

God has made it so; that is enough. It is in the nature of things that the daughters of Eve can never come to themselves while mere toilers for bread and butter, as the sons of Adam can. Baby-rearers must for ever differ from mere hard-bosomed, penny-a-day vine-dressers; another life is flowing and pulsing in them. Theirs is like the swallows', whose wings must spread in never-wearying flight for their helpless little one's food; and their reward is, that they can get it.

But all the same, as things are, tens of thousands of women and maidens are compelled to earn their bread, and so must turn their backs on home and go away to mill and factory, and, as a mere low-priced inferior laborer, drive the loom and stitch the coat to furnish Competition (for whose achievements the world was made) with cheap materials, returning at night-fall to houses that are not homes. And all this is working the greatest social mischief.

No man whose dreams of woman's place in the world are kindled at the dear old story of the reason of her creation as given in a too little read book, can ever think of her degradation to a mere cheap laborer without crying about it, with hot stinging tears too. "How long, O Lord, how long!" lying with his face in the very dust.

In her essential nature, woman is just the same now as she was at her creation; she is made to love, nurture, and die. Creative ideas never change. You may try to alter them, but you only pervert them and spoil them utterly. And it is still true that man has need of her if he is to be a man at all, though he can very well do without Competition, and so-called cheap garments.

But to the village—here men's wives and daughters now "lay their hands on the spindle," and bide in their well-kept homes.

"Where does Mrs. Tucker live?" I inquired from one of the group of men resting in the shadow of the barn. And I followed his directions. Mrs. Tucker I had met on the top of the Keswick couch a day or two before and had accepted her invitation to "come and see the spinning industry of her village."

But it was not from Mrs. Tucker, but from a Miss Twells that I was to learn the story of spinning in its new home under the hills. "Miss Twells will tell you all about it," Mr. Tucker said; for the coach had not yet brought Mrs. Tucker back home. "My wife was one of the first to learn; and Miss Twells knows all about it," he continued. And the story was as follows:

One day an English gentleman, residing at Broxbourne, in Herts, went to live at Neaum Craig, a house on the steeps of these hills around. There he found some old women who were too old to go out to work at the work offered to the women of the neighborhood; and were past giving a hand at charring. Some of them were widows, whom nobody claimed. To the new inhabitant of Neaum Craig these people gave trouble, not by any means of their own importunity, but of its owners' Christ-like carriage of their sorrows; in other words because he had some of the heart of the Nazarene, to whom sorrows and needs are dumb prayers. Feeling their unhappy condition, and his mind being set on its removal, it was not long before a life opened to these poor and aged folks in which they were as well fed and contented as were the luckiest old folks the valley ever contained. Aged, and dim of sight as they were, and quite past hard labor, they had the joys of industry brought back to them, and earned their own food. Their new friend did not dole out alms, which to live on is to the upright poor of these northern hills a humiliation and a disgrace fearful as death, which even blindness and decrepitude cannot wholly excuse. To be seventy-four—as one of the workers told me she was—with old eyes, almost sightless, and yet to be able to earn their own living, has made the pillow, when they went to sleep at night, easy to many a wrinkled brow.

"What would my old man have said if he could have seen this!" feebly exclaimed a woman of fourscore in a neighboring village, as she held out in her shaking hands the first reel of her own spun thread, which other eyes saw better than hers, not altogether because hers were old, but because she was crying tears which welled up of gratitude deeper than the deep waters of Windermere.

It was among folks whom the children had known all their lives as withered, and bent, and old, with hair white as the snowy crape caps they still wear for their dead, that the work began; but they were still of the sturdy, thrifty hearts, which from childhood had had the power of hills, and lakes, and skies upon them. So soon as there was a chance of something to do, their hearts were ready. Alas, poor souls! fingers were not as supple as they once had been; but "the outward man" had not quite perished, and with "the inward man" all willing and eager, the way to success was found. And life became young again, because the thread was running through its fingers, and they had the consoling feeling of a woman in them, and time was precious again; for proper labor is our life, and no age is gloomy which can hold the distaff and earn its daily bread.

Perhaps, too, aptitude in them owed something to inherited tendencies, born in them with the blood of others; for, seventy years ago, the spinning-wheel sang with the kettle on the English cottager's hearth. Their old eyes were not quite strangers to the thing they had never seen; the toe touched the treadle with something like recollection, and the heart felt almost familiar longings as the flax ran off to the wheel. Perchance our ancestry have destined us to be again a spinning race. Shut up in our girls may be their slumbering gifts, needing but the soft murmuring of the whirling wheel to awake it to its dainty usefulness again, and restore to English homes some of their quiet, serious simplicities.

And it was the poor, too, who were thus first taught to spin. There may be something in that also, for "the venerable art," as Wordsworth calls it, was "torn from the poor." It was so many years since they had felt the thing; it was a lost friend restored to life again. But this inherited cunning people will not understand who pace the streets, vain of their "individuality," as they call it, and see themselves and others as if they were parched peas, capering till their gas is gone, and then giving place to a new supply, instead of being like wonderful seeds, in which the country's long past life is sleeping, and the forces of what its future may be.

Mr. Fleming's difficulty was not to find willing and capable hands, but to find a spinning-wheel. It chanced that the first was found in the Isle of Man. It entered the village, in the barrow of a laborer, with a hopeful little company composed of old women, very thankful that it had come at last. They eagerly took it in turns to try their hands, looked over each other's shoulders, entered into a lively competition, used up pounds of flax, and made many spools of doubtful sort of thread. They combined the glorious eagerness of children at a new toy with the perseverance of sturdy women; and they bailed their success when it came, fascinated and bewildered with a new delight.

Mr. Fleming was the great teacher, but first he had himself to be taught by an old woman who could remember the bright days of a youth when men's shirts were still homespun. It was she who understood how to use the Isle of Man machine, and to her Mr. Fleming went to school. It is an altogether lovely picture, this English gentleman and barrister learning of a weary cottager, a woman old, ignorant, and poor, that he might, in turn, with his quicker perceptions, teach the better some other poor how to earn their daily bread and tea. And curly-headed little children looked on amazed, and the old women were merry, and Mr. Fleming was glad, and there was the feeling as if the peace of the world had come, as it surely will have come when poor and rich, young and old, of sheer love and good-will, take common interest in each other's simplest affairs.

The practical difficulty in Mr. Fleming's enterprise was not overcome when the right spinning-wheel was found. It was not until, in a cellar in Kendal, after considerable research, an old loom had been found which one day long ago had really woven fabrics to a weaver's hand, that work was fairly started. But, alas for the find! it was a mere dismembered skeleton of a loom, and nobody in the town around could be of the slightest use in putting its old limbs together, nor could anybody be found in all the country-side. Then, strangely enough, Italy came to the aid of Kendal, for happily somebody had a photograph of Giotto's "Weaving," (which is still in the Campanile at Florence,) and, lo! as if that very Kendal loom had been copied from the loom of Florence, part answered to part; and, following the photograph, a loom was at length rigged up for weaving the threads the women already had learned to spin. "After all," one is inclined to say, "it is true, mysteriously true, 'Where there is a will there is a way.'" Now the last great difficulty was removed.

As time went on more wheels were obtained, more hands were taught, and such women as had long quietly disliked leaving their home for the factory became willing scholars at the spinning school. With Mr. Fleming's aid a local carpenter learned the art of spinning-wheel making, and soon from fifteen cottages came faintly to the passer's ear the soft hum, which might be taken for the low murmur of bees at the flower-pots in the windows, and the women within had the good feeling of home-ives and mothers in them, and went no more to the factory.

"Does it pay quite as well as factory work?" I asked of one clean woman standing by her wheel of light-colored wood, who looked a picture of contentment, such as one so seldom sees in a woman who "works out."

"Not quite—that is, in a way, sir. You don't handle just as much wage, but, then, you don't neglect the children, as you must at the Works; and for that, their shoes and clothes will not cost you so much. And I can make up bits of dinners, you see, being at home, that I couldn't if I went there; and there's a great saving in that way. Then your husband has more comfort, like; his bits of things is hot. I should say, in savings and earnings, all together, we are quite as well off in money with the spinning as at the factory."

"Then, as to the comfortableness of your home and your children's character, that can't be put down in money, and that comes first," I continued.

"Yes, the home has yet to be found, sir, that is the better for leaving."

"And as to the boys, and girls, and babies?"

"Well, I think what makes a husband contented is somehow a great lesson for the children. It is not so much what you say to them, as it is how you live before them, that makes the character of children; and you can't live with them either much or well when you're scarcely ever in the house."

"How much can you earn a week?"

"About five or six shillings. But, you see, we take up the spinning and put it down, for we are always here for what happens to be wanted."

"That is not very much," I replied, to draw her out.

"No, but at a pinch I could do more; but we don't need it, and it all goes by, for when my man may be out of work."

"You can keep off the parish by it," I continued.

It seemed never to have entered her mind that there was a parish to keep off. But she said, after a little pause:

"There's no need of the parish where there's industry and a spinning-wheel. My neighbor has older children, and two of her girls work it. She puts by twelve or fourteen shillings a week. And there is them as does more."

I gazed upon this clean cottager and her nimble wheel in its stillness, with a great longing and hope. What mischiefs and miseries—personal, domestic, and social—might be destroyed utterly by all that is involved in a new age of the home-spin! When a country comes to think more of its people and less of fighting-ships, and soldiers, and solid gold calves, God will surely lead it into his promised land.

I left this cottager's door with great reverence, and descended the road to the headquarters of the many spinners (how many of them there are I do not know), the rustic cottage of Miss Twells. It is accurately given in the drawing of Mr. Arthur Tucker, which appears on a preceding page. In the garden to the right, I found the lady herself, busy bleaching a piece of sheeting linen which lay opened out and stretched full length on the grass, by watering it with some preparation from an ordinary red-painted watering-can.

In this cottage is stored the bale of flax from Belfast, which Miss Twells divides into hanks, weighs out to the women who fetch it home to spin. Here, too, is the store of spun flax, returned by the women on the bobbins on which it is wound; and the warping-room where the threads on the bobbins are prepared by Miss Twells herself for their place in the weaver's loom. And above all, hard by the house, is the weaver's shed, which it is worth going a hundred miles to see for the sake of the very old man, old John Thirsby, the weaver, who must have been at weaving when George III. was King, and who has brought with him through his long service, the dearest look of kindness, purity, and industry which makes his withered face beautiful. "With long life," very long, he is "satisfied." As one who has eaten a hearty meal, he is "full of days." And if his worn frame would last, he would live another eighty years and be glad. He looks at his loom, as he sits on the seat that rests him, as affectionately as an artist looks at his canvas, and throws his shuttle as if it were a pencil. The sight of his shrivelled face behind those heavy brass spectacles, quietly, seriously intent on his work, is marvellous. The click of that old man's shuttle will be one of the sacred things I shall remember till death.

It is all a very beautifully humble affair this Elberwater head-quarters of its spinning industry. Everything in it is clean and suitable to its use, and it stands in its own little ground, with a small plot of grass and a border round it that yields a few sweet herbs and flowers, and a little rhusbar, and it is dedicated to the soldier saint, St. Martin. And Miss Twells, the manager (if what is now a mere hireling's name is the right name to give her), has but one pay for her labor, viz., that it is welcome and precious to her. She manages everything—orders the flax from Ireland, stores and unpacks it, gives out the raw material for spinning, receives the spun thread, pays the spinners, warps the threads, sees to the loom, pays the weaver, gives out pieces of the woven fabric to embroiderers, sends off parcels to Messrs. Liberty & Co. of Regent Street, and, besides this, conducts all sorts of correspondence with private purchasers, and takes trouble, general and particular, about all the workers and their family affairs.

I like well that the loom of such a woman—cottage, warehouse, and factory, as it is—should be called by the same name and in the same fashion as a church. It is right and beautiful that it is so; but, with all respect to the good patron saint whose name it bears, would it not have been better to have dedicated it to Him who said, "Little children, love one another?" St. Martin was very good—he clothed the poor; but St. John was better, for he inspired the neighborly good-will of which it was done; and this is as charming a little home of neighborly love and good-will as this dear land of ours contains.

There has sprung up a terrible god in England, of which the poor simple saints (and, as the spirit of our age would call such utterly wholly unselfish people, simpletons) knew nothing, Commerce; which has a new chief creative end of man, which is to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest; and a new decalogue, which has this: "Thou shalt not be neighborly in matters of trade," as its first and greatest commandment.

What the disciples of "political economy," as it is called, will say of Miss Twells the stupidest person will at once understand.

All its theories read well, and are mechanically perfect, they seem unimpeachable wisdom, but what of that? They are "the wisdom of man," having no neighborliness in them, and therefore no Christ and no religion in them; they offend, they hurt, they destroy, as a machine will hurt and destroy what comes in its way. Looked at from the greatest of all commandments, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," they cannot be endured. Such a heart is too divine for them, and condemns. And here let me say that maxims condemned by a neighborly heart are sure, sooner or later to prove to have been mortal foolishness, and to bring us face to face troubles we cannot but deplore, and which cannot be removed without retracing our steps. To believe that and to act upon it is faith in God, to deride is unbelief.

How can a man who regards all his business as business which God, the God and Father of us all, has given him to do, regard life as a chance to earn for himself a carriage if he can, and a mansion and a fortune for himself and his family out of his neighbors? His God loves them all. And to be His child he must be led by His, God's, spirit, and love them too. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

It is such "labor" that is sweet, for it was in such a fashion Jesus toiled when He made His neighbors' clothes-bboxes, and yokes for ploughing oxen, at His bench in Galilee. Practical Divines thought it the life of a fool, doubtless; and the ceremonial priests made no count of it. But thus was He the well-beloved and well-pleasing child of the Father in Heaven.

"Money," said a distinguished preacher of London some time ago—"money, though it may be distributed on the principles of Christianity, must be made on the principles of political economy." With such a creed, the vision of the time when men shall fulfil "the law of Christ" must die, and the lovely and beloved days when "they shall not hurt nor destroy," which the eye of God and of his children always sees, become an impossibility. So we had better cease to talk about them. There is somewhere a picture of a figure of Pleasure, with troops of men mocked and maddened, hurrying to its lead towards an invisible perdition. Some seem weary, very weary, and have fallen down, and the rest are trampling them under foot, the most victorious and successful in the pursuing crowd being clearly destined to reach destruction first. Our new state axiom of commerce is that like figure, and to it many, it is to be feared, are yielding up their souls, madly pursuing, all the way overbearing and trampling down the weary ones, until they too find themselves deceived in the end.

Miss Twells is one of the many engaged in commerce who have not joined that running crowd. She is a servant of God in commerce as elsewhere, and in the name of her God, unconsciously despises and rejects all axioms of commercial unneighborliness as the more upstart wisdom of a day.

Mr. Fleming's plan, too, is the same. He will give the lessons, lead the wheel, invest his own capital in paying for the flax and the thread and the loom, and reeks not five per cent., but only the blessing of his neighbors. Mr. Fleming calls himself a companion of the beautiful Guild of St. George. He is a companion of a much older guild, the guild of a name too great to permit the addition of St.; he is a companion of the Guild of "the Father and of His Son Jesus Christ."

And Miss Twells and her simple workers are blessed together, as blessed, at least, as a mother who lives for the children that gather round her knee can ever be; though for all that, Miss Twells is young, and some of her constituents have fourscore years on their bowed heads.

The growth of the home-spinning industry from the work of the sped few into the staple female occupation of the neighborhood cannot but be delightful to its introducer, for he is, I understand, a disciple of Mr. Ruskin, and no achievement could ever be deemed half so honorable to that Christian prophet of England's more homely days as the restoration of strong and beautiful simplicities to the mothers and wives of laboring people. It is a great advance to have exchanged the factory for a distaff, and to have restored spinning to be a woman's work.

One cannot help wondering to what extent this industry might raise multitudes of partly occupied women, say of the class of seaside lodging-house keepers, for instance, who live on the verge of starvation. There are tens of thousands of such; they do not actually starve; they are strong of constitution and do not die; but that is all; they do not live. And the tens of thousands of women, young and old, who depend on the fitful work of factories and workrooms at shops, from which full half their time they return empty-handed. For weeks, at times months, one fate awaits their applications—failure. They return exhausted, body and mind, to sit by an empty cupboard. They could fill it if they could find anything to do, but they cannot, and their willingness serves them nothing. The hunger gnaws, and the public whispers "workhouse." But lean as they are, they are proud. Yet every week they are getting more and more into arrears for the rent of the little room they live in. It is at the top of a lofty house full of families in like distress. In times of work even they are poor; they earn little more than enough for scanty living, and clearing off the score with the shopkeeper and rent-collector.

What, one wonders, would be the result if those transparent hands could be taught to spin the thread, always at hand like a true friend? Such people, sitting by their whirling wheel, turning their spare hours, might no longer suffer the hunger, which is none the less real hunger because they do not complain, will not even own.

Let factory cloths produced by iron hands and hearts of steam still fill the marts of commerce; the world is large, and steam and cast iron have their work; but God speed the return of English mothers and maidens to their homes, and direct them into some way of being womanly centres of little circles of boys and girls. Thus and thus only can come to our people the feel out of which they can rebuild the idea of God, and there will be but one step between an English home and heaven.—Sunday Magazine.

VALUE OF PARISH MISSIONS.

ADDRESS OF THE BISHOP OF LONG ISLAND AT THE CLOSE OF THE MISSION IN ST. LUKE'S CHURCH, BROOKLYN, NOVEMBER 13, 1885.

During the past two weeks you have enjoyed a great and unusual privilege, and, I trust, not without a correspondingly great and unusual benefit. To the regular ministrations of the Church have been added others of a special character. Whatever is continuous, settled, permanent, normal in the former has not been obscured or disparaged, far less displaced by the latter. The Church, which is one and the same in its essentials, through all time has been speaking to you, though in unwonted tones and by extraordinary methods. Through it all it has spoken by the lips of its own valdly-commissioned Ministry; washed and fed you after a spiritual manner by Sacraments instituted by its own eternal Head and ordained by Him to convey the same unchanging grace; drawn from the Holy Scriptures—the one immutable and inspired record of the Word of Life—the one perpetual charter of its own authority and work among men; and used devotions and prayers which, however free and fervid, have been pitched on the key-note and conformed in spirit to its own majestic and hallowed liturgy. In substance, nothing more has been done than to evoke, on the one side, the fire and energy and half-hidden truth always more or less latent in all parts and forms of the Church's divine equipment for the quickening and edifying of souls in the knowledge and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; and, on the other side, to break down and sweep away the barriers in individual hearts erected by worldliness and sin, which resist the incoming of what the Bride of Christ has to offer us. It were well if both could be done by stated and ordinary means; but alas, experience shows they cannot. Our fallen and wayward nature must be dealt with in all its moods—in all its liabilities. The Church must be as wide and flexible in its methods as the nature which it would lead to Christ. Sin creates emergencies; Satan plies us with extraordinary temptations; the world and the flesh press upon us in strange and unlooked for ways; the divine life within us passes, at times, under shadows, way out into a darkness that drops upon it we scarce know how or whence; the chariot wheels of the Spirit that drove smoothly enough beside the water courses of salvation, now and then refuse to move along the stony road of hearts alienated from God or stuck fast in the deep mire of indifference or ungodliness. At such times what shall we do? Shall we fold our hands and cry out that evil has got the start of us, and we cannot overtake or check it? Shall we admit that the militant host of God's elect is outflanked—that the Church—the one witness through the ages of the power of a supernatural redemption—the one pillar, and ground of the truth which alone can make us free—and in our freedom alive once more into God, shall we admit that it is without discretion or resource to cope with such emergencies. God forbid. The armory of heaven is not empty. The needed weapons are always there, always waiting upon the courage and valor of Christ's true soldiers and servants. Never was there a war yet that strained a nation's life that had not its campaigns, its strategies, its risks, its perils, its victories outside and even contrary to accepted, ordinary rules of fighting. Shall it be said that the mightiest, most desperate and prolonged of all conflicts—that of the incarnate, crucified Son of God with a world dead in trespasses and sins—that in which we enlisted when we took the sign of the cross in baptism—and some of us took again in a certain special and awful sense when we were set apart to the Ministry of reconciliation—shall it be said that this in which all other wars are swallowed up, and on which hangs the destiny not merely of individual souls, but of the universe itself, is the one exception that allows no fighting that is not squared to the line and plummet of custom, of fixed rules, of unvarying traditions? No, let us see, once for all, that because this Church is what it is, and has what it has, there is no ground to fear the fullest play and counterplay of its centrifugal and centripetal forces. The centre is always sure, we always know where that is, so long as we know where Christ is, and so long as our grasp is fixed upon the order, the sacraments, the discipline, the worship which He instituted, and with these upon the fundamental aims and processes of the spiritual life of which He is the one everlasting source. Tied to this burning, immovable centre, standing behind these sure safeguards planted around them, we need not fear the tangent movements, the extraordinary instrumentalities for the conversion or quickening of souls however they seem to sweep off in abnormal circuits through the desert wastes of an evil world.

The work of which you have been witnesses and sharers of late has been under the leadership of brethren from across the sea, born and bred in the old Mother Church, whose name and traditions, whose labors and successes in all parts of the world are precious to us and form part of our common inheritance. They have come to us, not for honor or reward, not for personal fame or profit, not for curiosity or private pleasure, but because of the never-dying impulse that has to every age carried heroic, gifted, and consecrated men to the ends of the earth to testify to every one, night and day and from house to house, with tears, and strong, crying repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. Gratefully, cordially do I salute them and their labors as the living fruit of that hallowed impulse. I greet them as specially equipped angels of the ever old and the ever new message to men of eternal life purchased by the precious blood of the Lamb of God. I would honor the purity and recognize the usefulness of their motive, even though I failed to see in all the details of their work the safety and wisdom of their methods.

Their coming and their labors are alike timely. They know little what they say who affirm that there was neither room nor occasion for what they have done. I believe that the life without the Church and the life within the Church give abundant evidence of at once the need and value of their mission. Not needed? Think a moment. You have had here a faithful and earnest pulpit, but it has felt at times that it was engaged in an unequal struggle. It has longed for help to stem the tide—for aiding hands to reach down into the encompassing darkness after souls drifting on to death. It has searched these far-reaching spaces around it for voices to re-echo in louder, more piercing tones the message it uttered. These brethren have answered that yearning, responded to that cry. They have brought to bear their uplifting arms. They have kindled the flame that burns in this pulpit to an intenser heat, and they have done it with the old fire that always lives in the Church's heart, though we see it not.

And then, is it not the common experience that our very familiarity with sacred things gradually eats away their sacredness—that our daily contact with God's best gifts—with the forms, conditions, principles of a divine salvation dulls our sense of their divinity, and of the soul's need of what Christ came to do? Is it not true that we steadily gravitate toward routine in our religion, and from this into cold, hard, loveless, faithless living? Is it not true that because they are so near, so much with us, font and pulpit and altar lose their hold upon us, and the latter, especially, though ensanguined with a Saviour's blood, ceases to speak movingly to us of the cross?

And then, how what is called the spirit of the age—the common mould and movement of this generation—its dominant aims, its prevailing tempers and modes of life—its materialistic way of looking at the realities of being and destiny, of life and death, of sin and holiness, of probation, responsibility, eternal judgment—its self-indulgence, man-morn worship, and passionate greed of pleasures that make up the life of the flesh that withers with the grass and wanes with the sun, alas! how all these have smothered, depressed, distorted, deadened our Christian conscience, and wailed up the path that leads home to heaven and to God! Ah! I were five score John the Baptists, and as many Pauls sent among us crying in the highways and byways and working by methods which, because of their strange zeal and courage were deemed by slumbering thousands irregular, spasmodic, extraordinary—they would not be too great a company to arouse the indifferent, the doubting, the sleeping masses around us. Historically speaking, what you have witnessed is not in substance, and scarcely in form, really new. Rather is it as old as God's covenants and dispensations for reclaiming man to Himself. Go read the ancient prophets of Israel, whose message ran like a track of fire through the homes and market-places and shrines and hearts of God's people when smitten with strange idols or sunk in ignorance and sin. Go read the records of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic ages of the Church: turn the leaves that tell you of Chrysostom, and Boniface, and St. Anthony of Padua, of the Bernards and Wickliffes and Luthers, the Ridley's and Latimers of other days. Recall the labors, the missions of the first and second generations of preaching friars, who travelled from hamlet to hamlet, from city to city, from country to country, barefooted, half clothed, unfed, unpaid, in outward guise beggars and outcasts, but with hearts and tongues on fire with the message of the Cross to a spiritually dead, a morally and intellectually ignorant age. Gather up in memory what that movement did in England, and in this country, which began with the Wesleys in the last century, and rolled up its mighty army of itinerating evangelists, for which the cold, regular, respectable religion of the Mother Church could find no room, and which finally, in an evil hour, parted with its heritage of apostolic order, largely because of the unwisdom of its duly ordained guardians.

It were easy to show that our very manual of worship, the Book of Common Prayer, with all its majesty of tone, and reverence for order, and fixedness of arrangement, abundantly provides for seasons and methods of special work for souls. The fact is, and let us all understand it, the Church is seeking to recover and bring to the front more and more gifts and powers which have gone to rust for lack of using. She is rounding out, more and more, her own consciousness and, with that, her modes of worship, her styles of preaching, her methods of practical activity, so as to bring them all up to the level of her always Catholic heritages. She is for all men, and to all she must speak. She is for the ages, and to each she must present Christ as the fulness of Him who filleth all in all.

DREAMLAND.

BY R. W.

The grindstone of that marvellous mill, the mind, is always revolving—night and day it never tires, the unscen power that turns it is inexhaustible, we cannot stop it, it waits for no command of ours, and pays no heed to our wishes. But we may choose the grit, we may feed the mill with grain or sand or chaff. It might startle some to know how much of the unflagging energy of this mill is in their case wasted. How many bootless turns it takes in unproductive labor. In other words, how many of the subjects of their thoughts are barren as chaff, things that never were and never will be, the prolific but good-for-nothing growth of imagination. They little dream how many years are spent in threshing out and grinding the utterly unreal. They little dream it, for imagination has the powers of dressing up unrealities in the sober garb of matter-of-fact. It gives the ring of genuineness to the basest coin. It pains off mere bubbles as solid and substantial. This would be deplorable enough if imagination exercised its transforming powers only in temporal matters, but it is appalling when we find its sway extends to spiritual. There can be little doubt that a vast host of church-going folk are living in a perfect "fool's Paradise" as regards their spiritual state. Their faith is as unreal as their works, and their hopes as unsubstantial as their zeal, and more could not be said. Yet a willing imagination stimulated by the arch-deceiver gives body to these treacherous shadows; they really believe, they would claim it stoutly in the face of death, that they have true faith and well-grounded hope.

They are the spiritual counterparts of the soldier whose dream is told by the poet Campbell. After a long day's march he and his comrades sink down wearily upon the open field—he falls asleep, and now his imagination begins to play him pranks; he is no longer lying on the frozen ground, but rambling in the sunny lanes and through the meadows of his native place—he bonnets the old familiar stiles, and crosses the stream by the well-known stepping stones, and soon his home peeps out from between the trees and hedge-rows, and his little ones fly to meet him, his wife sobs aloud in her fulness of heart, and with a thousand kisses he swears never to leave them again, but a bugle call brings him rudely back from dreams to fact, and with stiff and cold limbs he buckles on his arms to meet the advancing enemy.

There are hundreds whose imagined spiritual state is as far remote from fact as this soldier's dream was. They are fondly dreaming of a heavenly land where they will meet again "friends gone before" and have done with separation forever, and so they will dream until the Archangel's trump arouse them from their mocking slumbers and reveals stern and hopeless realities.

LULLABY.

BY MISS KATHARINE INGHAM.

Written for the children in the Ladies' Shelter, of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York.

Ain—"Adele Mdeles

Sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near,
With Him for a watcher thou needest not fear:
The tenderest babe in His love hath a part;
He keepeth the weakest in the nearest His heart.
His arm doth uphold them,
His love doth enfold them;
Then sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near.

Sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near;
No father or mother can hold thee so dear.
Since for Him the innocents suffered and died,
He draweth young children all close to His side.
His arm doth uphold them,
His love doth enfold them;
Then sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near.

Sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near,
And sweet are His words as they fall on the ear;
"Forbidden not the children to come unto me,
For only the child-like my kingdom shall see.
My arm shall uphold them,
My love shall enfold them;"
Then sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near.

Sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near;
Oh! serve Him for ever, my baby so dear.
Keep always as guileless as now is thy heart.
If thou from this Saviour wouldst never depart.
His arm shall uphold thee,
His love shall enfold thee;
Then sleep, baby, sleep, for thy Saviour is near.

ROXIE'S THANKSGIVING.

BY M. E. K.

"Just a week to Thanksgiving Day! I can hardly wait for it to come. I am going to have such a good time," exclaimed one of a group of girls who stood in the entry of the school-house, buttoning their cloaks and tying their hoods securely down over their ears before they ventured out into the keen frosty air.

"And so am I!" chimed in another; and in a moment all the girls had begun to chatter away at once like a flock of magpies, each telling of the good times they expected to have on the fast approaching holiday.

Soon they started down the street in groups of twos and threes, with their arms about each others' waists in school-girl fashion, still talking eagerly of their expected pleasures.

One girl who had lingered behind the others, watched them from the window as they went down the street, half wistfully and half sadly.

"Everybody else has good times," she murmured to herself. "It's dreadful to be poor, and hear other people talking about things one can never have oneself. I don't suppose I shall ever have a party, or go to one either. If I get enough to eat I think I am pretty well off."

A frown of discontent settled on the face that was generally so bright, as she began her task of sweeping the school-room and putting it in order, and when her work was finished, she walked homeward with such a slow, lagging step, that her mother watching for her from the window thought that she must be sick.

"What's the matter Roxie?" she asked, as the door opened, and Roxie entered the room. "Don't you feel well?"

"Oh, I'm well, but I'm just cross and discontented," was the answer, as she hung up her school bag, took off her hat and shawl, and sat down in her favorite position at her mother's feet. "Do put that tiresome sewing anything. Thanksgiving don't mean anything to us, for we haven't anything to be thankful for. We are as poor as can be, and you have to sew all the time to get us enough to eat, and I have to do all the work at the school-room to pay for my lessons, and—"

Roxie had not exhausted her string of complaints, but her mother's hand gently rested upon her lips.

"Hush dear, you are forgetting how many things we have to be thankful for," she said. "I know there are a great many things that are hard for us, but think how many blessings we have." "I don't know of any," answered Roxie. "It is a great thing that we are both well, and that we did not have to be separated when your dear father died, and don't you remember how thankful we both were when Miss Brooks promised to educate you for a teacher in return for the little things you could do to help her about the school-room. We both knew that it would not always be pleasant for you to do those things, but—"

"I am really ashamed of my grumbling already, mother dear," interrupted Roxie. "But I did wish so much that we could look forward to having a nice Thanksgiving dinner, and that you needn't sew so hardly all the time. It's no use to fret about it, though. Is the work ready for me to take down to Mrs. Graham's, mother?"

"Yes, it is all wrapped up," answered her mother. "But you are too tired to go just now Roxie. Don't you want to wait until after supper?"

"I am not very tired, mother, and I think I would rather take it now," answered Roxie, and in a few moments she was on her way.

ing away mother, dear, and rest for a few moments. You do look so tired."

"I am tired, but it won't do to stop sewing as long as I can see. I can listen just as well, so tell me what the trouble is."

"The girls were all talking about Thanksgiving after school," answered Roxie, "and they were telling each other what good times they expected to have, and the parties they were going to give, and it did seem so hard that we have to be poor and never have hard all the time. It's no use to fret about it, though. Is the work ready for me to take down to Mrs. Graham's, mother?"

"Yes, it is all wrapped up," answered her mother. "But you are too tired to go just now Roxie. Don't you want to wait until after supper?"

"I am not very tired, mother, and I think I would rather take it now," answered Roxie, and in a few moments she was on her way.

Her sad thoughts had not altogether vanished, and they returned to her as one of her schoolmates drove past her in the pretty little pony carriage that had been her last birthday gift.

Presently the doctor's carriage came along, and the doctor nodded pleasantly to Roxie as he passed. He drew his handkerchief out, and as he did so, Roxie saw something fall to the ground. When she came up to the place where the object was lying, she saw that it was the doctor's purse that he had drawn out of his pocket with his handkerchief by mistake.

Roxie opened it, and her heart beat fast as she saw all the money in it. It was not so very much, but it looked like a fortune to the child as she stood there and thought of all the comforts it would buy.

Roxie was honest, and her first impulse was to run after the doctor and restore his property to him, but a sudden temptation seized her.

The doctor was rich. He could easily spare this money, and it would get Roxie and her mother not only a Thanksgiving dinner but many a meal besides, and no one need know that she found the purse. It was very unlikely that he would ever have found his purse again even if she had not picked it up, for a great many people travelled over that road, and somebody else would probably have kept it if she had not.

It was stealing, she knew that very well, and she could not argue to herself that it would be right for her to keep the purse which had thus come into her possession, but she tried to silence the voice of conscience.

She did want to keep it so much, it seemed as if she couldn't possibly give up so much money when her mother needed it so.

She took the bundle of work to Mrs. Graham's and received the small sum due for it, but the purse in her pocket seemed to be weighing her down like a leaden weight, and not even the thought that she had so much money in her possession lightened her spirits.

She walked past the butcher's and saw the fat turkeys hanging in a row; she saw the tempting display in the markets and it seemed impossible to give up all hope of having a share in their holiday rejoicings.

But she was a thief as long as that purse remained in her possession, and that thought poisoned all the happiness she might have felt if the money had been honestly her own.

"I wish I had never found it," she said to herself impatiently, but that did not help matters any now.

She passed the road which turned off towards the doctor's on her way home, and she hesitated at the cross-roads for some minutes, then, with a little prayer for help, she came to a sudden resolution and walked down the road that led to the doctor's.

The doctor had not yet reached home, but his mother insisted on Roxie coming in to sit by the fire and get warm, and she was so kind and motherly that Roxie told her the whole story, how strongly she had been tempted to keep the purse, and how, for a time, she had yielded to temptation.

When she had confessed the whole truth she felt far happier than she had at any time since she found the purse, and she was very glad to leave it with the doctor's mother to restore to its owner.

The old lady urged her to stay to tea, but Roxie knew that her mother would be wondering already at her long delay, so she declined the kind invitation.

"Then you must let me give you a little pail of broth to take home with you," said the doctor's mother. "My son is particularly fond of it, and he thinks nobody else can make it like me, so I hope you will find it good, too."

Roxie thanked her warmly and started home, walking as fast as she could with her steaming burden. She had not very far to go, so she was soon in sight of home.

Her mother stood in the doorway, watching for her, and Roxie waved her hand to her as she came from behind the trees, that she might know all was well.

As they sat down to supper to enjoy the good broth that the doctor's mother had sent them, Roxie told her mother of all that had taken place since she had left home, how she had found and restored the purse after almost deciding to keep it.

Though Roxie did not wish that she had kept the money, she could not help wishing many a time during the next week, that she had come into its possession honestly, for there were so many things that she wanted to get, so many holiday dainties that she would have liked to carry home to her patient, hard working mother.

Thanksgiving Eve came and Roxie and her mother sat by the table, the former sewing, while the little girl studied her lessons, when they heard a tap at the door.

"I have some things out here in a wagon that I was to leave at Mrs. Hyatt's. Is this the right place?" asked a man. Scarcely waiting for an answer he proceeded to unload his wagon, and Roxie and her mother looked on in wondering astonishment.

Could it be possible that all these good things could be intended for them?

A big turkey was in one basket, surrounded by various parcels which looked delightfully suggestive of good things.

There was a barrel of flour, a ham, a long string of sausages, but I cannot tell you all the other things, you must imagine them for yourselves.

The man handed Roxie's mother a note as he left after depositing the last of his many bundles on the floor, for the table and chairs were full.

"A happy Thanksgiving to Mrs. Hyatt from some old friends," was all that was contained in the note, but Roxie was not far wrong when she guessed that the kindly doctor had something to do with this surprise.

"We shall have a lovely Thanksgiving now after all!" exclaimed Roxie, joyously, as she began to investigate the parcels.

"We'll have good dinners now for many a day, won't we, mother?" she exclaimed suddenly, after a few moments of happy silence. "I am so glad I didn't keep that money. I can't bear to remember that I even wanted to. All these things wouldn't have made me a bit happy if I had stolen them, for it would have been stealing to keep the purse just as much as if I had taken it out of the doctor's pocket."

So Roxie and her mother had a happy Thanksgiving after all, notwithstanding Roxie's fears that the day would bring them nothing to be thankful for; and this kindness was not the only one they received from the good doctor, who had become really interested in the child who had been honest enough to return the money she might have so easily kept, and which she had confessed had been a sore temptation to her in her poverty.

CARDS, ETC.

In selecting a Prayer Book either for use or a present, care should be taken not only to secure attractive binding, but attention should be paid to the type and the paper used. There is a great difference in the several editions published. The "OXFORD" editions are printed on an opaque paper made in their own paper mills from pure linen, and the plates from which the books are printed are kept in perfect repair, thus doing away with such defects as broken letters or battered lines. Ask your bookseller to show you the "OXFORD" edition, and compare it yourself with any other he may have.

Littell's Living Age.

IN 1886, THE LIVING AGE published more than 400,000 words of commendation and success.

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE. It gives fifty-two numbers of sixty-four pages each, or more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double-column octavo pages of reading-matter yearly. If present literature is to be considered in its great amount of matter, nothing being to it as weekly issues, and with correspondence nowhere else serialised.

The best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Serial and Short Story Sketches of Travel and Discovery, Poetry, Science, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, from the entire body of Foreign Periodical Literature, and from the pens of the FOREMOST LIVING WRITERS.

The ablest and most cultivated intellects, in every department of Literature, Science, Politics, and Art, find expression in the Periodical Literature of Europe, and especially in Great Britain.

The Living Age, forming four large volumes a year, furnishes from the great and generally inaccessible mass of this literature, the only compilation that will within the reach of all, be satisfactory in the COMPLETENESS with which it covers its field, and of immediate interest, or of solid, permanent value.

It is therefore indispensable to every one who wishes to keep pace with the intellectual and moral progress of the time, or to cultivate in himself or his family general intelligence and literary taste.

"Hardly elsewhere in the English language, and certainly in no other written speech, are such treasures of literature to be found as in THE LIVING AGE." - New-York Examiner.

"Nearly the whole world of authors and writers appear in it in their most interesting, and most varied aspect of the current thought of the age." - Boston Journal.

"It is not too much to say that with it one commands the whole field of current literary activity; and it has never been so helpful, so comprehensive, so diversified in interest as it is to-day." - Evening Post/Review.

"It has as good as for many years held the first place of all our serial publications. There is nothing noteworthy in science, in history, biography, philosophy, or religion, that cannot be found in it. It contains nearly all the good literature of the time." - The Churchman, New York.

"It may be truthfully and cordially said that it never offers a dry or valueless article." - New-York Tribune.

"It enables its readers to keep fully abreast of the best thought and literature of civilization." - Christian Advocate, Philadelphia.

"No person who desires to keep pace with the development of modern thought can afford to dispense with it." - American Christian Review, Cincinnati.

"A highly-facile, accurate, criticism, history, poetry, travel, whatever men are interested in, all are found here." - The Watchman, Boston.

"Through its pages, the reader will see more of what is important in current literature as by the perusal of a long list of monthly periodicals." - Boston Herald.

"In fact, a reader needs no more than this one publication to keep him well abreast of English periodical literature." - London Standard, Philadelphia.

"Foremost of the eclectic periodicals." - N. Y. Herald.

"In subscribing for it, our readers will see more for their investment than in any other way of which we are cognizant." - Jones Christianian, Portland.

"Coming once a week, it gives, while yet fresh, the productions of the foremost writers of the day." - Montreal Gazette.

"One cannot read every thing. No man will be behind the times who reads the LIVING AGE." - New-York Herald, Boston.

"It furnishes a complete compilation of an indispensable literature." - Chicago Tribune, New-York.

"It saves not only time, but money." - Pacific Christianian, San Francisco.

"The best publication we know in the world." - Morning Post, Wilmington, D. C.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1885.

In his annual report, just now published, the Lieutenant General of the Army discusses the Indian question to some length and makes some important recommendations. After pointing out the fact that the Indians are the richest people in this country, considered as communities, and that their reservations, including some of the best lands of our domain, would, if divided, afford to each family an estate of many thousand acres, he goes on to recommend that three hundred and twenty acres be allotted to each family, and that such family be located on the allotment. He then recommends that the remainder of each reservation be condemned, and bought in by the government at one dollar and a quarter an acre, and that with the proceeds government bonds be bought and held in trust by the Interior Department, the interest to be given each year to the Indians for their support. From the figures which General Sheridan gives in illustration of the practical working of his recommendation, it appears that the interest on the condemned reservation lands would amount to more than is now annually given by Congress to the Indian tribes. The advantage which he claims for this plan is that the money so disbursed would be recognized as belonging of right to the Indians, and not as a matter of charity, and that the whole vexatious question of Indian appropriations would thus be taken out of Congress.

Gen. Sheridan's recommendation marks a distinct advance toward a better understanding of the relations that ought to exist between our government and the red man. As far as it goes it indicates, we think, the direction which future legislation on this subject ought to take. The only criticism which we would offer in regard to it is that it does not provide, even in idea, for the enfranchisement of the Indian. No doubt the giving of land to him in severalty, whether such allotment carried with it the right of alienation or not, would do much to break up the tribal condition. Perhaps it is essential that assistance shall be granted to him for some little time after his settlement on his own land; and it is reasonable to suggest that such assistance should come to him as an income from his own share of the undivided reservation hitherto given to his tribe. But a definite limit ought to be placed upon the giving of such assistance. It may be taken for granted that the Indian will always be dependent so long as he is directly helped in this or in any way. Whether he be made a citizen of the United States, therefore, or not, it should be definitely understood that personal assistance cannot be given to him in the way suggested or in any way beyond a limited time, and that thereafter the money received for his condemned reservation lands would be handed over by the general government to the territorial government which represents him, to be by such government and in accordance with the popular vote, appropriated for the benefit of his people considered as citizens of such territory. Of course this would involve his enfranchisement and his coördination with the white race who would be his neighbors; but this is inevitable in any event, unless the Indian be kept in his tribal condition and the white man be kept by force of arms out of his reservation. The alternative is daily becoming more and more intolerable. The Indian can live in this free country only as a citizen. If, under the protection of equal laws, and under the influence of Christian teaching he cannot coexist with the whites on terms of equality, then he cannot long continue in this country at all, but through the operation of great natural and economical laws he must perish.

In view of this state of facts, there is much force in the plea made by the Bishop of Michigan in his address at the semi-Centennial Missionary Conference in Philadelphia for extending to the Indians, in larger measure, the influence and benefit of the ethical teaching of the Church. The Indian must be coördinated with the white man. Our civilization will not permit him much longer to live in this free country except as a citizen. What he needs is to be made morally equal to the responsibilities and duties of free citizenship. Unless this can be compassed for him he cannot survive amidst the competitions of our progressive life; and the agency which can be looked to most reasonably for the accomplishment of this for the Indian is the Church of this English-speaking race, whose sober, practical teaching of duty has been the most potent factor in making our civilization what it is, and has given to the world the realization of civil and religious liberty.

The same plea was made with equal force by the Bishop of Michigan, for the carrying on of a larger work by this Church among the colored people of the South. After pointing out that it was in accordance with the same tendency of our civilization that the negro was emancipated and enfranchised—since, under our civilization, the negro must exist here as a free citizen or not at all—and after alluding to the opinion entertained by many that all past efforts to make his free citizenship a reality had failed, at least, in some degree, because he has not up to this time been made morally equal to the duties and responsibilities of free citizenship, he then said that the one agency that can accomplish this for the negro is the sober, practical, ethical Christianity of the Church. There is, therefore, the most urgent need for this Church to go forward to rescue this race not only from degeneracy, but from being finally excluded from any part in the government and civilization of this free land. For the negro must be made morally equal to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship in this country, or he cannot exist in this country. The genius of our civilization will not tolerate him unless he is fit to be free.

The steady influence of our civilization and of the institutions which represent it under our free government, in conforming all the people of the land to one type, upon which the same prelate dwelt in the address above referred to, has had a remarkable illustration in the transactions of the Hebrew Conference, which met in Pittsburgh last week. After long discussion a platform or declaration of principles was adopted, which was intended to sever "Reform Judaism" in America from the orthodox Judaism of the past, and to place it in vital relation with the thought and progress of the age. "We consider ourselves," it says, "no longer a nation, but a religious community. . . . We acknowledge that the spirit of broad humanity of our age is our ally in the fulfillment of our mission, and, therefore, we extend the hand of fellowship to all who operate with us in the establishment of the reign of truth and righteousness among men." Of this Conference and its transactions, Dr. Isaac M. Wise, who took a leading part therein, is reported to have said on his return home, "This meeting simply re-echoed and gave shape and form to public opinion, as expressed by the progressive Jews against the conservatives. Four-fifths of the Jews in America are progressive. The object of the Conference, in a single sentence, was to Americanize the Jews." When the Jew is thus Americanized, the next step, logically, for him to take will be to accept that Christianity which lies at the basis of the civilization with which the "Reform Judaism of America" has thus placed itself in harmony.

In the course of an able and interesting address on the present condition of Foreign Missions, which was made by the Bishop of Ohio, at the Missionary Conference in Philadelphia, he pointed out that a crisis had been arrived at in China and Japan, in the introduction of railways, the telegraph and other conveniences of European civilization, and the development of new forces which such progress must speedily put into active operation. Through these agencies the ancient panoply of heathenism in those lands is about to be broken in pieces, and God's providence in history is opening up the way for the introduction and extended influence of the Gospel. We may reasonably look, therefore, for a larger and more rapid success of missionary effort in the East than ever before. The strong plea made by the bishop for a renewed interest in our missions to China and Japan, was most timely. Now is the time to strengthen the hands of the Bishops of Yeddo and Shanghai, and to double our contributions for their work. From this time on events will move rapidly in those lands, and unless our missions there shall be equipped and ready to move with them, our part, at least, of the glorious work of converting those people to Christianity will be insignificant indeed.

At the opening service of the Semi-Centennial Missionary Conference at Christ's church, Philadelphia, it was a happy circumstance that the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Minnesota. Not only did he succeed to a large portion of the territory to which the "Apostolic Kemper" was sent fifty years ago, but upon no one of the Bishops of the Church, it is not invidious to say, has a larger portion of the spirit of our first missionary bishop descended. It goes without saying that the sermon of Bishop Whipple was in all respects suitable to the occasion.

At a later service in Holy Trinity church, the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas made an address on the present state of our Domestic Missions, which was full of interest and encouragement. Among the topics which he discussed was the influence which the Church has exerted, directly and indirectly, in securing the adoption by the government at Washington of a more just and humane policy in the treatment of the Indians. He also made grateful and graceful mention of the important work done by the Woman's Auxiliary since its organization, without whose aid it would have been impossible to have kept our missionary force in the field. At the same service the rector of St. George's church, New York, made an excellent address on some aspects of the Church's missionary work in cities.

There is good authority for saying that "comparisons are odious," and we have no desire to illustrate the truth of the adage. It is useful, however, to institute comparisons occasionally, for the purpose of correcting misapprehension, as well as for the purpose of provoking one another to love and good works. We have before us the annual report of a hospital under the control of the Protestant Episcopal Church in one of our large cities; and two reports of a Roman Catholic Hospital in the same city, the one report covering the time from the beginning of 1867 to the end of 1874, and the other report covering the time from the beginning of 1875 to the end of 1880. From the report of the Protestant Episcopal hospital it appears that the expenses of the hospital were $67,377.16, of which amount only $1,624.12 were paid by the patients. From the first named report of the Roman Catholic hospital, the expenses of the hospital were $128,348.21, of which sum $115,500.00 were paid by the patients; and from the second named report of the same Roman Catholic hospital, the figures are, expenses $73,665.06, of which $68,631.48 were received from patients. Now we have no disposition to fault the management of the Roman Catholic hospital. We simply point out that the work which it is doing is almost entirely paid for in cash by its patients, while the Protestant Episcopal hospital is doing its work almost wholly as a matter of charity. We believe that these figures indicate the difference between the benevolent work of these two communions all over the land; and yet one constantly hears the claim made and allowed that the Roman Catholic Church excels all other religious bodies in her charities. Those who have taken pains to inform themselves do not need to be told that Rome is usually well paid in cash for all that she does in this as in all things; but there are many to whom the figures given above, and which are taken from reports that have come quite incidentally before us, will be a revelation. More light is thrown upon the same subject when it is said that of the number of patients received and treated in the Protestant Episcopal hospital referred to, almost all of whom, of course, were free, 340 were registered as Episcopalians, while 437 were registered as Romanists. By all means let us give the Roman Church credit for all that she does, but let us cease to call much of it charity.

Before these words reach our readers the issue of the English elections will have been decided. For, although many of the constituencies will not vote till later, the result of the earlier contests will indicate the direction which political opinion will take, and will give victory to the party which takes the lead on the first polling days. More than any other people the English love the winning side. The facility with which they transfer their interest and their affections from the unsuccessful to the successful deserves to be accounted a national characteristic. Along with a good many peculiarities of more or less excellence, we have inherited a good share of this versatile disposition from our English ancestors, but our cousins beyond the sea still excel us in this as in other things. Therefore, we may look to see the lead in party success which shall be established in the first elections of this week followed by something like a "stampede" on the later days, especially in the rural districts, where most of the newly enfranchised voters are. Meantime it is sufficient to call attention to the enhanced reputation as a political leader which Lord Salisbury has made for himself, and especially to the clever way in which he has closed an unusually brilliant campaign. His final appeal to all Churchmen to rally to the support of the Establishment, and his arraignment of that particular phase of Mr. Gladstone's "opportunism," which has already been commented on in these columns, have been exceedingly effective.

The Irish elections do not take place till next week. The effect upon them of the English elections cannot fail to be great, though, to the credit of the Irish it must be said that they have more capacity for being true to a losing cause than we have learned to look for among the English. It has been evident for some days, however, that the nationalist cause has been in danger among the Irish constituencies. Mr. Gladstone's "unexpected speech" at Edinburgh has had the effect which we predicted in weakening the allegiance of many more intelligent Irish voters to the "uncrowned king" and his policy of alliance with the Tories; and, on the other hand, the Tory press of England has given a rather chilling response to Mr. Parnell's recent expressions of amity toward their party. Altogether, it is quite within the limits of possibility that the Home Rulers of Ireland may be compelled to make a retreat from some of their pretensions after the forthcoming elections.

Says Coleridge, in his life of Keble, "How little probably did those who laid their hands on Keble's head, dream, at the time, how holy a spirit, how powerful an agent for good, by God's blessing, they were enrolling among the ministers of God." And, to day, at each season of ordination, how little know they who send forth what they may be sending forth. It may not be just a Keble; it may be less than such an one; but it may be far more even. This is one of the reasons which invest the seasons of ordination with vast interest to the mind of the earnest and devout Churchman.

THE AMERICAN CHURCH BUILDING FUND COMMISSION.

The American Church Building Fund Commission has been in existence now nearly five years, doing its appointed work quietly, but as faithfully and well as the limited means at its disposal would allow. It was created chiefly as a safe channel for the Church's bounty in the building of churches and chapels, especially in the territories and new dioceses, though its operations are not restricted to these. The commission may not have accomplished all that its most sanguine friends had hoped for it, but it has at least proved very clearly the need of such an agency, and it is hoped, also, has won the confidence of the Church at large. Our fund now amounts to the very respectable sum of $62,979.77, and has been accumulated from offerings from parishes, a few generous individual gifts, mostly from members of the commission, and legacies. Under the provisions of our charter a few donations have been received and bestowed as gifts, but the great bulk of our money is invested in loans to the following dioceses and missionary jurisdictions, namely, Springfield, Texas, Nebraska, Albany, New York, Colorado, North Dakota, Iowa, South Dakota, Minnesota, Indiana, Mississippi, Michigan, Southern Ohio, Virginia, Easton, Quincy, North Carolina, New Mexico, Missouri, Maryland, Wisconsin, Montana, Western Michigan, and Tennessee. These loans are paid back in yearly instalments, with interest added, and, as a rule, the payments are promptly and cheerfully made, so that already the same money has been used more than once in its beneficent work. It is most gratifying that thus far not a penny has been lost through careless investment or bad faith.

The commission has not been able to respond favorably to more than a fraction of the applications for aid that have come to them. They therefore venture to appeal with great confidence to the Church for largely increased gifts to meet the demands that seem most urgent and imperative. They have had the experience of five years to guide them. The machinery is nicely adjusted and in good working order. The best methods of managing the trust have been carefully matured, and the commission feel sure of their ground. They can greatly aid the work of Church extension if they are entrusted with the means. They can prevent unwise expenditure of money, and at the same time they can build up a permanent fund which shall be a blessing to the Church for generations to come.

The expenses of the commission are trifling, so that all moneys contributed are applied without diminution to the work in hand. The commission feel that they are but agents to do little or much as the Church shall determine. While they would not willingly withdraw a penny from any other organized charity, they do venture most earnestly to press their claims for greatly increased contributions both from parishes and individuals. If the Church will listen to their plea and respond generously the commission will be able to show grander results in the future.

It has taken time to demonstrate the need of their existence at all, though other Christian bodies have long since found the use of such an agency. The commission offer their services to the Church gladly; freely, in the work for which they were appointed by the General Convention, and they pledge themselves to make the best use of the means entrusted to them, either as a part of the permanent fund, or for immediate expenditure, as the donors shall direct.

THE PLACE AND METHODS OF BIBLE STUDY IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

BY THE REV. GEO. WM. DOUGLAS, S.T.D.

(Concluded.)

I cannot at the close of this inadequate essay, dwell as I fain would on this great truth at the points where it touches the subject before me. I can but suggest it now. In primitive days the Fathers used to find the Old Testament replete with what they called types and anticipations of the Christ to come. Just as when we go to the former home of some dear friend we recognize everywhere, even in the most trivial objects—in book and chair and toy—suggestions and mementos of him that no stranger could detect; so the Fathers noticed throughout the Bible types and allegories of Jesus which to us of laxer memories seem forced. But, as Dean Church has urged in his striking course of sermons at St. Paul's, London, this last August, on the "Discipline of the Christian Character," there is another way of looking at the Bible which, while more akin to the feeling and thinking of our time, nevertheless finds in the progressive biblical history anticipations of our Lord no less surprising and suggestive. I refer to the ethical aspect of the Old Testament. The Jewish Scriptures are here viewed as the story of the progressive evolution, under God's superintendence, of the religious character—of that character which, as we now look back upon it, may be called the Christian character—the character of the man who in all his works and ways is, as St. Paul puts it, "alive unto God," realizing his oneness with the Heavenly Father. The Old Testament manifestations of this are partial and broken; but the Incarnation of Christ is the key to them. This Christian character is the outcome of all that series of events which, beginning in the primeval world, extends to the birth of Christ, and of which the Bible is in part, but in the most important part, the Divinely preserved history. All else that we learn of God from the Bible,—be it history, or philosophy, or science, or literature—comes out incidentally. The main end in view is the portrayal of the Christian character.

First one trait of this character is exhibited in the chosen of God, then another; until at last the world is ready for the perfect ideal and antitype which could not be realized except in the Superhuman Person of the God-Man. In the Old Testament we see the chosen of mankind at schools, for that ideal. In Abraham, Moses, David, Isaiah, and the rest, we follow through outward changes and apparent chances the growth of that which was to issue in the character of Christ. All that was good in these came, under the superintendence of the Holy Spirit, from Christ their Lord. Only because they had seen and realized Christ's character in part, were men able to welcome in anywise the perfect disclosure of it. Each stage of the Old Testament history marks an advance in the evolution of this character. In Abraham and the Patriarchal Dispensation we see brought out the singleness, the solitariness, the independence of the soul, as against the then prevalent disposition to view men in the aggregate. Then, under the Mosaic Dispensation, another side of the religious character is evoked. Man is single before God; but he is also social, and must live by law—moral law, religious law, ceremonial law. In the breach of that external standard he must measure his sinfulness, develop the sense of it, and thereby lay hold of the sacrificial and priestly system which culminates in Christ. Contrast the wild, bewildered, fluctuating morality of the world outside of Judaism with the ethics of Moses, and you appreciate this new side of the religious character. Then in the Psalms we have the development of the religious affections—love, hope, fear, repentance, aspiration. The soul is conscious of the sweetness, the awfulness, the personal intensity of its relations to its Creator. Notice the wide interval between the Book of Judges and the Psalms, and you measure this further trait of the religious character. In the Prophets, on the other hand, we have the awakening of the religious reason. There are problems to be solved, great principles to be applied, an experience of life to be mastered, a comparison to be made between the rise and fall of this world's kingdoms and of the kingdom of God, the spiritual essence of obedience to be contrasted with mere legality. In the Prophets we have the beginning of religious teaching. The great ideas of the Psalms are addressed to God; in the Prophets they are turned upon man. There is a vast deal more than this in the Prophets. They are more than teachers: they foretell. But the phase of the religious character which they specially exhibit is that of religious reasoning.

Finally the Word was made Flesh. That Divine Person who heretofore in parts and measures had worked out, through His Spirit, anticipations of His character among men, presents that character at last in its perfection as the Son of Mary. No change that ever was equalled that between the relative goodness manifested before, and the absolute goodness of Jesus; yet the change was wrought in such silence and reserve that it seemed continuous with the past. Nay, so intimate was the connexion between the partial life of Christ's forerunners and His own perfect life, that some of their very prayers and praises could be made His own. It was David's cry that Jesus uttered in the darkness of His Cross; and, in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ expressly states that He is come not to break with the Jewish traditions, but to fulfill them. The novelty was that He did fulfill them; and, in this exhibition, this acting out before God and man the perfect pattern of the religious child of God, without spot of sin, He accomplished the atonement for sinners. At this point, indeed, the life and work of Jesus pass beyond our ken. To all that He did for our example there is added much that man cannot fathom. Of Christ's mediatorial work Christians can frame no sufficient theory. We can but accept it as God's free gift. But along with all this sacrificial and sacramental aspect of Christ's life, death, and resurrection, there stands out on the pages of the New Testament a vivid portrait for us to imitate,—a portrait which we have been prepared for by all in the Bible that has gone before. Because of what has gone before we can recognize the portrait as real. And the only way to gaze on that portrait is to study the Bible. We may believe in Jesus without Bible study. We may partake of the Sacraments without Bible study. We may apprehend some of the abstract principles, and obey some of the detached precepts of Christianity, without Bible study, taking them at second-hand. But without Bible study there is one thing we cannot do: we cannot derive the inimitable impression of the Lord's very self. We cannot see what Christ effected in human life. We lose the objective vision of the Christian character. We are as runners in a race who struggle for the mastery without fixing their eye on the mark.

And if once this be apprehended as the true place of Bible study in the Christian life, there is imparted to the methods of that study a distinctive tone and purpose. The Christian will avail himself of every help to the right understanding of the Scriptures; for the Bible is supernatural, but not unnatural. The Christian is committed to Christ; but when he reads the progressive Revelation of Christ, he reads it to ascertain as far as possible just where, and when, and in what measures this now known Revelation was actually imparted to mankind. Hence the Christian will be as "fearlessly philological," as accurately historical, as quick to glean from kindred literatures as the most enthusiastic devotee of the so-called "higher criticism." He will not be afraid to learn all there is of solid learning in the most destructive commentators. Bauer and Ewald and Renan and Wellhausen will have much to teach him, notwithstanding his liking for the Fathers. And this rich and ever-widening life of our race to-day, with its new disclosures and applications of the truth which yet is old—all this will be ever in his view. For it is not for naught that God has caused the sciences to flourish in those countries where Christianity is flourishing—that the scientific are the Christian nations. This progress of knowledge, this study of God's works was intended to react—as it always has reacted—on the study of God's Word. But the Christian will not be sailing the sea of modern conjectures without a compass.

In view of Dr. Wright's scholarly and fearless paper at the recent Church Congress in England on the effect of the Revised Version upon Old Testament Christology, it is safe to say that with any chronological arrangement of the Sacred Books that has yet been seriously proposed, and in spite of the most destructive criticism that can stand, the Person and Work of Jesus come out vividly throughout the Bible, anticipated in the Old Testament, realized in the New; and the Christian, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, will start with Christ already vital in his own soul to find Christ in the Bible, and to give unity, point and power to his many-sided scholarship.

Such is the ideal place of Bible study in the Christian life. In these days of hurry and distraction, merely to mention study is to revive to most of us a beautiful but fast vanishing dream. Yet whether our opportunities for it be greater or less, in whatever Bible study we can accomplish we need not forget our aim. And if we often remember that whosoever we open the Scriptures the lineaments of Jesus are between the leaves, I think the vision of our thorn-crowned Master would make us more reverent, and because reverent, more scholarly.

Finally, this method of Bible study would bring it close to the issues of our day. The central problems of to-day are the personality of God the existence of man after death the necessity of religion to morality the possibility of a supernatural revelation in a sphere where law is natural; and lastly, the origin and destiny of the human race on earth, and the mutual relations of its several classes, rich and poor, governors and governed. It is with these problems that the ancient Pyrrhonism appears, wearing the borrowed mask of science, as of old the mask of metaphysics was borrowed. And because these are the foremost questions, it is frequently alleged that for the Christian scholar to spend much time upon the Bible is to attempt to defend the outworks of the fort when the citadel itself is in danger. But any discussion of these questions involves discussion of the Bible; and the only way to avail oneself of the full force of the Bible is to resort to it from the base of Christ's Work and Person as verifiable historic fact, and therefore rational, ethical, spiritual. The battle of the past hundred years between faith and skepticism has shown that the Christian is safe and strong when he takes his stand on the facts of history, as the verified expression of the wants of the human soul and the true source of their satisfaction. And whosoever this method has been pursued, there the Bible has disclosed itself as the advancing revelation of the grand central fact of the Personal God working in human history for the salvation of the world through Jesus. The Old Testament is the story of Christ's coming, and of the world's preparation for Him. The New Testament is the record of His life, and the exposition of His wisdom, informing, purifying, stimulating and regulating the minds of men.

FOREIGN MISSION.

SPECIFIC CONTRIBUTIONS NEEDED.—The meeting of the Board of Managers on November 10 had a pathetic interest, owing to the presence of the Bishop of Florida, who had risen from a sick bed to attend the meeting and plead in behalf of the Church work under his care in the Island of Cuba. The Board was so far moved by the bishop's presence, that although the condition of the treasury did not warrant an increase of appropriations, yet they voted an appropriation for three months at the rate of $4,000 per annum, to protect the work until the bishop could issue an appeal to the Church. The bishop was so ill as to be scarcely able to speak, and was tenderly helped to and from the rooms. Five days later he was called to his long home and blessed reward by the great Bishop and Shepherd of Souls. The work in which he was so deeply interested should not be permitted to suffer, though his voice is no more heard upon earth. The husbed voice pleads forcibly with the people of God to provide the means for this work so dear to the departed bishop.

Copies of Bishop Young's report of his visitation to Cuba last spring may be obtained for distribution by sending for them to the Mission Rooms, 22 Bible House, New York.

At the same meeting of the Board of Managers the appointment of a medical missionary for Africa, requested by the new bishop, was granted upon condition that specific offerings for his support could be obtained. To furnish the equipment and send the doctor to Africa $1,000 will be required.

We have at present no physician in the African Mission, and there is great need for one to care for the health of our own missionaries and their pupils, and also to instruct a class understood to be waiting for medical training.

Both of these cases are calls upon the Church which we hope will be heeded without diminishing the offerings for the stated appropriations.

W. M. S. LANFORD, General Secretary.

ENGLAND.

THE CHURCH ASSOCIATION.—The Church Association held its annual Autumnal Conference on Thursday, Oct. 29. The usual speeches were made, but little that was new was advanced. The threats of prosecution against the bishops that have been made for two or three years past were repeated. Ritualism was discussed with the usual vehemence; the question of disestablishment was barely touched, one speaker going so far as to suggest that disestablishment was preferable to living with ritualists. In view of the severe speeches made, it seems like a satire to read that the subject of the opening address was "The Truth in Love." The meeting is barely mentioned in one of the Church papers, is wholly passed by in most of them, and reported in full only in the English Churchman. It is evident that the Church Association is losing what popularity it once had. The Rev. C. Jex Blake in his speech said he was astonished to see so little action taken in the country against the ritualists who are Romanizing the Church of England, and was surprised to see so few people in Protestant Liverpool gathered together at the conference.

AUSTRALIA.

CHURCH GROWTH IN MELBOURNE.—A letter from Geelong (Victoria), 1873: "This diocese of Melbourne has lately been considerably strengthened by the arrival of the Rev. Churchill Julius, as Archdeacon of Ballarat. A proposal to erect a third diocese within the colony with the sea at Sandhurst, to embrace the whole of the north of the present diocese of Melbourne, came to the front this year in our Church assembly. We are the more encouraged to attempt this from the fact that the foundation of the see of Ballarat, nine years ago, has been followed by a remarkable growth of the Church, both there and among ourselves. Our annual receipts and expenditures are 217,000 more than the total amount for the whole colony in 1874. The difficulty in the way of a third diocese is, naturally, a money difficulty; but the great increase in value of Church properties in Melbourne will enable us to deal liberally with the district proposed to be cut off in our diocese thus diminished. The colony has reached its million of inhabitants, and being as large an area as England, there is abundance of work for three bishops. Victoria will, it is hoped, be constituted a province when the new diocese is formed, and the Bishop of Melbourne will of course become a Metropolitan. But this will not interfere with the 'Primacy' of the Bishop of Sydney, who is Metropolitan of New South Wales, and also is 'Primate' by appointment of the General Synod."

JAPAN.

THE VACANT ANGLICAN BISHOPRIC.—The London Record understands that the vacant

English Bishopric of Japan has been offered to the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, the eldest son of the Bishop of Exeter. Mr. Bickersteth was head of the Cambridge University Mission to Delhi from 1877 to 1882, but was forced to return to England on account of ill-health. In 1884 he was presented by Pembroke College, Cambridge, to the valuable living of Framingham, but resigned it a few weeks since, with the intention of returning to Delhi.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

MISSIONARY WORK ON THE Isthmus.—Church Work of November 6 says:

"The work (which has been placed under the supervision of the Bishop of Jamaica) among the English gathered on the Isthmus for the making of M. Lesseppe's great canal, is of large proportions, as our nationality is the main element among the 18,000 laborers in the company's employ, scattered over a line of forty-seven miles in length. The ministrations of our Church are now, in some degree, supplied at nine stations. It may be especially mentioned that the Rev. E. B. Key has restored to use the Anglican church at Colon, and that Mr. Kerr has done much good at Monkey Hill, which had been notorious for vice. Our countrymen have been raised to a sense of their religious duties. Three or four gentlemen volunteer their services as regular lay-readers, four congregations have provided harmoniums and other adjuncts for services, and, mainly out of the hard earnings of laboring men, $445 have been lately raised for Church purposes. The canal company itself is building three churches for our work. Two or three more clerical men are needed, as well as several catechists and school-masters. During the first year of the mission every sovereign sent from England has elicited another on the spot."

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Archdeacon Farrar's Address on General Grant.—The original manuscript from which Archdeacon Farrar gave his impressive address on General Grant in Westminster Abbey, has passed into the possession of the Webster Historical Society. The Rev. W. C. Winslow, Chairman of the Committee on Historiography, received the valuable document from the archdeacon, and the Hon. A. H. Rice, acting president, prepared the formal acknowledgment, which was signed by Messrs. Rice, Winslow, Hyde, Young and Thayer as a committee.

BOSTON—Clerical Association.—The second meeting of this association for the year, was held on Monday, October 9, and the Church Rooms, where it was held, were filled to overflowing. The Rev. Dr. G. Z. Gray read a paper on "Disestablishment," after which, at the urgent request of all present, the Rev. H. R. Haws occupied the remainder of the time with a series of pointed and brilliant remarks and criticisms relative to the topic presented, and kindred matters.

On motion of the Rev. W. C. Winslow a resolution was unanimously adopted expressing congratulation at the simultaneous visits of Archdeacon Farrar and Mr. Haws to Boston, and at their words, which indicated the deepening of the regard and the strengthening of the ties between the Church of England and that of America.

BOSTON—Girls' Friendly Society.—There was a meeting of associates of the Girls' Friendly Society for America in the chapel of St. Paul's church, Boston, on Thursday, November 12. The Rev. A. E. Johnson presided. Lord Inbraxton made a most interesting and instructive address upon the Girls' Friendly Society in England, speaking also of the Young Men's Friendly Society. Lady Brabazon read a paper on the "Sick Members and Homes of Rest Department" of the English Society, which was listened to with great interest. Mrs. A. T. Twing spoke of the new magazine, Church Work, and the Rev. Edward Osborne, S.S.J.E., made a few remarks on the Girls' Friendly Society for America.

FITCHBURG—Convocation.—The Central Convocation met in Christ church, Fitchburg, on Tuesday, November 17. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion, with sermon by the Rev. A. U. Stanley, in the morning. At 3 P.M. an essay was read by the Rev. G. F. Pratt on the subject, "Is there a Place for Pride in Christianity?" In the evening there was a missionary service, with addresses.

ALBANY.

MECHANICVILLE AND STILLWATER—Episcopal Visitation.—The bishop of the diocese has just made a visitation of the two parish churches in this mission (the Rev. Richmond Shreve in charge), confirmed two persons in Stillwater and six in Mechanicville, and spoke earnest words of warm encouragement to priest and people because of the continued and revived activity and life in the congregations. During the missionary's five months' service there have been 52 services, 10 celebrations of the Holy Communion, 11 baptisms, 8 confirmations, 3 marriages, and 431 parish calls.

NEW YORK.

HIGH FALLS—St. John's Church.—On the Twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity the Memorial Church of St. John was opened at High Falls, a village in Ulster County, in which for some years a Sunday-school and mission services have been kept up in the face of great difficulties. The whole bias of the place is toward the Dutch Reformed and Methodist systems, with a remnant of Church people and a large contingent of persons "who go nowhere." These comprehend the majority of the workers in the cement mills and the quarries. Their spiritual wants were left uncared for until the Church began her mission work among them, this being supplied from Stone Ridge, a village some two miles off, which shared with All Saints' church, Rosendale, the service of a resident priest. Thanks to the piety of others, a memorial church, dedicated to St. John, has just been completed and opened, in which will be held regular Sunday and week-day services, as well as Sunday-school. The building, which is frame, was designed by Mr. James Renwick of New York, and is in the Early English style. It consists of a nave, entered by a deep porch, painted externally in Quaker drab, with olive-green facings, the roof and bell-cot being treated in Indian red. Its dimensions are—length from east to west, forty feet, breadth twenty-one feet; height to top of walls eleven feet, from floor to open roof twenty-six feet, to top of bell-tower cross forty-one feet. The chancel is formed by a non-structural arch, eleven feet of the nave being cut off to form a sanctuary, which is approached by two steps rising twenty inches, the altar being again raised on a platform twenty inches in height, giving it a lofty elevation. Internally the open roof, panelling, and seats are finished in hard oil, the chancel is richly carpeted, the windows in the nave, by Day of New York, being of cathedral glass of various colors, with a deep orange border. The triple light at the east end is an exquisite piece of work, containing as its centre-piece a full length figure of St. John, with the eagle above his head and the chalice in his hands, flanked by the two minor lights, displaying the Rose of Sharon and the Annunciation lilies respectively. The west end is lighted by two lancets and a rose-window, filled with stained glass. The open seats are of balm-wood, while the chancel-rails, altar-chairs, credence, reading-desk, and font (the gift of the Sunday-school children) are of black walnut, the temporary altar and pulpit being of pine, stained. The altar candlesticks, vases, cross, book-rest, and alms dish are of brass, the last being really a work of art. The vestments, frontals, antependia, (all of the proper color) and the altar linen, are all worked by ladies, and with the solid communion plate and all the furniture, are memorial offerings.

In the absence of the assistant bishop the altar and its furniture were blessed, and the opening service conducted by the Rev. Edward Ransford, priest in charge of Stone Ridge and its mission. Twenty-five persons received at the Holy Communion, and the offertory amounted to about $29.

A night-school and young men's club will soon be opened in connection with the church. The new mission starts with a communicant roll of ten and a Sunday school of fifty.

NEW YORK—The Advent Mission.—The committee on the missions which begin to-day in this city drew up twenty Reasons therefor and published them last season, but at a time when many were leaving town for the summer. They are printed now that the people may be thoroughly informed on the subject, and, also, because time has shown that the Reasons are perfectly valid, and entitled to most earnest consideration. These Reasons are not indeed exhaustive, but they cover the main portions of the ground in an admirable manner. The case might have been put stronger and even differently in some respects, but thoughtful men will recognize the spirit of justice by which the statements are inspired. The "Object" of the Mission, a very different subject, was treated in THE CHURCHMAN May 30, in connection with the Assistant Bishop's Letter, and that matter may well be studied in this connection:

THE COMMITTEES' SPECIAL REASONS FOR A MISSION IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

1. A large class of well-to-do and refined people, who have ceased to be, or never have been, Church-goers.
2. Formal communicants.
3. The irreligion of the young men of our well-to-do families.
4. The evils in the life of men and women in fashionable society.
5. The feeble recognition on the part of masters and mistresses of the need of Church attendance by their servants, resulting largely from a want of care for the spiritual welfare of servants.
6. The evils of Class Churches.
7. The evils which come from the instability of Church connection.
8. The lack of opportunity for private prayer, consequent upon the condition of our tenements and building houses, and the fact that few churches are constantly open.
9. The want of definite, positive instruction in religious duties, and in what practical Christian living consists.
10. The lack of personal spiritual ministry to the rich.
11. The drain upon the minds, souls, and bodies of two classes: (1) of those who give themselves up to the demands of society life; (2) of those laden down with too much work—unfitting both classes for a healthful Christian life. Among the causes of this drain we specify: (a) late hours; (b) stores open late Saturday nights; (c) no Saturday half holidays.
12. The religious deprivation suffered by the large and rapidly increasing portion of the population called to labor at night, in connection with the cramped work and vicious classes abroad under cover of darkness.
13. The wrongs inflicted by employers upon their employees.
14. The lust of wealth, issuing in the manifold evils of unscrupulous competition; over-work under pay, cramped work and mutual enmity and discontent between employer and employee.
15. The immorality and irreligion caused by the unrighteous denial to a large and increasing class of one day's rest in seven.

16. The prevalence of the sins of intemperance and impurity.
17. The special religious difficulties caused by the constant flow of immigrants.
18. The hindrance to the growth of the Christian life caused by our luxuriousness and selfishness.
19. The ostentatious display by Church-goers of all classes.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Messiah.—On Sunday evening, November 15, at this church (the Rev. Charles R. Baker, rector), a special sermon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. J. H. Rylance, the subject being "Christian Socialism." The sermon was one of great interest and practical value. Among measures for reconciling the interests of capital and labor, he advocated "industrial partnerships," and gave instances of certain colliery proprietors and carpet manufacturers in England, whose employees had been greatly benefited by such means. He gave also a remarkable case of co-operation on the part of laborers: "In 1854 in a manufacturing store in the North of England, twenty-eight laborers formed a conspiracy to improve their condition, which was just then well nigh desperate. They agreed to combine their means wherewith to start their scheme of distributive co-operation. Their subscription of only five cents a week slowly accumulated to $140, on the strength of which they rented a store and began business. At first there was a struggle, and temptation to despair; but after a while profits began to show themselves, converts to their scheme increased and joined the original twenty-eight, the members numbering nine hundred at the end of ten years, while the $140 had become $35,860, business being done in the last year of the ten to the amount of $166,820, the profits of that single year amounting to $3,815. The present status and dimensions of the enterprise started by these twenty-eight poor men are indicated in the late reports. I have had access to no later than that of the Register General for 1878, from which I learn that there were then in existence in England, Scotland, and Wales 1,289 co-operative societies, the number of members 554,773, the sales $104,863,795, and the net profits $9,002,340. These material results of the movement are simply amazing." He then dwelt forcibly upon the moral fruits of such co-operative enterprise, seen in habits of sobriety, industry, and economy, increased intelligence, and self-respect. He believed the way out of the confusion in which the labor question is involved lies in workmen helping themselves through the strength which comes of union.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Redeemer.—This parish (the Rev. Charles R. Treat, rector.) has had under consideration for some time past the expediency of forming a surplined choir of men and boys. By action of the vestry this has finally been determined, and the choir is now in training under Professor Fitzhugh, organist and choir-leader. The cottas and casocks are also in process of preparation, and it is expected that the choir will be ready to engage in the services of the Church for the first time on Christmas Day.

The Church of the Redeemer has been steadily reducing its debt, and the parish generally are taking hold with great zeal of the work of which it is the centre. More money is freely contributed to the various interests which call for consideration than heretofore. On Sunday, November 15, in response to the sudden appeal received that morning from the Rev. S. M. Bird of Galveston, Texas, in behalf of the sufferers by the fire, forty-five dollars were contributed.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Church of the Ascension.—This parish (the Rev. Arthur Whitaker, rector,) broke ground last June for a parish house, which has now been completed sufficiently to be occupied, the plan being to leave the interior in an unfinished state until next summer. By that time the three thousand dollars needed to complete the work will have been raised. The architect is R. W. Gibson, who designed the cathedral at Albany. The building is forty-seven feet by ninety-five, three stories high, and built of brick. The first floor is a hall seventy-five feet deep, with a large platform at one end. The second floor contains a guild-room sixteen feet by thirty-two feet in area, leading off into a gallery. The third floor consists of a room twenty-five feet by fifty feet, with an ante-room of about half the size. This portion is intended for social purposes. The hall, which is from the ground to its ceiling twenty-six feet in height, will be provided with orchestra-chairs, and will be used for lectures, concerts, and other entertainments. The cost of this building, so far, has been eight thousand dollars, which amount was fully subscribed before the work was begun.

The Church of the Ascension, which stands now on a substantial footing, was started nearly forty years ago, when the Rev. Charles Reynolds, rector of Christ church, Williamsburg, conducted the first service of the Church ever held in Greenpoint, in the parlor of Mr. David Provost. Greenpoint had at that time about four hundred inhabitants. The election of the first vestry was held December 20, 1846. For several years services were held in a rented room. The early rectors were the Rev. Mr. Brown, the Rev. Robert J. Walker, and, in 1854, the Rev. E. C. Babcock, who labored with great zeal, securing the purchase of three lots on Kent street for $1,500, and the erection of a frame building for worship and Sunday-school. The present stone edifice was erected in 1867, under the rectorship of the Rev. Francis Mansfield. The present rector, the Rev. Arthur Whitaker, took charge in December, 1879. He was graduated from the General Theological Seminary in 1871, held cures in the Diocese of Albany, and spent three years in England, on his return taking his present work. The church had then a bonded indebtedness of $13,000, which had been standing twenty years, and a floating debt of $2,000. At Easter, 1880, the latter was disposed of, mainly through the generosity of Mr. Thomas F. Rowland, proprietor of the Continental Iron Works, and a former parishioner, and for four years Mr. Rowland paid the interest on the mortgage, until, in 1884, he paid the principal. While this liberality was being exercised a fund was established by others to provide for the building of the parish house above described on two lots on Java street, which had been given for that purpose as early as 1863, by Mr. J. W. Valentine and Mr. T. F. Rowland. At Easter, 1884, the sum had reached $2,000, of which all except one hundred dollars had been raised by the children of the Sunday-school. When this amount had been advanced to $8,000, in June last, ground was broken. The property of the parish now aggregates $40,000, and is clear of all debt.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Cateary Church.—The Rev. Cornelius L. Tving, the newly elected rector of this parish, entered upon his official duties in that relation for the first time on Sunday, November 15. The Rev. Francis Peck, for twenty-five years rector of the church and now retired, assisted in the services. The congregation was large, and was composed in part of members of De Witt Clinton Commandery of Knights Templar, of which Mr. Tving is prelate. The music, under charge of Mr. H. J. Richardson, organist, was appropriate and rendered with good effect, and the chancel was tastefully decorated with floral offerings. The subject of discourse was based on the text, Coloss. iii. 17.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—St. Paul's Church.—The church building of this parish (the Rev. Dr. Newland Maynard, rector) was sold at auction on Wednesday, November 18, on a foreclosure order of the Supreme Court, to satisfy a mortgage of $22,000 held by the Seaman's Bank for Savings, of New York. The property was knocked down to a representative of the bank for $5,000.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Grace Church.—At this church (the Rev. Edwin Coan, rector,) the interest of the Festival of All Saints was greatly enhanced by the presentation of certain memorial gifts by which the sanctuary has been beautified. The altar and reredos have been decorated with gold and color, and the effect is a wonderful transformation of the former sombre appearance of the chancel into one of brightness and taste. The colors are soft and harmonious, and, with the judicious blending of gold, produce a very pleasing effect. This is the loving work and gift of a member of the vestry, who is also one of the lay-workers admitted in this parish by the bishop with a special office. A very fine altar cross of brass was presented by the junior warden, in memory of his son, who died about one year ago; and a pair of altar vases of brass, suitable companions of the cross, were presented by the senior warden, in memory of his parents. All these pieces are appropriately inscribed as memorials. Through the generosity of a lady of the parish, the vases were on this occasion filled with rare and beautiful flowers, which were afterward taken to the hospital at Flatbush, to be given to the sick. The congregation was large, and the number of communicants surpassed that of the Easter celebration.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

SYRACUSE—Church Sisterhood.—The annual meeting of the Church Sisterhood was held on Monday, November 16, at the residence of the Rev. Dr. J. M. Clark. The meeting was opened by prayer by Dr. Clark. The business meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. S. G. Fuller, and the secretary, Mrs. A. H. Hall, rendered the annual report.

In the absence of the treasurer no report was made. An urgent appeal is made to those interested in the work, of the pressing need of funds to aid the sick and destitute in our midst. If only the frequenters of the rinks and the theatres would each share a few of their pennies with them, the blessed work of caring for the suffering poor would be largely helped. Who will follow this suggestion? The Chairman of the Hospital Committee reports faithful work from that department. Mrs. E. N. Westcott, of the Shelter Committee, acknowledges seventy-five baskets received during the year. The family is unusually large at present, and contributions of unbleached cotton will be acceptable, as well as half-worn garments.

The officers for the year are as follows: president, Mrs. S. G. Fuller; vice-president, Mrs. F. D. Huntington; secretary, Mrs. F. A. May; treasurer, Mrs. G. F. Comstock, Jr.; Chairman of the Hospital Committee, Miss Malcolm; Chairman of the Committee of the Sick and Destitute, Miss Huntington.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

GENEVA—Fire at Hobart College.—At 5 A.M. on Thursday, November 19, flames were discovered issuing from the upper story of the old library building of Hobart College. The building is between the two dormitories, and there was a wild scene as the students and professors rushed from their rooms. The college bell was on the roof of the library building, and a student had to run to the engine-house, a mile away, to give an alarm. The flames spread rapidly, and when the fire companies arrived the two upper stories were burning fiercely, and it was feared that all the college buildings would be destroyed. The students, led by the president, the Rev. Dr. E. N. Potter, rushed into the burning building and saved many valuable books and papers, but in the upper rooms thousands of old and valuable books that cannot be duplicated were burned. A marble bust of Dr. Hall, formerly president of the college, was also destroyed. Many of the college papers were removed from the library a few days ago. The total loss is $25,000, on which there is but partial insurance. The library building, which was almost entirely ruined, was the oldest of the college buildings. It was built in 1836, and was used for a medical college until 1841. From that time until 1880 it was used for recitation purposes, and was then made into a library. The loss of the books and papers is a serious blow to the college. A new fire-proof stone building for the library is just about completed. The fire is thought to have caught from a kerosene lamp.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Missionary Conference.—The Standing Committee of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, having arranged for a missionary conference in Philadelphia, on November 18 and 19, commemorative of the reorganization of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, in 1835, on the basis of the membership of the Church, and of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Jackson Kemper, D. D., the first Missionary Bishop, the opening service was appropriately held in Christ church upon the fiftieth anniversary of Bishop Kemper's consecration. Morning Prayer and Litany were said at 9 o'clock, by the rector, the Rev. Dr. E. A. Foggo, and the Rev. E. C. Belcher. At 11 A. M., the Presiding Bishop celebrated the Holy Eucharist, assisted by the Bishops of Ohio and Central Pennsylvania, and the Missionary Bishop of Northern Texas. The Bishop of Minnesota and the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas were also in the chancel, as well as the Rev. Drs. E. A. Foggo, T. F. Davies, R. Newton, W. S. Langford, J. H. Hopkins, and the Rev. Messrs. James H. Lamb and L. McAlpine Harding. The preacher was the Bishop of Minnesota, whose text was Isaiah xxxiii. 20: Blessed are ye that sow beside all waters, that send forth thither the feet of the ox and the ass. He briefly reviewed the work of planting missions in China, Commodore Perry's opening Japan, Livingstone and Stanley's work in Africa, the condition of Polynesia fifty years ago and the labors of Bishops Selwyn and Pattison. He said that the Church in America half a century ago was but a feeble vine. He referred to Bishop Kemper's family, early life, ordination and consecration; how much was expected of him as the first Missionary Bishop, and how nobly he fulfilled it; his manner of working and his giving tone to all subsequent missionary efforts in the West and Northwest. He asked why, with all our wealth, we have an impoverished treasury? Why the kingdom of Christ cannot lay tribute upon its subjects? Why it is that we are not availing of every opportunity to seize for Christ. We need the Baptism of the Holy Ghost. It needs to be impressed upon all that the field is the world, that every baptized person is a missionary, that we all need the constraining power of love, that the Church exists only to train souls for heaven. With all the progthat has been made we are only gleaners. Storm clouds are lowering. Labor and capital are antagonistic. Communistic principles threaten us. The one door of escape from them is the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the presentation of the brotherhood of the children of one Father in Heaven. He paid a most noble tribute to the Missionary Bishops of the West, and ended by declaring that the spirit of the Synagogue of Nazareth is that which must animate all.

A public meeting was held in the evening at the Church of the Holy Trinity. A short service was said by the Rev. Drs. Wm. S. Langford and Wm. N. McVickar. Addresses were made by the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas, and the Rev. Wm. S. Rainsford. The topic of the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas was "The Present of Domestic Missions." He began by showing that the title, "Domestic Missions," was a technical one, and that it was divisible into three parts, namely, to the Indian, to the colored people, and to the whites in our Western States and territories. Through the instrumentalities of Domestic Missions the Indian has ceased to be a heath, has been given a man's heart, and has been made to stand upon his feet. He referred to the labors of Bishop Kemper, Dr. Breek, Bishop Hare, William Welsh, the Indian Hope Association, and the Niobrara League, which had elevated their condition and influenced the government, as well as creating a proper feeling towards them among the whole nation. Of the colored race he said, they were a people without a history, that we must give them the history of the Gospel, as we ourselves have it. They were more preached to than any people, such preaching as it is. They need to be preached to in the true setting forth of Christ as He is. They need a religion of morality. We must give them what we ourselves have received. Not a limited diocese, but properly educated clergy. He referred to the state of affairs in several Southern dioceses, said there was no real difference between the Bishop of North Carolina and the Assistant-Bishop of Mississippi, the one found colored men fully able to do the work of the clergy, the other found that, owing to the conditions which surrounded the colored men in his diocese, white clergy must be depended upon for the present. The problem of South Carolina would work itself out in due time, that the bishop of that diocese and his clergy were in the right and the laity in error on the question before them. The work among the whites in the West is fully organized. There is some one on whom rests the responsibility for every foot of ground west of the Mississippi. The bishops and clergy are following in Bishop Kemper's footsteps, and are doing a noble work. The Women's Auxiliary, like an army with banners flying, have come to the rescue and have done good work in making more comfortable the lonely missionary in his far off station, by their money and well-filled boxes.

The Rev. W. S. Rainsford said that the pressure of the problems of life was great, that the pity of humanity need to be felt more than it is. He urged the importance of reaching the young men who crowded our large cities, and were threatened with infidelity. A great power was in the living voice of the preacher. He pressed strongly the need of the better preparation of the clergy, and better material, as well as more directness of aim and teaching. He showed the laity the great duty they owe to the clergy to help them in their work, and that they ought to make their religion a living force in their business and in the marts of trade.

On Thursday morning at 11 o'clock another public meeting was held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, when Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Drs. Charles R. Hale and Wm. S. Langford and the Rev. S. F. Hotchkiss. The Bishop of Ohio spoke on the Present of Foreign Missions, the lateness of the services on the night previous preventing its delivery then. He gave a hasty glance of all that was being done by all bodies in heathen lands, showing that the American Church only gave fifty cents per communicant for foreign missions last year. Missionaries have gone into all lands, they are to be found under the equator and near the poles. But missionary work among the heathen has reached a crisis. He confined himself more particularly to China and Japan, showing what dangers might arise from the material progress which they were making, though it might be God's purpose that they should be the means of opening those nations to a better reception of Christianity. The anti-Christian influence was dwelt upon, and how sometimes infidels were beaten openly in their own modes of attack. He showed the power of medical missions and spoke of the work of the Missionary Bishop of Cape Calmas and parts adjacent, how noble and far-reaching his plans are. He purposes to plant mission houses, schools, and churches at as many places as he can, and that the opening of the Congo was the opening of a great mission field which he would not be slow to occupy if the means are placed in his power. The Bishop of Ohio urged his hearers to pray and give that their gifts should go with their prayers, the one being the completion of the other.

The closing meeting of the conference was held in the evening, when, after a short service, the Bishop of Michigan made a grand address setting forth "The Future of Domestic Missions." He showed how we might rightly read the signs of the times; that which was passed showed what would be. Though immigrants were flocking in from many nations, they were fast becoming one people subject to Anglo-Saxon laws and forming a branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. Though made up of Celts, Teutons, Gaul, Scandinavian, and of the Latin races, they were learning the English language, thinking English thoughts, and would soon be a part of the English speaking race. So the historical English Church was impressing itself upon the whole people and ought to prevail throughout the land. This Anglo-Catholic Protestant Episcopal Church of ours from an ethnological standpoint ought to take control of and shape the destinies of our people. It is our duty to realize our mission as the Church of this land and of this people. The Church is not a sect. He urged the entering into loving relation with the Protestant bodies and to utilize all the agencies provided by the civilization around us which is our civilization. The way to make the work among the Indians a success is to treat them as we do our fellow white men. Follow out the suggestions of General Sherman, give so many acres of land to each family, invest the rest, give them homes and Anglo-American Christianity, else they will soon be wiped out. He asked why our treatment of the colored man has been a failure, and answered his own question: because we have failed to give him Anglo-Saxon Christianity and a sense of duty. If we do not make him a part of the great Anglo-Saxon race, we will either have to colonize him or cause him to secede. God has called this Church of ours to take charge of the Christian missions of this land, and she will most certainly do it.

The Rev. Dr. J. Houston Eccleston spoke of "The Future of Foreign Missions." Our divisions are the great hindrance to our growth.

While men went out to preach the Gospel, men were by the heathen's side who had gone out from our land to say that there was no truth in Christianity. If we expect to convert the nations we must have faith. None can do the work like the Church. We cannot understate our privileges and obligations. We are able to do the work laid upon us, but success will depend upon our faith at home. Just as an obstructed artery means death to our bodies, so doubt means hindrance to the true progress of missions.

Mr. Russel Sturgis, Jr., closed with an address on what a layman can do for missions.

PHILADELPHIA—Formation of a Federate Council.—The three Diocesan Conventions in the State of Pennsylvania, at their last meetings, elected the following deputies to form a Federate Council, of which they, with the bishops and assistant-bishops, should be members:

Diocese of Pennsylvania.—The Rev. Drs. G. E. Hare, Benjamin Watson, C. G. Currie, D. F. Warren, T. F. Davies, R. F. Alsop, W. N. McVickar, I. L. Nicholson, T. C. Vernald, D. R. Goodwin, and J. A. Harris, the Rev. Messrs. Henry Brown, J. W. Lee, S. D. McConnell, John Bolton, and J. DeW. Esry, and Messrs. M. R. Thayer, R. C. McMurtrie, P. P. Morris, B. Landreth, R. Evans, W. H. Reeves, W. W. Frezier, Jr., E. A. Price, W. H. Drayton, E. S. Buckley, H. Flanders, J. S. Biddle, M. P. Henry, C. S. Patterson, J. Ashurst, Jr., C. Spencer, L. H. Redner, A. Brown, G. C. Thomas, and J. Cadwalader.

Diocese of Pittsburgh.—The Rev. Messrs. S. Maxwell, G. A. Carstensen, H. G. Wood, Boyd Vincent, and M. Byllesby, and Messrs. F. Church, Hill Burghwin, J. B. Jackson, and H. Souter.

Diocese of Central Pennsylvania.—The Rev. Drs. J. H. Hopkins, R. J. Keely, W. C. Langdon, and C. F. Knight, the Rev. Messrs. Chandler Hare, A. M. Apel, and M. A. Tolman, and Messrs. U. Mercur, R. A. Lambertson, C. M. Conyngnam, J. G. Freese, G. E. Farquhar, and S. H. Reynolds.

The meeting on Tuesday, November 17, was preceded by a celebration of the Holy Communion in St. James's church (the Rev. Dr. H. J. Morton, rector), when the bishop was present, this being his first public act since his late severe illness. The celebrant was the Bishop of Central Pennsylvania, assisted by the Bishop of Pittsburgh, the rector of the parish, the Rev. Drs. C. F. Knight and J. Andrews Harris, and the Rev. Boyd Vincent.

The council was called to order in the chapel by the bishop of the diocese, and Mr. Robert A. Lambertson elected secretary. The bishop regretted that the condition of his health precluded his bidding them welcome as he would wish, but he trusted that the Holy Spirit would be with them in their labors.

The Bishop of Central Pennsylvania presented a statement of powers similar to that adopted by the Federate Council of New York, which had received the approval of the General Convention.

Mr. Burghwin of Pittsburgh moved that a committee consisting of one bishop, one clergyman, and one layman from each diocese be appointed to prepare a constitution for the council. The Rev. Dr. J. H. Hopkins of Central Pennsylvania thought that they ought first to agree upon the powers of the council and submit them to the several dioceses before any further action was taken.

Considerable discussion was had at this point, and Mr. Burghwin presented a draft of a constitution which he had prepared. Judge M. Russell Thayer of Pennsylvania said that it was impossible to proceed without organization, and approved of Mr. Burghwin's proposition for a committee. This was agreed to, and the following committee appointed:

Pennsylvania: The bishop, the Rev. Dr. G. E. Harv, and Mr. M. Russell Thayer.

Pittsburgh: The bishop, the Rev. M. Byllesby, and Mr. Hill Burgwin.

Central Pennsylvania: The assistant-bishop, the Rev. Dr. J. H. Hopkins, and Mr. Ulysses Mercer.

Upon the reassembling of the Council at 3 o'clock the Bishop of Central Pennsylvania presided, in the absence of the Bishop of Pennsylvania, and the Bishop of Pittsburgh, in behalf of the committee, presented its report, of which the following is an abstract.

The members of the council shall consist of the bishops and assistant-bishops of the dioceses within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, one clerical and one lay deputy for each diocese, and one additional clerical deputy for every twelve clergymen entitled to seats and votes in the convention of any diocese, and one additional lay deputy for every fifteen hundred communicants in any diocese. The council shall sit as one body, the bishop of the diocese having Philadelphia for its centre being president, or, in the vacancy of that see, the presiding officer shall be the senior bishop in the order of consecration. The council shall meet annually in Philadelphia on the third Tuesday in November, unless some other time and place shall be fixed at a previous meeting. Special meetings may be called by the bishop, or on request of two bishops, or of ten clerical and ten lay members. All voting shall be per capita, except that on the call of five members the vote shall be by orders, the bishops, clergy and laity voting separately, a majority of all three orders being necessary to an affirmative action. When committees are to be appointed, having representatives from each diocese, the respective bishops, or, in their absence, the members of the deputations shall name the members from their respective dioceses.

"The powers of this Council shall be: (1). To deliberate and decide on all matters pertaining to such civil legislation as the common interests of the Church in the State of Pennsylvania may require.

"(2). To the promotion of the interests of Christian education and to the furtherance of work for the extension and prosperity of the Church.

"And the said Federal Council shall have full power to enact all regulations necessary to its organization and continuance and to the ends contemplated in the foregoing declaration, not inconsistent with or repugnant to the Constitution and Canons of the General Convention of this Church, or of any one of the dioceses, or to the Law of the Rubric as contained in the Book of Common Prayer and Offices of the Church, together with such other specified powers as this Council shall propose to exercise under resolutions duly adopted and approved by the conventions of all the dioceses and in conformity with the Constitution and Canons of the General Convention."

It was also provided that any number of members present at a regularly called meeting shall constitute a quorum, provided that the three orders shall be represented. Alterations to the constitution shall be proposed at one meeting, sent to the several dioceses for ratification and be finally adopted at the next meeting of the Council.

Considerable discussion was had when many questions of procedure and of canon law were raised. The constitution was then adopted as a whole and the following resolution passed:

Resolved, That the articles of organization shall not become of force until they shall have been submitted to and approved by the three diocesan conventions and so certified by the secretary thereof to the Bishops of Pennsylvania, together with a list of the deputies, clerical and lay, elected by said conventions, respectively, to the next Council.

The preparation of by-laws and rules of order were referred to the Committee on Constitution to report at the next meeting of the Council.

After the meeting of the Federate Council special committees from the three dioceses met to consider the subject of marriage and divorce which had been referred to them by the several conventions.

The Committee from the diocese of Pennsylvania, having held a meeting early in November, it presented a report which was received, and the following preambles and resolution adopted:

Whereas, In the judgment of this committee, the whole system of divorce legislation, not only here, but in most of the States of the Union, is vicious, and works only to the benefit of designing knaves and to the destruction of the family constitution; and,

Whereas, The evil would seem to be on the rapid increase, as evidenced by the fact that within the last thirty years the number of divorces in proportion to marriages has in most of our Northern States more than doubled, the percentage in our own Commonwealth being about one divorce to every fifteen or twenty marriages; and

Whereas, Wise and scriptural legislation can be secured and enforced only by and through a wholesome turn of public sentiment, the creation of which is fairly within the function of the Christian Church; therefore

Resolved, That this committee recommend the formation of a committee of six (one clergyman and one layman from each of the three dioceses here represented), whose duty it shall be to be present and submit a memorial suggesting to the next Federate Council what in their opinion is the best means of remedying the evils hereinbefore set forth.

The Bishop of Pittsburgh, who presided, appointed the following committee:

Pennsylvania: The Rev. Dr. Reese F. Alsop and Mr. M. Russell Thayer.

Pittsburgh: The Rev. G. A. Carstensen and Mr. F. R. Brunot.

Central Pennsylvania: The Rev. Dr. Wm. Chauncey Langdon and Mr. T. B. Freese.

MARYLAND.

SLIGO—Silver Spring Parish.—The parish and mission points of the Rev. Jas. B. Averitt, at this and adjacent points have witnessed a great revival of interest. A few weeks since a mission was conducted, at which the Rev. Dr. Thomas Addison, of Washington, Rev. W. Brynshaw, and Rev. Messrs. C. B. Perry, Henry Thomas, R. T. Brown, A. C. McCabe, the rector, and others were special preachers, expounding the way of life with great vigor and earnestness. At the recent visitation of the bishop, October 20, thirty-one persons were confirmed, the greater portion of whom were the results of the late active mission.

EASTON.

SPECIAL CONVENTION.—Pursuant to the call of the Standing Committee, a Special Convention for the election of a bishop, in succession to the late Dr. Lay, was held in Christ church, Easton, on Wednesday, November 18. The Rev. Dr. T. P. Barber was elected president of the convention. Three ballots were taken, resulting, on the third ballot, in the election of the Rev. Dr. George Williamson Smith, president of Trinity College, Hartford, who received 19 out of 29 clerical, and 18 out of 33 lay votes.

MISSISSIPPI.

VICKSBURG—St. Mary's Chapel.—The assistant bishop visited this (colored) chapel (the Rev. Nelson Ayres, priest in charge,) on Sunday, November 14, and confirmed six persons, two of whom had been baptized by the priest in charge the same day, and two others publicly received. It is the custom in this parish publicly to receive with the sign of the cross, and the reception in the Baptist Office, all who, having been baptized outside the Church, signify their desire of becoming her active members.

This confirmation, with the former one held in July, brings the number of those confirmed during the conciliar year up to twenty-eight.

A mission is in contemplation to begin next week, and it is confidently hoped that the fruits of the effort will bring the number of confirmed up to fifty before the meeting of the next council in the spring.

St. Mary's is in a healthy and flourishing condition. Though yet weak in numbers, it is strong in faith and zeal. The parishioners that it has are earnest, active, and energetic. The services are as frequent as circumstances will permit, and are well attended by a large, attentive, and well-behaved congregation. After the night service the assistant bishop remarked that it was "a good, hearty service."

At Evening Prayer at 3:30 P.M., which is the children's service, the assistant bishop expressed himself as much gratified at the marked familiarity with the catechism displayed by them, and their prompt and ready answers.

It is evident that this work has passed beyond the period of uncertainty and experiment to a state of assured permanence and steady growth. But it must not be forgotten that as yet St. Mary's is numerically and financially weak, and is surrounded by little opposition from the sects. The chapel is yet unfinished, and the congregation can do but little as yet for the support of the priest. The assistant bishop carries the work on his own income, and should receive help.

TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE—Holy Trinity Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. M. M. Moore, rector,) on the evening of Sunday, November 15, and confirmed ten persons, four of whom were from different sects, and in the morning had received hypothetical baptism. The bishop had already confirmed eighteen persons in Christ church in the morning, and nine at the Church of the Advent in the afternoon. The congregation at Holy Trinity in the evening was all the church could possibly hold, and listened to a unusually strong sermon on the authority and necessity of confirmation.

There has just been organized in this parish "The Trinity Guild," composed mainly of the young men of the parish. Besides such mutual help and Church work as it may accomplish, it will open a reading-room where its members may spend their week-day evenings and Sunday afternoons. Books, magazines, and papers are desired for this room, and may be sent to the rector.

OHIO.

EAST LIVERPOOL—St. Stephen's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish and Wellville (both under the care of the Rev. Edmund Burke) on Sunday, November 15, and confirmed fifty-two persons. He also confirmed six persons at the Ohio City Mission School, which Mr. Burke succeeded in building last summer in that place.

WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, WARRENSBORO, BOULIYAN, OHIO.

Paul & Palfy, Architects.

A full account of these buildings was given in The Churchman of the 15th. The work is now being prepared for the press. It is a quarter of a century ago that the Rev. Dr. McKim, then a student in the Rev. Dr. McKim's class at the Theological Seminary, was invited to deliver the opening prayer at the laying of the corner-stone of this building. It is now a fact that the Rev. Dr. McKim, at the age of 84, is still active in the work of the seminary.

NOTICES.

MARRIED.

On Wednesday, November 19, 1885, at noon, in St. Paul's Church, Alexandria, Va., by the pastor, the Rev. George H. Norton, D.D., the Rev. Douglas Hooper, of Suffolk, Va., to Miss Mary Douglas, daughter of the late Rev. Chandler Robbins, of Springfield, Ohio, No cards.

DIED.

Entered into rest, in Reading, Pa., at quarter past one of the afternoon of Sunday, November 22, Dr. BENJAMIN KRUI in the 61st year of age.
 At Kansas City, Mo., on Sunday, November 8, 1885, HELEN MORSE McALLISTER, aged 30 years and 29 days.
 Entered upon eternal life on November 14, 1885, LOUISA A., daughter of the Rev. Lewis and Mary T. Walker, and wife of Edwin B. Sneed, of Richmond, Va., in the 53th year of her age.
 Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

DIVID BRYDON TENNANT.

Entered his rest on the 8th day of October, 1885, at his summer villa, in the city of A. Newport, R. I., DAVID BRYDON TENNANT, of Petersburg, Va., in the 64th year of age, son of Margaret Dunlop Brydon and the late John Tennant, Esq. of Crook-shire, Ayrshire, Scotland.
 He was born at Shields, Cockburn, Ayrshire, on the 28th July, 1822. He was the eldest and most prominent one of Ayrshire, and are connected and related to many of the Scotch and English nobility. His uncle was the founder of the St. Rollox Works, in Glasgow, which are known throughout the world, and in the N.ropolis, in Glasgow, a large, handsome public monument was erected to his memory. Also one of the largest and handsomest memorial windows in the Glasgow Cathedral, in honor of his name, Sir Charles Tennant, M.P. of "The Glen," Perthshire, in his memory.
 Mr. Tennant led a life of an early age. Soon after his father's second marriage, and the death of his maternal grandparents, from whom he inherited his considerable independent fortune, he came to Ayr, being then thirteen years of age, to his mother's brother, Mr. Daniel Dunlop Brydon, then living in Petersburg, Va., which was the first place he occupied as an adopted home. During this period, however, he has, from time to time, spent several years abroad, both in the Continent, and in visiting his family in Scotland and England.
 Mr. Tennant was named for his two uncles, Mr. David Tennant, of Mohamrad, Tipperary, Ireland, who was a gentleman of great wealth and large landed estates; and for his mother's brother, Mr. David Dunlop Brydon, with whom he spent his home when he first came to Virginia. He began business at 21 years of age, in Petersburg, Va., the firm then being Dunlop & Tennant, and he was a partner. Since, the business was carried on in his own name, and, at the time of his death, was D. B. Tennant & Co. He was always successful as a business man, having amassed quite a fortune in the tobacco business, and was not only distinguished in his business relations in this country, but abroad; his being altogether a foreign trade.
 Although a man of wealth and high social position, Mr. Tennant was one of the most retiring and modest of men; a model of a true Christian gentleman. He was admired for his unassuming manner and a certain frankness and directness that won all hearts. As a host he was most to be appreciated, as it was in his own house he displayed his hospitality and his character which show the true Christian gentleman.
 It was my privilege to be present at his funeral, which took place in the city of Ayr, Scotland, and I watched the long procession of carriages, for every one told me it was one of the largest funeral processions ever seen in the city, and I can assure you it shows what that good man, or how he was appreciated by those who knew him best; but it was the sight of the hundreds of the poor, and the sick, in both colored and white, who, as far as we could see, thronged the sidewalks, following him on foot to his last resting place, that touched me most, and that his life had been that a good man, great in his goodness to the fellow man, has passed to his reward.
 For the poor, he said, and bless her, and those dear fatigued children, for the help and sympathy she has given so beautifully, through the assistance, to those around her, through distress.
 He was a peaceful Christian life, with a sweet and blissful ending, in the full assurance of His Saviour's love.
 He was a most devoted and indigent husband and father, and such a true friend, who will miss him, but they did not mourn alone. It is a city's loss. But God is good, and merciful, and He will send comfort and strength to those who are left.
 A LOVING FRIEND.

 All the above named churches have services every evening at 8 o'clock.
 Many of our readers have been disappointed in respect to obtaining missionaries, and are obliged to give up their plans for the present. Among these may be mentioned the Churchmen of the Transfiguration and St. Ann's Church. Quite a number of parishes are prevented by various causes from holding missions, while many of the clergy have already expressed their hearty sympathy with the movement, regretting their inability to take part in the present mission.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A MODERN ANTI-PATHY.

The First Opening of the New Portfolio, by OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. 12mo., gilt top, $1.50.

A very engaging book, including a thoroughly interesting story, with "Dapper" and "Reminiscences" full of wit and wit only, which are brilliant in fancy and in wit—a delightful story, which only the success of "Eleanore" and "The Anticrep of the Breakfast-Table" could rival.

BONNYBOROUGH.

A New Story, by Mrs. A. D. W. WATNEY, author of "Faith Gwynne's Outlook," "The Graywork," etc. $1.50.

With England's life and characters, marked by a new and rare tone, rare nobility of spirit and interest which will lead to all the stories that Mrs. Watney has ever written.

THE IDEA OF GOD AS AFFECTED BY MODERN KNOWLEDGE.

By JOHN FINEK, author of "Myths and Myth-Makers." 15mo., $1.00.

This is a sequel to "The Deity of Man," which appeared last year, and produced an impression so impressive that it is shown that the (indivisible) Science and Philosophy are at variance, but that, while the idea of God has been greatly modified by modern knowledge, it has been very much preserved and illuminated.

DARWINISM AND OTHER ESSAYS.

By JOHN FINEK. New and Enlarged Edition. 15mo., $2.00. Mr. Fink has added several papers to those which appeared in the former edition of this book, greatly increasing its value and interest.

MUSIC AMONG THE CLERGY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

A letter under the above heading, published sometime since in THE CHURCHMAN, and turning upon the matter of the musical element in a clergyman's education, as exemplified in the case of the Hartford Theological Seminary (Congregationalist), having been the means of calling out some indications of deep interest in the subject, I am encouraged to offer some account in detail of the work actually carried on at that institution. Without pretending to a knowledge of the inner workings of the faculty, it seems possible to say that there are indications of perfect harmony of action in giving to the art its proper place and its just amount of time. I cannot see that it is over-rated or under-rated. It is neither put on a footing with systematic divinity, nor superficially studied. It is not in the hands of visionary sentimentalists, or of hard headed theologians who see in the possibilities of the art nothing but a drawing-room attraction.

Back of the whole matter lies the very sensible conclusion that, as music is an acknowledged factor in the Christian service, it will some day meet the clergyman face to face, and a problem will have to be solved then and there. If the clergyman be ignorant, he will be helpless; if he be informed, he will be master. Why should not the people have the law at his mouth, "regarding music as well as other things?"

On entering the junior class of the seminary the student is examined in regard to the range and quality of his voice, and his ability to read music. The class will naturally, then, fall into two divisions—those who can read music and those who cannot. The latter members of this class are instructed in the rudiments of harmony and musical form, and begin in this connection the study of hymns, anthems, and chants. By beginning at this point the study of sight reading also, the student enters upon the practical application of what he learns theoretically, and a feature of instruction which by its exceptional advantage, to be mentioned later, is able to turn out men of actual musical experience.

Beginning with the middle class, we come to a regular course of lectures, embracing an outline history of Church music, a sufficient account is given of the art in the Bible. Early Christian music up to Palestrina needs with special attention. The era of the Reformation brings up a point of peculiar interest to these young clergymen of a non-liturgical Church in the emphasis laid upon the study of hymn tunes. The German chorale receives due consideration, and the contrast is made clear between the impressive character of Romish music and the expressive character of Protestant music. The peculiar part taken by congregational music in the history of the Church is fully treated, and the whole subject in its relation to rehearsals, to the choice of hymn books, and further, to the selection of hymn tunes, the congregation singing with organ, aided by a piano, and by a choir, etc., is admirably covered. The advice of the professor, in view of his own experience in all the situations he treats about must necessarily be invaluable. Then the matter of a choir considered as an organization apart is treated, its construction, balance of parts, and the necessity of a given amount of vocal voices composing it come in order, and lead naturally to the question of anthems and anthem singing, the training and placing of a choir, the construction and performance of chants, the chanting choir and chanting congregation. The organ, its construction, its use both as a solo instrument and as an accompaniment, taken up at this stage, the points made being emphasized by illustrations given in one of the churches. All the students are drilled at regular periods in singing chants and hymns, and there is an optional class in harmony which aims to give a thorough practical knowledge of the subject such as is unattainable save by giving it special attention. It were needless for any one to enlarge upon the subject, after having become acquainted with the course laid out. It speaks its own praise. Contrived with great judgment and skill, and carried out by a gentleman of thorough ability, its good effects, it seems to me, can hardly be estimated. As I have, perhaps somewhat imperfectly, sketched it, this scheme includes a careful survey of the history of sacred music, the principles of harmony, of form, of the composition and performance of the choral body, whatever it be, under whatever circumstances placed, and however led and accompanied. The education of the mind, however, is not all; for, as if the taste were not clearly enough cultivated indirectly by this course of study, there is connected with the seminary a mixed chorus of about two hundred voices under the training and public direction of the professor of music, which render the highest class of sacred compositions, accompanied by orchestra and organ. Most of the students of the seminary are members of this chorus, and consequently have a rare opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the highest example of the art they have studied. The mind of the ear, the ear the critics school in have all been trained; and while the men who come from this school would not pretend to be skilled musicians, they certainly have been furnished with remarkably good opportunities for becoming good judges of public performances, and it is questionable whether they do not have, as far as the ear is concerned, the edge of the art in general as that possessed by great numbers of avowedly professional musicians. Among the great works done publicly and with success by this choral body have been the Messiah, the Creation, Mendelssohn's 42d and 50th Psalms, Schubert's Mass in G, Schumann's Advent Hymn, Max Bruch's Jubilate, and Handel's Utrecht oratorio, and part of Bach's Christmas Oratorio. And yet this course of study, attractive in itself, and calling one's attention by the novelty of the place it occupies, is simply in the place where it belongs, and is neither more nor less than it ought to be. To some extent, at least, it might well be copied by every theological school in the country. At the present time still more attention is being paid to sight-reading, the men who enter the seminary being as deficient in that branch as the usual run of men in general. One of the greatest helps for the building of a thoroughly good taste have been found in the Evangelical Hymnal, a work that, as yet, too good for the common use of the average congregation. Beginning with this year, the professor of music will lecture on Liturgies (in the technical sense of "the science of conducting public worship"). His lectures on musical history and on practical Church music will follow a general discussion of the whole subject of public worship, experience having shown that his views about music are but imperfectly understood, without being thus correlated with more general principles. Private lessons are offered the students in voice-building, singing, and pianoforte and organ-playing at a nominal price. The seminary has a fair two-manual organ, and Mr. Brotherhod's technique, also, has been put in, which may eventually become part of the apparatus of the institution. To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Pratt has had a somewhat unique task in laying out the scheme of work in his department, and it seems as if his pioneer work, much of which has been necessarily tentative, by the way he looked back upon, when this whole subject receives its proper consideration, as a foundation laid with rare discernment and ability.

W. C. RICHARDSON.

Hartford, Conn.

SUBSTANTIAL WORSHIP.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Church has used to beg for God's own, while her worship is unsubstantial and because it is so.

Have doctors and pastors taught that substantial worship is the only true worship for men, and do they persuade them thus to honour and serve God?

As the Children of Israel were not to leave their substance behind when they went to worship God; so all who would now give the Lord His honor must bring up offerings and come into His courts.

The Lord is mocked by bare lip service; by shadowy words or gestures. We must honour Him with our substance, and with the fruits of all our increase, or we come before Him empty. This truth must be kept before the Church which is in a covetous and unbelieving world. While we neglect the plain truth, that God's worship must be substantial, in vain are all essays on the most fitting all plans for clerical support; all lamentations over impoverished missions.

"None shall appear before me empty," was not said to men as Israelites, but to Israelites as men. All men are entrusted with substance for the acknowledgment and service of God, and we are proved by our use of it.

If a man were a spirit, then unsubstantial worship might suffice; but while he is, and is in, his flesh, he cannot serve God without using his substance for God.

"God is a spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and truth." The worship itself is the offering, and use of his substance for it, and that must not be more lifeless in form, but heartily rendered in spirit, as a living sacrifice. Can it be "in truth" if in words and gestures only? Nay, for what we regard as true, we build our substance upon. The new version has a marginal reading of Heb. xi., 1: "Faith is the giving substance."

Our worship must be substantial or it is not manly; and manly worship must be spirited and true, as unto the living God.

Substantial worship is demanded for the honor of God, and man can neither wholly trust in Him, nor fully enjoy His gifts, until he renders it.

A valiant brother writes, "The Church seems to be held in the bonds of a false system." "Until the general Church legislates upon the whole matter any attempt to change it will be regarded as singular and eccentric, and the rector adopting it would probably hurt his influence." "While the present system is maintained for it is the best, the Church by judicious legislation has been committed to a better. It is a folly to attempt a change in individual parishes." This is a sad witness and not encouraging for those whose rule is, "What saith the Scripture?"

A prominent bishop writes, "I feel at times that we ought to give up every other way, and commit the work of the Church and the support of the clergy to the one true plan of tithes and offerings." I hope the good bishop will make the next General Convention feel as he does. It will deliver many souls, and especially relieve those who practice what they know to be scriptural. Brethren of the clergy, do not let the voice of the only manly worship be substantial worship! If but ten families in a parish worshipped substantially, as the Lord prospered them, their clergymen would fare better and be more content, without any stipulated salary, than most of the clergy now are whose salaries, if raised, are not of faith, nor by grace, but by law, and the support of the work. "Prere me now herewith says the Lord."

Worship among the poor and at missions should be scriptural from the start. Offerings "according to that a man hath abundance" should be the basis of the work. "Prere me now herewith says the Lord."

Please, Mr. Editor, print the words SUBSTANTIAL WORSHIP as large as possible. We must teach it, and talk of it, and print it, until the attention of the Church is gained, for the way of our escape from the present prevailing system of "begging" for God's own is a manly, that is, in a substantial worship."

CHAS. R. BONVELL.

P. S.—A small tract on Substantial Worship may be found at Jas. Hammond's, 1234 Chestnut street, Philadelphia. It is there set for sale, but for distribution.

NEW BOOKS.

THE STORY OF GRECE, by Prof. James A. Harrison. Washington and Lee University, (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.) pp. 515. Price $1.50.

We have but one fault to find with Professor Harrison's lively outline of Grecian history for the young, and that is his rather too frequent use of slang. It is political slang withal, and that detracts from the merit of any book, which is meant to be permanent, because there is no slang which is more evanescent and utterly meaningless when the occasion for it has passed. There is no objection to using phrases consecrated by history, as "Tory" and "Whig," "Cavalier" and "Roundhead," to illustrate classic politics. These serve to bind together history, and will touch the imagination of a lively boy. But such phrases as "Jay-hawkers," "Mugwumps," which are here-to-day and gone to-morrow, are blemies, especially as they do not add to the vigor of the story. We suspect that this has come from the attempt to be over-colloquial, a fault somewhat on the right side, but which is a fault when it is excessive. The true narrative style is that of the story-teller, a sustained flow, with only just enough of variety to keep the attention. De Foë was master of that art, so was Charles Lamb. The one thing a boy wants in his reading is to "get on," to know what happened next. There are two sorts of slang, moreover, one which, like royal bastards, is presently legitimated by act of Parliament, and takes its place in the peamage of language; and another, which is of common founding origin, and is thrown upon the streets. Professor Harrison has not been sufficiently discriminating between the two. We think this a pity, for in other respects we like his book much, and we have always a good word for literature which will elevate the tone of juvenile reading. We want the taste of boys and girls raised above the very vulgar and destructive stuff of which there is altogether too much printed and sold. The "Boys' Herodotus" and the "Boys' Froissart" are capital models of what should be.

HISTORIC BOYS, Their Endavors, Their Achievements, and Their Times. By E. S. Brooks. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 259.

There are twelve lives of boys in this collection, beginning with Marcus Aurelius, and ending with Van Rensselaer, the boy Patriot. Two at least of the series might almost be called "paw historic boys," for Bryan, of Munster, and Olaf, of Norway, can hardly be called unedulatory. At least, the greater part of their sayings and doings in these pages are purely imaginary. This, however, will apply to nearly all the characters of the volume. Accepted as "fiction founded on fact," these are graceful and well drawn sketches, and so far as we can see will give a tolerably correct idea of the times in which these various youths had their boyhood. At least it will stimulate historical and biographical reading, and that is a point very much desired. The other lives are those of William of Norway, Baldwin of Jerusalem, Frederick of Hohenstaufen, Harry of Monmouth, Giovanni of Florence, Ixtlil of Tezcuco, Louis of Bourbon, Charles of Sweden. We presume that it will be understood by most readers who these are in history, but for fear they should not be, we may add that William is William the Conqueror; Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem; Frederick was Frederick II., Emperor of Germany; Harry of Monmouth, Henry V., of England; Giovanni, of Florence, Pope Leo the Tenth; Louis of Bourbon, Louis XIV., of France, and Charles of Sweden, the Charles, Charles XII. Ixtlil was the last reigning Aztec prince. The last history, that of the Van Rensselaer is probably much the most authentic, and has some touch of history. But as all boys need an ideal hero, it is much better to go for the same to such volumes, rather than to the dime fiction counter, and we might suggest for the benefit of our quite young readers, that it is not easy to unko a boy's life interesting or instructive without drawing a good deal upon the imagination.

THE DAYS OF MAKEMIE; or, the Vine Planted A. D. 1688-1708. With an appendix by the Rev. L. P. Bower, n. d. [Philadelphia: Presbyterian Board of Publication.] pp. 326.

Dr. Bower has given here a queer hybrid between a novel and a biography. Francis Makemie was the father of Presbyterianism in the Virginia colony. Probably very few would have cared to read his story as a record of his life, so it is thrown into a novel form. This has the great advantage of allowing almost unlimited opportunities of saying the harshest things possible of Episcopalians and Quakers. If the days of Makemie are to be trusted as real days, the sole possession of a true faith and a vital piety, so far as the American colonies were concerned, must have chiefly centered in the Scotch Presbyterians filtered through Ulster, in Ireland, to this side of the Atlantic. If an Episcopalian had written this book concerning the Presbyterians, we should not hesitate to describe it as spiteful; but as it is issued by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, we must take it for granted that it describes the actual state of the "Establishment" in the days of Makemie, and we are thankful that in England and this country "Prelatists" have so far improved as to be obnoxious to the same degree of censure. At least Churchmen have left off "persecuting" Presbyterians as they used to do about that same date in the colony of Connecticut, when the first Presbyterian (or Congregationalist) missionary who attempted to minister in Stratford, was "boycotted" by the bigoted "Church of England men" to that degree that he had to go in an open boat to Long Island to get provisions for his family. At least something of the sort happened, though we may have possibly got the ecclesiastical relations of the parties confused. Col. Caleb Heathcote, if living, could tell something about it. But then, if one side persecuted, it was in conformity to the spirit of the age; if the other side did so, it was (to use a polite phrase) "disinterested malignity."

AMERICAN COMMONWEALTHS.—KANSAS: The Prelude to the War for the Union. By Leverett W. Spring. Professor in English Literature in the University of Kansas. [Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Company.] pp. 384. Price $1.25.

The history of Kansas is both fiery and bloody. It is not a pleasant or inspiring story. It is the record of mutual wrong and violence, of political trickery, of open disregard of law, and this with very little of counterbalancing nobility of action. That out of this confused and base struggle of "border ruffians" and jay-hawkers, has come a peaceful and intelligent community, is a remarkable testimony to the recuperative power of the American people. It is almost an argument for evolution. The State of Kansas shows to-day little trace of its origin. Twenty years have transformed it from the wildest of frontier regions, where the armed hand was the chief safeguard for life and property, into a law-abiding and industrious region. This volume says but little of the processes by which the past has become the present, it is mainly made up of the history of the early struggles out of which Kansas has emerged. Of course this has been brought about by the vast influx of a better order of citizens. Just as the San Francisco of to-day has scarcely a trace of the encampment of "Forty-nine" upon the hills of Yerba Buena, so the Kansas of 'eighty five is another land from that which was blackened and reddened by the fires and massacres of a quarter of a century ago. That the strife in Kansas was, as the title of this book declares, the prelude to the War for the Union, is fairly made out in these pages. It is so far the justification of the South, provided that the institution of slavery can be upheld as right. The great verdict of the nation, North and South alike, has recognized that the abolition of slavery was a blessing, and that out of the unquestionable evil has come a larger good and a grander development for the whole nation than would have been possible without its untoward beginnings.

SAKOONLAL, OR THE LOST RING; An Indian drama translated into English prose and verse from the Sakuntal of Kalidasa. By Homer Williams, M. A., Professor of Sanskrit at the East India College, Haileybury, formerly Rector in the University of Oxford. [New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.] pp. 256.

Mr. Williams has done good service by this translation. It is understood that this is the best of the East Indian dramas, and it goes without saying that Mr. Williams has done all that he could to give an effective rendering. One can therefore judge of the Hindoo literature fairly from this specimen, and when we say that Mr. Williams has done good service to letters, we mean that he has pricked the bubble of Oriental reputation, which writers like Mr. Edmund Arnold and others have blown. Instead of European embroidery on Asiatic material, we get the genuine article. It is a literary curiosity, but it is no more. It is childish in its conception and execution. As a story it does not come up to the level of the fairy tales which make the folk lore of the Western nations. As a drama, it is commonplace. There is always supernatural machinery at hand to meet every emergency. The humor, which is thrown in by way of relief, is of a kind which hardly comes up to that of "Gammer Gurton's Needle." We say this advisedly, because we believe that a most unwarranted glamour has been thrown over Indian thought in the interest of a school which hopes to prove Christianity a plagiarism upon Buddhism. We can only bid our readers to put "Sakoonlal" besides the "Tempest," or the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and they can never be in much danger of supposing that India anticipated the New Testament. Having said this as a matter of duty, we can say that there is in good deal that is pretty and striking in "Sakoonlal," and as an East India drama it is interesting. It is far above what one is taught to believe the average of Asiatic performances—Chinese or Japanese.

A STRONG MINDED WOMAN; or, Two Years After. By William A. Hammond, Author of "Lal," etc. [New York: D. Appleton & Co.] pp. 308. Price $1.50.

The readers of "Lal" will have an opportunity to know what has become of some of their old acquaintances. The scene is transferred from Colorado to New York, we think somewhat to the increase of the interest. As is usual with Dr. Hammond, the novel is made the vehicle for carrying a good many of his personal opinions on questions of the day. We do not think his ideas will satisfy the ladies who endeavored to vote at the last election, but his moderate conservatism is not far from the general opinion. He would give to woman all the privileges in the way of education that she desires. He would not encourage co-education. He would make occupations, especially medical practice, free to her as she desires it. But he sees this, and everybody except a few obstinate niggers sees it also, that woman cannot enter upon a competition with man without one of two results. Either she must give up all rights as a woman and ask no feminine favor, or she must be so protected as to give her the practical monopoly of the business whatever it is. To put the matter in a metaphorical phrase, "She wants to go a fishing, but man must dig the worms and bait the hooks—and take the fish off."

There is evidently a good deal of personal satire in this story, and we fancy one could make out a very fair case of libel by writing against the names of the personages, their representatives in society—or by publishing a "key" after the manner of the early editions of Vivian Grey." We are glad to find that Dr. Hammond stands up manfully for good

English, and insists upon it as a mark of good breeding, and that he declaims the pedagogic pedantry of abounding the usual colloquial contractions and elisions as "don't" for "do not." We think this a better story than "Lal," more natural, and more agreeable reading.

HIDDEN SWEETNESS. The Poems of Mary Bradley. The Illustrations from Drawings by Dorothy Holroyd. [Boston: Roberts Brothers.] pp. 64. Price $1.50.

If the sweetness in these exquisite verses is "hidden" and the grace and loveliness in the illustrations invisible, so much the worse for the one who fails to see. We have had to use some scant measure of praise for many of the volumes of verse committed to us for review. We have done so with reluctance, because we know how dear to an author's heart is the work of his pen and that none can be so sensitive as he or she who has fancied the possession of the poetic gift. It is with real pleasure that we welcome a volume wherein poetic thought and poetic expression are fitly united. The authoress has found the secret of concentrated feeling without the overflow of many words. We will not say that this is great poetry, but that it is simply perfect in its degree. There is no declining into commonplace (the chief peril of women poets), and there is no aiming at the overstrained word-twisting which is the prevailing vice of the day. Each poem is brief enough to suffer no wasting of the leading idea, and clear enough to show just what it is. There was a lovely thing to be said, and she has said it and there stopped just at the right place. There is, too, the unmistakable tone of true feeling—nothing simulated, nothing manufactured—in this volume. One feels that it has been written out of the heart, and that a heart purified and touched by a real sorrow.

The Illustrations are lovely bits of New England nature, field, flowers, catkins, birds' nests and the like, adorned with a thorough fitness to the verses they border. We do not believe that a lovelier volume for the Christmas tide will be found on the book-counters, and we are glad to have the opportunity to say this.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

SOME NOTED PRICES, AUTHORS AND STATUSES OF OUR TIME. By Canon Farrar, James T. Field, Archibald Forbes, K. P. Whipple, James Parton, Louise Chandler Moulton, and others. Edited by James Parton. [New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.]

The names above of the illustrious people who have contributed to this volume would be a surety for its success, even were its subjects not as interesting as they are. Of course space has forbidden elaborate accounts of the principal men of our times, but much care has been bestowed upon the sketches of their lives and deeds. The accompanying illustrations are mostly excellent.

SONGS AND RHYMES FOR THE LITTLE OXEN. Compiled by Mary T. Morrison ["Jennie Wallace."] [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.]

The little children who are so fortunate as to receive this volume for a Christmas present, will find an endless source of amusement between its leaves on every conceivable subject that children love to read and hear about. Dolls, cats, Bowers, birds and other little children tell pleasing stories in verse, which are illustrated by marginal pictures daintily colored. The verses have been collected from the writings of some of the best known authors in this country.

THE CELESTIAL COUNTRY. From the Rhythm of St. Bernard of Cluny. Translated by the Rev. John Mason Neale, D. D., with four illustrations by J. H. Gratecap. [New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.]

The inspired verses collected in this volume are full of the sorrows of earth, and the most exalted triumph of heaven. The illustrations are very fine reproductions of photographs, and the publishers have taken great pains in the technical work of the volume to reproduce the "spirit" of the translator. Certainly the "setting" is all that could be desired "for a very fair jewel."

THE ANNOTATOR OF THE NURSERY. By L. T. Mead, with forty illustrations, by T. Pym. [New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son.]

This is a story of the life and every-day doings of five little children, who lived and played and interested the weary hours of a little motherless boy by telling these stories. How successful they are, is only to be measured by the interest they excite in other children. Of this we can imagine no limit. Mr. Crane's illustrations add much to the charm of the stories. The cover of the book, designed by the former artist, is a "picture" in itself.

BASIC & BASIC STORIES. By Mrs. Barton Harrison, illustrated by Walter Crane. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.]

Mrs. Harrison, a versatile and pleasing writer, has gathered together a number of folk tales, legends and fairy stories of many nations. These she has clothed in her own graceful language, and "makes believe" that the many ornaments of a very bric-a-brac parlor in New York, takes it upon themselves to charm, and laughed and cried in the nursery of an old English house. The incidents are illustrated by numerous charming little pictures. The book is one of the handsomest and most attractive of the holiday series.

LITERATURE.

ESTES & LATRIAT, Boston, in their reprint of Carlyle's choice works have given us in one volume "Sartor Resartus, or the Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh." A new generation will read it with interest.

THE Living Age continues to hold the first rank among our eclectic magazines. Weekly or quarterly, it furnishes the very best of the current literature of Europe, with occasional forays into the home field. If one can have but one magazine, commend us to the Living Age, for it gives the cream of all, and is a library in itself.

AN ORIGINAL BELLE. A Novel

By E. P. Roe. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

"An Original Belle" is strong as a novel and interesting in the history which is contained in it, and the lesson shown by the story, that the gay life of a fashionable belle is as nothing compared with the satisfaction and usefulness of a life where the true woman is disclosed and the untrue discarded. . . . can be taken home by many to-day, though the incidents of the novel occurred twenty years ago."—Boston Times.

TIRYNS:
THE PREHISTORIC PALACE OF THE KINGS OF TIRYNS. THE RESULTS OF THE LATEST EXCAVATIONS.

By DR. HENRY SCHLIEMANN, author of "Mycenae," "Ilios," etc. The preface by Professor F. Adler, and contributions by Wilhelm Dörpfeld. With 148 wood-cuts, 41 plates in chromolithography, 1 map, and 4 plans. 1 vol., royal octavo, $10.00.
Published simultaneously in England, France, Germany, and America.

"The great debt which modern scholarship owes to Dr. Schliemann for his discoveries is still further increased by this new book. . . . The results of the excavations at Tiryns will be especially valuable for the light they throw upon the architecture of the pre-Homerics."—Boston Transcript.

THE NEW ILLUSTRATED
RUDDER GRANGE. Newly Illustrated by A. B. Frost. One vol., 12mo, $2.

"It is possible that there are readers and buyers of books who have not yet made the acquaintance of 'Rudder Grange'; it is, it is hard to tell whether they are proper objects of pity or of scorn for having lost so much enjoyment, or for the promise that is still in store for them."—Phila. Times.
"Mr. Frost's drawings emphasize the text in the most welcome manner."—Boston Gazette.

BRIC-A-BRAC STORIES. By Mrs. Burton Harrison. Illustrated by Walter Crane. One vol., 12mo, $2.

"Few volumes will receive a warmer welcome from children. . . . It is a pleasure to see Mr. Crane's illustrations to say that they harmonize with the stories. We confess to have been led by the book into a forgetfulness of time, care, and pretty much every thing, for two consecutive hours."—Christian Intelligencer.

CHILDREN'S STORIES IN AMERICAN HISTORY.

By HENRIETTA CASSEY. Illustrated by J. STEPHEN DAVIS. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.
"A collection of thrilling stories of America's history which the book indubitably impresses on the child's mind."—Brookings Union.

AFTERNOON SONGS. By JULIA C. R. DORA. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

The new volume contains Mrs. Dorr's poems of the year since her former collection, "Frier Anselm's." The title embodies a fancy of the author that these are afternoon songs of life.

FAITH AND RATIONALISM. With short supplementary essays on Related Topics. By GEORGE F. FISHER, D.D. 1 vol., 12mo, 75 cents.

A new edition of this valuable book for popular circulation. Prof. Fisher adds a new introduction and additional observations on the Atonement, etc.

In selecting a Prayer Book either for use or a present, care should be taken not only to secure attractive binding, but attention should be paid to the type and the paper used. There is a great difference in the several editions published. The "OXFORD" editions are printed on an opaque paper made in their own paper mills from pure linen, and the plates from which the books are printed are kept in perfect repair, thus doing away with such defects as broken letters or battered lines. Ask your bookseller to show you the "OXFORD" edition, and compare it yourself with any other he may have.

THE SILENT SOUTH. Together with the Freedman's Loan System. By GEORGE W. CARLE. With Portrait. 12mo, $1.

Mr. Carle, in this little book, makes a strong and anxious defense of the rights of the negro. He presents facts which will prove a revelation to those who have not made a special study of the subject. He draws his statistics, which are striking in the extreme, from official documents, and offers indisputable evidence that will create a sensation among the thinking friends of the freedmen.

THE BEST PERIODICALS FOR FAMILY READING.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION AND A PICTURE HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES.
Subscription per Year, $4.00.

THE THIRTIETH VOLUME will begin with the Number dated January 2, 1886, issued on December 30, 1885.

HARPER'S WEEKLY justifies its title as "A Journal of Civilization" by reflecting, with steadily increasing fulness and accuracy, the progress of civilization, and by embodying as well as by recording the continuous advance of American literature and American art.

It presents, in faithful and graphic pictures, the noteworthy events of the day, portraits of men of the time, reproductions of the works of celebrated artists, cartoons by eminent pictorial satirists, and humorous illustrations of the ludicrous aspects of social and political life.

Besides the pictures, HARPER'S WEEKLY is full of good reading. It always contains instalments of one, occasionally of two, of the best novels of the day, with fine illustrations. Its short stories are bright and entertaining. Poems, sketches, and papers on important topics of current interest by the most popular writers, and columns of humorous and personal paragraphs, make it interesting to everybody.

As a family journal, the care that has been successfully exercised in the past to make HARPER'S WEEKLY a safe, as well as a welcome, visitor to every household will not be relaxed in the future. The ultimate influence of the subjects treated in its text and in its illustrations is not less considered than their immediate public interest. It is conducted in the belief that such scenes as would be repulsive or brutalizing to persons witnessing them cannot form fit subjects for literary or pictorial representation.

PRESS NOTICES.

A thoroughly able, instructive, and entertaining journal for the household. Its general news is well selected, its editorials are judicious and vigorous, its stories are of high interest, its moral tone is unexceptionable, and its illustrations are as famous as they deserve to be.—Congressionalist, Boston.

For years the WEEKLY has enjoyed the distinction of being the best illustrated paper in America, and every successive volume shows new strength and enterprise.—Boston Transcript.

The ablest and most powerful illustrated periodical published.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

It should be in every family throughout the land. A purer, more interesting, higher toned, better illustrated paper is not published in this or any other country.—Commercial Bulletin, Boston.

The only illustrated paper of the day that, in its essential characteristics, is recognized as a national paper.—Brooklyn Eagle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

AN ILLUSTRATED JOURNAL OF FASHION, INSTRUCTION, AND DOMESTIC ECONOMY.
Subscription per Year, $4.00.

THE NINETEENTH VOLUME will begin with the Number dated January 2, 1886, issued on December 18, 1885.

HARPER'S BAZAR offers a host of brilliant attractions designed to interest every member of the family circle. It combines the choicest literature and the finest illustrations with the latest fashions, the most useful household knowledge, and all the arts that make home attractive. Its weekly plates of the latest Paris and New York styles, with well-fitting patterns, and descriptions of the materials and styles in vogue, enable ladies to save many times the cost of subscription by being their own dressmakers. It spreads the changes of fashion throughout the land. Its articles on household matters are from the best sources, and are eminently practical. Its papers on social etiquette are of the highest interest. Much attention is paid to art decoration, and exquisite embroidery designs are published, together with the latest and most interesting art novelties.

The literary excellence of HARPER'S BAZAR is beyond dispute. Its serial stories are by acknowledged masters of fiction. Its pithy editorials are marked by good sense, and its short stories, poems, essays, and other matter are the best of the kind. Not a line is ever printed in its columns that could offend the most fastidious taste.

The fine art illustrations of HARPER'S BAZAR, from the best native and foreign artists, form a marked feature of the journal, as do the bright, humorous cuts which have won it the name of the American Punch. No pains or cost will be spared to maintain the high standard of the paper.

PRESS NOTICES.

HARPER'S BAZAR is not only an authority in the world of fashion and on matters relating to the home, but it also contains in every number an abundance of useful and entertaining reading of general interest.—Observer, N. Y.

To take it is a matter of economy. No lady can afford to be without it.—Chicago Evening Journal.

Par excellence the ladies' paper of the country, a mirror of fashion, a minister of comfort and ornament in the family.—The Watchman, Boston.

It has become an established authority with the ladies of America.—N. Y. Evening Post.
A welcome visitor in thousands of homes.—N. Y. Tribunes.

The arbiter and instructor in taste, fashion, and household economy.—Providence Journal.

The very best family paper in the country.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

"And Enoch, also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied, saying, The Lord cometh."—JUDS. 1, 14.

On the freshness of Earth's morning,

Like some distant signal gun,

Broke th' ascending prophet's warning,

Echoing on till set of sun:

The Lord cometh!

Ran the message through the ages—

"King and prophet waited long"—

Till the shepherds and the sages

Saw the star and heard the song:

The Lord cometh!

Now the Earth is old; no longer

Hope's illusions gild her sky;

But the Church's faith grows stronger,

For she hears the distant cry:

The Lord cometh!

Nearer yet, and yet more glorious,

Soon this signal shall appear;

And th' archangel's trump victorious

Summon Heaven and Hell to hear:

The Lord cometh!

WHAT'S MINE'S MINE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

"Where are you from, Ian?" said the chief at length, in a voice broken with gladness.

All Valentine understood of the question, for it was in Gaelic, was its emotion, and he scorned a fellow to show the least sign of breaking down.

"Straight from Moscow," answered the new-comer. "How is our mother?"

"Well, Ian, thank God!"

"Then, thank God, all is well!"

"What brought you home in such haste?"

"I had a bad dream about my mother, and was a little anxious. There was more reason too, which I will tell you afterwards."

"What were you doing in Moscow! Have you got a furlough?"

"To tell the truth, I am a sort of deserter. I would have thrown up my commission, but had not a chance. In Moscow I was teaching in a school to keep out of the way of the police. But I will tell you all by and by."

The voice was low, veiled, and sad; the joy of the meeting rippled through it like a brook.

The brothers had forgotten the stranger, and stood talking till the patience of Valentine was as much exhausted as his strength.

"Are you going to stand there all night?" he said at last. "This is no doubt very interesting to you, but it is rather a bore to one who can neither see you, nor understand a word you say."

"Is the gentleman a friend of yours, Alister?" asked Ian.

"Not exactly.—But he is a Sasunnach," he concluded in English, "and we ought not to be speaking Gaelic."

"I beg his pardon," said Ian. "Will you introduce me?"

"It is impossible; I do not know his name. I never saw him, and don't see him now. But he insists on my company."

"That is a great compliment. How far?"

"To the New House."

"I paid him a shilling to carry my bag," said Valentine. "He took the shilling, and was going to walk off with my bag!"

"Well?"

"Well indeed! Not at all well! How was I to know—"

"But he didn't—did he?" said Ian, whose voice seemed now to tingle with amusement. "—Alister, you were wrong."

It was an illogical face-about, but Alister responded at once.

"I know it," he said. "The moment I heard your voice, I knew it.—How is it, Ian?"—here he fell back into Gaelic—"that when you are by me, I know what is right so much quicker? I don't understand it. I meant to do right, but—"

"But your pride got up. Alister, you always set out well—nobly—and then comes the devil's turn! Then you begin to do as if you repented! You don't carry the thing right straight out. I hate to see the devil make a fool of a man like you! Do you not know that in your own country you owe a stranger hospitality?"

"My own country!" echoed Alister with a groan.

"Yes, your own country—and perhaps more yours than it was your grandfather's! You know who said, 'The meek shall inherit the earth!' If it be not ours in God's way, I for one would not care to call it mine another way. But we must not keep the gentleman standing while we talk!"

"Thank you," said Valentine. "The fact is, I'm dead beat."

"Have you anything I could carry for you?" asked Ian.

"No, I thank you.—Yes; there! if you don't mind taking my gun?—you speak like a gentleman!"

"I will take it with pleasure," said Ian. He took the gun, and they started.

"If you choose, Alister," said his brother, again in Gaelic, "to break through conventionalities, you must not expect people to allow you to creep inside them again the moment you please."

But the young fellow's fatigue had touched Alister.

"Are you a big man?" he said, taking Valentine gently by the arm.

"Not so big as you, I'll lay you a sovereign," answered Valentine, wondering why he should ask.

"Then look here!" said Alister; "you get astride my shoulders, and I'll carry you home. I believe you're hungry, and that takes the pith out of you!—Come," he went on, perceiving some sign of reluctance in the youth, "you'll break down if you walk much farther!—Here, Ian! you take the bag; you can manage that and the gun too!"

Valentine murmured some objection; but the brothers took the thing so much as a matter of course, and he felt so terribly exhausted—for he had lost his way, and been out since the morning—that he yielded.

Alister doubled himself on his heels; Valentine got his weary legs over his stalwart shoulders; the chief rose with him as if he had been no heavier than mistress Conal's creel, and bore him along much relieved in his aching limbs.

So little was the chief oppressed by his burden, that he and his brother kept up a stream of conversation, every now and then forgetting their manners and gliding off into Gaelic, but as often recollecting themselves, apologizing, and starting afresh upon the path of English. Long before they reached the end of their journey, Valentine, able from his perch to listen in some measure of ease, came to understand that he had to do, not with rustics, but, whatever their peculiarities, with gentlemen of a noteworthy sort.

The brothers, in the joy of their reunion, talked much of things at home and abroad, avoiding things personal and domestic as often as they spoke English; but when they saw the lights of the New House, a silence fell upon them. At the door, Alister set his burden carefully down.

"There!" he said with a laugh. "I hope I have earned my shilling!"

"Ten times over," said Valentine; "but I know better now than offer to pay you. I thank you with all my heart."

The door opened, Ian gave the gun and the bag to the butler, and the brothers bade Valentine good-night.

Valentine had a strange tale to tell. Sercombe refused to accept his conclusions; if he had offered the men half a crown apiece, he said, they would have pocketed the money.

CHAPTER VII.

Mother and Son.

The sun was shining bright, and the laird was out in his fields. His oats were nearly ready for the scythe, and he was judging where he had best begin to cut them.

His fields lay chiefly along the banks of the stream, occupying the whole breadth of the valley on the east side of the ridge where the cottage stood. On the west side of the ridge; nearly parallel to, and not many yards from it, a small brook ran to join the stream: this was a march betwixt the chief's land and Mr. Peregrine Palmer's. Their respective limits were not everywhere so well defined.

The air was clear and clean, and full of life. The wind was asleep. A consciousness of work approaching completion filled earth and air—a mood of calm expectation, as of a man who sees his end drawing nigh, and awaits the saving judgment of the Father of Spirits. There was no song of birds—only a crow from the yard, or the cry of a blackcock from the hill; the two streams were left to do all the singing, and they did their best, though their water was low. The day was of the evening of the year; in the full sunshine was present the twilight and the coming night, but there was a sense of readiness on all sides. The fruits of the earth must be housed; that alone remained to be done.

When the laird had made up his mind, he turned toward the house—a lowly cottage, more extensive than many farm-houses, but looking no better. It was well built, with an outside wall of rough stone and lime, and another wall of turf within, lined in parts with wood, making it as warm a nest as any house of the size could be. The door, picturesque with abundant repair, opened by a latch into the kitchen.

For long years the floor of the kitchen had been an earthen one, with a fire on a hearth in the middle of it, as in all the cottages; and the smoke rose into the roof, keeping it very dry and warm, if also very sooty, and thence into the air through a hole in the middle. But some ten years before this time, Alister and Ian, mere lads, had built a chimney outside, and opening the wall, removed the hearth to it—with the smoke also, which now had its own private way to liberty. They then paved the floor with such stones as they could find, in the fields and on the hill, sufficiently flat and smooth on one side, and by sinking them according to their thickness, managed to get a tolerably even surface. Many other improvements followed; and although it was a poor place still, it would at the time of Dr. Johnson's visit to the highlands have been counted a good house, not to be despised by unambitious knight or poor baronet. Nor was the time yet over when ladies and gentlemen, of all courtesy and good breeding, might be found in such houses.

In the kitchen a deal-dresser, scoured white, stood under one of the tiny windows, giving light enough for a clean-souled cook—and what window-light would ever be enough for one of a different sort? There were only four panes in it, but it opened and closed with a button, and so was superior to many windows. There was a larger on the opposite side, which at times in the winter nights when the cold was great, they filled bodily with a barricade of turf. Here, in the kitchen, the chief takes his meals with his lady-mother. She and Ian have finished their breakfast, and gone to the other end of the house; the laird broke his fast long ago.

A fire is burning on the hearth—small, for the midday-meal is not yet on its way. Everything is tidy; the hearth is swept up, and the dishes are washed; the bare-footed girl is reaching the last of them to its place on the rack behind the dresser. She is a red-haired, blue-eyed Celt, with a pretty face, and a refinement of motion and speech rarer in some other peasantry.

The chief enters, and takes down an old-fashioned gun from the wall. He wants a bird or two, for Ian's home-coming is a great event.

"I saw a big stag last night down by the burn, sir," said the girl, "feeling as if he had been the red cow."

"I don't want him to-day, Nancy," returned her master. "Had he big horns?"

"Great horns, sir; but it was too dark to count the tines."

"When was it! Why did you not tell me?"

"I thought it was morning, sir, and when I got up it was the middle of the night. The moon was so shiny that I went to the door and looked out. Just at the narrow leap, I saw him plain."

"If you should see him again, Nancy, scare him. I don't want the Saunnachs at the New House to see him."

"Hadh't you better take him yourself, Macruadh? He would make fine hams for the winter!"

"Mind your own business, Nancy, and hold your tongue," said the chief, with a smile that took all the harshness from the words. "Don't you tell anyone you saw him. For what you know he may be the big stag!"

"Sure no one would kill him, sir!" said the girl aghast.

"I hope not. But get the stoving-pot ready, Nancy; I'm going to find a hird or too. Lest I should not succeed, have a couple of chickens at hand."

"Sir, the mistress has commanded them already."

"That is well; but do not kill them except I am not back in time."

"I understand, sir."

Macruadh knew the stag as well as the horse he rode, and that his habit had for some time been to come down at night and feed on the small border of rich grass on the south side of the burn, between it and the abrupt heathery rise of the hill. For there the burn ran so near the hill, and the ground was so covered with huge masses of gray rock, that there was hardly room for cultivation, and the bank was left in grass.

The stalking of the stag was the passion of the highlander in that part of the country. He cared little for shooting the grouse, black or red, and almost despised those whose ambition was a full bag of such game; but he dreamed day and night of killing deer. The chief, however, was in this matter more of a man without being less of a highlander. He loved the deer so much, saw them so much a part of the glory of mountain and sky, sunshine and storm, that he liked to see them living, not dead, and only now and then shot one, when the family had need of it. He felt himself indeed almost the father of the deer as well as of his clan, and mourned greatly that he could do so little now, from the limited range of his property, to protect them. His love for live creatures was not quite equal to that of St. Francis, for he could not have conceived the thought of turning wolf or fox from the error of his ways; but even the creatures that preyed upon others he killed only from a sense of duty, and with no pleasure in their death. The heartlessness of the common type of sportsman was loathsome to him. When there was not much doing on the farm, he would sometimes be out all night with his gun, it is true, but he would seldom fire it, and then only at some beast of prey; on the hill-side or in the valley he would be watching the ways and doings of the many creatures that roam the night—each with its fitting of means to ends. One of the grounds of his dislike to the new possessors of the old land was the raid he feared upon the wild animals.

The laird gone, I will take my reader into the parlor, as they called in English their one sitting-room. Shall I first tell him what the room was like, or first describe the two persons in it? Led up to a picture, I certainly should not look first at the frame; but a description is a process of painting rather than a picture; and when you cannot see the thing in one, but must take each part by itself and in your mind get it into relation with the rest, there is an advantage, I think, in having a notion of the frame first. For one thing, you cannot see the persons without imagining their surroundings, and if those should be unfittingly imagined, they interfere with the truth of the persons, and you may not be able to get them right after.

The room, then, was about fifteen feet by twelve, and the ceiling was low. On the white walls hung a few frames, of which two or three contained water-colors—not very good, but not displeasing; several held miniature portraits—mostly in red coats, and one or two a silhouette. Opposite the door hung a target of hide, round, and bossed with brass. Alister had come upon it in the house covering a meal-barrel, to which service it had probably been put in aid of its eluding a search for arms after the battle of Culloden. Never more to cover man's food from mice, or his person from an enemy, it was raised to the traballa of the parlor. Under it rested, horizontally upon two nails, the sword of the chief—a long and broad Andree Ferrarri, with a plated basket-hilt; beside it hung a dirk—longer than usual, and fine in form, with a carved hilt in the shape of an eagle's head and neck, and its sheath, whose leather was old and flaky with age, heavily mounted in silver. Below these was a card-table of marquetry with spindle-legs, and on it a work-box of ivory, inlaid with silver and ebony. In the corner stood a harp, an Erard, a golden and gracious, not a string of it broken. In the middle of the room was a small square table, covered with a green cloth. An old-fashioned easy chair stood by the chimney; and one sat in it whom to see was to forget her surroundings.

Of middle age she was still beautiful, with the rare beauty that shines from the root of the being. Her hair was of the darkest brown, almost black; her eyes were very dark, and her skin was very fair, though the soft bloom, as of reflected sunset, was gone from her cheek, and her hair showed lines of keen silver. Her features were fine, clear, and regular—the chin a little strong perhaps, not for the size, but the fineness of the rest; her form was that of a younger woman: her hand and foot were long and delicate. A more refined and courteous presence could not have been found in the island. The dignity of her carriage nowise marred its grace, or betrayed the least consciousness; she looked dignified because she was dignified. The form of falsehood which consists in assuming the look of what one fain would be, was as much as any other, impossible to Isabel Macruadh. She wore no cap; her hair was gathered in a large knot near the top of her head. Her gown was of a dark print; she had no ornament except a ring with a single ruby. She was working a bit of net into lace.

She could speak Gaelic as well as any in the glen—perhaps better; but to her sons she always spoke English. To them indeed English was their mother-tongue, in the sense that English only came addressed to themselves from her lips. There were, she said, plenty to teach them Gaelic; she must see to their English.

The one window of the parlor, though not large, was of tolerable size, but little light entered, so shaded was it with a rose-tree in a pot on the sill. By the wall opposite was a couch, and on the couch lay Ian with a book in his hand—a book in a strange language. His mother and he would sometimes be a whole morning together and exchange no more than a word or two, though many a look and smile. It seemed enough for each to be in the other's company. There was a quite peculiar bond between the two. Like so many of the young men of that country, Ian had been intended for the army; but there was in him this much of the spirit of the eagle he resembled, that he passionately loved freedom, and had almost a gypsy's delight in wandering. When he left college he became tutor in a Russian family of distinction; and after that accepted a commission, and served the Czar for three or four years. But wherever he went, he seemed, as he said once to his mother, almost physically aware of a line stretching between him and her, which seemed to vibrate when he grew anxious about her. The bond between him and his brother was equally strong, but in feeling different. Between Alister and him it was a cable; between his mother and him a harpstring; in the one case it was a muscle, in the other a nerve. The one retained, the other drew him. Given to roaming as he was, again and again he returned, from pure love-longing, to what he always felt as the protection of his mother. It was protection indeed that he often sought—protection from his own glooms, which nothing but her love seemed able to tenuate.

He was tall—if an inch above six feet be tall, but not of his brother's fine proportion. He was thin, with long slender fingers and feet like his mother's. His small, strong bones were covered with little more than hard muscle, but every motion of limb or body was grace. At times, when lost in thought and unconscious of movement, an observer might have imagined him in conversation with some one unseen, toward whom he was carrying himself with courtesy: plain it was that courtesy with him was not a graft upon the finest stock, but an essential element. His forehead was rather low, freckled, and crowned with hair of a foxy red; his eyes were of the glass-gray or green loved by our elder poets; his nose was a very eagle in itself—large and fine. He more resembled the mask of the dead Shakespeare than any other I have met, only in him the proportions were a little exaggerated; his nose was a little too large, and his mouth a little too small for the mask; but the mingled sweetness and strength in the curves of the latter prevented the impression of weakness generally given by the association of such a nose and such a mouth. On his short upper lip was a small light moustache, and on his face not a hair more. In rest his countenance wore a great calmness, but a calmness that might seem rooted in sadness.

While the mother might, more than once in a day, differ to fault-finding from her elder-born—whom she admired, notwithstanding, as well as loved, from the bottom of her heart—she was never known to say a word in opposition to the younger. It was even whispered that she was afraid of him. It was not so; but her reverence for Ian was such that, even when she felt bound not to agree with him, she seldom had the confidence that, differing from him, she was in the right. Sometimes in the middle of the night she would slip like a ghost into the room where he lay, and sit by his bed till the black cock, the gray cock, the red cock crew. The son might be awake all the time, and the mother suspect him awake, yet no word passed between them. She would rise and go as she came. Her feeling for her younger son was like that of Hannah for her eldest—intensest love mixed with strangest reverence. But there were vast alternations and inexplicable minglings in her thoughts of him. At one moment she would regard him as gifted beyond his fellows for some great work, at another be filled with a horrible fear that he was in rebellion against the God of his life. Doubtless mothers are far too ready to think their sons above the ordinary breed of sons: self, unpossessed of God, will worship itself in its offspring; yet the sons whom holy mothers have regarded as born to great things and who have passed away without sign, may have gone on toward their great things. Whether this mother thought too much of her son or not, there were questions moving in his mind which she could not have understood—even then when he would creep to her bed in the morning to forget in her arms the terrible dreams of the night, or when at evening he would draw his little stool to her knee, unable or unwilling to enjoy his book anywhere but by her side.

What gave him his unconscious power over his mother, was, first, the things he said, and next, the things he did not say; for he seemed to her to dwell always in a rich silence. Yet throughout was she aware of a something between them, across which they could not meet; it was in part her distress at the seeming impossibility of effecting a spiritual union with her son, that made her so desirous of personal proximity to him; such union is by most thinking people presumed impossible without consent of opinion, and this mistake rendered her unable to feel near him, to be at home with him; if she had believed that they understood each other, that they were of like opinion, she would not have been half so unhappy when he went away, would not have longed half so grievously for his return. Ian on his part understood his mother, but knew she did not understand him, and was therefore troubled. Hence it resulted that always after a time came the hour—which never came to her—when he could endure proximity without oneness no longer, and would suddenly announce his departure. And after a day or two of his absence, the mother would be doubly wretched to find a sort of relief in it, and would spend wakeful nights trying to oust it as the merest fancy, persuading herself that she was miserable, and nothing but miserable, in the loss of her darling.

Naturally then she would turn more to Alister, and his love was a strengthening tonic to her sick motherhood. He was never jealous of either. Their love for each other was to him a love. He too would mourn deeply over his brother's departure, but it became at once his business to comfort his mother. And while she had no suspicion of the degree to which he suffered, it drew her with fresh love to her elder born, and gave her a renewal of the quiet satisfaction in him that was never absent, when she saw how he too missed Ian. Their mutual affection was indeed as true and strong as a mother could desire it. "If such love," she said to herself, "had appeared in the middle of its history instead of now at its close, the transmitted affection would have been enough to bind the clan together for centuries more!"

It was with a prelusive smile that shone on the mother's heart like the opening of heaven, that Ian lowered his book to answer her question. She had said—

"Did you not feel the cold very much at St. Petersburg last winter, Ian?"

"Yes, mother, at times," he answered. "But everybody wears fur; the peasant his sheep-skin, the noble his silver fox. They have to fight the cold! Nose and toes are in constant danger. Did I never tell you what happened to me once in that way? I don't think I ever did!"

"You never tell me anything, Ian!" said his mother, looking at him with a loving sadness.

"I was suddenly stopped in the street by what I took for an unheard-of insult: I actually thought my great proboscis was being pulled! If I had been as fiery as Alister, the man would have found his back, and I should have lost my nose. Without the least warning a handful of snow was thrust in my face, and my nose had not even a chance of smothering with indignation, it found itself so twisted in every direction at once! But I have a way, in any sudden occurrence, of feeling perplexed enough to want to be sure before doing anything, and if it has sometimes kept me from what was expedient, it has often saved me from what was wrong: it took but another instant to understand that it was the promptitude of a fellow Christian to preserve to me my nose, already whitening in frosty death: he was rubbing it hard with snow, the orthodox remedy! My whole face presently sharpened into one burning spot, and taking off my hat, I thanked the man for his most kind attention. He pointed out that any time spent in explaining to me the condition of my nose, would have been pure loss: as the danger was pressing, he attacked it at once! I was indeed entirely unconscious of the state of my beak—the worst symptom of any!"

"I trust, Ian, you will not go back to Russia!" said his mother, after a little more talk about frost-biting. "Surely there is work for you at home!"

"What can I do at home, mother? You have no money to buy me a commission, and I am not much good at farm-work. Alister says I am not worth a horseman's wages!"

"You could find teaching at home: or you could go into the Church. We might manage that, for you would only have to attend the divinity classes."

"Mother! would you put me into one of the priests' offices that I may eat a piece of bread? As for teaching, there are too many hungry students ready for that: I could not take the bread out of their mouths! And in truth, mother, I could not endure it—except it were required of me. I can live on as little as any, but it must be with some liberty. I have surely inherited the spirit of some old sea-rover, it is so difficult for me to rest! I am a very thistle-down for wandering! I must know how my fellow-beings live! I should like to be one man after another—each for an hour or two!"

"Your father used to say there was much Norse blood in the family."

"There it is, mother! I cannot help it!"

"I don't like you holding the Czar's commission, Ian—somehow I don't like it. He is a tyrant."

"I am going to throw it up, mother."

"I am glad of that! How did you ever get it?"

"Oddly enough, through the man that pulled my nose. I had a chance afterwards of doing him a good turn, which he was most generous in acknowledging; and as he belonged to the court, I had the offer of a lieutenant's commission. The Scotch are in favor."

A deep cloud had settled on the face of the young man. The lady looked at him for a moment with keenest mother-eyes, suppressed a deep sigh, and betook herself again to her work. Ere she thought how he might take it, another question broke from her lips.

"What sort of church have you to go to in St. Petersburg, Ian?" she said.

Ian was silent a moment, thinking how to be true, and not hurt her more than could be helped.

"There are a thousand places of worship there, mother," he returned, with a curious smile.

"Any Presbyterian place?" she asked.

"I believe so," he replied.

"Ian, you haven't given up praying?"

"If ever I prayed, mother, I certainly have not given it up."

"Ever prayed, Ian! When a mere child you prayed like an aged Christian!"

"Ah, mother, that was a sad pity! I asked for things of which I had no need! I was a hypocrite! I ought to have prayed like a little child."

The mother was silent; she it was who had taught him to pray thus—making him pray aloud in her hearing, and this was the result. The premature blossom had withered, she said to herself. But it was no blossom, only a musliu flower.

"Then you don't go to church," she said, at length.

"Not often, mother dear," he answered.

"When I do go, I like to go to the church of the country I happen to be in. Going to church and praying to God are not the same thing."

"Then you do say your prayers? Oh, do not tell me you never bow down before your maker."

"Shall I tell you where I think I did once pray to God, mother?" he said, after a little pause, anxious to soothe her suffering. "At least I did think, then, that I prayed," he added.

"It was not this morning then, before you left your chamber?"

"No, mother," answered Ian; "I did not pray this morning, and I never say prayers."

The mother gave a gasp, but said nothing. Ian went on again.

"I should like to tell you, mother, about that time when I am almost sure I prayed!"

"I should like to hear about it," she answered, with strangest minglings of emotion. At one and the same instant she felt parted from her son by a gulf into which she must cast herself to find him, and that he stood on a height of sacred experience which she never could hope to climb. "Oh for his father to talk to him!" she said to herself. He was a power on her soul which she almost feared. If he were to put forth his power, might he not drag her down into unbelief?

It was the first time they had come so close in their talk. The moment his mother spoke out, Ian had responded. He was anxious to be open with her so far as he could, and forced his natural taciturnity, the prime cause of which was his thoughtfulness; it was hard to talk where there was so much thinking to be done, so little time to do it in, and so little progress made by it. But wherever he could keep his mother company, there he would not leave her. Just as he opened his mouth, however, to begin his narration, the door of the room also opened, flung wide by the small red hand of Nancy, and two young ladies entered.

ADVENT MORNING.

BY GEORGE T. PACKARD.

Behold, He comes!

The shadowed home in Bethany grows bright;
A brother's grave, astonished, yields its trust.

Lord, break again a sepulchre's dread night,
Call back to life the vows which are as dust.

Behold, He comes!

Through fear-shut doors, to hopes like withered grass,
He moves with promised haste, nor stays to chide.

Through doubts, my fear-clad doors, Lord quickly pass;
Utter Thy peace, and show Thy smitten ease.

Behold, He comes!

The mist-veiled shore repeats His "Come and dine;"
And wistful fibers wonder as they eat.

Through storms and mists that mock Thy Advent sign,
Lord, draw me shoreward, to Thy waiting feet.

ON THE USE OF THE CHANCEL.

A feature which strikes an American Churchman at once on visiting the old churches in England is the great depth of the chancel. I looked in yesterday at the beautiful old Norman church of St. Peter's, Northampton, which is open all day, and I found the chancel and choir were nearly forty feet long, and the rest of the church not more than fifty. This is an extreme proportion, but it is very usual to find the chancel quite half the length of the remainder of the church.

In the finest American churches the chancel is very short. In Trinity church, New York, it is small; in Grace church it is less; whilst in the noble Cathedral in Long Island, it was to me the one great disappointing feature of this wonderful and exquisite work of art.

It is plain, however, that the use of the chancel has never been realized in our American churches. The proper idea of the chancel is that those who lead the service should sit there: the eastern or extreme end is fenced off by the communion rails for the holy table and the special eucharistic service, but the rest of the chancel is occupied by the choir seats or stalls facing each other on opposite sides. Now it is an error to suppose that the duty of the choir thus seated, and often surpliced, is to sing only: no; they repeat the prayers also in a loud distinct voice, and so assist the devotions of the congregation also.

When the old parson and clerk duel gradually gave way to a more general interest, and the people about the church began to respond aloud, it was thought better to give tone and direction to the responses by thus employing those who sang the hymns to read also on one low convenient note. The choir from the elevated position which they occupy in the chancel are able to lead the prayers with more force and effect, and so the whole service, the reading as well the chanting and singing, is offered with a dignity and volume of sound which makes it a hearty and cheerful act of worship.

Thus are the large chancels utilized, and are in fact necessary to give a suitable position to the choir, and the wisdom of the builders of our ancient churches has reasserted itself after a long period of disuse.

I commend this idea to the consideration of church builders, and hope that in the future we shall see more ample chancels.

There is another point which I cannot forbear mentioning in connection with the churches of England. I observe that they all point to the East. If there are exceptions, I do not remember a solitary instance. Just as the dead are buried with their feet to the East, and their faces are turned toward that quarter whence they expect the rising of the Son of Righteousness, when He shall come to call men forth, so is this eastward aspect of the chancel the established mark of the old Church.

As our faith has come down from the beginning, so it is edifying to see in new countries the old type of our churches reproduced in interior arrangement where there is no insuperable obstacle. I plead that this feeling is no empty sentiment, but is connected with a great truth, viz.: the continuity of the Church.

The choirs in England are composed of men and boys, and as the latter lose their voices they retire into the congregation and make room for younger ones, and so gradually there is diffused through the congregation a body of worshippers perfectly familiar by long habit, with the Psalms and Hymns and responses, and with their aid the service through the whole building becomes every year more hearty and congregational, and in a few years the Common Prayer of the Church will be offered up in a way unknown before. The spread of education helps a responsive mode of service, for whereas, fifty years ago few of the poor people could read and Prayer Books were scarce, now as all can read and books are cheap, the worship of the Church has assumed a volume of tone and of heartiness all through the country villages even, which is perfectly wonderful to those who can remember the "duet" services of former days. I do not say that people attend church better now than then, but the revived use of the chancel with its choir, has given an immense impulse to worship, which may be usefully imitated in many of the churches in America. THE choicest flowers are those which we cause to grow in the homes of others.—G. A. Rose.

THE REV. FRANCIS PIGOU, D.D.

Dr. Pigou, of whom we give a portrait, was born in 1831, at Baden-Baden, Germany, but was of English descent, his father being a military officer and his mother the daughter of the rector of Marston, in Yorkshire. After an attendance at schools on the Rhine, in England and Scotland, he entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his degree in 1853. He began his ministerial life as curate of Stoke Talmage, in Oxfordshire. After a brief service there he became chaplain of the Marboeuf chapel in Paris, where he not only ministered to the English residents and visitors, but took special work in asylums, hospitals, and prisons. After some three years of this service he again took a curacy, first of Vere Street chapel, London, and then of Kensington parish church. Two years later Dr. Pigou became incumbent of St. Philips, Regent street, where he had a very large and influential congregation, among whom were to be frequently found members of Parliament, the Duchess of Cambridge, Princess Mary of Teck, and other persons of prominence. Such was his activity, that the duties of his parish did not fill all his time, and he was associated with many of the leading London charities, such as Charing Cross Hospital, King's College Hospital, etc., and for two of the eleven years during which he remained at St. Philip's he was chaplain to St. John's House Sisterhood for training nurses. Meanwhile the Archbishop of York had had his eye upon Dr. Pigou, and in 1869 he promoted him to the important Vicarage of Doncaster, and later, so marked had been the character of his labors, the Crown appointed him Vicar of Halifax. Here, also, as at Doncaster, he was rural dean. The position gave him an assured income of some $10,000 yearly, and he had not less than thirty-two livings in his gift, being in this respect better provided than are some, not to say many, English bishops. The vicarage is a most important one. There has always been an abundance of labor, but with a zealous staff of curates, Dr. Pigou worthily meets his responsibilities, and the parish church, restored at a cost of $100,000, is one of the fruits of his toil. He was made a Doctor in Divinity by his own college, and in 1871 became Honorary Chaplain to the Queen, and in 1874 Chaplain in Ordinary. Of late years Dr. Pigou has devoted much time and labor to parochial missions in various parts of England, and with great success, and he has been much sought after to conduct "retreats," or quiet days. As an author he has published "Faith and Practice," a volume of sermons, "Unostentatious Piety" and "Private Prayer," two sermons preached before the queen, and "Addresses at Holy Communion." The latter have been delivered at many missions. Dr. Pigou is now in this city, and will conduct the Advent Mission at the Church of the Heavenly Rest, the Rev. Dr. Howland, rector. A man more competent to the task, and with a larger experience in this peculiar work could hardly have been selected. He is an earnest preacher, with great tenderness of spirit, a strong believer in the "mission," and from his labors we may look for the best results.

PATIENCE—THE LESSON OF ADVENT.

BY C. M. LYTTON.

Perhaps there is no season in the Church whose fruits are as scant as those of Advent. Solomon says: "It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting;" and we all know that gayety is not the corner-stone of works of self-renouncing merit. Christmas merry-making—often harmless in itself—has almost obliterated the solemn, the holy associations, which should cluster around the first weeks of the Christian year. A time of preparation is usually a time of diverse, unsettled occupations, too heavy with multifarious cares and diversions to leave large space for intellectual or spiritual activity; and, so, it may be, that in Advent the word itself, "coming," half explains, undoubtedly simplifies the problem that vexes experience. Christ is coming—Advent is the only season in the calendar of the Church in which He is not personally present. Christmas points us to His birth; Lent, to His self-renunciation on earth; Easter to His glorious resurrection that secures our own; Ascension, to the sure joys of heaven; Pentecost, to the sending of the Holy Ghost, by whose sanctifying power we are made "meet partakers of His precious promises;"

Trinity invites the love of the Father, the sacrifice of the Son, and the presence of the Holy Spirit into a triple guardian of our daily lives, and a triple shelter from our daily trials. Advent, alone, turns us back to the days when the Man Christ Jesus was still the Messiah, and figuratively, and, alas! sometimes, we fear, literally, suspends responsibility to the law of self-denying love and chaste humility, that, nearly nineteen hundred years ago, was made flesh in the stable of Bethlehem. Nearly nineteen hundred years since the shepherds saw "The light that never was on sea or land," and heard the heavenly host praising God and singing, "Peace on earth, good-will to all mankind;" nearly nineteen hundred years since the wise men, having seen His star, came to worship Him; nearly nineteen hundred years since the Incarnate God, made manifest to man, disowned His kingly state, and leaning down from heaven took up the burden of the "sin of the world." There are few souls so sluggish that they do not thrill to the strains which tell of the rush and fire of battle, the perils of the forlorn hope, the heroes of the Alamo. But the hearts that kindle under the magnetic touch of the heroic in man lie cold and unresponsive under the heroism with which this Advent season is quick. "For scarcely for a righteous man will one die: yet, peradventure, for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth His love to us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

You who worship at the shrine of self-abnegating friendship, I summon to an altar upon which Infinite Love is self-slain for His enemies; you who burn the incense of your creed in the censer of unrelenting, uncomplaining labor, turn your faces to the odorous blossoms of a Life whose watch-word was, "The might cometh when no man can work;" you who vaunt humility, enter with me a carpenter's shop in Nazareth, and set your feet toward Jerusalem, where reviled, buffeted, and spat upon, the Son of Man opened not His mouth; you who lift on high the white cross of purity, search every record of a blameless Life, and read how even His judges found "no evil in Him;" you whose motto is self-renunciation, keep silent while from Gethsemane and Calvary there breaks two cries: "If it be Thy will let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not my will but Thine be done." "This day shall thou be with me in Paradise;" you hero-worshippers, vainly seeking a glorious ideal of strength, and courage, and wisdom, raise your eyes to the malfactor who died for His enemies and forgave His persecutors; you whose Advent is passing in restless work or restless pleasure, pause for one reverent moment while the throng press on to Bethlehem, pause, or, rather, kneel and pray, for the Lord girls up His might, and the first step has been taken in the blood-stained path that leads to Calvary. Kneel and pray, and on your knees learn the lesson of Patience, strong to wait, brave to work, and tender to succor. So learning, you will forge for yourselves armor more invulnerable than that of Achilles, and bind upon your forehead a crown more imperishable than the bay or the olive; so learning, you will in a higher sense than any dreamed of by the great artist, engrave upon your lives in golden characters the "Open Sesame" to victory, and pour into torn hearts healing dew distilled from the Perfect Flower Whose seed was sown in this holy tide.

Take from Christ's birth, life, and death a single attendant circumstance, and the symmetry of the whole is destroyed.

Any other way of redemption might have been as effectual—could any have been as generous in its conditions, as comprehensive in its teachings, as full of help to the sinful, as abounding in comfort to the sorrowful!

Have you ever watched a picture grow under the brush of an artist, or marble develop into form and beauty under the sculptor's chisel, or a rose swell from bud to blossom? Did you marvel at the magic that transformed the bare canvas and coarse colors into harmonious beauty? Behold, the word which epitomizes our Advent lesson transfigures the waiting of those long months from the angel's "Hail, Mary," to the birth-night in Bethlehem into a vision radiant with the fair colors of humility and love. Did you bow before the genius that wrought beauty, grace, expression out of the cold, unshapely marble? Lo, the hard, inharmonious granite of difficult life grows plastic under the chisel that carved out of apparent inactivity the grand conception of invincible patience.

Did you steep your senses in the fragrance of the rose, and question the mysteries of the color, texture, and confirmation of each delicate petal? There opens before you to-day a flower whose fragrance will refresh the wearied senses that ever cried for rest and upon whose spotless petals are scored symbols that solve the mysteries of life and death.

"Endurance without murmuring—constancy in toil or labor," are the Advent links in the chain that binds Trinity to Christmas Day—the notes that round into rhythm and melody the first chords of the exultant chorus sung by the angels in the hill country roundabout Judea. "Endurance without murmuring—constancy in toil and labor." Blessed Lord, knowing that Gethsemane and Calvary press close upon the glory and the bliss of Christmas Day, knowing that sunshine sharpens the north winds which follow, knowing Thy children's needs and pitying Thy children's weakness, Thou, even Thou, in those weary months of waiting didst fashion for them a staff to guide their uncertain feet and support their failing frames.

"Endurance without murmuring—constancy in toil or labor," fit countersigns for a season holy with the Incarnation, and pulsating with the approach of Him "Who shall come in great glory to judge the world."

"Endurance without murmuring—constancy in toil or labor." Harken, men and women, to their echoes ringing from Bethlehem, Nazareth, Gethsemane and Calvary! They mingle with the Advent chimes; they call us from idle pleasure, from self-indulgence, from the allurements of fast living, from haunts of vice; they bid us arm for the conflict awaiting those who bear the sign manual of Christ; they bridge, with an everlasting arch over which youth may worthily pass, and under which old age may securely rest, the chasm that separates time from eternity.

GUILDS AS EMBRACING ALL PAROCHIAL AGENCIES.*

BY MRS. W. W. SILVESTER.

Perhaps the most practical way to touch the subject I have been asked to write upon is to give a brief account of a guild which embraces all parochial agencies for charitable work.

The organization of which I write drew its members largely from a parish aid society, already in existence, and by no means an inefficient one; but it was felt by the clergy, and those most interested, that a broader organization would more effectively accomplish the works of piety and charity, which were before them to do. At a meeting of the Parish Aid Society, the proposed guild was explained by one of the clergy, and after a form of by-laws, which had previously been drawn, was submitted, and at later meetings was accepted. The by-laws were as follows:

I. This organization shall be known as

II. There shall be a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and honorary members.

III. The duty of the vice-president shall be to preside at the meeting in the absence of the president, and to call meetings of the Guild.

IV. The president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, and heads of branches, shall constitute the executive committee.

V. Five shall constitute a quorum.

VI. Officers shall be elected yearly. The meetings for such purposes shall take place at ten o'clock, on the Friday morning after October 15, or at the call of the president.

VII. Each branch of the Guild shall be authorized to elect its own adjutants, collect money from its own department, transact all business relating to its own particular work, and report the same at the monthly meetings.

VIII. The unauthorized bills shall be paid by the president.

IX. The regular meetings shall be held in the parish rooms, every Friday morning at half-past nine o'clock. The first Friday in the month shall be a business meeting, when the reports from each branch shall be read.

Article VII, of the by-laws, speaks of different branches of the Guild. The work is divided into different departments, each under an efficient head. As this is the chief advantage of the Guild, it may be well to enter a little into debate in regard to the branches, and give a brief account of each.

1st. THE DORCAS BRANCH.—Composed of young married and unmarried society women, who are not found ordinarily engaged in Church work. The head is an elderly lady, of high social position. The meetings, every Wednesday morning from ten o'clock until one, are held at her house, and are for missionary or other work furnished by the Guild for them to do.

2d. THE ORPHANS' HOME.—The duty of this branch is to collect money for the home, make needful garments, provide homes, etc., for the orphans. The orphanage is a Church institution, supported by all the families in the city.

3d. THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY, is charged with the missionary interests of the Guild. Preparing boxes, collecting money for scholarships, insurances, etc., for our missionaries. Working under our diocesan branch of the Woman's Auxiliary in New York.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL.—Under this head work is done for our Church hospital, which is in charge of the Diocesan Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd. The members of this branch hold themselves ready to make clothing for indigent patients, surgical pads, or render any other aid the sisters may ask.

CARE OF CHURCH.—This branch is to attend to general cleanliness of the church—over-looking the sexton, and women who are hired to sweep and keep it clean, and to see that all things are done decently and in order.

CARE OF ALTAR BRANCH.—To attend to the careful cleanliness of chancel and altar, keeping the holy vessels bright and clean, the vases on the re-table supplied with flowers, altar cloths and hangings changed at the proper seasons, keeping in good repair the vestments, and doing all the nice details of Holy of Holies.

PARISH AID, which attends to the temporal and spiritual needs of the very poor. This branch, after investigating each applicant's case, holds itself ready to supply fuel, food and clothing; in some cases paying the rent, besides visiting and showing a Christ-like spirit of kindness.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.—Meets every Saturday, from 9 A. M. to 1 P. M. Poor children are taught to sew and make garments for themselves. This branch is particularly encouraging, having from eight to nearly forty members during the past year.

THE GLEANERS is composed of girls from ten to seventeen years old. They meet every Friday afternoon at the house of the assistant minister. Last winter they interested themselves in a little struggling mission of the diocese. Sending them a Christmas box containing a gift for each Sunday-school scholar, besides furnishing the chapel a cabinet organ. There is also a "Young Men's League" in connection with the Guild, but as that hardly comes under the head of women's work it is not necessary to give an account of it here.

It has seemed necessary thus to give briefly some account of each branch of the guild that a clearer idea might be had of its designs and operations.

It has been found that a greater interest among a larger number of the members of the parish has been the result of the guild with its many branches, and a thoroughness in each branch of the work which is no other way could have been attained. The members of the guild were thus enabled to sustain a work much more far reaching than could have been accomplished by working individually. As this organization has now stood the test of two years, we feel that it is no longer an experiment. It is an assured fact that a guild can be made effectively to embrace all parochial work. It is however desirable to find at the outset the right person for the heads of the different branches, persons with interest and enthusiasm each in their own particular work. Each branch reports at the meeting on the first Friday of the month. This is a point to be insisted upon, as by it the whole guild is kept en rapport and knows all that is going on in each branch of the guild, thus preserving the unity of the guild. The honorary members mentioned in the by-laws are persons whose charitable work in the parish in time passed are in this way recognized. Persons who by their works and means have shown their interest in the welfare of the Church—our blessed Lord's visible kingdom on earth. The motto of the guild is "Go, work in my vineyard," and it felt that each member of the parish ought to do some Christian work, and labor for Christ and His Church faithfully and perseveringly organized. Methods are included in all the departments of the guild. If one is disinclined to work for missions, the immediate demands of the parish are offered as a substitute instead. There is certainly something for every one to do, and the guild with its different departments offers in definite shape, something to each member of the parish.

A CHRISTIAN LIFE.

"Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer; distributing to the necessity of saints."—ROMANS XII, 12 and 13.

And is thy life no longer worth the having Because its light thus early knows a cloud?
Dost thou, ere noon, resign all hope of saving
The remnant of thy day? Cry not aloud
That God hath ceased to mark the sparrows' falling,
And heareth not its note of sore distress.
Look up in faith, poor heart, and while thou'rt calling,
Thy Father hath compassion, and will bless.
No words hast thou for prayer, save "Help me, Father."
Stern conscience smites thee e'en as thou dost kneel, Saying, "Oh, thankless one, thou should'st far rather
Pour out before the throne thy meek appeal
For pardon, and with fervent adoration Praise Him who thus far hath not left thee fall,
But even in the midst of tribulation
Hath promised to regard thy feeblest call.
"And when thy prayers and thanks have swiftly ascended,
And in thy heart remains a tender thought,
Think not thy work in life thus soon is ended,
Remember that the Christ thy time hath bought.
Look down in pity on His loved ones toiling, Oppressed and wretched 'midst a thousand wrongs,
And think no unclean thing thy hand is soiling
When thou canst change their groans to joyous songs.
"This done, thy earthly day may yet be clouded,
And evening shadows fall ere yet 'tis noon,
But when the night of death thy life hath shrouded,
Thou wilt not ask for light of stars or moon.
For then in Heaven shalt thou find consolation,
The Saviour with swift healing shall arise,
And as thou look'st up on Him in supplication, He'll gently wipe the tear-drops from thy eyes."

CHILDREN'S SOCIETIES.*

BY MARGARET T. EMERY.

If a children's society is to meet with any measure of success, it is absolutely necessary that it have for its guiding spirit a woman who is, in the first place, deeply and sincerely in love with children. She must not simply be "fond" of them; she must not simply find them amusing; she must love them from the depths of her holy heart, and see in each little one the Holy Child Whose Blessed Name it bears. She must earnestly desire to do her part in bringing out and perfecting the Divine Image in each, and so have patience with its waywardness, and sympathy with all its moods. She must have wisdom to direct, and gentleness to guide. She must have a certain degree of ingenuity, and a boundless supply of tact; and she must ever be on her guard, lest, in a careless moment, she "cause one of these little ones to stumble."

And next, she must be truly interested in the object for which the society is formed. The more enthusiasm she can bring to it, the better. However successfully half-heartedness may be disguised from their elders, children discover it at a glance; and the zeal with which they follow their leader is strictly proportioned to the zeal with which they are led.

So, if a children's branch of the Church Temperance Society is to be formed, let its leader be one who is really alive to the evils of intemperance, and deeply anxious to see the children of God preserved from every form of excess. If it is to be an association for missionary work, let its leader thoroughly believe in missions, and have a burning desire to speed the time when all the peoples of the world shall be made one in the Kingdom of God. If it be a guild for parish work, let the leader believe that every child should take a loving pride in its own Church home, and do what it can to beautify the house of God and the grounds in which it stands.

That this enthusiasm should be tempered with the soundest good sense, so that its own particular object may be properly adjusted to all the other equally important works of the parish, it is hardly necessary to add. The children's society, like the children themselves, should take its place modestly in the background of parochial life; but well managed and faithfully worked, it may unconsciously become a pattern to the elder organizations, as a gentle, devout and loving child often reads, all unknown to itself, a lesson to those among whom its quiet days are spent.

If we realized the double good that children's societies achieve, it is quite certain that we should not rest satisfied until such an association had been formed in every parish. The work they accomplish is great, and the service they render to the Church is very real, while the good that reacts upon the souls of the children themselves is incalculable. These girls, meeting every week to sew for their Christmas or Easter box; these boys who keep the church grounds tidy, and are ready to respond to any call of rector or Sunday-school teacher,—all are getting practical lessons in their duty to the Church of which they are members, and in the reality of their union with their fellow-members, which will last them all their lives. And having learned their lesson, the little "Willing Workers" and tiny "Helping Hands" of to-day will be the strong and willing workers, and the helpful hands of many a parish and mission, far it may be from home, in the years that are to come. Many of our later lessons fade from our minds, more easily still from our hearts, but those that are instilled when mind and heart alike are "wax to receive and marble to retain," remain with us for ever. It is our duty to see that the Church is supplied with intelligent and loving workers when those who now do her work are gone; and so surely as we teach our children to love and serve her, shall her supply of faithful servants never fail.

The smallest and most original society with which I have any acquaintance is composed of a number of little girls who are banded together to work both for their own parish and for missions. These children meet once a week, to manufacture from scraps rescued from the rag-bag, pocket-pin-cushions, needle-books and pen-wipers, which they sell for pins. A small pin-ball is valued at ten pins; more elaborate articles bring a better price. When the society has amassed three hundred and sixty-five pins (the usual number in a paper) they are sold for ten cents. Occasionally articles are made whose intrinsic value warrants their being sold for pennies instead of pins. The first year of its existence this unique society made eleven dollars, with a part of which a Prayer Book and Hymnal were bought for the chance that had recently been added to the parish church.

The rules of this society are, first: That if any child is angry or cross during working hours, or on the way home from a meeting, she shall pay a fine of ten pins. Second, if any member is absent from a meeting she shall pay a fine of five pins. Third, every member shall do her best to dispose of articles for the objects of the society. Fourth, every member shall bring all the pins she has collected during the week, to be counted and added to the general fund.

The patient, ingenious and loving head of the society bears this testimony to its members: "They are always interested and untiring in their zeal and industry; very regular in attendance; kind, unselfish and thoughtful; very polite and well-behaved, and very anxious for the chapel for which they work."

In a little mission in Central New York, that has been maintained for years chiefly through the efforts of one good woman, there is an association called the Daisy Guild, in which six young girls are being trained to do just such work as their leader does, in the same consecrated spirit. These girls take care of the little chapel; they sweep and dust it; they attend to the floral decorations, finding, gathering, begging, bringing flowers, plants, ferns, leaves, mosses, for every service; except in the depths of winter, when they gather evergreens, and twine them for Christmas. When their leader is away from home, she entrusts the key of the chapel to one of the members of the guild, who has charge also of the Communion service; and this little twelve-year-old girl, aided by another of the same age, marks and distributes the envelopes in which are gathered contributions for the current expenses of the mission.

* Read at the Wisconsin Conference of Churchwomen, September 28, 1885.—(From Church Work.)

Another member, fourteen years of age, plays the organ when the regular organist is absent; and all are gladly ready to do any work for the Church which may be demanded of them.

Such societies as these may be found already in many of our parishes and missions, and might well be established in all. Beside these parochial organizations, there are other associations, both diocesan and general, which band together numbers of children for a certain work. Among these the Children's Twenty Minutes' Society and St. Mark's Friendly League are the largest.

The Children's Twenty Minutes Society, a branch of the well-known Twenty Minutes Society, has nearly five hundred members in twenty dioceses and missionary jurisdictions, and has for its object the providing of boxes of gifts for Christmas and Easter, for our domestic missionary schools. Each child pledges itself to say a prayer daily for the society; to contribute ten cents a year toward its expenses; to devote twenty minutes a week to missionary work, and to give one book each year, not necessarily new, to be added to the boxes.

St. Mark's Friendly League also numbers nearly five hundred members. It was organized some years ago, to support a scholarship in St. Mark's School, Salt Lake City; but as it has increased in membership, its work has been largely extended. The headquarters of the league are in Washington, where the greater number of its members are to be found.

In forming parochial societies for girls and boys, the children should be made to feel, as much as possible, the responsibility of their society, while, at the same time, they are never permitted to forget that they are under authority. The secretary and treasurer should be chosen from among their own number, and they should form their own committees. In some very successful societies the leader holds no office, but is a sort of advisory committee to whom all refer.

The rules should be few and simple, but they should be strictly observed; and the great object of the society, for whatever special object it may be formed, should be constantly kept before its members. The Glory of God, this and this only, should be the aim and end of the association; and the society will have done its best work when it has taught each little member that every effort of hand and heart, whatever its purpose, should be begun, continued, and ended in God's Holy Name, and dedicated to the Blessed Maker in Whose service it is that they are engaged.

AN EVENING WITH CHINESE SCHOLARS IN NEW YORK.

BY JENNIE HARRISON.

It has been said that when women give themselves to a work, that work is pretty sure to be a success.

Perhaps this is the one cause of the great and beautiful results which have been accomplished among the Chinese in our land.

It is largely the work of women, and it gladdens one's heart to know, that here in this great city, the centre of fashion and frivolity, where woman is called loudly, on every side, to join in this or that gaiety, to seek that diversion or amusement which is considered most "the thing" in society, there are those who willingly give their time and talents to caring for these poor heathen who have wandered to our shores.

Surely, every one must rejoice, and find it a token for good, when he sees, as we saw, a few evenings since, the beautiful parlors of a lady's house filled with these Chinese "boys," and their teachers; and hears the sweet voice of woman mingling with the broken utterance of the foreigners as they repeat together, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer.

It is no fanciful sketch. It is a beautiful reality. More ladies than one have thrown open the doors of their homes to these poor men, who have come to, our country to learn, we trust, respect for women, as well as to learn to know the one True God and Saviour.

And on this evening of which we speak, their courtesy, and gentle manners, their eagerness to assist, and the dexterity with which they performed many little offices, usually the work of our own gentlemen, gave cause, certainly, for much satisfaction to those who had labored so faithfully among them.

We noticed how pleased they were to offer any little service to the gentle lady of the house; and how they were watchful to do just what she desired.

Certainly, we said, as we noted the quiet demeanor, the modest manliness of these Chinamen—no truer gentlemen ever sat in this lady's parlor!

These faithful women may count it a nobler conquest than any which American society ever accorded them, that they have won the reverence and regard of these men whose religion never taught them respect for the other sex. It is the first step for them towards a true heart-religion, and a worship of the One God who cares for all alike.

Most touching of all, was it to hear these "boys" following the lady, as she uttered slowly and distinctly, the words of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. One could see just how the gentle persuasions and praises of these women had encouraged them to try, to overcome their natural backwardness, and to feel no hesitation in speaking the hard words of our language, as well as they could.

Scarcely any but women, with their tact and wisdom, could have done this as well.

Some of these boys have made wonderful progress in the language. They read parts of various chapters in the Bible, gave recitations, and sang hymns, with a clearness and understanding which surprised us, and which certainly reflects much credit upon their faithful teachers. Several also recited from a Church catechism, with much spirit and emphasis.

The work is growing. It is a beautiful work; and the Church is bearing her part in it nobly.

I rejoice to feel that God has put this work so largely into the hands of women.

As I looked around at the fair faces that evening, beauty and youth and gentleness side by side with the dark-visaged sons of China, I thought that never had beautiful womanhood such a setting before—never shone it with such radiance, as in the midst of these heathen wanderers whom it had drawn, magnet-like, to itself, and unto whom it had given the precious things of God.

Oh, my sisters, sit not with folded hands while this blessed work is on every side, and God has called you to do it!

ADVENT.

Blackness, and darkness, and tempest,
Were round about;
Lightnings, and thunders, and voices,
On Sinai's mount.

Smoke in vast clouds upward rolling;
Red glaring flame;
Such was His manifestation
When first the Lord came.

The tents were so high to the mountain,
Each Israelite saw,
The women, the very young children,
They trembled with awe.

The peal of the thunder incessant,
The lightning's sharp glare,
The blaze of the tempest,—they wakened
Fear, terror, despair.

He cometh again! yea, He cometh,
In clouds of the sky.
In the snow-blakened heavens His radiance
Will draw every eye.

Every eye shall behold Him descending,
Earth shivering away,
No refuge remaining. Oh! who, then,
Abideth that day!

Star, moon, and sunlight departed,
All eyes shall behold
The King, in His beauty, appearing,
As prophets foretold.

Coming, with all His bright angels,
To gather His own—
The patient, the meek, and the humble,
The loving—alone.

His mansion's prepared—O, He longeth
To give them their rest;
The spirits of those who have served Him
To clasp to His breast.

Fulfilled is the time of the selfish,
The lover of ease,
The scornful of the proud, the unloving,—
He knoweth not these.

The "lowly in heart," and the pure one's
Who trusted through all,
The tramp may alarm; but God's angels
Will gather them all.

TOIL AND REST.—Remember always toil is the condition of our being. Our sentence is to labor from the cradle to the grave. But there are Sabbaths allowed for the mind as well as the body, when the intellect is stilled and the emotions alone perform their gentle and involuntary functions.

No wonder that a generous, self-denying, earnest woman declared that she would not give any more money to the "society for the increase of the ministry," but would, if she could, subscribe towards one for the decrease until the quality should improve.

If Christ our Lord should now walk upon this earth, in New York City, for instance, with His train of disciples, the fishermen, the publican, Lazarus, Martha, and Mary, where would He find a Christian minister's home simple and humble enough to receive Him and His lowly followers? And how would some of our fashiony young preachers and pompous old ones know how to demean themselves in His presence? How many could say, "Lo, we have left all and followed Thee?"

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THEM THAT ARE ASLEEP.

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

"Father is coming—dear papa! Oh, little Maddy, how glad we will be!"

"Papa coming?" Maddy stopped dangling her dolly and looked up earnestly at her brother. "To-morrow, Willy?"

"Oh, not to-morrow, is he, Willy?" asked another child eagerly.

"Why no; at least I don't suppose he can be here so soon.

But that's just where it is, Ellinor, we don't know when he will come; Uncle Arthur said he might surprise us any day."

Ellinor clasped her hands together and looked pleased and excited, but she did not jump and caper about as some little girls would have done on hearing such good news.

The reason of this was that Ellinor scarcely remembered her father. Willy was older when he went away, and had a clear recollection of his looks, words, and ways; he well remembered the dear mother, too, who was called away from her little ones a few months before. But Maddy was a baby then, and Ellinor had thought of both parents in the same dreamy way—the mother who could never return to them, and the father who had been kept away from them so very, very long, on the other side of this great world.

"You see," Willy went on, "we'd better be all ready for him, for they can't tell just when the ship will get to port. I know he will come to us just as quick as he can, after he lands!" and Willy's eyes sparkled with joy at the thought.

"What can we do? How must we get ready, Willy?" asked Ellinor anxiously.

"Oh, I don't know; you must ask Aunt Katharine about your part; I only thought we'd like to be all right, you know! For one thing, I would have had a better school report this week, if I'd known of this! You may believe, I'll try to be perfect next week!"

"We don't get 'perfects' in our room," said Ellinor, "we only have tickets. I've got a ticket every day this week. But, Willy, do you suppose father will care?"

"Why, of course he will! He cares all about us—more than Uncle Arthur does, even, I guess."

"Oh, not more than Uncle Arthur! I don't believe he could. Why, Willy, he has not seen us for ever so long!"

"But he has kept on loving us, Ellinor," said Willy, earnestly, "I am sure he has. And he has wanted Uncle and Auntie to write about us in every single letter. Yes, I am sure that father cares; and now he is coming—coming!"

first thing in the morning and the last at night, almost, she talked of it in her own pretty way, and never failed to ask, "Will papa come to-morrow?"

Nearly two weeks had gone by, and nothing had been heard of the ship. The older children were growing weary of watching and waiting; and they both laughed a little when Maddy said one morning: "Papa coming to-day?"

"I guess that's all you know about it, you little pet!" said Willy, and he gave her a hug and a kiss as he started for school. His lessons were harder than usual, and Willy came near losing his "perfect" more than once that day; but somehow Maddy's words seemed to ring in his ears, and he worked with all his might.

Ellinor, too, had given over her dusting, for two or three days. "What's the use!" she had said to herself. But that day she ran upstairs the minute she came home from school, and dusted all the furniture carefully, and arranged the toilet articles as prettily as she could.

And what was Maddy doing all day?

Trot, trot, went the little feet, to and fro, and busily the child worked, all for the dear father whose name she had learned to love. She carried up wood, one stick at a time, for the open fire that was to be lighted in his room when he came; she rubbed each spoon and fork with a soft cloth, after Aunt Katharine had washed them, so that they would be "shining bright" when papa came; and she took the greatest pains to keep her own little white apron, and hands and face, as clean as a new pin.

"Maddy mustn't be dirty when papa comes!" she said.

So busy had the little one been that she grew tired, even before dusk of the grey November day.

"Come, Dolly," she said, "Maddy get up in this chair, so can see 'way down street! Wait! Here's a shawl! Maddy see papa coming; put on shawl and run. Wait; here's auntie's shawl too; so auntie can run! And here's my new ball, to show papa!"

So she prattled while settling herself in the chair; but she had not watched very

"THE WATCHER WAS FAST ASLEEP."

"Coming!" repeated little Maddy, rocking back and forth in her little chair. "Papa coming! Willy glad! Maddy glad, too!"

Ellinor at once consulted Aunt Katharine as to what she could do to be ready for her father's coming. To please the little girl, her Auntie gave her leave to dust his room every day, and see that it was all fresh and in order.

"But, darling," she said, "the best way to be ready for him is to be a good, faithful little girl every single day, at school and at home; then, dear, papa will surely be pleased with you, whenever he comes."

But no one seemed to think more of the father's coming than did little Maddy. The long before the ball fell to the floor; dolly slipped out of her lap; and the tired head rested on one fat little arm; the watcher was fast asleep.

Aunt Katharine laid aside her work as the light grew dim, and Willy and Ellinor came lovingly to her side.

"Do see dear Maddy, auntie! Isn't it strange that she has been so sure papa would come to-day?"

"Hark, Willy!"

A carriage was stopping at the door. The children looked at each other, and then sprang up and rushed into the hall; Aunt Katharine followed them, trembling with excitement.

Uncle Arthur was just entering; who was that with him? In a moment Aunt Katharine threw her arms around his neck, crying: "Brother!" And then came Ellinor and Willy's turn. Ah, the little girl did not doubt her father's love, now, as he pressed them close to him, whispering: "My precious children!"

Then the father looked up at his sister anxiously, saying:

"Where is my little Madeline?"

She smiled, and led him into the room.

"She has been watching for you!" auntie said.

Dear little Maddy—her mother's namesake—was caught up in her papa's arms, and kissed again and again. The child nestled close to him, murmuring: "Papa!" Then she opened her eyes and gazed at him in a startled way.

"It is papa; oh Maddy, it is papa!" cried Willy.

She smiled contentedly, and laid her head again on his breast, saying:

"Papa come; Maddy glad!"

Oh how full of joy were the next few days! The children never tired of sitting on their father's knee, or standing by his side, and gazing in his face.

Sunday came; the very happiest day of all, they thought; it was so pleasant to go to church with their own dear papa—and uncle and auntie too.

It was Advent Sunday; and in the afternoon they had a little talk about the sermon which they had heard in the morning, and the collect for the day.

The clergyman had preached on this text: "Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come." He spoke so plainly about being ready for the coming of our Lord, that any child might understand; and Willy and Ellinor had seemed to be listening, their father thought; so now he asked them about it.

"Yes, papa, I know Mr. Wood meant when Christ shall come to judge the world; and what he said about being ready made me think of last week."

"So did I think of it," said Ellinor, shyly.

"What about last week, darling? Tell me!"

"Why you know, papa, we didn't know what day you would come, and so we tried to be ready for you all the time!"

"Yes, and then we got almost tired of watching," said Willy, "and dear little Maddy put us in mind of it again; she was so sure you would come."

"Wasn't it a pity that she fell asleep before you came, papa dear? She had been watching and keeping ready all day!"

Papa did not answer for a moment; he then he asked:

"Do you not think, Ellie, that the darling felt happy and satisfied when she waked in my arms?"

"Oh, yes indeed!" said both children, smiling as they remembered her look.

"Well, dear children, here is another thought for us about The Coming. We need not be sorry for those who have fallen asleep while they were making ready to meet the Lord; for 'them that sleep in Jesus will be living with Him; and they shall be satisfied.'"

Willy and Ellinor were very still, for they knew that their father was thinking of the dear mamma who was laid to rest. The children never forgot this sweet Advent lesson.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

READY NOVEMBER 15th.

The Living Church Annual And Clergy List Quarterly.

THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL, as the public have been advised, has now become a Quarterly Magazine, as the full name indicates. The Advent number will be issued NOVEMBER 15, and will contain the same amount of valuable matter as in the past. The most important addition is a Glossary of Ecclesiastical Terms.

This feature will be continued year after year, till a complete Glossary of the Church's nomenclature has been given. The present installment comprises upwards of relating to the Altar, and the rites and ceremonies connected therewith. This feature alone is worth more than the year's subscription price.

ONE HUNDRED DEFINITIONS

THE CLERGY LIST

Has been carefully revised, and at greater expense, to insure accuracy, than has ever been incurred by any similar publication. However, knowing how utterly impossible it is to give a list once each year that can be correct for any length of time, the publishers have begun the issue of the Clergy List Quarterly.

The subscription price for THE LIVING CHURCH ANNUAL AND CLERGY LIST QUARTERLY is 25 cents per year, advance payment. All who subscribe now will receive, in addition to the Advent number, a Quarterly corrected Clergy List, which will be issued on the 15th days of the months of February, May and August, 1886. Send subscription at once (by Postal Note, if possible, for fractional amounts), to

DESIGNERS' PATTERNS LETTERS and PLATES

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1885.

The heavy loss sustained by Hobart College in the loss of its very valuable library by fire, should elicit the active sympathy of many a Churchman. Hobart is doing an excellent work, and the crippling of its usefulness would be a great misfortune.

The Church is kneeling on the threshold of the Christian year, and crying: "Almighty God, give us grace, give us grace, give us grace." They are the first words she utters, and they are the continual undertone of all her prayers through all the year. She is gazing up into the heavens, expectant of her Lord. While He still sitteth at the right hand of the Father, she prays ever for, she relies wholly upon, His grace, upon the influence of the Holy Spirit, whose presence and work on earth are the fulfillment of the Saviour's promise that He would not leave His Church uncared for.

Trinity College, we are glad to be able to state, has escaped the very serious loss which threatened it by the election of its president, Dr. Williamson Smith, to the Bishopric of Easton. We certainly wish only the highest good to that diocese, bereaved of so saintly and learned a bishop as the late Dr. Lay. But we cannot avoid the thought that the Church's colleges should be held worthy of the services of the very best men in the Church. Dr. Smith's administration in the affairs of Trinity College has been most admirable, and its present prosperity is an unanswerable claim for his continuance in the presidency.

The parochial mission in a large number of the churches in New York began very auspiciously. On Friday morning, November 27, a service was held chiefly for the clergy, at which the assistant-bishop made a most forcible and most helpful address. The attendance at the first service was very large, and there was every promise of the accomplishment of much good. One thing which is noteworthy is the enormous amount of preparatory work done by the rectors and their lay co-workers. In all the parishes visits have been made by men and women of the best standing, who have gone about making calls, giving notices of the meetings to be held, leaving tracts, and in all ways showing a kindly Christian interest in those whom they visited. In some parishes thousands of such visits have been made.

In the death of the Vice-President of the United States, the nation is called to mourn the loss of a distinguished citizen, and the Church to write on her diptychs the name of a devout and good man. The estimates which will be formed of the value of his public and patriotic services will naturally be various; but all who have known him bear willing testimony to his high Christian character and his blameless and upright life. For many years he had been a devout communicant of the Church, and he represented the Diocese of Indiana in the last General Convention. Widely as many of the public men of the day differed with him in regard to political and civic questions, all respected him as an honorable and high-minded Christian man; and it is pleasant to make grateful mention of the fact that all unite in ascribing to his upright and loving Christian character the vast influence which he wielded over his fellow-men.

It is to be feared that Archdeacon Farrar has been for the most part, while in this country, in the hands of the Philistines, who have worked him and led him about for their own advantage as well as for the delectation of the people. It is to be hoped, on the other hand, that the disinterested and cordial attention which Churchmen have extended to him when they have had opportunity has made some amends for the Philistinism which has overtaken the weary lecturer. One could wish that the visit of the distinguished scholar and divine had been made under different auspices; but in projecting their visits to this land, the dignitaries of the mother Church do not always place themselves, in the first instance, in communication with American Churchmen. No doubt the Archdeacon of Westminster has learned the usual lesson, and will profit by it on the occasion of his next visit, which, it is to be hoped, will not be long deferred. Meantime, grateful mention should be made of the wide influence for good which he has undoubtedly accomplished by means of his lectures. One does not need to consider whether or not he is an orator, or what faults of elocution or delivery he may be charged with. The spell of his undoubted power lies in his lofty conception of his theme, in his glowing language, and in the noble purpose which animates and sustains him. His lectures on Dante and Browning have been blessings to all who have heard them.

The course predicted in these columns last week has actually been taken by the English elections. Slight Conservative gains on the first day were followed by larger gains on the succeeding days, in the midst of great enthusiasm among the Tories and corresponding depression among the Liberals. Though the final result has not been ascertained at the time of this writing, it is certain that the strength of the Liberal party is shattered, and the prestige of its great leader obscured. For this result Mr. Gladstone is largely responsible, no doubt, since it has been his lack of candor which has forfeited the support which multitudes of Liberal Churchmen would gladly have given to his party. Nevertheless, it is fair to admit that it has been Mr. Chamberlain's excess of candor even more than Mr. Gladstone's lack of it that has injured the Liberal cause. In the enthusiasm of his newly-found leadership at the beginning of the campaign, and with the prospect before him of unrivalled personal popularity and power, he laid aside the caution of the party chief, and spoke with the zeal of a true Radical. As a disserter it was natural, of course, that he should desire disestablishment; but as a politician it was expected that he would dissemble, or, at least, not proclaim his desire. Mr. Chamberlain was not to be depended on, however. With more zeal than discretion he precipitated the issue of disestablishment, and the wary Tories were not slow to take it up. With consummate skill Lord Salisbury made the most of the opportunity that the over-candid Radical leader thus presented to him, and the result is likely to save the Established Church from spoliation for at least another Parliamentary session.

The death of the King of Spain brings a life of romantic interest and a reign of undoubted prosperity to an untimely close. During the whole of his official career he has been surrounded by difficulties which he inherited with his crown, and has been constantly menaced by a pretender to his throne on the one hand, and by an organized socialistic proletariat on the other. It can hardly be claimed that the young king was endowed with such abilities as were required to cope with the dangers which beset him. Though he was bred with the prospect of certainly succeeding to his royal estate, and the utmost care was lavished upon his education, yet he was not much helped by his training. It is almost pitiful to read of the weary labor to which his tutors subjected him, under which, no doubt, his health greatly suffered. Nevertheless, by his devotion to his duties, as he understood them, and by his sympathy with his people, he contrived in times of great difficulty, to approve himself one of the best kings Spain has ever had. With singular courage and faithfulness he visited the plague-stricken districts of his kingdom during the recent pestilence of cholera, in spite of the opposition of his ministers, and acquitted himself in so kingly a fashion as to deserve and receive the enthusiastic gratitude of his people. For himself he could not have died at a better time, though for Spain his early death seems to be a great misfortune.

The encyclical letter of the Bishop of Rome has at length been set forth by authority in this country. A careful study of it confirms the impressions of its teaching and tendency which have already been set forth in these columns. Indeed it may be said that the letter as a whole goes much further than was then supposed. Though it professes to provide a modus vivendi between the Roman Church and the civilization of the age, and especially between the Church and popular government, a brief examination of it is quite sufficient to show that no papal definition or decree has ever gone to greater lengths in claiming for the Church the virtual control of the civil power. A wordy show of toleration for all kinds of government is made, but all through the lengthy letter it is taught that a government, in order to be entitled to the support of Roman Catholics, must be in accord with and foster the religion of the Roman See. For instance, speaking of the duties of rulers and of governments, it says: "It is clear that a State constituted on this basis is altogether bound to satisfy by the public profession of religion the very many and great duties which bring it into relation with God," etc.; and again it says that the chief of the duties of the State is "that attention should be paid to a holy and inviolate preservation of religion, by the duties of which man is united to God." It then goes on to declare, with the usual emphasis, that the only religion to be thus respected and preserved is that of the Roman obedience. And a little later it declares that the "Church of Christ is the true teacher of morals. From the decisions of the popes it is clearly to be understood that the origin of public power is to be sought from God Himself, and not from the multitude . . . that it is a crime for private individuals and a crime for States to observe nowhere the duties of religion, or to treat in the same way different kinds of religion; that the uncontrollable right of thinking and publicly proclaiming one's thoughts is not inherent in the rights of citizens, nor in any sense to be placed among those things which are worthy of favor or patronage." When to these declarations are added the injunctions that Roman Catholics should use public institutions as far as can be for the advantage of their religion, that they should embrace every branch of public administration with their attention and care, and that, in order rightly to exercise their influence over political affairs, "concord of wills should be preserved, and a likeness of things to be done sought for, and each will be attained the best if all shall consider the admonition of the Apostolic See as a law of conduct," it will be seen how completely this letter is in conflict with our free institutions, and what a menace it offers to the liberties of our people. Indeed it may be said that the encyclical Immortali Dei is an unmistakable proclamation of war against the whole theory of civil society upon which our government is founded, and that it commands all Roman Catholics in this country to unite politically for accomplishing its subversion. Not only so, but it declares that the object to be aimed at by such united political effort shall be nothing less than the exclusive establishment of the Roman Catholic religion, the acknowledgment of the supreme authority of the See of Rome in all matters relating to it—which means all matters of human conduct—and the utter suppression of free speech and free thought in this as in every land. No intelligent Protestant has needed to be told, of course, since the publication of the syllabus of Pius IX., that the undivided allegiance of no Roman Catholic to his government is possible. This encyclical letter makes it evident to all who take the pains to study its meaning and drift that it is intended from this time on that the political and civic purposes of the Roman Catholics of this country shall be determined in effect by the Roman See. From this time it will not be possible for a devout Romanist to be a loyal citizen of our republic, or to cease to strive for its practical subversion in bringing it into subjection to the Roman pontiff.

The General Executive Board of the Knights of Labor, with Master Workman Powderly at their head, have been in St. Louis; and although their proceedings while there were secret, it is understood that they made some sort of inquisition into the recent street-railway strike in that city, and the dynamite outrages connected with it. The purpose of the investigation appears to have been to determine whether the "Cleveland Assembly" of the Knights of Labor, to which the accused dynamiters belong, was directly implicated in the conspiracy to destroy life or property; and it is said that the inquiry exonerated the local body of such complicity. In an interview reported in the daily press, Mr. Powderly disclaimed having made any formal investigation of this matter, but expressed the opinion that nothing had been done by the Cleveland Assembly that would implicate that organization. He declined to express any opinion of the guilt or innocence of the accused dynamiters, but said that if there is a possibility of establishing their innocence, "there should be no stone left unturned to do it," though a defence fund for that purpose would have to be supplied by individuals, and not by the Knights of Labor as an organization. Mr. Powderly also took occasion, in the same interview, to denounce the use of dynamite, to deprecate all strikes, and to condemn the particular street-railway strike of St. Louis as untimely, and as "a mistake from beginning to end." It is encouraging to note that the official head of the Knights of Labor is aware of the grave impeachment which this whole business of the strike in St. Louis has made against his order, though the defence that he makes or implies is altogether inadequate. Though he and every official connected with it should continue to denounce all ill-advised strikes and the crimes attending them, yet, so long as the members of his organization shall continue to engage in such strikes, and to commit such crimes, just so long will the Knights of Labor be justly responsible for them. It is not enough to say, either officially or otherwise, that whatever young member does, he does as an individual, and that, as such individual, he is amenable to the law of the land. In the case of the St. Louis dynamiters, and others of like character, the intent of the wrong-doers was to further the ends which the Knights of Labor exist to serve, that is, the promotion and conservation of the supposed rights of laborers as a class; and since the Knights of Labor, by the very fact of their secret combination and organization, go outside of the law for the serving of those ends, they are responsible for all the lawlessness which this leads to among their own members. It has been pointed out already in these columns, but it cannot too much be insisted on, that the very existence of such a secret body as the Knights of Labor, appealing as they do to class prejudices, devoted to alleged class interests, and working secretly and in concert, through a wide-spread organization, and under a despotic and irresponsible head, for the advancement of the objects which they choose to foster, is a menace to public order and public liberty. Nor should the members of that body be allowed to forget that in continuing in such an organization they renounce their own liberty, and surrender their own manhood to a despotism which is yet powerless to protect them from responsibility for the excesses of its worst adherents.

A communication made by the aged Primate of the Church of Ireland, a short time since, to the synod of his Diocese of Armagh, called attention to the somewhat anomalous arrangement, under the existing statutes of the Church, for the choice of a primate. As matters now stand, on the death of the Archbishop of Armagh, who is primate in right of his see, the Synod of Armagh would meet and "elect a bishop, who would bear the ad interim title of Bishop of Armagh. The bishops would then meet to elect a primate, and if their choice fell on some other bishop, the newly-elected Bishop of Armagh and the primate-elect would have to effect a change of dioceses." The question of altering the statutes in regard to the primacy is being agitated, the object being to provide some way for allowing the Church at large to choose the primate, and at the same time permit the Diocese of Armagh to elect its own bishop. Manifestly, so long as the primacy goes with Armagh, this will be impracticable, except in the case of the choice for the primate and the bishop happening to fall on the same person. Otherwise, it will be the "Church at large" which will choose the Diocesan for Armagh, for which the only compensation to the diocese will be the privilege of choosing a bishop for some other diocese. From this dilemma there seems to be no practicable escape, since the making of the primacy ambulatory, and thus abandoning the title of "Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland," would probably involve grave legal difficulties. It is desirable, for many reasons, that Armagh should continue to be the ecclesiastical metropolis of Ireland; but, in order to retain this dignity, it must be willing to hand over to the Church at large the right to select its bishop.

True, there are fashions in theology, and there are not wanting those who claim that each new age may, and should, have its new theories, the same in religion, as in science. But, theory is one thing; and "a faith once delivered" another. Popular theology is as full of fashion plates as the show window of a merchant tailor. But, back of men's opinions, lie God's facts, just as back of the nebular hypothesis, lie the stars in their orbits. Men may come and men may go, and there will ever go with them their tastes and their views; but fundamental doctrines change not, they are the "fixed stars" of the firmament, and while we have historic facts and the "faith once (for all) delivered," we may let theory be as popular as it may; and only ask of those who carry it, what we ask of the Italian bandit and his stiletto—that he, please be as careful as he can how he wears it.

"To-day," wrote Keble to his friend George Cornish, in 1827, "I have been to an ordination, for the first time since I was ordained myself, and I have almost made a vow to be present at one every year. I think it would do me good; like going back to one's native air after a long interval." And there is much in it. We have known of clergy who read over the ordination service on recurring days of their own ordination. One went into the chancel and read it aloud. Perhaps many peruse it on each anniversary. Would not a re-reading of baptismal and confirmation promises be a valuable drill to those who have made them? The mind is affected by recurring events and periods of time. Old lessons may be learned anew, and early impressions kept alive, or re-awakened, and indeed, should they not be?

THE REVISION.

I desire to offer, in a spirit of great respect, a few criticisms on the proposed amendments to the Prayer Book, as adopted by the last General Convention. Two things will, I think, be generally admitted: first, that the amendments, although good in the main, are yet not quite all that they should be; and secondly, that it is desirable to have them as nearly perfect as possible before they are finally adopted. The subject naturally takes the two divisions of Liturgical Enrichment and greater flexibility of use. And first, of Liturgical Enrichment.

1. The most objectionable feature of the whole work is the large number of Occasional Prayers that have been added. I am not the first person to call attention to this. Dr. Dix, in an article in the American Church Review for January, 1883, observed that when, as might often be the case, several of these prayers were used, the service would be greatly lengthened thereby. He suggested—what the revisers have made—the addition to the Prayer for all Conditions of Men, and the General Thanksgiving, of the special clauses now in the English Prayer Book, and expressed the wish that the people would be satisfied with such general mention of their individual wants. It is to be hoped that this matter will not be overlooked by the next convention, and that the number of Occasional Prayers will be lessened instead of enlarged. The same reasoning applies to the Occasional Thanksgivings. It should be borne in mind that the services exist less for the people as individuals than for the people as a whole, and less for the people as a whole than for the glory of God; and that, therefore, we should each and all of us, upon occasions of public worship, suppress ourselves as far as possible, and by no means lengthen the service by unnecessary reference to our personal wants.

2. The possession of three sets of Canticles for Morning and Evening Prayer, with a fourth set for use at Evening Prayer during Lent, cannot, in my opinion, do otherwise than lead to confusion. There is little enough system in the alternative use of the Canticles which we now have, and to add more can only make matters worse. The restoration of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, and the latter part of the Benedictus, and the putting all three in the place of honor, were to be expected, and were eminently proper; and it seems to me that when the revisers had gone so far, they should have thrown out our present second set of evening Canticles, and added no new ones whatever. This arrangement would have made our morning and evening Canticles (with a few verbal differences which amount to nothing) exactly the same as those of the English Prayer Book.

There is, moreover, an element of doctrine in the case, to which this arrangement would give suitable prominence. The Benedictus and the Magnificat have been for centuries the morning and evening memorials of the Incarnation. The evident intention of the Church of England, from the Reformation down to the present time, is to set forth the doctrine of the Incarnation, by making these hymns the chief Canticles of morning and evening service, and the Psalms which follow them alternatives only. This is shown both by the position of the hymns, which are in the first place, or, as I have called it, the place of honor, and by the rubric before the Benedictus, which directs that it shall be used except when it is "read in the chapter for the day, or for the gospel on St. John Baptist's Day." By analogy a similar use should obtain as to the Magnificat and also the Nunc Dimittis, which is another hymn in honor of the Incarnation, and takes place along with the Magnificat.

We are thankful for the proposed restoration of these hymns to our own Prayer Book; but it cannot be denied that with respect to one of them the revisers have fallen short of their duty. I allude to their treatment of the Benedictus. They have, it is true, printed the hymn entire; but by the strange rubric which they have prefixed to it, they and the convention after them have recorded themselves as at least consenting to its continued mutilation. This rubric requires the hymn to be used as a whole only during the season of Advent! We have here the singular spectacle of two mistakes of exactly opposite character in close connection with each other. While the revisers have enriched too much by adding an unnecessary third Canticle, they have enriched too little by not requiring that the Benedictus when used shall be used entire. It is to be hoped that the next convention will correct this also.

3. Additional selections of Psalms to be used instead of the Psalter for the day seem to me objectionable, as tending to break up the regular order of the Psalms, as we read them day by day through the month. The English Prayer Book contains no selections; and I have known rectors in this country who would never use those that we have except on very special occasions, and not even then unless the Psalms for the day of the month happened to be positively unsuitable. The best way to keep in mind any series of things is to use the series in regular order; and as the lessons follow a regular order, with only necessary exceptions, it seems best that the Psalter should do likewise, the necessary exceptions being the Proper Psalms for particular days. As these are now considerably increased in number, I can see no need of any other selections.

4. Inasmuch as the revisers have amplified our Ash Wednesday service, one wonders why they have done nothing in the way of a special service for Good Friday. It is a day unlike any other in the Christian year. The great festivals have something in common; one does not so far overshadow the others as to lose all likeness to them; but the Great Fast stands by itself, absolutely and awfully unique. It would seem fitting that the day have a special service of its own. The nucleus of such a service can be found in what are known as the Reproaches, and are sung in some churches on Good Friday. I cannot say whether their use is limited to "advanced" churches; but I recollect seeing a statement in the newspapers two or three years ago, to the effect that the present Bishop of Lichfield (Dr. Maclagan) chanted the Reproaches in his own cathedral on Good Friday. If this statement was correct, it would seem that such a service was perfectly safe.

5. The revision follows the usage of the Mother Church in having a petition for the President not only in the Morning and Evening Prayer, but in the Litany also. It would be well that the Communion Service should contain a similar petition. The proper place would be in the Prayer for the Church Militant, where it could be easily inserted by adding after the clause ending "all Christian rulers" the words "especially thy servant the President of the United States." All the English Prayer Books, from the first of Edward VI. down, contain a petition of this kind; and by adding it to our own book, our four principal services would be made to agree in this respect not only with the English book, but with each other. There is another reason why this addition is more desirable now than it once was; which is, that in these days the celebration of the Holy Communion as a service by itself is becoming more and more common.

And here I wish to object, in the strongest manner, to the introduction into the Prayer Book of any special petitions, of whatsoever kind, for the governor or legislature of any State. The Church does not wish to neglect these officials; she well knows that they need praying for; but they are already sufficiently noticed in the expression "all others in authority;" and, besides, it should be remembered, that if we are to become, as we hope, the National Church, we must, in our public worship at any rate, know no such thing as State lines. It is proper to notice the President, as such, for he alone represents us all. He alone is the embodiment, in his person, of our common citizenship.

I now come to the second division of the subject—that of greater Flexibility of Use. This is, of course, largely brought about by rubrical directions. I desire to call attention to the fact that most of the new rubrics simply give permission to do what many of us have been doing for several years without permission. Such are those relating to an anthem after the Collect for Grace (this is practically the same as a "Litany Hymn"), the omission of the Litany on Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday; the use of an Offertory anthem; the use of an anthem, followed by Creed and prayers, after the Lesson in the Burial Service; and the use, "under shelter of the Church," of the portion of that service appointed to be said at the grave.

Now, I do not mention these cases of permission after the fact as an objection to the new rubrics, but rather in commendation of them. They are useful, because they give a recognition to certain customs perfectly proper in themselves, and which have grown up in the course of years. My complaint is that this sort of permission does not go far enough. There are two important particulars in which, I think, it ought to be extended.

1. The first is the recognition of a very old custom, indeed—the singing of the Nicene Creed in the Communion Service. Here I must do the Committee of Revision the justice to say that their rubric, prefixed to the Creed, directed that it should be "sung or said;" but the convention would not accept it in that form, and struck out the permission to sing. Now, I am entirely satisfied in my own mind of the legality of singing the Creed, and shall, therefore, say nothing on that point; but the permission, plainly stated in the rubric, would be a justification and an encouragement to those timid persons who never dare do or omit anything unless they find the authorization therefor in the letter of the rubric, and a fitting rebuke to those "men of factious, peevish, and perverse spirits," who will not construe rubrics, or anything else, in the light of history, and reason, and common sense. It is well known that the English Prayer Book directs that the Creed shall be "sung or said;" and I think that, using the above-mentioned light, the variations of our own book, in this as in some other respects, can be understood by bearing in mind the condition, toward the close of the last century, of the Church in both countries; the indifference in the mother country, and the weakness in this, and the improbability at that time that, in this country, certain observances could ever be carried out.

2. The other particular which I wish to mention is one of practical convenience. I think that the permission given, on Christmas, Easter, and Whitsunday, to begin Morning Prayer with the Lord's Prayer, and end it with the Collect for Grace, should be extended so as to include any day when the entire Communion Service is to follow immediately. Morning Prayer, thus shortened, would not be, especially if rendered with simple music, a disagreeably long prelude to the Communion Service; and as the number of churches is large, especially in cities, where there is a celebration every Sunday, immediately after Morning Prayer, I am inclined to think that this arrangement, once adopted, would become general. The Litany would then, under the new rubrics, be said after Evening Prayer, except, perhaps, on one Sunday in the month, or oftener, if the rector should think proper, when it would be, not added to, but substituted for Morning Prayer. Thus each of the services would be kept independent of the others, and none would be habitually disused. It is also to be hoped that this arrangement would induce a portion of the multitude who now go out after the Offertory to stay in the church until the end of the service.

I may say here that the office of Morning Prayer, shortened as above described, becomes practically what it was in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. And this leads me to add that it would be a great gain if we could get rid of the Exhortation altogether. The obvious purpose of that instrument is to give the raison d'être of the service—a thing wholly unnecessary, since the service is its own raison d'être. A congregation of Christian people, who come together Sunday after Sunday to worship God, do not need to be told of that fact at the beginning of the service. They know it well enough before coming, else why did they come? There is, also, as it seems to me, another strong argument in favor of removal. As a literary composition, the Exhortation is greatly inferior to the rest of the Prayer Book. It is the one poor thing where all else is rich, the one weak point of an otherwise strong work, the one fit subject for ridicule amid surrounding grandeur, the one blot upon what Churchmen and Dissenters alike call "a noble Liturgy." All this is hardly to be wondered at, considering its origin; but it does not make the Exhortation any better, nor excuse its presence in the Prayer Book. We ought to serve God with only the best of our literature, as with only the best of our architecture; and we shall do neither so long as we continue to build plaster vaults in our churches, and deface our service book with this amazing medley of tautological inelegance.

CLARENCE C. EDGERTON.

ENGLAND.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC ON TITHES.—Mr. Langdale, a member of an old and staunch Roman Catholic family of Market Wroughton, in his address to the electors, writes:

"I am afraid I cannot complete what I have undertaken without saying something about Disestablishment, which you know is very delicate ground for me to tread on, because I object to the teaching of the Church of England as much as or more than any of you possibly can. But this, notwithstanding, I will say at once, that if it depended upon me, I would not disestablish the Church of England. I have lived now a good many years in the country, and the conclusion I come to is, that in far the greatest number of villages, and I believe the same thing may be said of towns, the clergymen of the Church of England act as true Christian ministers should do, and that the poor and sick would feel their loss exceedingly. But what about the Tithes? Well, I pay a considerable sum yearly in Tithes myself, and though I find it hard sometimes, I am not so foolish as to believe that, if I did not pay it to the parson, I should not have to pay it at all. That being so, I may sincerely say that I can hardly imagine how the hundred or two a year, or whatever it may be I have to pay, would do more good to the people of the neighborhood than it does by being paid in Tithes as it is at present."

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.—The telegraphic reports of the Parliamentary elections in England indicate unexpected and surprising Conservative gains, and equally unexpected Liberal losses. The defection of the Liberal Churchmen has had much to do with the result, and undoubtedly the election has hinged very much, if not mainly, on the question of disestablishment. This has been postponed, if not altogether set aside, by the results of the election. It is not at all improbable that the Conservatives will be able to hold control of the House of Commons without regard to the Irish vote.

IRELAND.

SYNOD OF MEATH.—The new Bishop of Meath presided at his first Diocesan Synod on Wednesday, November 4. A resolution was passed, with the approval of the bishop, refusing to accept the resolution of the General Synod, abolishing the ancient precedence of the Bishop of Meath as Premier Bishop of Ireland.

MAINE.

MOUNT DESERT.—St. Mary's-by-the-Sea.—The many good friends of St. Mary's who are scattered throughout the country at their winter homes will be interested to know that the changes in the chapel for which they contributed so generously last summer have been made. The plans were drawn by Mr. Moffette, the original architect of the building. The addition is in the form of an aisle extending along the southern side of the building, with a porch at the western end. It is separated from the nave by a movable partition, which can be taken away in summer. The capacity of the chapel will thus be considerably increased, while the difficulty of heating it in winter will, it is hoped, be less than before. The work is now finished, except the making of the seats, and all is made ready for the severities of the winter. The services are hearty and well attended. Nearly all the people of the neighborhood come regularly to them. The Church has plainly taken a hold of the people of the island.

MASSACHUSETTS.

MISSION WORK IN THE DIOCESE.—The treasurer of the Diocesan Board of Missions reports the receipts from May 5 to Nov. 5 as $3,619.95, and the expenditures during the same period as $5,570.65, leaving a deficiency of nearly $2,000, but as many of the parishes have not yet made their semi-annual offerings the financial exhibit will be better later on in the year.

BERKSHIRE COUNTY.—Student Missionaries in the Berkshire Hills.—Last summer two students from the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Messrs. Grant and Addison, spent the month of August calling upon nearly every family in most of the townships in Berkshire county, distributing religious papers and Prayer Books. They presented a report of their work to the Western Convocation, and it has recently been printed.

BOSTON.—Woman's Auxiliary.—The eighth annual meeting of the Massachusetts Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, held in Boston on Wednesday, November 18, was an occasion of much pleasure and encouragement to the friends of missionary enterprise. There were present as guests the Missionary Bishop of Montana, Miss Emery, secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. A. T. Twing, Miss Helen Beach, of the Niagara League, and representatives of the Connecticut, Virginia, and Ohio branches. Delegates from sixty parishes and members of parochial missionary societies filled the chapel of St. Paul's church to its utmost seating capacity. The reports of the diocesan secretary and treasurer, and the secretaries of the several departments indicate vigor and growth in the diocesan branch, and bear kindly testimony to the increasing confidence and co-operation of the rectors of the diocese. Addresses from Miss Emery and Miss Beach, full of sympathy, Christian fellowship, and practical suggestion, were followed by words of congratulation and gratitude from the Missionary Bishop of Montana.

The total offerings of the year in money, boxes, etc., fall but little short of $19,000, and the secretary reported among "specials" the Sunday-school Penny Collection, the Lucy Lee Chickering Fund, the payment of insurance dues of four foreign missionaries, the support of five free hospital beds, two or three missionaries, and forty seven scholarships.

NEWTON.—The Massachusetts Altar Society.—An organization of ladies in this diocese, under the presidency of Miss Clara V. Parker of Newton, aims to supply surplices, altar linen, and the like to needy mission stations. It gathers funds for the purpose by working for parishes able to pay for the work ordered by them, using thus the proceeds of paid work in gifts to those unable to pay.

EASTHAMPTON.—St. Philip's Church.—After services had been held in this manufacturing town for a few years a lot was secured at a cost of $2,500, and now a chapel is in process of erection. It is of brick, and will constitute the chancel and parish rooms of a church to be built at some future time. The plans are by Mr. S. S. Woodcock, of Boston, and are a practical illustration of "building by sections and finishing by degrees."

The services of the church in this place are in charge of the Rev. H. N. Cunningham, who also has charge of the work at Westfield, thirteen miles distant.

RHODE ISLAND.

PROVIDENCE.—The St. Elizabeth Home.—An interesting service was held on Thursday, November 19, at the St. Elizabeth Home, in this city. This institution is a free hospital and home for incurable patients and con-resents among the respectable poor. The officers and members of its corporation are chosen from communicants of the Church, and the bishop of the diocese is president ex-officio, but in the admission of inmates form of belief is not considered. The home was opened in the spring of 1882, in a small house; but the number of applications for admission made it necessary to find a large one, and to this removal was made in the early fall of the same year. This house is now filled to its utmost capacity, and a large addition has become a necessity. As soon as this change was decided upon a strong desire was expressed by the board of officers and other friends of the work that this additional building should be given as a memorial of one whose sympathy and interest in this home were so well known, the late wife of the beloved bishop of the diocese.

On St. Elizabeth's Day, November 19, services appropriate to the laying of the cornerstone of the Caroline Clark Memorial Building were held. The bishop and a large number of the clergy of the diocese were present, and many of the friends of the home. The musical part of the service was led by a boy-choir from St. Stephen's church. After the laying of the cornerstone by the bishop, brief and appropriate addresses were made by the Rev. Drs. C. A. L. Richards and D. H. Greer, and the Rev. H. Bassett.

It is hoped that the building will be ready for use by the end of the spring. The design for the addition provides for twenty-four new dormitories, a chapel, etc. The designs were furnished gratuitously by Messrs. Stone and Carpenter, architects, of Providence.

CONNECTICUT.

GUILFORD—Christ Church.—The fiftieth anniversary of the ordination to the priesthood of the Rector Emeritus of this parish, the Rev. Dr. L. T. Bennett, was observed on Friday, November 20. There was a large number of people present, including the rector of the parish (the Rev. W. G. Andrews), the Rev. Drs. E. E. Beardsley, A. G. Shears, and W. E. Vibbert, the Rev. Messrs. D. L. Sanford, E. G. Lines, G. M. Wilkins, J. H. Fitzgerald, M. K. Bailey, and E. W. Babcock, Dr. J. B. Robertson, and Mr. A. L. Kidder. The Rev. Dr. Beardsley made a few congratulatory remarks, and the rector read a poem written by the Rev. Dr. Shears. In the evening the house was completely filled with Guilford people of all religious names. Addresses were made by the rector for the present and former parishioners of the parish, and the Rev. Mr. Banks of the Congregational Society for the whole community. Dr. Bennett made a grateful and touching reply.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The Advent Mission.—The work of the Advent Mission was begun in this city on Saturday, November 28. After the opening service the rector of each church, in a brief statement, delivered it to the charge of the missionary. The missionaries include the bishops and prominent clergymen of many dioceses who have been invited to New York to conduct the services. The conspicuous characteristics of the mission are prayerful and united effort, to preach more directly and more constantly, with more earnestness of prayer and heartiness of worship. Services are hearty, musical, devotional, and congregational.

At Calvary church the rector (the Rev. Dr. H. Y. Satterlee) delivered the parish into the hands of the Missionary Bishop of Utah and Idaho and the Missionary Bishop of Western Texas. At the Church of the Reconciliation

(the Rev. Newton Perkins, rector,) the Rev. Dr. Campbell Fair of Baltimore has charge as missionary. At the Church of the Heavenly Rest (the Rev. Dr. R. S. Howland, rector,) the mission is conducted by the Rev. Dr. Francis Figou, vicar of Halifax, England. At the Church of St. Mary the Virgin (the Rev. T. M. Brown, rector,) the Rev. George C. Betts of St. Louis conducts the services and mission, assisted by the Rev. E. A. Larrabee of Chicago.

At St. George's church (the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, rector,) the mission was opened with a reception of the missionaries in the chapel, to introduce the workers to one another and to the congregation. The missionaries here are the Rev. Messrs. W. Hay Aitken and James Stephens, both of whom are well known in mission work. At the Church of the Holy Communion (the Rev. H. Mottet, rector,) the Rev. Dr. F. Courtney of Boston is missionary. At the Church of the Holy Spirit (the Rev. E. Guilbert, rector,) the mission is conducted by the Rev. S. W. Young of England. At the Church of the Holy Apostles (the Rev. Dr. B. E. Baekus, rector,) the Rev. I. M. Thompson of Canada is the missionary, and began his work on Saturday morning.

The Church of the Incarnation (the Rev. Arthur Brooks, rector,) and Zion church (the Rev. Dr. C. C. Tiffany, rector,) hold a united mission, holding services alternately at each church. The missionaries are the Rev. R. B. Ransford of England and the Rev. Harvey Carmichael of Canada. At St. Philip's church (the Rev. G. G. Hepburn in charge,) the Rev. A. S. Crapey is the missionary. At the Church of the Epiphany (the Rev. A. A. Butler, rector,) the missionary, the Rev. Otis A. Glazebrook of Elizabeth, N. J., conducts the services and the mission.

The mission in these and other parishes has opened very satisfactorily, and great grounds are afforded for confidence that great and general good will result.

NEW YORK—Church Temperance Society.—The fourth annual convention of the Church Temperance Society was held in the Hall of Grace chapel, New York, on Monday and Tuesday, November 16 and 17. Previous to the convention, and by request of the twelve bishops whose jurisdictions lie in Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, sermons were preached in at least five hundred churches in these States on Sunday, November 8.

The Bishop of Northern New Jersey presided at the first session. The annual report showed successful work along each of the secretary's lines of action, and the balance sheet showed the payment of all the yearly expenses, $7,051, and of the deficit of $1,661.49, with which the society began the year.

After an address by the Rev. J. F. Steen the constitution and ritual of the Knights of Temperance were heartily and unanimously endorsed.

The second session was held in Steinway Hall, the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim presiding. Speeches were made by the Rev. E. W. Donald, on "The Position of the Church on the Temperance Question;" the Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby, on "Our New Excise Bill;" the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, on "High License;" the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, on "The Liquor Traffic and its Influence on City Government;" and the Rev. E. Osborne, on "Rescue Work in New York."

The third session was held in Grace chapel on Tuesday morning, the Bishop of Long Island presiding, who said he endorsed the society's Christian basis, believed in its objects, and admired its methods. He had for a year past desired to say publicly and emphatically that to Mr. Graham, the secretary, the society owed its success. He had the large faculty of ranging himself alongside the best minds of the community and had largely influenced public opinion with regard to city government. He earnestly urged upon him to make this land his home, and complete what he had so ably begun.

Literature with special reference to the "Outlook" was fully and warmly discussed by the Rev. Dr. McKim, the Rev. Messrs. Donald and Osborne, Mr. Graham and others, and resolutions for its enlargement and improvement were referred to a committee.

Metropolitan Organization was introduced by the Rev. Dr. H. Y. Satterlee and enlisted the warmest interest. With a new Excise Bill to urge before the Legislature at Albany, with immanent and necessary changes in the personnel of the Excise Board of New York, it was urged that we should have a representation to-day in this and other cities whose influence would be felt in urging (1) an improvement on the present law, and (2) its more honest and official enforcement. It was resolved, "That in view of the pressing need of special work for the promotion of temperance in the large cities of our country, it is expedient that metropolitan organizations be formed in each of such cities, composed of delegates from parochial branches or parishes; that the rectors of all parishes in large cities be requested to bring this matter before their people, and to take action in it, either by the formation of parochial societies, or the appointment of delegates in any other convenient way."

It was urged by the secretary that without central offices and a hall of meeting, it was impossible to carry out one of the main objects of the society, namely, personal rescue work. Through the kindness of Mr. J. Noble Stearns such work had been done during the past summer, and before the first of May next it was necessary to raise $2,500 to secure Anaex Hall and make it permanent. The matter was referred to the Committee on Metropolitan Organization.

The fourth session was held on Tuesday evening, ex-Governor Chamberlain presiding, and was a public discussion of High License vs. Prohibition. The room was packed. Judge Aroux and Mr. W. C. Beecher were leading speakers for High License, and Professor A. A. Hopkins and the Rev. W. H. Boole, for Prohibition. The debate was able and spirited on both sides, and a larger number of cards from volunteer speakers were received than could be accommodated. The two leading speakers gave a five minute resumé, and Gov. Chamberlain ably and impartially summed up.

The results of the convention may be summed up as demonstrating three things: (1) That the broad basis of the society is emphatically endorsed by the Church, and increasingly so by the community. (2) That public opinion is ripe for a condensation of diffuse and contradictory Excise Laws, and for the insertion of a High License clause. (3) That the Church Temperance Society leads in an intelligent appreciation of the difficulties in the way of honest city government, and has carefully weighed and measured the liquor traffic in its relation thereto.

CLIFTON—Convocation.—The first meeting of the Convocation of Staten Island met in St. John's church, Clifton, (the Rev. Dr. J. C. Eccleston, rector,) on Monday, November 23, in response to an invitation from the assistant bishop. The clergy of the island, with lay delegates from the several parishes, were present. For some years the island parishes have felt the great need of better mutual acquaintance and more effective and aggressive work. In his address the assistant-bishop called attention to the importance of a more united Church life and work upon the island. It could not be possible for a section so near New York, with her two million inhabitants, to remain in its present condition. The scheme of rapid transit, not to mention other causes, must produce a change far greater than anything known in the past, and lead to a largely increased population. It becomes, therefore, a very imperative question, what is to be done? For the consideration of this and other matters, he had requested the clergy and lay delegates to meet him, in the belief that such a conference would be of great benefit in drawing together the scattered parishes in one common interest.

There was a celebration of the Holy Communion, after which a meeting was held in the parish-house, for discussion and organization. The convocation was organized with the assistant-bishop as acting dean, the Rev. G. D. Johnson as secretary, and Mr. Huntington as treasurer. The assistant-bishop stated his desire to hear from those present some report of their work and the condition of things about them.

St. John's, Clifton, (the Rev. Dr. J. C. Eccleston, rector,) has carried on for some years a mission school in the region known as Dutch Farms, or Concord. This place is rather interior and at some distance from the east shore. The school is very promising, numbering about two hundred scholars. The other parishes do not seem to have taken up any such work as this. But it was one of the objects in view to see if something could not be done elsewhere. For instance, in St. Paul's parish, Tomkinsville, (the Rev. H. N. Wayne, rector,) there is a very large population of Germans, for whom there exists no proper services. They are not attracted to the English service. The Rev. Mr. Wayne made a proposition looking toward the establishment of a mission with all the appointments of a separate service and church life. It was felt that it ought not to be impossible that a German parish should be thus very soon established. The Rev. Johannes Roeskrohn, who is familiar with this part of the island, fully corroborated this opinion. Christ church (the Rev. G. D. Johnson, rector,) might also start a mission to be worked in connection with St. Simon's Mission in Dutch Farms, placing its own chapel nearer New Brighton. The town of Northfield lies to the north and west, and is under the jurisdiction of St. Andrew's parish. This section is supplied by the three churches, St. Andrew's, Richmond (the Rev. Dr. T. S. Yocum, rector;) St. Mary's, Castleton (the Rev. A. G. Mortimer, rector;) and the Ascension, West New Brighton (the Rev. P. P. Harrover, rector.) The latter parish was started as a chapel of ease to old St. Andrew's, and has at present between thirty and forty families living within the jurisdiction of St. Andrew's, in the villages of Port Richmond and Mariner's Harbor, and others in the hamlet of Graniteville and New Springville, lying in the interior. These sections are almost entirely undeveloped, so far as mission work is concerned. They are, in some measure, supplied with other religious privileges; but there is no doubt that much could and ought to be done by the Church. The work at Rosville, under the care of the Rev. William Wardlaw, has been almost newly created. He found the parish scattered and disheartened, but has gathered it again, and it is continually growing in strength.

NEWBURGH—Western Convocation.—A meeting of this convocation was held in St. Paul's church, Newburgh (the Rev. R. Emery, rector,) on Wednesday, November 18. There was a large attendance, and much interest was manifested throughout. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion, preceded by Morning Prayer. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Edward Ransford, from Psalms ix. 1.

After the service the clergy and other guests were entertained by the ladies of the parish at the rectory.

The business meeting was held at 2 P. M., the Rev. Dr. O. Applegate, dean, presiding. The report of the treasurer, Mr. A. S. Ring, showed that the contributions for the past year had been $624.14; there had been given to Grace church, Post Jervis, $205, and to West Park, Highland, Callicoon and Marlboro, each, $100; and a balance remained of $163.90. The reports of the missionaries were very encouraging as to the work done, and the success their efforts had met in their several fields of labor. The officers of the convocation were all re-elected for the coming year.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Messiah.—At this church (the Rev. Charles R. Baker, rector,) a series of lectures on Sunday evenings is in progress. In this course the Rev. E. Winchester Donald delivered on November 22 a discourse on "Obstacles and Helps to Christian Living in Cities," the text being Rev. xxi. 1, 2, 3. After showing that life is neither better nor worse in cities than in the country, but different, he took up as the first great obstacle to Christian living in cities the exciting side, which wickedness is at pains and great cost to show. The next which he presented was the development in our souls of wicked desires by the open displays of opportunities for doing wicked things. The temptations to vice, and dishonesty, and sinful show were pictured in many striking examples. As to help he said: "City life brings out in sharp and wholesome distinctness the certain penalty of wrong doing. Nowhere is there so sure a mark of the suffering and punishment of the sin as is set upon the forehead of a great city. Thus the city has attractions with which a parent may entertain and instruct his children, in whose happiness and progress he is led to take interest. The city offers opportunity for this as the country never can. Excessive devotion to business, in which many allow themselves, is an obstacle to this Christian home-life and proper nurture of the young. But the churches, again, are a help to it. The city is full of churches, and in them a voice is heard against wickedness, and pleading for righteousness, purity, and truth.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Christ Church.—This church (the Rev. Dr. James H. Darlington, rector,) has been open for private prayer every day in the week, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M. since the early part of October. Many have availed themselves of the privilege.

A sewing school has been started by the rector, in the Partridge Memorial chapel, and among the managers is the wife of the late Rev. William B. Cooper, who was, until his death, chaplain of St. Phebe's Mission and Diocesan Missionary, in the Fourteenth Ward, along the river front.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

BELLEVILLE—Christ Church.—This parish (the Rev. C. S. Abbott, rector,) celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization on Wednesday, November 18, when there was a most pleasant reunion of old friends. Addresses were made by the bishop of the diocese, the dean of the Newark convocation (the Rev. J. N. Stansbury), and the Rev. Messrs. J. B. Falkner and S. W. Sayres, the two former rectors. The present incumbent left what he had to say for an historical sermon, which was delivered on the following Sunday. There was a shortened evening service, conducted by the Rev. A. L. Wood, of St. John's, Newark, and the Rev. W. R. Nairn, of Grace, Franklin, both of which parishes were formed out of this older one. There were present besides those mentioned the Rev. Dr. E. B. Boggs and the Rev. Messrs. W. J. Roberts, Charles Douglas, B. Falkner, and E. B. Russell.

Though this is but the fiftieth anniversary of the parochial organization of Christ Church, the Church itself in Belleville dates as far back as 1752, so that in fact, but not in name, this is an ante-revolutionary parish. Originally it was part of Trinity parish, Newark, whose charter from George II., given in 1746, made it embrace a large territory, of which Belleville was a part, and required one warden and five vestrymen to be selected by and from the portion of the congregation in this part of the parish. As a chapel from 1752 and a parish from 1835 the Church has been maintained here. It has had some very distinguished clergymen ministering at its altar, of whom the late Bishop Whittingham, the Rev. Dr. Berian, afterward of Trinity, New York, the Rev. Dr. Chapman, and the Rev. Dr. S. L. Southard, afterward of Calvary, New York, will be familiar to most Churchmen. By death and removal, and the formation of new parishes, it has lost much of its former material strength, when Mr. Peter G. Stuyvesant was a vestryman, and the Rutherford family were active workers in the parish, together with the Kingdlands and Schuylers, who are still represented. But what it has lost in financial ability it has more than made up in spiritual vitality, numbering, as it does to day, more communicants, and showing more of the spirit of the Master, than ever before.

PATERSON—St. Paul's Church.—Thanksgiving Day was celebrated in this church (the Rev. E. B. Russell, rector,) by a union service of all the parishes. The Rev. Dr. J. I. Moberly and the Rev. Messrs. E. B. Russell, T. S. Cartwright, Frederick Greaves and J. C. Hall officiated. The sermon was preached by the Rev. T. S. Cartwright. The chancel was tastefully decorated with flowers, fruits and sheaves of wheat. The music by the chorus choir was very hearty, and a very large congregation was present.

ENGLEWOOD—St. Paul's Church.—On Sunday, November 22, the Twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity, the bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. C. W. Ward, rector.) At 9:30 A. M. Morning Prayer was said, at which the rector baptized six adults. The Litany was said at 11 A. M., after which the bishop celebrated the Holy Communion. The sermon was by the bishop, and was immediately followed by the confirmation of twenty-nine persons, the largest number confirmed in the history of the parish.

The present rector has had charge of the parish since Easter, and one of the best parts of his work has been the thorough preparation of the candidates for confirmation.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

LOCKPORT—Christ Church.—The bishop of the diocese made his annual visitation of this parish (the Rev. G. W. Southwell, rector,) on the evening of Monday, November 23. There were present and assisting at the services the Rev. Messrs. F. S. Dunham, C. W. Camp, and S. Wilbur. The bishop preached, and confirmed eight persons, making sixty-one confirmations during the rectorship of the present incumbent. A large and attentive congregation was present.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Saviour.—The dedication of the new Farr Memorial Parish Building of this church (the Rev. Dr.

W. H. Meade, rector,) took place on Wednesday evening, November 24, with appropriate services before a large congregation in the new lecture-room. The service was said by the Rev. Dr. T. C. Yarnall and the Rev. Messrs. H. Allan Griffith, R. N. Thomas, C. W. Duane, and the Sentence of Donation was pronounced by the Rector. Mr. George C. Thomas made an address, in which he dwelt upon the purity, thoughtfulness and consecration which characterized the life of the late Rev. Dr. Wm. W. Farr, some time rector of the parish, and an address was also made by the rector.

The new parish building, which is joined to the church building on the rear, fronts on Ludlow street, and extends about 80 feet southwardly toward Chestnut street. It was constructed and furnished at a cost of over $11,000. The architect was C. B. F. Jefferys, who is also superintendent of the Sunday-school. There is a basement and second floor, both of which are divided into rooms for Sunday-school and church purposes, and apartments for the various industrial and charitable societies of the parish. The first floor entrance to which is had from Ludlow street on the north, and from Thirty-eighth street, south of the church building, on the west, contains a large infant class-room, which the children will enter from Thirty-eighth street; a library and class-room which are lighted by windows looking towards each other in a V-shaped arrangement of the eastern building walls, and two large class rooms which extend to Ludlow street. These rooms communicate with each other and the main Sunday-school room, in the basement of the church. On the second floor there is a large room overlooking Ludlow street, which is intended for the Young Men's Guild and other societies, and back of it is the lecture-room. There are two doors on this floor which lead to the church proper. The vestry-room is located at the southeast corner of the church and looks out upon Thirty-eighth street. The new building is provided with toilet rooms and other conveniences and has been comfortably furnished. The main schoolroom has also been refurnished, in a manner becoming the other improvements. In addition to the uses to be made of the new building on Sunday, it is said it will be open on Friday evenings for the convenience of those who receive instructions in shorthand, under the auspices of the Young Men's Guild; in needlework, under the direction of the Young Lady's Society, and in singing, under the direction of Colonel Boobyshell.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Clement's Church.—A week of services incident to the observance of the Dedication festival was begun in this church (the Rev. W. B. Maturin, rector,) on Sunday evening, November 22. After evening service and processions the Bishop of Central New York preached the sermon. On St. Clement's Day there were celebrations at 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 A.M., the latter choral, with a sermon by the Rev. Dr. G. W. Douglas. In the evening there was the annual procession of the guilds. The preacher was the Rev. W. S. Rainsford.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Beloved Disciple.—A missionary meeting was held in this church (the Rev. H. T. Widdemer, rector,) on Sunday evening, Nov. 22, under the auspices of the Northwest Convocation of Philadelphia. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Messrs. G. H. Kinsolving, J. P. Hnblard, and C. J. Mason.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Nativity.—There was a missionary meeting in this church (the Rev. Wm. M. Jefferis, rector,) on Sunday evening, November 22, when addresses were delivered by the Missionary Bishops of Northern Texas and Western Texas, and the rector.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Messrs. G. T. Bowen, of Barbadoes, and Jeremiah Karcher. The offerings were for the missionary jurisdictions of Northern and Western Texas.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Ascension.—The last Sunday service in the old Church of the Ascension (the Rev. G. Woolsey Hodge, rector,) was held on Sunday, November 15. There were celebrations of the Holy Communion at 7:30 A.M. and 11 A.M., Litany and instruction to children at 8:30 P.M., and Evening Prayer and sermon at 7:30 P.M. The services were conducted by the rector and his assistant, the Rev. Henry O. Du Bois. At the eleven o'clock service the rector gave an account of the chief events in the history of the parish since 1834, when it was organized by the members of St. Peter's parish.

The corner stone was laid April 10, 1834, and the church consecrated September 27, 1836, by Bishop Onderdonk. The rectors were: The Rev. Dr. Robert Piggott, now rector of a parish in Louisiana, from 1834 to 1835; the Rev. John B. Clemons, from January, 1836, to October, 1841; the Rev. N. Sayres Harris, from 1841 to July, 1842; the Rev. Frederick Ogilby, from October, 1842, to 1855; the Rev. Mr. Dabell, from September, 1855, to April, 1857; the Rev. Samuel Cox, from June, 1857, to Easter, 1861; the Rev. Dr. Mark A. DeW. Howe, as rector of St. Luke's church, the Church of the Ascension becoming a chapel of St. Luke's parish from 1861 to 1867; the Rev. John A. Childs, assistant in charge, from 1861 to 1862; the Rev. William Hobart Hare (now Bishop of South Dakota) assistant in charge and afterward rector, from 1864 to 1870; the Rev. Henry M. Stuart, from 1871 to 1878; and the Rev. G. Woolsey Hodge, from 1880 until the present time. The history of the parish for forty years, Mr. Hodge said, had been one of efforts to remove the church to some better location, the very site now chosen (on Broad street) having been made some years ago.

At the evening service the rector gave some statistical information relative to the work of the parish.

The congregation took formal possession of the new parish building on Sunday, November 22. There were celebrations of the Holy Communion at 7:30 and at 11 A.M. The lot upon which the new church stands, the foundations of which only are at present laid, but which will be pushed to a completion, has a front of one hundred and thirty feet on Broad street, and is ninety feet deep at the deepest part, it is irregular in shape. The church will be erected lengthwise on Broad street, and will be one hundred feet long, will seat six hundred. The parish building, the upper floor of which forms the chapel, is built on the back of the lot. Space is reserved on the south of the lot for a rectory.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Advent.—An interesting Thanksgiving service for the Sunday-school of this church (the Rev. R. B. Shepherd, rector,) was held on the afternoon of the Twenty-fifth Sunday after Trinity. The school entered the church in procession, and occupied the seats designated by the class banners. After a short service, interspersed with hymns and Thanksgiving collects, and an appropriate address by the rector, the names of the classes were called, and each scholar advanced and presented a gift. These consisted of articles of diet and fruits, which were afterward distributed to the poor of the parish, and to the Episcopal Hospital, Sheltering Arms, and other charitable institutions, by committees selected from the several classes. The money offerings were presented to the Home of Our Merciful Saviour for Crippled Children, in West Philadelphia. The lesson in practical charity cannot fail to beget in the children a hearty desire to do good; and there can be no better method of teaching them to be "ready to give and glad to distribute," than bringing them in direct contact with the objects of their charity.

PHILADELPHIA—City Mission.—On Tuesday, November 17, a reception was given by the Protestant Episcopal City Mission of Philadelphia to Miss C. Biddle. It was her sixtieth birthday, and the twenty-second anniversary of her connection with the mission. Not only her class of men which she has instructed during these years, but other friends of the mission, wished to show their love and affection by recognizing her faithful services. Miss Biddle was the recipient of a beautiful basket of flowers from the members of her class.

WESTCHESTER—Church of the Holy Trinity.—The semi-centennial of this parish (the Rev. John Bolton, rector,) was observed on Sunday and Monday, November 22 and 23. On the morning of Sunday the rector preached an historical sermon. In the evening a musical service was given by the choir of Christ church, Philadelphia. On Monday morning the service was said by Drs. Richard Newton and J. B. Clemons, and the Rev. Messrs. S. D. McConnell, M. T. Jefferis, and R. F. Innes. The Rev. Dr. C. G. Currie preached the historical sermon at the celebration of the Holy Communion. In the afternoon there were addresses by a number of the clergy, and a sermon to the children by the Rev. R. Newton.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

MONTOURVILLE—A Parochial Tioqa.—The Rev. Percy C. Webber of Tioqa, Pa., has conducted a most successful mission in the parish church at Montourville, near Williamsport. It began on the afternoon of Monday, November 16, and closed on Saturday. There were no less than thirty-five services, including daily celebrations, Morning and Evening Prayer, addresses to workers, children's service, service for women only and for men only, instructions, and after-meetings—all being besides the chief service in the evening. Questions were also answered—given anonymously in writing. No such series of services was ever known in Montourville before. The opening congregation was good, and the attendance steadily increased. At the service for men only the church was filled with men. At the closing evening service Mr. Webber held the unflinching attention of the people for nearly three hours—the church being filled to its utmost capacity, seats being brought in for the aisles and other open spaces, the society being filled, many standing throughout, and at least a hundred being unable to enter at all. Great numbers attended throughout who had never entered one of our churches before. The utmost satisfaction was expressed by the energetic and devoted rector of the parish, the Rev. C. J. Kilgour, as well as by all who took part in these interesting services. Mr. Webber has certainly rare gifts for this kind of work.

PITTSBURGH.

BRADFORD—Church of the Ascension.—On Monday, Oct. 26, a service was held in this church in memory of the Rev. David Buchanan Willson, late rector, and Mr. Lyman Curtice Blakeslee, late senior warden of the parish. The chancel had been appropriately draped, the altar had black covering with white emblems; the dossal was also black with white trimmings, the vases on the r-table and the font were filled with white flowers. The rector's chair was draped in black with a wreath of flowers over it: all the work of loving hands. There were present the bishop of the diocese, the rector elect (the Rev. A. D. Day), the Rev. Drs. William White and A. W. Ryan, and the Rev. Messrs. J. H. Burton, G. A. Carstensen, S. P. Kelly, E. D. Irvine, F. W. White, H. L. Yewens, A. B. Putnam (the first rector of the parish), L. B. Van Dyke, J. W. Ashton, and Sydney A. Dealy. The bishop and clergy entered the church singing the professional, Hymn 317. Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. E. D. Irvine and J. H. Burton, the Burial Anthem being sung instead of the Psalter. Addresses were made by the bishop and the Rev. Messrs. A. B. Putnam, S. P. Kelly, G. A. Carstensen and H. L. Yewens. The bishop then used an adaptation of the committal portion of the Burial Office.

The next day, Tuesday, Oct. 27, was the day appointed for the consecration of the church and the institution of the rector-elect. The bishop and clergy were met at the church porch by the wardens and vestry, and the request to consecrate was read by Mr. A. P. Tanner. The procession then advanced to the chancel, where the Sentence of Consecration was read by the Rev. A. B. Putnam. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. L. B. Van Dyke, G. A. Carstensen and S. A. Dealy. After Morning Prayer the rector-elect, the Rev. A. D. Day, was instituted by the bishop. The bishop then proceeded with the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the rector, the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. B. Putnam.

In the evening Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. S. P. Kelly, H. L. Yewens, J. H. Burton, and F. W. White. The bishop preached the sermon, and then confirmed nine persons, whom the new rector presented as the fruit of the labors of the late rector.

UNIONTOWN—Consecration of St. Peter's Church.—This church (the Rev. R. S. Smith, rector,) was consecrated on Thursday, November 19. The church was crowded, the glad parishioners crowding there before the first peal of the bell. The new church is built of a creamy-tinted stone, the inner wall being constructed of the bricks of the old church. The design is a happy blending of Norman and Gothic architecture, and bears the features of solid and dignified simplicity. The chancel is apsidal and polygonal, and from the nave is partitioned off a two-story section containing sebooroom and chapel. The floor of the aisles and chancel are of colored tiles. The chancel furniture is all memorial, as are also the windows. The chancel window of nine lancets, grouped in threes, is a memorial of the late Bishop Kerfoot, and the windows of the nave are memorials of parishioners. A tribute of a beautiful floral altar cross, from Mr. Murdoch, should be mentioned here.

The bishop and clergy were met at the door by the wardens and vestry; and the senior warden, Mr. Alfred Howell, read the request to consecrate. The bishop and clergy then advanced to the chancel, where the sentence of consecration was read by the Rev. R. J. Coster. Morning Prayer was said by the rector, assisted by the Rev. Dr. J. C. White, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Maxwell and S. P. Kelly. The bishop then proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. Drs. W. F. Brand and William White. The sermon was preached by the bishop, from 2 St. Peter, l. 15. The application of the text to the beloved rector of the parish was an affectionate and well-timed tribute.

There were present, besides the bishop and rector, the Rev. Drs. William White, W. F. Brand, and J. C. White, and the Rev. Messrs. Samuel Maxwell, R. J. Coster, J. L. Taylor, S. P. Kelly, H. Q. Miller, T. J. Danner, H. G. Schorr, and J. B. Williams.

SEWICKLEY—St. Stephen's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. R. A. Benton, rector,) on Sunday, November 15. At the celebration of the Holy Communion a set of altar linen, beautifully embroidered by the ladies of the parish, was used for the first time. In the afternoon the bishop catechized the Sunday-school, and in the evening he confirmed three persons. An earnest address, by Miss Sybil Carter, has lately aroused new interest in missionary work, and steps have been taken to associate the Ladies' Guild with the Woman's Auxiliary. A Chancel Society has been begun, to take charge of the vestments and ornaments of the church. Since Easter this parish has paid off a small debt, besides expending considerable money in refitting the rectory and roofing the chapel. Within a few weeks, with the help of some kind friends outside the parish (to whom the rector and vestry here make public acknowledgement), some very necessary improvements have been made in the rectory, greatly increasing its comfort and convenience.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Ascension.—On November 4 the Parish Ladies' Association held its annual meeting at this church (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Elliott, rector). The general treasurer reported receipts for the year as being $2,413.97; of this amount $2,345.00 had been appropriated toward the extinguishment of the debt on the church. All the sums due the Bishop Pinkney Scholarship Fund were reported paid. The Relief Committee has expended $345; nearly one thousand pounds of groceries have been distributed; 396 garments have been cut, made and distributed, and 238 yards of material furnished the Industrial school. The relief committee, in addition to its regular work, has just organized a woman's sewing club, for the purpose of reaching more of the very poor and helpless, and of instructing them in habits of domestic usefulness. The Missionary Committee report the value of the boxes lately sent out by them to be some $463. But $20.68 has been expended during the year past by the Decoration Committee, in its work at the greater festivals—an economy to be heartily commended to those who waste money in flowers and stint missions. The aggregate of moneys realized by the Parish Ladies Association for the year last past is the large and gratifying one of $3,383.68.

St. Peter's Colored Mission having been for a time abandoned, and the chapel being at the disposal of the bishop, the assistant of the Ascension parish, the Rev. G. Shackelford on November 8 reopened the chapel with an attendance of six teachers and fifty-five pupils. The bell will be purchased at a cost of $40. The chapel is furnished, and a good field exists for active and aggressive work for the Church among the freedmen of the neighborhood.

The whole sum necessary for paying off the debt upon the large and elegant Church of the Ascension is in hand, but the lender of the money refusing to accept it so long before the maturity of the notes of hand, it has been secretly invested at the same rate of interest as the debt, ready for payment in the spring, at which time the building will be consecrated as the Bishop Pinkney Memorial. A parish library of some 200 volumes has been established in this parish. The Rev. Mr. Shackelford's Friday evening lectures at this church command increasing congregations.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Convocation.—The semi-annual meeting of the Convocation of Washington was held in Trinity Church, Washington, (the Rev. Dr. T. G. Addison, rector,) on Tuesday, November 17, with a large attendance of clerical and lay members.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. S. H. Giesey, from Eph. ii. 22.

On Wednesday, after Morning Prayer, the bishop proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, assisted by the Dean of Convocation, the Rev. Dr. Meyer Lewin. The address was by the Rev. W. C. Butler.

At the business meeting the Rev. Dr. Meyer Lewin was elected dean; the Rev. C. D. Andrews, secretary; and Mr. L. J. Davis, treasurer, for the ensuing year. The dean reported favorable progress at all the mission stations within the deanery. The Rev. Dr. Addison tendered the bishop the use of the vestry-room of Trinity church (on the corner of Third and C streets) as his Washington office. [After December 1 the office days and hours of the bishop, in Washington, will be Mondays, from 1.30 to 4 P.M.] Resolutions of respect for the late Rev. J. H. Chew, and of sympathy with the Rev. W. A. Harris, detained at home by painful and dangerous illness, were adopted. The bishop made a stirring address on the subjects of clerical support and diocesan missions.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Incarnation.—The late quarterly report of the Finance Committee of the vestry of this parish (the Rev. I. L. Townsend, rector,) shows that if the income of the parish for the fourth quarter continues to grow in the same proportion as that of the preceding quarters of this year, the regular income of the parish will be about $500 in excess of the income for 1884. Weekly pledges for meeting the interest and principal of the church debt now realize $300 per year.

St. Peter's colored mission has been abandoned, and the chapel turned over to the bishop, to be disposed of as he may determine. Though withdrawing from the colored work at St. Peter's, the rector warmly commends that of St. Luke's (the Rev. Dr. Alexander Crummell, rector,) to the liberality of his congregation.

BALTIMORE—Convocation.—The Convocation of Baltimore met on November 16 in St. Mark's church, Baltimore, holding interesting sessions on Monday and Tuesday. On Monday evening the Rev. W. H. H. Powers delivered the sermon, on Tuesday morning the Rev. Dr. B. B. Griswold. The Holy Communion was celebrated on Tuesday by the bishop of the diocese. About fifty-five clergy were present, at one time or another, during the services. Much discussion arose upon topics mostly of local interest. An elegant lunch was spread by the ladies of the congregation of St. Mark's, and a supper, each of which was heartily enjoyed by the visitors. The Rev. A. J. Rich of Reisterstown is the dean of this convocation, besides being rector of the parish at that city and head of the Hannah More Academy, the diocesan school for girls and young ladies.

CUMBERLAND—Emmanuel Church.—On August 13, last, an excursion train from Mount Savage was struck by the express on the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad. None of the passengers were injured, though by the testimony of all present and the verdict of experts, the entire party, numbering about thirty persons, had a narrow escape from a horrible death. A majority of those thus preserved purchased and presented to Emmanuel church (the Rev. F. N. Meade, rector,) a book-rest of polished brass, beautifully carved, together with a copy of services, handsomely bound in red morocco and printed in large clear type. Both the volume and the stand are engraved with the inscription: "To the Glory of God, and in loving Recollection of a Merciful Rescue from Death, August 13th, 1885." The formal offering was made after the Litany on Sunday, November 8, by Mr. Louis M. Hamilton, on behalf of the contributors. The rector accepted the same in fitting terms, and after pronouncing a sentence of dedication, placed the gifts in position on the altar.

EASTON.

THE VACANT BISHOPRIC.—The Rev. Dr. George Williamson Smith, President of Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., who was elected Bishop of Easton, at the late special convention, has declined the election.

VIRGINIA.

LAWRENCEVILLE—Episcopal Visitation.—The assistant-bishop of the diocese visited the three parishes under the charge of the Rev. J. S. Russell, and confirmed sixty-six persons. He was highly pleased with the result of the missionary's work, and the hand of the Lord has certainly been with it.

Now that the rectory at Lawrenceville has been completed (with the exception of painting), the missionary in charge earnestly appeals to the friends of the colored work for three hundred dollars ($300), which amount is needed for painting the rectory, to pay off all indebtedness on the same, to build a stable, and make the necessary improvements about the yard. He extends his thanks to those who have already contributed to this worthy object. The assistant bishop "cordially endorses" this appeal.

ALABAMA.

ANNISTON—Church Progress.—Anniston is a beautiful young city, full of life and energy. Fifteen years ago there was not a building, not even a depot there—now there are six thousand people and a city of furnaces, elegant streets, gas, electricity, water-works, and every modern convenience and comfort. The Church has kept pace with the upgrowth, and a new stone edifice of beautiful design is nearing completion, all paid for: and a chapel for the operatives under full headway. To the Rev. Wallace Carnahan, with lay co-operation, must be awarded the praise for this great work. Anniston is in the convocation bounds of which the Rev. T. J. Beard, of Birmingham, is the deau. This is a live convocation—none equal to it in the diocese. All the parishes within its limits are prospering; and the mission work, under the Rev. J. F. Smith, is a great success. The new church at Tuscaloosa, the new mission churches at White Plains, and Briarfield, and Montevallo, with the anxious promise of a grand church building to be ere long erected in Birmingham, "the Magic City," altogether corroborate the statement made as to the character of the convocation referred to.

TENNESSEE.

SEWANEE—University of the South.—The news of the sudden death of the Bishop of Florida cast a shadow of sadness over the university, of which he was a trustee. He will be greatly missed, both in the councils of the Board of Trustees, and in the Theological Department, where he was Lecturer in Liturgics and Hymnology. He spent the past summer on the mountain here, busily engaged in the compilation of a scholarly work on Hymnology, embodying the results of his rare taste and extensive research in the liturgies and writings of the early Church. That this work is left incomplete will be a great loss, as few men combine the judgment in selection, taste in music, and knowledge of original hymns possessed by Bishop Young.

At a meeting of officers and faculty resolutions of condolence and sympathy with the bereaved family of the late Bishop of Florida were passed, and it was ordered that his Episcopal Chair in the university chapel should be draped in mourning for the remainder of the term.

Trinity term, now drawing to a close, has been the most successful in the history of the university. It has witnessed many improvements in buildings and equipment, and has been marked in the harmonious and efficient work done in every department.

Dr. J. W. S. Arnold has assumed duty as Professor of Chemistry. He is well known in scientific circles as lately an eminent professor and lecturer in some of New York's leading institutions. Under his directions the laboratory is refitting, and, when finished, will be one of the most complete in the South.

Sixty new students, and numerous applications for admission next term, together with many inquiries for catalogues, etc., give an indication of the substantial and healthy growth of the university. Every year is demonstrating the wisdom of having the executive office conducted on business principles. The university owes everything to the rare executive ability and sound judgment of its Vice-Chancellor.

NASHVILLE—Mission Services.—During the first and third weeks of the Advent season it is proposed by the clergy of this city to hold a series of meetings in the several churches with a view to deepen and broaden interest in Church work. The subjects to be presented are various, but all of a practical character. The meetings will be held as follows: Monday night, Holy Trinity church; Tuesday night, Church of the Advent; Wednesday night, Christ church; Thursday night, St. Peter's church; Friday night, St. Ann's church.

NASHVILLE—Ordination.—On Wednesday, November 25, the bishop of the diocese advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. M. Cabell Martin and Theodore Foote, in St. Ann's church (the Rev. T. F. Martin, rector.) Morning service was said by the Rev. M. M. Moore; the sermon was preached by the bishop, and the candidates were presented by the Rev. Dr. W. Graham.

NASHVILLE—St. Ann's Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. T. F. Martin, rector,) on the evening of Wednesday, November 25, preached, and confirmed six persons.

NASHVILLE—St. Peter's Church.—On the evening of Thursday, November 26, Thanksgiving Day, the bishop visited this mission (the Rev. H. Cabell Martin in charge) preached, and confirmed twelve persons. This is the second confirmation in this parish since February 1, and the prospect seems to be fair for this mission soon to become an independent and self-supporting parish.

MICHIGAN.

DETROIT—Emmanuel Church.—The Rev. J. W. Ashman entered on the rectorship of this parish in October, 1884. The congregations have increased to such an extent that it was soon found necessary to enlarge the church. A parish meeting was called and authority given to the vestry, under which the work of enlargement was entered on. By September, 1885, the seating capacity of the church had been increased from four hundred and seventy-five to seven hundred, at a total cost of about $5,000.

On Sunday, November 8, the Rev. J. W. Ashman was instituted into the rectorship by the bishop of the diocese, the Rev. P. B. Lightner preaching the sermon. In the evening the Bishop of Nebraska preached an eloquent and powerful discourse.

WISCONSIN.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—The journal of the thirty-ninth annual council gives statistics as follows—clergy, including the bishop, 70; candidates for orders and postulants, 12; lay readers, 44; ordinations, 8; parishes and missions, 108; baptisms, 503; confirmations, 409; communicants, 5,000; Sunday-school scholars, 2,870; parish-school scholars, 74; offerings, $92,078.47; value of church property, $671,645.00. The address of the bishop is devoted to the diocese and its institutions.

FOND DU LAC.

FOND DU LAC—Laying of the Cathedral Corner-Stone.—The corner-stone of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul was laid on St. Simon and St. Jude's Day. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather the service was conducted without any curtailment of the order arranged. At 10:30 a.m., the Bishop of Wisconsin celebrated the Holy Eucharist in the cathedral chapel, assisted by the Rev. Dr. L. A. Kemper and the Rev. William Dafter, the bishop of the diocese making a short address. At noon the procession of Sunday-school children, members of the congregation, chorists, students of Nashotah, clergy and bishops, proceeded to the corner-stone, which was duly laid by the Bishop of Fond du Lac, and then, singing appropriate hymns, passed around the walls and foundations, being dismissed at the chapel porch.

The plan of the projected cathedral is a simple, graceful enlargement of the former building, adding transepts, chapel and chancel. The outside measurement is one hundred and eighty feet in length; nave, forty feet broad, transepts eighty feet in length. Seatings will be provided for about one thousand worshippers. Gray, rough-faced limestone is used for the walls. Mr. R. M. Upjohn, of New York, is the architect. The loss by fire of the former building was a severe blow to the congregation, but they are beginning the new work courageously, and doubtless will be prospered in doing it.

GREEN BAY—Orphan's Home.—The bishop of the diocese has announced that the Northwestern Orphan's Home has been put under his jurisdiction and care as a part of the work of the diocese. This institution occupies a beautiful house and site on Astor Heights, overlooking the Fox River. It was organized by an able and benevolent Lutheran minister, the Rev. Karl E. G. Oppen, and his estimable wife. It shelters at present twenty-four orphans of different nationalities and creeds. The Rev. Mr. Oppen has just been received into the Church, and with his wife and family confirmed. He will become a candidate for Holy Orders, remaining, however, in charge of the orphanage. It is understood that the bishop has in mind for the Rev. Mr. Oppen special and important work among the Germans.

GREEN BAY—Christ Church.—On the Twenty-first Sunday after Trinity the Rev. H. C. E. Costelle was instituted as rector of this parish by the bishop of the diocese.

COLORADO.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We gather the following statistics from the journal of the twelfth annual convocation—clergy, including the bishop, 20; candidates for orders and postulants, 3; parishes and missions, 85; baptisms, 427; confirmations, 189; communicants, 2,000; Sunday-school scholars, 1,599; offerings, $36,867.43; value of church property, $278,085.00. The bishops address is confined to matters pertaining to the jurisdiction. There is in the journal no separate summary of diocesan statistics other than the abstract of the parochial reports and the report of the Committee on the State of the Church.

PARAGRAPHIC.

A CHURCH in Newark, every day in the week, has a sign upon it, inviting passers-by to rest and pray. Trinity and St. George's of this city are always open with the same invitation, and there may be others beside them.

It is curious how extremes meet. The Roman Catholics believe that infants dying unbaptized are incapable of salvation, and they invented the limbo patrum as their final resting place. The Presbyterians have only the elect infants.

A DENOMINATIONAL paper says that the five points of ritualism, the eastward position, altar lights, vestments, wafer bread, and mixed chalice, are neither of them mentioned by St. Paul or St. Peter, or St. John. It might have pointedly added that neither do they mention the five points of Calvinism.

THE Evangelist of this city is desirous of seeing the words, "Elect infants dying in infancy are saved," expunged from the Confession of Faith. It admits the implication that non-elect infants are not saved, which it says no one now believes. In Confessions of Faith it holds there should be honesty and truth.

AMONG the most noticeable displays at the last Chrystiancton Show was one by Mr. James R. Fitcher. Some of his latest seedlings are named after clergymen. The Revs. D. Parker Morgan, F. L. Humphreys, and N. Barrows, are among those chosen. No mention is made, however, of the color and variety he thus seeks to distinguish.

WILLIAM M. DUCKER, of Brooklyn, has received a prize of $1,000 and the decoration of the Order of the Red Cross, from the Empress of Germany, for a portable field hospital exhibited at Antwerp. It was 34 feet long, 17 feet wide, 6-12 feet high at the side walls, and 10-14 feet high at the ridge pole. The advantages claimed for it are simplicity, stability, strength, lightness, cheapness, convenience, ease of transportation, facility of erection and removal, adaptability and superiority of heating and ventilation. It will accommodate twelve beds with twelve cubic metres to each bed.

THE following resolution, referred by the last to the next Presbyterian Synod of this city relates to a grave subject, and one worthy of the attention of all Christian people:

"Resolved, that the Presbyterian Synod of New York, believing that the lessons of history and the traditions of American liberty forbid the union of Church and State, discriminates between sectarianism and religion, and affirms that, so far as public education is concerned, the sanctions of an enduring morality must be found, not in policy, nor in social custom, nor in public opinion, but in those fundamental truths of religion which are common to all sects and distinctive of none. It, therefore, urges upon its pastors and people the important duty of opposing the attitude of indifference to religion which appears in our public school manuals and in the educational work of our reformatories, and, at the same time, of using every proper influence to secure the incorporation with the course of study and national instruction, of the following religious truths as a basis for national morality, namely:

1. The existence of a personal God.
2. The responsibility of every human being to God.
3. The deathlessness of the human soul, as made in the image of God and after the power of an endless life.
4. The reality of a future spiritual state beyond the grave, in which every soul shall give account for itself before God, and shall reap that which it has sown.

DIED.

Entered into rest, Nov. 18, 1885, at the residence of her son-in-law, Charles B. Hatch, at Rochester, N. Y., Mrs. MARY LEFFINGWELL CLARK, widow of Charles B. Clark, of East End, N. Y., in the seventieth year of her age. The funeral was held at St. Luke's church, at Brockport, N. Y., on Saturday, Nov. 21, 1885.

Suddenly, on Friday evening, Nov. 18, in the eighty-first year of her age, ESTER K. R., widow of the late John Leverett.

THOMAS A. HERRICKS, Vice-President of the Board of Christian Education, as mentioned at the meeting at Ind., at 4:35 o'clock, Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 25, 1885, aged sixty-six years, one month and eight days. The funeral services were held on Tuesday, Dec. 1, in St. Peter's Cathedral, Indianapolis.

At Salisbury, Conn., Nov. 19, HARRIET EMMA, wife of HERV. H. GEORGE, and daughter of the late Rev. D. F. Sanford, D. D., aged 80 years.

THE REV. JOHN BAYLEY.

Entered into rest, on the Twentieth Sunday after Trinity, St. Luke's Day, in his home, in Ctica, N. Y., the Rev. JOHN BAYLEY, aged 73 years and 8 months.

The death of this faithful priest of the Church deserves a more extended notice than has yet appeared in the Church papers. Mr. Bayley has been a member of the clergy since 1812, and for some time, but in the years of his health, he was one of our most active, successful and laborious clergymen. He was a member of the Synod of the Diocese of the Churches at Oswego, Lowville and Fayetteville were all built under his rectorship. His influence and power of character were such a part of his life, that he raised the Episcopal Fund of Central New York. All who knew Mr. Bayley felt that he was a pure and good spirit had a heart that was always courteous, dignified, yet a cheerful and pleasant companion. His soul has quietly left the bodily tabernacle, and passed to the companionship of loved ones gone before, into the presence of the dear Lord whom he served so many years. "Blessed be the power by which they shall see God."

THE REV. HENRY F. HARTMAN, PH. D.

The Rev. HENRY F. HARTMAN, Ph. D., whose death at Cologne, Germany, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, is reported, was a native of Germany. He came to the new world while a young man, immediately after having received his degree from Heidelberg University, and for some years was a minister of the German Reformed church. He was prominently identified with the rise of the "Mercersburg School of Theology." In January, 1857, he was appointed to the pastorate of the Holy Innocent church, advanced to the priesthood, by the Rev. John B. Kerfoot, Bishop of Pittsburgh. He remained in that office until 1871, when he came to Hoboken, N. J., and organized the Parish of the Church of the Holy Innocent in that city. Shortly after his arrival, the chaplaincy of the English Church in Cologne, Germany, was appointed to the post under a special licence from the Bishop of London, which position he held until his death. His only wife, E. A. Hartman, was a rector of the Church at Daneseburgh, N. Y.

MRS. THAYER.

Entered into rest, at Gratton, W. Va., on the morning of Nov. 25, VIRGINIA LOVE, beloved wife of Dr. A. Thayer.

Born in Virginia, Mrs. THAYER removed to Gratton with her parents in her childhood. She was educated at the West Hill Female Seminary. In her youth, she gave her heart to God, committing herself to His service. She was prominently identified with the services of our Church, where she was established in Gratton she was confirmed. Her husband was a prominent member of the same, and his gentle spirit and unselfishness shed a blessed light in her home. Eight months of suffering were all that she had to endure, but she passed peacefully into the presence of the Pure and Holy One. The strong arms of earthy love would fail have kept her here. Death took her embrace, and so now "underneath her are the Everlasting Arms" of Christening Love.

And yet, those whose hearts are made desolate, the same blessed Hand will surely lead us on.

"Till the morning is gone."
And with me the morning comes, and I am left.
Which we have loved long and will love still."
W. H. H. P.

APPEALS.

The first of November completed the second year of the existence of the Church Home for Infants and Aged Colored People in Brunswick County, Virginia, the only asylum that has ever been built by the Church to alleviate the physical sufferings of the unfortunate people; the only Home ever provided for the old, worn-out slaves of the past. This second year has been a peculiarly trying one. It has nearly every patient had typhoid fever. She recovered, but the fever was so severe that she nearly every patient had had it, and all the summer has been spent in caring for her duties. The matron was unable to attend to her duties. A very anxious summer! On the lonely hillside, where we bury our dead, are many rest, see some graves.

I have increased the number of beds from the original number, and could easily do more for thirty, if I only had the means to support them. For the first time since my work commenced, I am glad and perhaps the only one, to have the means to sustain it. Most earnestly I beg my friends to help me. The fearful responsibility of such work, its unnumbered sorrows, are greater than you can imagine. If I have any money care be superadded to these, the burden will be heavier than I can bear. Boxes are sent most generously to the school, but need money, too, to defray the necessary expenses. One hundred dollars yearly, for each bed, will cover all expenditures. One hundred dollars, also, to teach the children, physicians, nurses, medicine, everything. I could not well support the school and home, if I had more than $1000. The school has reopened this fall with a fuller attendance than we have ever had at this season of the year. The improvement of the children is marked and most encouraging. During the fall and winter terms, I have also taught the children, and many of our young men who have to work during the day.

With all the strength and wisdom God has given me, I have so little, so often, I cannot tell what is right. I grope in the dark. Most keenly, most deeply, each day. I feel my own deficiencies, my want of judgment, my deplorable ignorance of business details. But earnestly and trying to make this work a permanent blessing to those negroes. I appeal to the dear friends He hath raised up for me to uphold, and strengthen, and help.

THE PAPAL ENCYCLICAL AND THE FREEDOM OF WORSHIP BILL.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The mandement of Leo XIII. as to the conduct of the Roman Catholic voters with regard to civil and municipal affairs will not be without its influence on both non-Roman and their constituents so far as the Freedom of Worship Bill is concerned. One vote more last session and that mischievous bill would have passed into law, and the Jesuits would have scored another point. So far as the voting went, many strong Republicans went over to the side of the Roman priesthood and voted for the measure—some of those thus casting their votes being adherents of the Dutch Reformed persuasion, and, therefore, presumably sturdy Protestants in the strongest, if not the best, sense of the word. The principles, however, for which their forefathers sacrificed their very lives they remorselessly cast to the winds, and preferred to play into the hands of a non-American and a diabolical faction, lest they should fail of being returned this November. Several have paid the penalty of this their political malfeasance, but many others have been returned by the votes of non-Roman electors without having been even catinched as to their intentions with respect to the bill. In fact, it is doubtful if more than one assemblyman has been returned to Albany this November from New York State on the distinct understanding that he is to vote against the Freedom of Worship Bill. That has been the case in this section, though even here many of the Dutch Reformed voters seemed to think it was of much higher importance that personal spite should be gratified, or that the Prohibitionist candidates should be returned, even at the risk of seeing men seat to the assembly whose votes they knew in every way inimical to freedom of worship and unjust to the interests of those waifs and strays of humanity whom the Roman Church engorges so greedily, and brings up at the public expense as her zealous henchmen of the future. Should as the non-Roman assemblymen be distinctly instructed by their constituents of the non-Roman stripe—at least by those belonging to the Church—as to what is expected from them when the bill comes up for discussion?

LET RUBRICS BE KEPT.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Before the Church finally considers the adoption in part or as a whole of the proposed amendments and enrichments of our Common Prayer, a layman asks for some assurance that its provisions and rubrics will be strictly regarded and complied with when such adoption is consummated. With the individual liberties taken by some of our parish clergy with the Book in morning or adopting the rubrics to suit an emotion or convenience, it is not encouraging to give lay sanction to further rubrics, which may be subject to like temporary adaptations. Let us abide and rest on our present formulae without giving more opportunity for the laity to be taught disrespect and unconcern for the rubrics. To us parish clergymen is given the right of private interpretation, and the layman justly is entitled to have the Prayer Book followed when he enters in good faith on public worship. One rector on a Sunday asks his people to repeat with him the General Thanksgiving, as it seems "proper"—to him. Another Sunday he asks his people to join with him in the opening sentences of the Litany, instead of responding as prescribed, as it seems "suitable"—to him. Another omits the Exhortation in his week-day services, and when asked why, responds it is "unnecessary." Another has formed the habit of reading his parish and other notices immediately after the Litany, instead of in the prescribed place, because to him it is more seemly.

And thus it goes on, in one way and another, the layman holding his Common Prayer in hand, and in time wondering what all these rubrics mean, when in one parish or another he sees the rubrics handled at the will of the rector. Are the parish clergy aware of the education they are giving the laity toward a disregard, if not disrespect, of our Common Prayer and its prescribed directions for public service?

HOBART COLLEGE LIBRARY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Hobart College has met with a very serious loss in the destruction of the greater part of its library by fire, and we shall be greatly indebted to you if you will give the enclosed a place in your columns, with such editorial notice as you may deem appropriate.

CHAR. D. VAIL, Librarian.

Geneva, N. Y.

Long before dawn the college was roused by the cry of fire; the fire department of Geneva were reported overtaxed by a fire in the town the night previous. Before the arrival of a sufficient force the old college building, containing, among other things, its library, was burned. With the aid of brave students we were able to extinguish the flames on Trinity Hall dormitory; and for this and the fact that no lives were lost, we give thanks. But the most valuable and indispensable possession of the college, its choice collection of books, representing the toil, and sacrifice, and care of more than half a century, is swept away. The nearly completed new and long-looked-for fire-proof library building stands empty, and with a sadly appealing look. The small insurance which the meagre funds of the college permitted will suffice to re-build and replace but comparatively few volumes, while valuable sets of books are hopelessly broken, and thousands are lost by fire or ruined by water.

Distant, as we are, from the greatest centres of wealth and influence, still we devoutly trust that there may be those of our own people, or of religious bodies committed to higher education, who will be touched by the tragic fate of the Hobart College library, and by the crippled condition of faculty and students, deprived of it and of the old college hall. Those moved to help the college properly for the library or other purposes, with contributions of money or books, will kindly address: Alex. L. Clew, treasurer, or Dr. Hamilton L. Smith, senior professor, or E. N. Potter, president, Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y.

WHO ARE COMMUNICANTS IN WESTERN NEW YORK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

It will be observed by those who study Church statistics that the returns from the Diocese of Western New York show a decrease of about fourteen hundred in the number of communicants. Let it be inquired that this indicates a retrograde movement, and in order that the loss may be rightly accounted for, I call attention to a new diocesan canon which during this present year has gone into effect throughout the Diocese of Western New York:

"Of the Registration of Communicants.—Forasmuch as it is requisite that every communicant should receive the Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Christ at the Feast of Easter, it is hereby ordered that the number of communicants in any parish or mission shall be reckoned only according to those actually communicated at Easter, with such as give good and sufficient reasons for failure. And to this end, all clergy is enjoined to annually correct their list of communicants during the Paschal season, giving due notice of the operation of this canon to their congregations. But the name thus omitted of any communicant who shall appear at the Holy Table between Easter and Pentecost, inclusive, may be restored to the list aforesaid. And the clergy shall not fail to admonish those whose names are thus omitted, in case they delay and prolong the time of their neglect."

IS THE INFLUENCE OF THE MINISTRY WANING?

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

This subject has been a good deal discussed in your columns of late.

I will not attempt to decide the question, but will ask another.

Why do so many young men hang around the large cities instead of taking work on the frontier, where older men with families cannot be supported?

The Methodists can find plenty of men for such work.

I know a young Methodist minister who travels thousands of miles every year, in all sorts of ways, through Arizona, on a salary of $600 a year.

I will guarantee twice as much for the right sort of man for Tucson, Phoenix and Prescott.

The climate is unsurpassed, as I would have him work in Prescott—altitude over 500 feet—during the hot months, and in Tucson and Phoenix—altitude about 2,500 feet—the rest of the year.

One who has failed elsewhere will not do here, but for a man of fair ability, and not afraid to work, I hardly know a more hopeful field.

I will be glad to correspond with any unarmored clergyman who desires to undertake the work.

GEO. K. DEXTER.

SUFFERERS AT GALVESTON.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Will you kindly announce that I will publish in THE CHURCHMAN, at an early day, a full list of the generous donors who have so promptly responded to my appeal for help. The sufferers from the great fire which swept away so many hundred homes in my parish join with me in loving thanks to my brethren everywhere. To the Rev. Dr. Charles Hall of Brooklyn, and Dr. Morgan of St. Thomas' church, New York, we would return our special recognition.

These venerable brethren, whom I shall always remember with grateful affection, threw themselves into the sad cause which I had presented to them with an enthusiasm and devotion as if the cry had been at their own doors, and not two thousand miles distant from them. To them and others who have remembered us in our affliction we extend the assurances of our Christian fellowship and gratitude.

Rector of Trinity church, Galveston, Texas.

NEW BOOKS.

THE FALL OF CONSTANTINOPLE: Being the Story of the Fourth Crusade. By Edwin Pears, LL.B. Barrister at Law, Late President of the European Bar at Constantinople, and Knight of the Green Order of the Saviour. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 422.

It hardly needed that Mr. Pears should write himself "barrister-at-law" on his title-page. The advocate's habit is shown throughout these pages. It is as if he held a brief for the Greek Empire and against the Venetian Republic. Yet we do not mean by this that he is an unfair historian. On the contrary, he writes with the moderation of a man conscious that he has an excellent case, and cautious not to spoil it by over statement. But the style is the style of the bar. There are repetitions which strike one as the fashions of a jurist-lawyer who is afraid lest his facts should slip the memory of his hearers; there are arrangements which exemplify the skill of one who presents a case, rather than of the placid follower of the track of history. But in spite of these peculiarities Mr. Pears has written a remarkably interesting volume. He has striven to show that the Eastern Empire was the great bulwark of Europe against Asia, and that, while the Crusades were spasmodic and abortive sallies, the real battle was maintained under the fortress walls of Constantinople by a steady resistance to the almost exhaustless surges of the waves of Tartar migration. The Fourth Crusade was, to use Fouché's famous dictum, "worse than a crime, it was a blunder." It so weakened the resisting power of the empire that it fell at last under the Ottoman invasion. It was a crime, for it was brought about by the perjury of the Crusaders themselves. It was a blunder, for it missed the last favorable chance for the conquest of Egypt and Syria. It was a crime, for it violated the leading principle of the Crusades, that no Christian was to suffer violence at the hands of one who bore the cross on his shoulder. It was a blunder, for it played the cat's-paw to the avaricious Venetian State, and wrecked the commercial prospects of the other Italian commonwealths.

It was both crime and blunder in that it really lent itself to the wiles of Saracen diplomacy and opened the way for all the mischief which Turkish rule has done and is still doing in Europe. Mr. Pears brings strongly out this great feature of the Turkish character, that no faith is to be kept with the infidel, except under pressure of necessity. It is this which makes the problem of European diplomacy at this present moment, it is this which, as we write, is really setting at odds the Great Powers—viz., the conviction that it is no use to trust the Turk to look for reforms or to expect amelioration.

It is well brought out in these pages that the relation of the Christian and the Moslem is an impossible one so long as the latter is dominant. There is but one condition under which foreign residents can inhabit Constantinople, and that is under treaty concessions, by which they remain under the jurisdiction and protection of their own governments.

LALA BOKER: An Oriental Romance. By Thomas Moore. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat, 1885.] pp. 378. Quarto.

Among holiday publications this exquisitely illustrated volume must remain unique, since the poem stands out quite alone as an expression of Oriental imagination, thoroughly saturated with sensuous beauty; while the spirit and quality of illustration seems almost an aesthetic outgrowth of the melodious and richly colored lines. Often the common type illustration adds little to the text, and often may be dispensed with, leaving the volume unimpaired.

But here we have this dream-land idyl "set" to fantasy and picturesque suggestion, very much as it might have been "set" to music by Mendelssohn. And these illustrations henceforth will cling to the verses, as if they had shared a common conception and production. So the "Midsummers' Nights' Dream" music is become a part of the text to modern culture. The verse brings the music and the music brings the text. This much may very naturally become true of this weird conjunction of picture and poetry. There are one hundred and twenty-five photo-etchings, having mostly the freedom and breadth of aquarelles, but the higher interest lies in the wealth of imagination and fancy among the artists themselves, who are generally recognized as foremost in American art. The plates are monochromatic, ranging through many tones of subdued tint. Paper, printing and binding are unexceptionable.

RELIGION IN HISTORY AND IN THE LIFE OF TO-DAY. By A. S. Fairbairn, D. D., Principal of Alfreton College, Bradford. (New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., pp. 128. Price 75c.)

We regard Principal Fairbairn's work as decidedly valuable. It is an attempt to approach the working class upon a matter which deeply concerns them, and in a new and perhaps effective way. At the same time, it is our opinion that, unless the workmen of Bradford are of a different class and with a different habit of reading from anything this side of the water can show, these lectures must have gone in part far above their heads. The most defective part of the book is the part concerning the Church. It is only a bigoted independent who is capable of asserting the absence of anything like a hierarchy in the primitive Church. It is absurd to suppose an Oriental society of any sort capable of existing with a measured rule and order of internal government. It is preposterous to suppose a vast affiliation, such as the Christian Church became in a very short time after it grew out of Jerusalem and Judea, could have lived for a day without organization. The New Testament is full of the indications of this, and the absence of precise directions, when coupled with innumerable allusions, is the strongest proof that a completed system, at least in its main parts, preceded the writing of the very earliest of the New Testament Scriptures. But, regarded as an answer to the infidel and agnostic writings, which, more or less, reach the workmen of Great Britain, we ought to say that this should be a very useful volume. The thought is clear, if the language is little too elevated. For instance, "objective" and "subjective" are fine algebraic formulas, very convenient when one knows their meaning, utterly bewildering unless one knows them. The same may be said of many other philosophic terms. Unless Principal Fairbairn knew aright the capacity of his hearers, he should not have used them.

LECTURES ON TEACHING Delivered in the University of Cambridge During the Lent Term, 1885. By J. G. Fitch, M. A., Assistant Commissioner to the late Endowed School Commission and one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. New Edition, with a Preface by an American Normal Teacher. [New York: McMillan & Co., pp. 308. Price $1.00.]

There is a thoroughness in the whole tone of these lectures which commends itself very decidedly to the reader. There will always be differences of methods resulting from differences of character. Teaching is like preaching; there is no royal road to it, nor infallible method by which success is insured. Men or women with a natural gift will develop ways of their own which go in the face of all rules previously laid down. Nevertheless rules are good, and in general, teaching requires method and is founded on principles widely applicable. We commend this book as one in which the best teachers may find something to be learned and the poorest will be likely to get some help.

The last eight lectures, especially the one on the modes of teaching different branches, language, arithmetic, history, geography, etc., are particularly to be studied. Like all sensible men Mr. Fitch sees the absurdity of teaching English grammar; the real thing to be taught being the English language, and the grammar a mere engraving of the Latin grammatical system upon a tongue of which one-half has no relation whatever to Latin roots. When we speak of this as a book for teachers to study, we do not mean for them only. It is a book for learners to read, and especially when teaching is so much controlled by the State it is useful for those who have to do citizen's duty in the management of school committees, etc., to know something about teaching. Most men in middle-life are only competent to remember and like (or dislike) the way in which they were themselves taught and their whole judgment is based on these methods.

BRYANT AND HIS FRIENDS: SOME REMINISCENCES OF THE KNICKERBOCKER WRITERS. By James Grant Wilson. Author of "Poets and Poetry of Scotland," "Life and Letters of Fitz-Greene Halleck," etc. [New York: Forde, Howard & Buttrick,] pp. 42.

Gen. Wilson has given a series of slight biographical sketches of Bryant, Paulding, Irving, Dana, Cooper, Halleck, Drake, Willis, Poe and Bayard Taylor, and thereafter brief notices of some twenty-one other authors, under the head of the Knickerbocker Writers.

We can only say that this makes a volume of the sort which a friend is wont to describe as "dipping," which, we take it, means a nice book to have on a table at hand and to catch up in odd moments. These sketches are pleasantly written, with little bits of personal reminiscence here and there, with letters hitherto unpublished and the like. We should like to have more, though Gen. Wilson, as the son of a publisher, probably knows by instinct how much is safe to venture. There are nice portraits of Bryant, Paulding and Halleck, and manuscript facsimiles of most of the other authors, all tending to show that literary success and good handwriting are man and wife. Horace Greeley to the contrary notwithstanding. We do not absolutely share Gen. Wilson's high estimate of Bryant as a poet, though we admire him, but as a rule we can say that the literary criticisms of the book are just and fair.

HYPERAESTHESIA: A Novel. By Mary Cruger. [New York: Forde, Howard & Buttrick,] pp. 400.

Hyperaesthesia is a medical term for a state of physical nervous sensibility which causes acute suffering to the patient. It has a correspondent psychical state in which the soul has the same experience. This novel turns on the fates of two ladies, one married and one single—sisters-in-law—the matron has the physical form of the trouble and the maiden, who is killing herself by waiting on her sister, has the psychical infirmity.

Ester on the scene a young doctor who happily effects the cure of both. This is certainly a new variety of fiction, but we do not see but what it is permissible. There is a good deal of shrewd common-sense inculcated in the pages of this book, and some very good talk about flirtation. It is rather curious to see how large a drift there is of the latest American novel writing against this practice. It is as if there were a sudden waking up of the national conscience on the subject, and a discovery that the American principle of unlimited freedom of choice by young people was not without its perils.

We can say that on the whole this is a good novel and that oddly enough it will pay for the perusal by qualities quite apart from its character as fiction. The intimation of a possible cure for "Hyperaesthesia" is well worth considering.

FROM SHAKESPEARE TO POPE. An Inquiry into the Causes and Phenomena of the Rise of Classical Poetry in England. By Edmund Gosse, Clerk, Lecturer in English Literature at the University of Cambridge. [New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.,] pp. 242.

Mr. Gosse prepared these lectures for the Lowell Institute in Boston, and afterwards delivered them at Johns Hopkins University, and at Yale, and at his own University of Cambridge (England). This is enough to raise a fair presumption that they are above the ordinary standard, and this presumption will be turned to certainty on a perusal of these pages. Their object is not so much criticism of particular authors, as it is the inquiry into the vast change of literary style from that of the Elizabethan age to that of the age of Anne. He has considered poetry as an art, and has shown in a very masterly way the characteristics of the two schools, the classic and the romantic, as well as the causes which led to the choice of each. It is rare that so much is compressed into a volume of this size, and a literary purpose so strictly maintained from first to last. With this there is shown a graceful and masterly handling of the topic which is in marked contrast to the usual dilatory and desultory way in which such questions are discussed. We trust the reader will not overlook the graceful lines of dedication to Mr. W. D. Howells, verses which certainly establish Mr. Gosse's claim to criticize poetry by quite another title than that of the famous dictum of St. Beuve.

THE STORY OF THE HEAVENS. By Robert Stowell Ball, LL.D., Fellow of the Royal Society of London, Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society, Honorary Member of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Vice-President of the Royal Irish Academy, Andrews Professor of Astronomy in the University of Dublin, and Royal Astronomer of Ireland, With Coloured Plates and Numerous Illustrations. [New York: Cassell & Company,] pp. 351.

The titles of Dr. Ball above given are a sufficient warrant for the correctness of the facts told in these pages. Of his merits as an astronomer we do not, of course, pretend to judge. Our business is with his work as an author, and we can safely say that he has known how to tell the "Story of the Heavens" most entertainingly, so that the unscientific reader can both understand and enjoy it. There is that happy mixture of abstruse science and familiar illustration which leads one on into learning at least something of the magnitude of the study, the most fascinating and laborious to which the human mind can give itself. It is evident that there is no room for any rivalry of astronomical study and other sciences; it has enough to absorb the entire devotion of a life. This work brings astronomy down to the latest times, treats of the possible intra-mercurial planet Vulcan, of the satellites of Mars, of the spectroscopic and its revelations, and much more that in the old school books was undreamt of.

POEMS, together with Brother Jacob, and The Lifted Veil. By George Eliot. Harper's Literary edition. [New York: Harper & Brothers,] pp. 280. Price 25c.

George Eliot's fame as a prose writer has stood in the way of her poetical reputation. But we can say that many volumes of verse come in our way which do not show a tittle of the original power and beauty of the verses in this volume. The longest poem is the drama of the Spanish Gipsy, which is, we presume, too well known to the reading public to require extended notice. Of the other shorter poems, "How Lida Loved the King," "Agatha," "A Minor Prophet," and "The Death of Moses," are admirable. It is noteworthy that George Eliot's verses exhibit little of the free philosophy of her prose. There is, too, a vigor and concentration in her poetry which is by no means a feminine characteristic. We think, if she had written nothing but these verses, she would have attained a high place among bards, while she now will be known mainly as the novelist.

THE LAST MARYING. A Story. By Brander Matthews. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons,] pp. 208. Price 25c.

This is distinctly a society novel of New York. The action does not move away from the charmed circle between Washington Square and the Central Park. It is a story in which the names are merely veiled titles of living persons, with the exception, perhaps, of the chief actors. Some of the veils are of the thinnest sort, and it is well that the story is a good-natured one throughout, or the book would give room for a dozen libel suits, to say the least. It is a good-natured book, with no more of the tragic element than is needed to make a good story, and the villainy is all imported villany. The dialogue is light and sparkling—in fact, we doubt much whether the actual New Yorker hears so many good things said in anything like the space of time covered by these pages. But this should be said for Mr. Matthews, that it is thoroughly in the style of New York, and "si non e vero" is certainly "ben trovato."

BIBLE READINGS, selected from the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua. By the Rev. J. A. Cross. [London and New York: Macmillan & Co.,] pp. 284. Price 60c.

The idea of this is to give the historical parts of the portions of the Old Testament above mentioned in such a way as to afford a continuous view of it—in other words, to break up the formal chapter and verse arrangement, which is such a hindrance to the Bible study of many readers. We can see no possible objection to this, and it seems to us that, if successful, it will be of great use. There are no notes or comments.

WHERE AND HOW TO BUILD: With Plans and Sketches of Cottages and City Houses, Schools, Churches, Theaters, Apartment Houses, etc. [New York: Hubert, Frazon & Co.]

The title sufficiently indicates the general purpose of the volume. The first twenty pages are taken up with a valuable treatise covering most practical matters in which house-builders are interested. A varied series of plates, with ample explanatory notes, provides numberless hints and suggestions. These gentlemen have been long identified with rural and suburban architecture.

AMERICA AND OTHER POEMS. By Henry Hamilton. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons,] pp. 210.

Mr. Hamilton seems to have considerable facility in verse, and to understand the use of various metres. His poetry is very much in one key and the sentiments he puts in verse, while very praiseworthy, do not strike us as particularly new or original.

HOLIDAY BOOKS.

THE LAST LEAF. Poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes, illustrated by George Wharton Edwards and F. Hopkinson Smith. [Cambridge: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Riverside Press, 1888.] Quarto.

The admirers of Dr. Holmes, and they are everywhere, will welcome this costly and elaborate illustration of perhaps his most widely read poem, consisting of only five unpretending stanzas, which cling tenaciously, however, when once read. Here an autograph copy bearing the dates 1832 and 1885 follows the tables of contents, itself not the least interesting among them. Mr. Edwards takes the figure and Mr. Smith the landscape subjects. The former are in the quaint, dainty feeling of Abbey's early-English studies, and show conscientious study and a tender perception of old New England days and ways. Necessarily a quiet monotone of sentiment runs through the pages; and sometimes there is a conscious effort in illustrating that which furnishes little or no inspiration. But there is enough creditable work in this somewhat attenuated picturesque accompaniment to awaken and retain popular interest. Opposite page 10, Mr. Smith's engraver has hit upon an excellent Corot effect, and again upon page 44. The burden of the volume lies in a charming sketch of the growth and history of the verses from the pen of Dr. Holmes. The publishers have dealt lavishly in the production of this luxurious and finely appointed volume.

RECENT AMERICAN ENGRAVINGS. Original Plates. Text by J. B. Hitchcock. [New York: White, Stokes & Allen, 1885.]

This collection evidently grows out of the brilliant success of last year's group of etchings. There are ten plates of unequal merit, some of them brilliant and touching the level of our best native productions, a few are commonplace and unimpressive. Among the former may be mentioned Mr. King's "Breton Courtyard"—a strong impression of sunlight; "A Sea-side Residence," by Henry Farrer; "A Morning Walk," by Hamilton Hamilton, full of delicate, wintry feeling and wintry air, with a beautifully-drawn figure; Mr. Volkmar's "Duck's Paradise," very rich and mellow in tone; "An Idyl of Shanty-Town," in Mr. Monk's plate of clambering goats; Mr. Van Elten's "Beach at Gloucester, Mass.," and Mr. Calahan's very spirited plate of Fortny's celebrated "Mandolin Player."

Mr. Hitchcock provides an excellent sketch of the rise and progress of etching among American artists, with genial, explanatory notes for each plate. The collection is published in several editions of "Artists Proofs," of course severely limited, with appropriate and costly portfolios.

TOMAS CRUIER. By William D. Howells. With Illustrations from Drawings and Etchings by Joseph Pennell and others. [Boston: Ticknor & Co. 1885.]

To the cultivated reader who is denied the privilege of foreign travel, such a mentor as Mr. Howells is inestimably valuable. Few writers travel with such highly trained perceptions and that indefinable gift of selection and discrimination which makes sure of the best results and never passes off chaff for wheat. He is stereoscopic, philosophic, poetical, and learned, by turns, as mood and occasion warrant. He travels, like Goethe, gathering the cream of finest experiences by an unerring instinct. If you have read Howells intelligently, you have gone more thoroughly and wisely through his journey than many perhaps who bore him company. The letterpress has already appeared in magazine literature; the illustrations are graphic and spirited.

THE TRAVELER'S INSURANCE COMPANY, Hartford, Conn. PHOTOTYPE SOUVENIR.

This is a generous welcome to its friends and patrons, from this enterprising association. It presents a valuable series of phototype views of this capital city, old and new; giving spirited views of the many important civic, educational, charitable and commercial structures which have grown up during the last generation, together with welcome glimpses of many celebrated homes, spoken of throughout the literary world. Here is the symmetrical and commanding State House, the new Trinity College, Bushnell Park, portraits of the literary colony, and the face and home of the energetic man who created and yet controls this beneficent corporation.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ALFRED LORD TENNYSON. POET LAUREATE. Complete Edition, from the Author's Text. Illustrated by Church, Dillman, Fredericks, Fourn, Murray, and other eminent artists. [New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.]

A stout, thick volume, on good paper, distinct print, with a delicate, renaissance page-binding, presenting the complete works of the laureate, and a so serviceable publication, especially where good books are wanted while but few can be afforded. The illustrations are far above the average found in similar publications, are never objectionable, and are frequently admirable.

THE MAGAZINE OF ART. Vol. VIII. [London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne: Cassell & Co., limited, 1888.]

Here, in graceful binding, is gathered a year's monthly parts of this sterling monthly. It abounds in delightful miscellany, spirited illustration, and a valuable range of art literature. It hardly needs further mention in this journal, which so often and heartily calls for public attention to its many excellencies.

THE EMERSON CALENDAR. [Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.] THE WATTSLEY CALENDAR. From the same house.

THE GOLDEN TREASURY CALENDAR. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.)

These compilations of daily leaflets, from the best writers, serve a modest yet by no means insignificant purpose. Often a true "word for the day" comes when most needed. They are produced in tasteful and attractive forms.

LITERATURE.

CUTPLER, UPHAM & Co. publish Literature, a series of essays upon modern writers, by Hermann Grimm.

C. N. CASPAR, Milwaukee, has published a "Directory of Antiquarian Booksellers," which should be useful.

"The Guileless Man and Minister" is the title of Bishop Gillespie's memorial sermon for the Rev. John A. Wilson, D.D.

THE Rev. Samuel W. Dike has a second paper on "The Divorce Question" in the November Homiletic Review, a subject upon which he has thought and written much.

IMMORTALITY, a paper by the Rev. Dr. R. A. Holland, read before the Concord School of Philosophy, is reprinted by D. Appleton & Co., from the Journal of Speculative Philosophy.

"EVERY Christian's Every-Day Book," by the Rev. T. H. Leary, published by Frederick Warne & Co., contains admirable selections for daily reading on the duties and doctrines of Christianity.

THE November North American Review has nine papers besides a symposium and notes and comments. "Statecraft and Priestcraft" is by Dr. Schaff, and "Slang in America" by Walt Whitman.

HENRY HOLY & Co. will present issue Oblivion, by Miss M. G. McClelland, of Norwood, Va. The scene is laid in the mountains of North Carolina, made familiar to us by Miss Murfree and Mr. Warner.

The first article in Good Housekeeping for November 14, begins a story entitled "Ten Dollars Enough," which is to illustrate how ten dollars is sufficient for a week's housekeeping. The number is filled with good reading and practical sense.

"A NOVEMBER STUDY," by Bruce Crane, is reproduced in the Art Interchange as the colored supplement for November 5, it being specially drawn for the number, which contains a large variety of other designs in the various departments of art.

IN the Old Time Classic Series, G. P. Putnam's Sons give us in two volumes each, with many illustrations, "Plutarch's Lives" and "Herodotus," selected and edited by John S. White, LL.D. They will be welcomed by scholars young and old, storing the minds of the former and refreshing the memories of the latter.

TOWNSEND MACCOCKIN has in press a complete ARND or lexicon of the Targum, Talmud and Midrash, by Dr. Alexander Kohut, a learned Rabbi of this city, formerly of Vienna, Austria. It will consist of eight quarto volumes in half binding. The lecture of Canon Farrar on the Talmud has excited an interest in the subject.

THE Homiletic Magazine is divided into four parts, the homiletic, theological, expository and miscellaneous sections, some of which are also subdivided. They are filled by able contributors who represent all shades of evangelical thought. In the October number "Is Salvation Possible After Death?" is the subject of the symposium.

A VERY interesting article in the November Lippincott is "The Peabody Museum of American Archaeology," by Ernest Ingersoll. There is also a paper on "Queen Anne or Free Classic Architecture," which should interest many readers. It is by George C. Mason, Jr. There is much other pleasant reading in the number.

THE November Decorator and Furnisher has an unusual number of designs in stained glass, wall paper, stencils, etc., some of them Japanese and Byzantine. It also reproduces the various yacht cups of which there has been so much talk recently. Every page of the number is full of interest.

WITH the January number the Spirit of Missions will take a new departure and possess added interest. The annual reports will be published separately, and not as a part of the magazine. It will be free to the clergy who in their parishes represent the board, and will be furnished to the laity at $1. per year. It ought to be found in all our families.

THE November Andover Review opens with a paper on "The New Education," by Prof. Palmer. An article to attract attention is "The Conquest of Utah," by the Rev. D. L. Leonard. Editorially, the series of Progressive Orthodoxy has for its subject The Scriptures. Under Archaeology, the Rev. Dr. Merrill, Consul at Jerusalem, discusses "The Site of Calvary." There are other papers in the number, which is one of great interest.

THE November Art Amateur has six supplement designs, one of which is devoted to altar frontal centres and an altar covering. The extra supplement is the study of a cat, which presents a back much raised as if seeing a near antagonist; the frontpiece reproduces some studies of cherubs from paintings by the old masters. The number contains a sketch of Henry Mosler with some figure studies by him, and also a double page design, elaborate and rich, for panel decorations. Full directions are given for treatment of the designs in oil and colors, and altogether the number is one of unusual merit.

THE Church Review for October closes the forty-sixth volume, and each of its numbers might make a volume in itself, and one highly creditable to the literature of the Church. In this number there are twenty papers, besides the current literature and editorial articles. There are three papers on Liturgies and one on Centennial Statistics. Bishop Williams has a paper on the Seabury Centenary, and Dr. Richey one on Bishop Littlejohn's Christian Ministry. The Revision of the Old Testament is considered by Prof. Gardiner, the Late Convention in South Carolina by Rev. John Kershaw, and the Rev. E. P. Gray has a prize essay on the question, "Did Christ Rise from the Dead on the First Day of the Week?" There are other able papers which we have not space even to name.

ART:

The fifth annual festival of the Choir Guild of the Diocese of New Jersey was celebrated in Christ church, Elizabeth, on Tuesday, Nov. 9th. This organization serves a devout purpose so admirably that the Church at large is interested in a more explicit knowledge of its operation. It consists in a confederation of six suppressed choirs—of St. Mary's, Burlington; Christ church, Elizabeth; Christ church, Bordenstown; Trinity church, Princeton; Christ church, South Amboy; and St. James, Long Branch. A seventh, Trinity church, Trenton, while in sympathy with the Guild and its work, has recently withdrawn on account of practical difficulties in the way of attendance. The officers are a superior, secretary, treasurer, and precentor, who shapes the musical work and training. The Rev. Mr. Oberly, of Christ church, Elizabeth, has filled this position for several terms, and in discharge of his stipulated duties visits and drills each choir of the Guild once each year. In this way a common "use" and a community of interest are sustained, and under the direction of the accomplished and devoted precentor the happiest results are secured.

The Guild never rehearses its programme together, and its musical success at the Annual Festival expresses, in conjunction with the precentor's efficiency, the industry and intelligence of each choirmaster's individual training. Those who were fortunate enough to attend this recent Festival were certainly impressed with the great value and importance of the movement. For it was shown that such choirs are practicable, that they bring groups of lads and young men under churchly influences, in relations rich with spiritual promise. They are comparatively inexpensive, and, what is of far deeper consequence, purely religious music is secured for religious worship.

At the same time, all rivalries are shut out, and a fine spirit of fellowship displaces the old-time clamor and heart-burnings. More than one hundred and twenty choristers mustered on that beautiful day, in that picturesque and beautifully appointed church. About twenty-five of the clergy were in attendance. There was a choral celebration, without sermon, in the morning, at which the effectiveness of those massed chorists was very reverently manifested. This sublime office was not done in a corner, and the showing forth of the Lord's death, assumed a new and profounder significance to many who had never before participated in the Divine Office under such a concentration of ritualistic solemnities. Indeed the spiritual reciprocities between the Catholic faith, Catholic architecture, and the Catholic ritual were tenderly and irresistibly brought home to the hearts of multitudes. The Processional was "Daily, daily sing the praises," set to a lovely tune by the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard.

The anthem—an Introit and Antiphon—written in Mr. Messier's best spirit—had for the text "Lift up your hands in the sanctuary," with Laetatus Sum, Psalm cxlii, sung in unison to the 7th tone, 1st ending. At the music for the Holy Communion the precentor set a most desirable precedent by providing an unbroken office by the same composer, thus securing an impressive unity of feeling otherwise out of reach. W. H. Monk's Communion in C is easily produced, free from technical difficulties, and, on this occasion proved, very effective. The Recessional was "Angel voices ever singing," to Sullivan's exquisite setting. After a few hours, refreshed by the lavish hospitalities of the parish ladies, spirited games in the adjacent grounds, and quiet strolling through the broad, embowered avenues of this quaint old town, Evensong at four o'clock found the church overfull, and most of the worshippers were provided with the libretto and music of the festival in lieu of Prayer Books, so that the responsive and choral passages were almost tumultuous in volume and heartiness. As a spectacle, nothing could be more inspiring, or more eloquently symbolize the greater worship of the invisible Church. Entering with the hymn, "Rejoice ye pure in heart" (Mr. Messier's best tune), the interminable choir, in Decal and Cantoris, gave the best illustration we recall of the inapproachable majesty and solemnity of the Plain Song for the Psalter. After the lessons were sung Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, admirably set by Ferris Tozer. It is not the function of this column to particularize sermons, but the festival sermon, for all such festivals, now-a-days, was preached by Dr. Dix, who was in perfect tune with the occasion, and literally "in the spirit" for rejoicing, for exhortation, for counsel, and withal, for wholesome criticism. For the whole choral movement in the American Church lies within the experience of the preacher. After the hymn, "The Day of Praise is Done," Stainer's "Te Deum," in b, gave complete and joyful expression to the gathering delights and spiritual refreshments of the festival; the choir departing with the hymn, "O Mother, Dear Jerusalem," tune by S. A. Ward, in rhythm and melody most felicitous.

There was not a salaried nor "professional" singer, nor an "artist" in the great choir. There was not a trace of individualism or irreverence. There was an absence of "artistic" varnish and finish, which on the whole was not to be regretted in the prevalent seriousness and unmistakable religiousness. The choirs came with their best, and the cause they represent is henceforth edified and the better for their festival service.

THE SHEPHERD.

Tenderly by Jesus led,
By His constant kindness fed,
Might I walk in pasture sweet,
Weary, lay me at Thy feet !

O forgive that on this day
Far from Thee Thy lamb did stray,
Now by briars and brambles torn
In the wilderness forlorn.

Hear my cries, O Jesus mild !
Comfort Thon Thy pleading child,
Let me always hear Thy voice,
And therewith my heart rejoice.
Though my eyes no path can see
Ever would I follow Thee.

CHAPTER VIII.

A Morning Call.

Had Valentine known who the brothers were, or where they lived, he would before now have called to thank them again for their kindness to him, but he imagined they had some distance to go after depositing him, and had not yet discovered his mistake. The visit now paid had nothing to do with him.

The two elder girls, curious about the pretty cottage, had come wandering down the spur or hill-toe, as far as its precincts,—if precincts they may be called where was no fence, only a little grove and a less garden. Beside the door stood a milk-pail and a churn, set out to be sweetened by the sun and wind. It was very rural, they thought, and very homely, but not so attractive as some cottages in the south—it indicated a rusticity honored by the most unceremonious visit from its superiors ! Thus without hesitation concluding, Christina, followed by Mercy, walked in at the open door, found a barefooted girl in the kitchen, and spoke pleasantly to her. She, in simple hospitality, forgetting herself, made answer in Gaelic; and, never doubting the ladies had come to call upon her mistress, led the way, and the girls, without thinking, followed her to the parlor.

As they came, they had been talking. Had they been in any degree truly educated, they would have been quite capable of an opinion of their own, for they had good enough faculties; but they had never been really taught to read; therefore, with the utmost confidence, they had been passing judgment upon a book from which they had not gathered the slightest notion as to the idea or intention of the writer. Christina was of that humorous class of readers, who, if you show one thing better or worse than another, will without hesitation report that you love the one and hate the other. If you say, for instance, that it is a worse and yet more shameful thing for a man to break his wife's heart by systematic neglect, than to strike her and be sorry for it, such readers give out that you approve of wife-beating, and perhaps write to expostulate with you on your brutality. If you express pleasure that a poor man should have succeeded in escaping from the door of death from his haunting demon, they accuse you of advocating suicide. Mercy was not yet afloat on the sea of essential lie whereon Christina swung to every wave.

The question they had been discussing was, whether the hero of the story was worthy the name of lover, seeing he deferred offering his hand to the girl because she told her mother a fib to account for her being with him in the garden after dark. "It was cowardly and unfair," said Christina: "was it not for his sake she did it?" Mercy did not think to say "Was it?" as she well might. "Don't you see, Chrissy," she said, "he reasoned this way: 'If she tell her mother a lie, she may tell me a lie some day too!'" So indeed the youth did reason; but it occurred to neither of his critics to note the fact that he would not have minded the girl's telling her mother the lie, if he could have been certain she would never tell him one! In regard to her hiding from him certain passages with another gentleman, occurring between this event and his proposal, Christina judged he had no right to know them, and if he had, their concealment was what he deserved.

When the girl, who would have thought it rude to ask their names—if I mistake not it was a point in highland hospitality to entertain without such inquiry—led the way to the parlor, they followed, expecting they did not know what: they had heard of the cow-house, the stable, and even the pigsty, being under the same roof in these parts! When the opening door disclosed "lady" Macraugh, every inch a chieftain's widow, their conventional breeding failed them a little; incapable of recognizing a refinement beyond their own, they were not incapable of feeling its influence; and though they had not yet learned how to be rude with propriety in unproved circumstances—still less how to be gracious without a moment's notice. But when a young man sprang from a couch, and the stately lady rose and advanced to receive them, it was too late to retreat, and for a moment they stood abashed, feeling, I am glad to say, like intruders. The behavior of the lady and gentleman, however, speedily set them partially at ease. The latter, with movements more than graceful, for they were gracious, and altogether free of scroll-pattern or Polonius-flourish, placed chairs, and invited them to be seated, and the former began to talk as if their entrance were the least unexpected thing in the world. Leaving them to explain their visit or not as they saw fit, she spoke of the weather, the harvest, the shooting; feared the gentlemen would be disappointed: the birds were quite healthy, but not numerous—they had too many enemies to multiply! asked if they had seen the view from such and such a point—in short, carried herself as one to whom courtesy to strangers was a duty. But she was not taken with them. Her order of civilization was higher than theirs; and the simplicity as well as old-fashioned finish of her consciousness recoiled a little—though she had not experience enough of a certain kind to be able at once to say what it was in the manner and expression of the young ladies that did not please her.

Mammon, gaining more and more of the upper hand in all social relations, has done much to lower the petite as well as the grande morale of the country—the good breeding as well as the honesty. Unmanliness with the completest self-possession is a poor substitute for stiffness, a poorer for courtesy. Respect and graciousness from each to each is of the very essence of Christianity, independently of rank, or possession, or relation. A certain roughness and rudeness have usurped upon the intercourse of the century. It comes of the spread of imagined greatness; true greatness, unconscious of itself, cannot find expression other than gracious. In the presence of another, a man of true breeding is but faintly aware of his own self, and keenly aware of the other's self. Before the human—that bush which, however trodden and peeled, yet burns with the Divine Presence—the man who thinks of the homage due to him, and not of the homage owing by him, is essentially rude. Mammon is slowly stifling and desiccating Rank; both are miserable duties, but the one is yet meaner than the other. Unrefined families with money are received with open arms and honors paid, in circles where a better breeding than theirs has hitherto prevailed: this, working along with the natural law of corruption where is no aspiration, has gradually caused the deterioration of which I speak. Courtesy will never regain her former position, but she will be raised to a much higher; like Duty, she will be known as a daughter of the living God, "the first stocke father of gentleness;" for in his neighbor every man will see a revelation of the Most High.

Without being able to recognize the superiority of a woman who lived in a cottage, the young ladies felt and disliked it; the matron felt the commonness of the girls, without knowing what exactly it was. The girls, on the other hand, were interested in the young man; he looked like a gentleman. Ian was interested in the young women; he thought they were shy, when they were only "put out," and wished to make them comfortable—in which he quickly succeeded. His unconsciously commanding air in the midst of his great courtesy, roused their admiration, and they had not been many minutes in his company ere they were satisfied that, however it was to be accounted for, the young man was in truth very much of a gentleman. It was an unexpected discovery of northern produce, and "the estate" gathered interest in their eyes. Christina did the greater part of the talking, but both did their best to be agreeable.

Ian saw quite as well as his mother what ordinary girls they were, but, accustomed to the never moles in manner and speech, though uncorrupted by them, he was not shocked by movements and phrases that annoyed her. The mother apprehended fascination, and was uneasy, though far from showing it.

When they rose, Ian attended them to the door, leaving his mother anxious, for he would accompany them home she feared. Till he returned, she did not resume her seat.

The girls took their way along the ridge in silence, till the ruin was between them and the cottage, when they burst into laughter. They were ladies enough not to laugh till out of sight, but not ladies enough to see there was nothing to laugh at.

"A harp, too," said Christina. "Mercy, I believe we are on the top of Mount Ararat, and have this very moment left the real Noah's ark, patched into a cottage! Who can they be?"

"Gentlefolk, evidently," said Mercy; "perhaps old-fashioned people from Inverness."

"The young man must have been to college!—In the north, you know," continued Christina, thinking with pride that her brother was at Oxford, "nothing is easier than to get an education, such as it is! It costs in fact next to nothing. Plowmen send their sons to St. Andrew's and Aberdeen to make gentlemen of them! Fancy!"

"You must allow that in this case they have succeeded!"

"I didn't mean his father was a plowman! That is impossible. Besides, I heard him call that very respectable person mother! She is not a plowman's wife, but evidently a lady of the middle class."

Christina did not reckon herself or her people to belong to the middle class. How it was it is not quite easy to say—perhaps the tone of implied contempt with which her father spoke of the lower classes, and the quiet negation with which her mother would allude to shopkeepers, may have had to do with it—but the young people of the family all imagined themselves to belong to the upper classes! It was a pity that there was no title in it; but any one of them might well marry a coronet! There were indeed higher than they; a duke was higher; the queen was higher—but that was pleasant! It was nice to have some to look up to!

On anyone living in a humble house, not to say a poor cottage, they looked down, as the case might be, with indifference or patronage; they little dreamed how, had she known all about them, the respectable person in the cottage would have looked down upon them! At the same time the laugh in which they now indulged was not altogether one of amusement; it was in part an effort to avenge themselves of a certain uncomfortable feeling of rebuke.

"I will tell you my theory, Mercy!" Christina went on. "The lady is the widow of an Indian officer—perhaps a colonel. Some of their widows are left very poor, though, their husbands having been in the service of their country, they think no small beer of themselves! The young man has a military air which he may have got from his father; or he may be an officer himself; young officers are always poor; that's what makes them so nice to flirt with. I wonder whether he really is an officer! We've actually called upon the people, and come away too, without knowing their names!"

"I suppose they're from the New House?" said Ian, returning after he had bowed the ladies from the threshold, rewarded with a bewitching smile from the elder, and a shy glance from the younger.

"Where else could they be from?" returned his mother;—"come to make our country yet poorer!"

"They're not English!"

"Not they!—vulgar people from Glasgow!"

"I think you are too hard on them, mother! They were not exactly vulgar. I thought, indeed, there was a sort of gentleness about them you do not often meet in Scotch girls!"

"In the lowlands, I grant, Ian; but the daughter of the poorest tacksman of the Macruadh has a manner and an modesty I have seen in no Sasunnach girl yet. These girls are bold!"

"Self-possessed, perhaps!" said Ian.

Upon the awkwardness he took for shyness, had followed a reaction. It was with the young ladies a part of good breeding, whatever mistake they made, not to look otherwise than contented with themselves; having for a moment failed in this principle they were eager to make up for it.

"Girls are different from what they used to be, I fancy, mother?" added Ian thoughtfully.

"The world changes very fast," said the mother sadly. She was thinking, like Rebecca, if her sons took a fancy to these who were not daughters of the land, what good would her life do her.

"Ah, mother, dear," said Ian, "I have never—and as he spoke the cloud deepened on his forehead—"seen more than one woman whose ways and manners reminded me of you!"

"And what was she?" the mother asked, in pleased alarum.

But she almost repented the question when she saw how low the cloud descended on his countenance.

"A princess, mother. She is dead," he answered, and turning walked so gently from the room that it was impossible for his mother to detain him.

CHAPTER IX.

Mr. Scramble.

The next morning, soon after sunrise, the laird began to cut his barley. Ian would gladly have helped, but Alister had a notion that such labor was not fit for him.

"I had a comical interview this morning," he said, entering the kitchen at dinner-time. "I was out before my people, and was standing by the burn-side near the foot-bridge, when I heard somebody shouting, and looked up. There was a big English fellow in gray on the top of the ridge, with his gun on his shoulder, hollering. I knew he was English by his hollering. It was plain it was to me, but not choosing to be at his beck and call, I took no heed. 'Hullo, you there! wake up!' he said. 'What should I wake up for?' I returned. 'To carry my bag. You don't seem to have anything to do! I'll give you five shillings.'"

"You see to what you expose yourself by your unconventionalities, Alister!" said his brother, with mock gravity.

"It was not the fellow we carried home the other night, Ian; it was one twice his size. It would have taken all I had to carry him home!"

"The other must have pointed you out to him!"

"It was much too dark for him to know me again."

"You forgot the hall-lamp!" said Ian.

"Ah, yes, to be sure! I had forgotten!" answered Alister. "To tell the truth, I thought, when I took his shilling, he would never know me from Nebuchadnezzar: that is the one thing I am ashamed of—I did in the dark what perhaps I should not have done in the daylight!—I don't mean I would not have carried him and his bag too! It's only the shilling? Now of course I will hold my face to it; but I thought it better to be short with a fellow like that."

"Well?"

"You'll want prepayment, no doubt!" he went on, putting his hand into his pocket. Those Sasunnach fellows think any highlandman keen as a hawk after their dirty money?"

"They have too good reason in some parts!" said his mother. "It is not so bad here yet, but there is a great difference in that respect. The old breed is fast disappearing. What with the difficulty of living by the hardest work, and the occasional chance of earning a shilling easily, many have turned both idle and greedy."

"That's you and your shilling, Alister!" said Ian.

"I confess," returned Alister, "if I had foreseen what an idea of the gentlemen of the country I might give, I should have hesitated. But I haven't begun to be ashamed yet!"

"Ashamed, Alister!" cried Ian. "What does it matter what a fellow like that thinks of you?"

"And mistress Conal has her shilling!" said the mother.

"If the thing was right," pursued Ian, "no harm can come of it; if it was not right, no end of harm may come. Are you sure it was good for mistress Conal to have that shilling, Alister? What if it be drawing away her heart from him who is watching his old child in her turf-put? What if the devil be grinning at her from that shilling?"

"Ian! if God had not meant her to have that shilling, He would not have let Alister earn it."

"Certainly God can take care of her from a shilling!" said Ian, with one of his strangely sweet smiles.

"I was only trying Alister, mother."

"I confess I did not like the thought of it at first," resumed Mrs. Macruadh; "but it was mere pride; for when I thought of your father, I knew he would have been pleased with it."

"Then, mother, I am glad; and I don't care what Ian or any Sasunnach under the sun may think of me."

"But you haven't told us," said Ian, "how the thing ended."

"I said to the fellow," resumed Alister, "that I had my shearing to do, and hadn't the time to go with him. 'Is this your season for sheep-shearing?' said he. 'We call cutting the corn shearing,' I answered, 'because in these parts we use the reaping-hook.' 'That is a great waste of labor!' he returned. I did not tell him that some of our land would smash his machines like toys. 'How?' I asked. 'It costs so much more,' he said, 'but it feeds so many more!' I replied. 'Oh yes, of course, if you don't want the farmer to make a living? 'I manage to make a living,' I said. 'Then you are the farmer?' 'So it would appear.' 'I beg your pardon; I thought——' 'You thought I was an idle fellow, glad of an easy job to keep the life in me?' 'They tell me you were deuced glad of a job the other night.' 'So I was. I wanted a shilling for a poor woman, and hadn't one to give her without going home a mile and a half for it.' By this time he had come down, and I had gone a few steps to meet him; I did not want to seem unfriendly. 'Upon my word, it was very good of you! The old lady ought to be grateful,' he said. 'So ought we all,' I answered.—'I to your friend for the shilling, and he to me for taking his bag. He did me one good turn for my poor woman, and I did him another for his poor legs?' 'So you're quits?' said he. 'Not at all,' I answered; 'on the contrary, we are under mutual obligation.' 'I don't see the difference!—Hillo, there's a hare!' And up went his gun to his shoulder. 'None of that!' I cried, and knocked up the barrel. 'What do you mean?' he roared, looking furious. 'Get out of the way, or I'll shoot you.' 'There will be murder then as well as poaching!' I said. 'Poaching?' he shouted, with a scornful laugh. 'That rabbit is mine,' I said; 'I will not have it killed.' 'Cool!—on Mr. Palmer's land!' said he. 'The land is mine, and I am my own gamekeeper!' I rejoined. 'You look like it!' he returned. 'You put your gun on half-cock, and go after your birds!—not in this direction though,' I said, and turned and left him."

"That was not just the right way," said Ian.

"I did lose my temper rather."

"There was no occasion. It was a mistake on his part."

"I almost expected to hear him fire after I left him, for there was the rabbit he took for a hare lurching slowly away in full view! I'm glad he didn't: I always feel bad after a row!"

"Is the conscience getting fastidious, do you think, Alistair?" said Ian.

"How is anybody to know that when he's got to obey it?"

"True—so long as we suspect no mistake!"

"So long as it agrees with the Bible, Ian!" said the mother.

"The Bible is a big book, mother, and the things in it are of many sorts," returned Ian. "The Lord did not approve of every thing in it."

"Ian! Ian! I am shocked to hear you!"

"It is the truth, mother."

"What would your father have said?"

"'He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me.'"

Ian rose from the table, knelt by his mother, and laid his head on her shoulder.

She was silent, pained by his words, and put her arm round him as if to shield him from the evil one. Homage to will and word of the Master, apart from the acceptance of certain doctrines concerning him, was in her eyes not merely defective but dangerous. To love the Lord with the love of truest obedience; to believe him the Son of God and the savior of man with absolute acceptance of the heart, was far from enough! It was but sentimental affection!

A certain young preacher in Scotland some years ago, accused by an old lady of preaching works, took refuge in the Lord's Sermon on the Mount: "Ow ay?" answered the partisan, "but he was a varra young man when he preach that sermon!"

Alistair rose and went: there was to him something specially sacred in the communion of his mother and brother. Heartily he held with Ian, but shrank from any difference with his mother. For her sake he received Sunday after Sunday in silence what was to him a bushel of dust with here and there a bit of mouldy bread in it; but the mother did not imagine any great coincidence of opinion between her and Alistair any more than between her and Ian. She had not the faintest notion how much genuine faith both of them had, or how it surpassed her own in vitality.

But while Ian seemed to his brother, who knew him best, hardly touched with earthly stain, Alistair, notwithstanding his large and dominant humanity, was still in the troublesome condition of one trying to do right against a powerful fermentation of pride. He held noblest principles; but the sediment of generations was too easily stirred up to cloud them. He was not quite honest in his attitude towards some of his ancestors, judging them far more leniently than he would have judged others. He loved his neighbor, but his neighbor was mostly of his own family or his own clan. He might have been unjust for the sake of his own—a small fault in the eyes of the world, but a great fault indeed in a nature like his, capable of being so much beyond it. For, while the faults of a good man cannot be such evil things as the faults of a bad man, they are more blameworthy, and greater faults than the same would be in a bad man; we must not confuse the guilt of the person with the abstract evil of the thing.

Ian was one of those blessed few who doubt in virtue of a larger faith. While its roots were seeking a deeper soil, it could not show so fast a growth above ground. He doubted most about the things he loved best, while he devoted the energies of a mind whose keenness almost masked its power, to discover possible ways of believing them. To the wise his doubts would have been his best credentials; they were wrong tenfold the faith of most. It was truth, and higher truth, he was always seeking. The sadness which colored his deepest individuality, only one thing could ever remove—the conscious presence of the Eternal. This is true of all sadness, but Ian knew it.

He overtook Alistair on his way to the barley-field.

"I have been trying to find out wherein lay the faleness of the position in which you found yourself this morning," said he. "There could be nothing wrong in doing a small thing for its reward any more than a great one; where I think you went wrong was in assuming your social position afterwards—you should have waited for its being accorded you. There was no occasion to be offended with the man. You ought to have seen how you must look to him, and given him time. I don't perceive why you should be so gracious to old mistress Connal, and so hard upon him. Certainly you would not speak as he did to any man, but he has been brought up differently; he is not such a gentleman as you cannot help being. In a word, you ought to have treated him as an inferior, and been more polite to him."

CHAPTER X.

The Plow-bull.

Partly, it may be, from such incidents at the outset of their acquaintance, there was for some time no further meeting betwixt any of the chief's family and that of the new laird. There was indeed, little to draw them together, except common isolation. Valentine would have been pleased to show gratitude to his helpers on that stormy night, but after his sister's account of their call, he felt not only ashamed, which was right, but ashamed to show his shame, which was a fresh shame. The girls on their part made so much of what they counted the ridiculous elements of their "adventure," that, natural vengeance for their untruthfulness, they came themselves to see in it almost only what was ridiculous. In the same spirit Mr. Sercombe recounted his adventure with Alistair, which annoyed his host, who had but little acquaintance with the boundaries of his land. From the additional servants they had hired in the vicinity, the people of the New House gathered correct information concerning those at the cottage, but the honor in which they were held only added to the ridicule they associated with them. On the other side also there was little inclination towards a pursuit of intercourse. Mrs. Macrae, from Nancy's account and the behavior of the girls, divined the explanation of their visit; and, as their mother did not follow it up, took no notice of it. In the mind of Mercy, however, lurked a little thorn, with the bluntest possible sting of suspicion, every time she joined in a laugh at the people of the cottage, that she was not quite just to them.

The shooting, such as it was, went on, the sleeping and the eating, the walking and the talking. Long letters were written from the New House to female friends—letters with the flourishes if not the matter of wit, and funny tales concerning the natives, whom, because of their poor houses and unintelligibility, they represented as semi-savages. The young men went back to Oxford: and the time for the return of the family to civilization seemed drawing nigh.

It happened about this time, however, that a certain speculation in which Mr. Peregrine Palmer was very materially interested failed utterly, depriving him of the consciousness of a good many thousands, and producing in him the feeling of a lady of moderate means when she loses her purse; he must save it off something! For though he spent freely, he placed a great value on money—as well he might, seeing it gave him all the distinction which before everything else he prized. He did not know what a poor thing it was to be distinguished among men, therefore did not like losing his thousands. Having by failure sinned against Mammon, he must do something to ease the money-conscience that ruled his conduct: and the first thing that occurred to him was, to leave his wife and daughters where they were for the winter. None of them were in the least delicate, his wife professed herself fond of a country life; it would give the girls a good opportunity for practice, drawing and study generally, and he would find them a suitable governess! He talked the matter over with Mrs. Palmer. She did not mind much and would not object. He would bring Christmas with them, he said, and send down Christian, and perhaps Mr. Sercombe.

The girls did not like the idea. It was so cold in the country in winter, and the snow would be so deep! they would be starved to death! But, of course—if the governor had made up his mind to be cruel!

The thing was settled. It was only for one winter! It would be a new experience for them, and they would enjoy their next season all the more! The governor had promised to send them down new furs, and a great boxful of novels! He did not apprise them that he meant to sell their horses. Their horses were his! He was an indulgent father and did not stint them, but he was not going to ask their leave! At the same time he had not the courage to tell them.

He took his wife with him as far as Inverness for a day or two, that she might lay in a good stock of everything antagonistic to cold.

When father and mother were gone from the house, the girls felt larky. They had no wish to do anything they would not do if their parents were at home, but they had some sense of relief in the thought that they could do whatever they liked. A more sympathetic historian might say, and I am nowise inclined to contradict him, that it was only the reaction from the pain of parting, and the instinct to make the best of their loneliness. However it was, the elder girls resolved on a walk to the village, to see what might be seen, and in particular the woman at the shop, of whom they had heard their brother and Mr. Sercombe speak with admiration, qualified with the remark that she was so proper they could hardly get a civil word out of her. She was in fact too scrupulously polite for their taste.

It was a bright, pleasant, frosty morning, perfectly still, with an air like wine. The harvest had vanished from the fields. The sun shone on millions of tiny dew-suns, threaded on forsaken spider-webs. A few small, white, frozen clouds flecked the sky. The purple heather was not yet gone, and not any snow had yet fallen in the valley. The burn was large, for there had been a good deal of rain, but it was not much darker than its usual brown of smoke-crystal. They tripped gayly along. If they had little spiritual, they had much innocent animal life, which no great disappointments or keen twinges of conscience had yet damped. They were but human kittens—and not of the finest breed.

As they crossed the root of the spur, and looked down on the autumn fields to the east of it, they spied something going on which they did not understand. Stopping, and gazing more intently, they beheld what seemed a contest between man and beast, but its nature they could not yet distinguish. Gradually it grew plain that two of the cattle of the country, wild and shaggy, were rebelling against control. They were in fact two young bulls, of the small black highland breed, accustomed to gallop over the rough hills, jumping like goats, which Alister had set himself the task of breaking to the plough—by no means an easy one, or to be accomplished single-handed by any but a man of some strength, and both persistence and patience. In the summer he had lost a horse, which he could ill afford to replace: if he could make these bulls work, they would save him the price of the horse, would cost less to keep, and require less attention! He bridled them by the nose, not with rings through the gristle, but with nose-bands of iron, bluntly spiked inside, against which they could not pull hard without pain, and though he had made some progress could by no means trust them yet: every now and then a fit of mingled wildness and stubbornness would seize them, and the contest would appear about to begin again from the beginning; but they seldom now held out very long. The nose-band of one of them had come off, Alister had him by a horn in each hand, and a fierce struggle was going on between them, while the other was pulling away from his companion, as if determined to take to the hills. It was a good thing for them that share and coulter were pretty deep in the ground, so the help of their master; for had they got away, they would have killed, or at least disabled themselves. Presently, however, he had the nose-band on, and by force and persuasion together got the better of them; the staggly little furries gave in; and quickly gathering up his reins, he went back to the plough-stilts, each hand holding at once a handle and a rein. With energetic obedience the little animals began to pull—so vigorously that it took nearly all the chief's strength to hold at once his plough and his team.

It was something of a sight to the girls after a long dearth of events. Many things indeed upon which they scarce cast an eye when they came, they were now capable of regarding with a little feeble interest. Nor, although ignorant of everything agricultural, were they quite unused to animals; having horses they called their own, they would not unfrequently go to the stables to give their orders, or see that they were carried out.

They waited for some time hoping the fight would begin again, and drew a little nearer; then, as by common consent, left the road, passed the ruin, ran down the steep side of the ridge, and began to toll through the stubble toward the ploughman. A sharp straw would every now and then go through a delicate stocking, and the damp soil gathered in great lumps on their shoes, but they plodded on, laughing merrily as they went.

The Macruadh was meditating the power of the frost to break up the clods of the field, when he saw the girls close to him. He pulled in his cattle, and taking off his bonnet with one hand while the other held both reins—

"Excuse me, ladies," he said; "my animals are young, and not quite broken."

They were not a little surprised at such a reception, and were driven to conclude that the man must be the laird himself. They had heard that he cultivated his own land, but had not therefore imagined him laboring in his own person.

In spite of the blindness produced by their conventional training, vulgarly called education, they could not fail to perceive something in the man worthy of their regard. Before them, on the alert towards his cattle, but full of courtesy, stood a dark, handsome, weather-browned man, with an eagle air, not so pronounced as his brother's.

His hair was long, and almost black,—in thick, soft curls over a small, well-set head. His glance had the flash that comes of victorious effort, and his free carriage was that of one of whom labor has nowise subdued, whose every muscle is instinct with ready life. True even in trifles, he wore the dark beard that nature had given him; disordered by the struggle with his bulls, it imparted a certain wild look that contrasted with his speech. Christina forgot that the man was a laborer like any other, and noted that he did not manifest the least embarrassment in their presence, or any consciousness of a superfluity of favor in their approach: she did not know that neither would his hired servant, or the poorest member of his clan. It was said of a certain Sutherland clan that they were all gentlemen, and of a certain Argyll clan that they were all poets; of the Macruadhs it was said they were both. As to Mercy, the first glance of the chief's hazel eyes, looking straight into hers with genial respect, went deeper than any look had yet penetrated.

THE HILL SCHOOL AT ATHENS

At a late meeting of the American Philological Association, Prof. W. W. Goodwin, Harvard College, spoke in the warmest terms of the late Dr. and Mrs. Hill and their work at Athens.

What he said was based upon what he saw and heard while residing in Athens for a year, at the head of the American School, so-called.

We reprint it here both as a tribute to those noble persons and because it may help the securing of money now needed to put the school which they left into a condition in which it may still continue its good work:

"The modern city of Athens, apart from its wealth of ruins and the material beauty of its surroundings, has in itself little to attract a traveller. It is now hardly fifty-four years old, and the oldest inhabitant a year ago (1854) was an American lady, the venerable Mrs. Hill, who came with her husband in 1831 to the desolate waste left by the departing Turks where Athens had once been, but where then not a house was standing.

"These two noble-hearted Americans, who may almost be called the founders of modern Athens, came from home (by a journey longer than that of Ceopros from Egypt) on an errand of the most enlightened charity, to educate the children of the poor Athenians who were returning from exile after the Greek revolution, to find homes laid waste and their city in ruins, as wretched and yet as hopeful as their ancestors returned from Salamis and Argolis, twenty-three centuries before, to occupy the deserted city after the retreat of the Persians.

"The little school then planted by Dr. and Mrs. Hill in the basement of a Turkish tower, twelve feet square, which served them also for a dwelling, has supplied every part of Greece with educated teachers, and is everywhere recognized as an institution to which the whole country owes a debt of the deepest gratitude, and is one of the many bonds of union between the Greeks of to-day and our own countrymen."

ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, NEW YORK.

The Rev. William S. Rainsford, the present rector of St. George's church, New York, was born in Ireland in 1850. Very early in life his health failed, and, to recover it, he travelled extensively abroad. Since then he has become distinguished for athletic vigor, taking the lead at the university in many sports, and spending his summer vacations, every year now, shooting in the Rocky Mountains. After suitable preparation, he entered Cambridge University, England, and was graduated in 1872. He became curate at St. Giles's, Norwich, England, from which work he came to this country to help the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., continuing in this duty four months. For two years thereafter he took missions in various parts of this country and Canada, at the close of this period becoming senior-assistant in St. James's cathedral, Toronto, where, when the old dean, the Rev. Dr. Grasette's health failed, he took sole charge. After the death of the dean, Mr. Rainsford's succession to the rectorship was desired by the people, but his appointment was not favored by the bishop, and was not made. It was at this juncture that he received an election to the rectorship of St. George's church, New York, in January, 1883.

St. George's had already a noble history, through the labors of the sainted Milnor, the energy and influence of Dr. Tyng, and the devoted faithfulness of the Rev. Dr. W. W. Williams. During the ministry of Dr. Tyng, the location in Beekman street was abandoned, and the present one on Stuyvesant Square chosen, where for a long while the congregation was large, fashionable, and wealthy. But, at the time Mr. Rainsford was elected, all this had changed. Fashion, to a large degree, had left the neighborhood, and the congregation, from this and other causes, had dwindled to an insignificant figure. There had been only chance supplies for a year and a half, and the outlook was very discouraging.

Mr. Rainsford accepted the election on condition that the pew system be given up, and the church made free. This was done, and the result has proved a very great success, the income of the parish the first year being over forty-eight thousand dollars, and the exhibit of total offerings during the last year showing the sum of $57,870.33. The choir was enlarged, and removed from its high gallery, and congregational singing introduced, and early celebrations were established.

The congregations at once began to be large, and they rapidly increased until, for a long while past, the church has overflowed with worshippers. All classes are represented, and a very great many of those who attend are persons from the highest circles of culture and wealth. These are enlisted with a delightful earnestness in a great variety of benevolent work. Mission effort of the most practical character is going forward in the large territory of which St. George's is now the religious centre. An enumeration of the societies, clubs, missions, schools, and other organizations which are now formed to carry on these labors effectively, would make a very long list. The efforts which are made reach out after and win the roughest class of boys, also factory girls, shop girls, and street loiterers, and minister to the poor, sick, and friendless. In the summer, about five thousand poor people are given trips to the sea, and some three or four hundred are sent to the seaside for a week or a fortnight. The Sunday-schoolers number one thousand four hundred. In a very bad quarter of the city, in Avenue A, a whole house, known as Jefferson Hall, is occupied for mission work, a reading-room being there maintained, and once a week a musical and literary entertainment of a high class is given, at an admission charge of five cents. When this was first undertaken by young gentlemen of the parish, they were pelted with stones and mud by the roughs; but their work is now parish. In every large city church, he thinks there should be several deacons training for the full service of the ministry, rendering a duty which will be of highest benefit to the parish they work in, to the whole Church, and to themselves. The other point is the importance of having deaconesses. These should be solemnly set apart, before the Church, receiving a certificate from the bishop. And after labor under a rector, responsibly to him, if it be necessary for them to engage similarly in another parish, he would have them transferred formally, as a deacon is transferred. These direct and systematized labors he would supplement with volunteer work, which would give all, if possible, a share in the evangelistic enterprises of a parish.

The Rev. Mr. W. H. Aitken promised to hold a mission in St. George's as much as two years ago, but was then prevented from coming, as he was also from rendering assistance to Mr. Rainsford in Toronto, according to a promise then made. A mission is now being held in St. George's, in which the clergy of the parish receive aid from Mr. Aitken, especially, and other of the English missionaries, who are engaged in their work in Brooklyn and New York.

RETREATS FOR THE CLERGY.

Before leaving the subject of spiritual progress, I must record one fact with special thankfulness, namely, the retreat that was held last autumn in this college and cathedral under the auspices of our much respected provost and dean. It was from the first, I believe, his wish that such a retreat should take place annually, and I now hope this will be the case henceforward.

The retreat conducted for us last year by my dear friend and brother in Christ, Mr. Mackenzie, was in fact the third that we have had here, and at the conclusion of this synod we hope to commence a fourth, Mr. Wylde, the vicar of St. Saviour's, Leeds, having kindly consented to act as conductor, for the second time in Scotland.

I can hardly overstate the importance of such spiritual retreats. I think we have only to realize what we are, and what we have to do, in order to see how important, how, I might almost say, essential, they are, for every priest who desires to be a faithful minister of Jesus Christ, and to save both his own soul, and the souls of those who hear him.

For what have we to do? We have not only as priests to offer sacrifice at God's altar, to administer the sacraments to his people, and to recite day by day, as in solemn duty bound, our appointed morning and evening offices: we have to fulfil other functions, which must depend very much on our own personal fitness, on our own personal religion. Every priest who exactly follows the directions of the Church can in one sense equally well baptize, celebrate the Holy Eucharist, absolve, bless, and understood, and proceeds without molestation.

A clergy-house, situated in the rear of the church and rectory and connected with them, was given, a year or two ago, by ladies of the parish, who personally raised the sum needed to secure it. This building, by means of which the clergy are all practically under one roof, has greatly promoted the efficiency of the work, and facilitated it in many ways. Mr. Rainsford attributes his success largely to the able help he has had from the Rev. Lindsay Parker, and the Rev. Henry Wilson, p.d., assistant-ministers of St. George's. But he especially traces the rehabilitation of the parish and its present flourishing condition to the hearty support and confidence he has received from the vestry, who have rendered him absolute assistance, and have reposed in him absolute confidence. His own idea of Church work embraces two points. He believes in a small school of the prophets as a fitting adjunct of a administer the other rites committed to him. For, in all these functions, he is acting rather in his official character as a representative of Christ than as a private individual. But there are many other duties of his ministry in which his own individuality must, of necessity, make itself felt. The priest must be a teacher. How can he teach if he has not been himself taught of God? And as he must not only instruct the heads of his people, but also reach their hearts, his own heart must have been first enlightened by the Holy Spirit. How can he teach his people to repent and confess their sins, if he does not himself know what it is to have a broken and contrite heart, to have confessed his own sins, and by the ministry of reconciliation to have received pardon and peace, through the Precious Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ? How, again, can the pastor of souls lead his people to conversion, if he does not himself know something of that change of heart, so needful for us all (notwithstanding our new and heavenly birth in baptism)—that change of heart, I say, which must be granted to each of us if we are ever to see the Lord, and rejoice in Him.

Such spiritual experiences must be sought for, and, if granted, must be deepened, by earnest waiting upon God in prayer, by self-examination, by retirement from the bustle of the world, and by seeking to be alone with Jesus. How difficult all this is in ordinary clerical life, we most of us know. On the other hand, I think I may appeal to those here present who have prayerfully followed out the spiritual exercises of our Retreats to bear witness to the benefits which such seasons bring, through the opportunities they afford for retirement, and for the contemplation of the things of the world to come.

Retreats, in short, are intended to make us religious men—men whose hearts, having been changed from their natural condition by the converting influence of the Holy Spirit, are seeking to follow Jesus, our Great High Priest, in the way of holiness and unworldliness. So long as we all, to a greater or less extent, fall short of the standard required by our high calling—still more, so long as there are irreligious men among the ranks of the clergy—so long Retreats will be necessary, both for the perfection of the priestly character in those who are striving to do their Master's work, and also for the conversion of those who, though called to save the souls of others, must know that they have not yet sought in earnest to make their own salvation sure, or who, perhaps, have even lived ungodly lives, in spite of their holy calling.

And O, let us realize the terrible condition of an irreligious priest! If it were ever lawful to indulge in feelings of hatred or contempt towards any of our fellow-creatures and fellow-sinners, such feelings would be lawful with regard to the ungodly or worldly among the clergy. Such men, if any, must be hateful in the sight of Christ our Lord, because they are the murderers of souls for whom He died. Such men must be contemptible also, even judging them by a worldly standard, as being the betrayers of the sacred trust that was committed to them at their ordination, when they declared their conviction that they were "truly called according to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ to the order and ministry of Priesthood." For such priests, spiritual writers often remind us, in terrible language, a far sorer condemnation is prepared in hell, than will fall to the lot of those who have shunned the responsibilities which they so rashly have taken upon them.

But what have we to do with judging others? Let us look to ourselves. May you, my revered brethren, and I, though laden with sins, and liable to condemnation on account of many acts of unfaithfulness, seek and find cleansing through the Sacred Passion and Death of our Lord Jesus Christ; and through the Grace of the Holy Spirit, may our hearts be changed, and that more tired to a small property belonging to him in the Isle of Man, where he became the subject of a great spiritual change that completely revolutionized his character and career. He at once began to preach the Gospel wherever a door opened, but in those days doors did not open freely in the Church, so that his evangelizing work, which was gladly welcomed by the Wesleyans, was carried on largely among them. He, however, never formally joined them, but for twelve years his services were in demand all over England, chiefly in Wesleyan chapels, but latterly in above a dozen hallings of his own, which he erected in various large towns.

About the year 1840 Mr. Robert Aitken became much interested in the Oxford movement, known as the Tractarian discussion, which seemed to him to hold out promise of supplying what he found wanting in the sectarian circles within which he had been working. He felt the need of the sacramental system as expounded by the Rev. John Henry Newman, with whom he was in correspondence. This led to his returning to Church orders and receiving a license from the Bishop of Chester, both for himself and for Hope Hall, Liverpool, which took the name of St. John's chapel. There his son William Hay was born.

Subsequently Mr. Aitken removed to St. James's, London, at the invitation of Dr. Hook, who invited him with the hope that he might reach the degraded masses around that church. During his ministry now he combined along with evangelical doctrine the inculcation of the importance of sacramental grace, of the frequent use of the Holy Communion, and the value of Church order and discipline. In 1849 he accepted mission work in the district of Pendle, Cornwall, a desolate waste, where there were neither church, vicarage nor schools, and not a dozen Church people in a population of three thousand. Within two years a church, vicarage, and a building for school purposes were erected, and the church had crowded congregations and a large number of communicants. It was in this remote section of England that Mr. William Hay Aitken's early years were passed in the midst of active religious growth. Although his preparatory education was poorly provided for, he was matriculated in 1839 at Wadham College, Oxford, where, after four years, he took his degree with honors. Before beginning his university course he had already entered upon his present line of work. His uncle, a Scotch laird, Hay Macdowall Grant of Amdilly, who was a prominent lay preacher in England and Scotland, invited young Mr. Aitken, in 1839, to make an evangelizing tour through Scotland at its northern extremity. There Mr. Aitken came to realize that he had a call to this especial work. Again in 1865, just before his admission to Holy Orders, he had similar work with his uncle in Scotland, with results of the same encouraging character. His first official position was the curacy of St. Jude's, Islington, of which the late Rev. William Pennyfeather was vicar.

and more. Then year by year, that spiritual growth which Retreats are designed to foster, will manifest itself among us, and real progress will follow—not an outward progress merely, but an advancement in the way of inward and vital religion. In short, men will take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus.—Bishop of Argyle and the Isles.

REV. W. H. M. H. AITKEN, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND PAROCHIAL MISSION SOCIETY.

William Hay Macdowall Hunter Aitken was born Sept. 21, 1841, at Liverpool, England, where his father was then officiating in Hope Hall, which had been built by him, and was then licensed as St. John's Episcopal chapel. His father, Mr. Robert Aitken, was ordained in the year 1823, but not feeling much interest in clerical work, he re-

He remained there until the end of 1870. In 1869 was held the Twelve Days London Mission, originated largely through the instrumentality of the present Bishop of Truro, with whom Mr. Aitken was on intimate terms. By him and by the present Bishop of Lichfield he was allowed to take part in the mission. From that time invitations to work of this kind have been constant. This Twelve Days Mission was undertaken by the Bishop of Truro, through the knowledge he had of Mr. Aitken's father's eminent success, and through the direct influence of Father Benson of Cowley.

In 1871 Mr. Aitken was appointed by the Messrs. Horsfall, of Liverpool, to the incumbency of Christ church, Everton, which was situated in the midst of a very dense population, there being thirteen thousand people in a district covering thirty-six acres. He continued to labor here with several curates under him, at the same time taking missions in various places—five a year. During his charge of this parish, school mission buildings were erected costing over $35,000.

In 1873 he was much interested in Mr. Moody's work, and when the latter left Liverpool Mr. Aitken continued the special services. It became apparent that removal was necessary on account of Mrs. Aitken's health; accordingly he withdrew from his field in Liverpool and for six years lived in a country home in Derbyshire, provided by a friend. There his wife regained her health, and thence at intervals he went to engage in missions, and to put into effective operation the Church of England Parochial Mission Society. This was originally started in 1876, as a fund in memory of his father, who died suddenly in 1873 of heart disease. In its eight years' of active work it has conducted 1,400 missions. Mr. Aitken is general superintendent. About thirty clergy take part in the work; a few are supported by the society, others receive grants of aid which enable them to get a curate by which they themselves are set free at intervals to conduct missions. The usual custom is for a clergyman to conduct five missions a year.

In 1881, Mr. Aitken removed to Bedford, in order to provide better facilities for the education of his sons. This is now his home when in England. He is the author of twelve volumes, consisting of sermons, and addresses and treatises on mission work and kindred topics.

THE NATURE OF WORSHIP.

WORSHIP is, or should be, expressive. Its purpose is to express to Almighty God the thoughts and intents of the worshippers. It is not for the worshipper, therefore, to speak of his worship as impressive. The impression which he seeks to make by the expression of his thoughts and his desires is, so to speak, to be made upon God. Plainly, it is impertinent, therefore, for the worshipper to pronounce his worship impressive. It is possible that onlookers may be impressed with the public services of the Church, but this is an accidental and illegitimate result of the worship. It is practically a looking upon worship as if it were a theatrical representation. It is a mere spectacle to the looker-on, and he is impressed by it as by a spectacle in any other place, a spectacle made solely for the purpose of affecting the spectators. Just so far as this effect is produced by the presence of non-worshippers, and just so far as the possibility of this effect shapes the character of the services, so far the presence of spectators is both undesirable and harmful.

If the grand principle is kept in view, that the sole purpose of worship is the expression of the longings of the soul, we can at once determine whether the various methods used in worship are real or unreal, legitimate or illegitimate. It is right for man to use the utmost skill of art in offering prayer and praise to Almighty God. It is necessarily right, therefore, and to be desired, that he should employ the best music in His praises. But the music should always be the vehicle of his thoughts. It should never be employed for his own gratification, as if it were addressed to himself, nor should it be employed as an attraction for those without.

The only modification, in however small a degree, of this principle comes from the fact that those who desire to worship, naturally seek those services which seem to them best suited for their expressions of prayer and praise.

Surplised choirs are rapidly taking their places in all the larger churches of the land. They are thoroughly to be commended in themselves, yet surplised choirs can adopt such music that the congregation cannot join with them. They can, indeed, carry their performances to such a point, that, instead of leading the congregation in its praise, they shall turn churches into concert halls, as certainly as quartette choirs with full chorus can do it.

So, too, with reference to the position of the officiating minister. As he is the leader of the congregation in worship, in its prayers and in its praises, his natural position is with his face in the same direction as that of the people themselves. He is their leader, and, except when addressing them in the words of Almighty God, or as God's accredited agent, he stands and kneels, as it were, among or of the people. Yet this Eastern position, as it is commonly called, which seems to subordinate the priest, may be turned into a method of impressing as truly as may that of the minister in non-liturgical services.

He who thinks of impressing the people with the gorgeousness of the embroideries upon the back of his chasuble, and with his genuflections, with his face turned from them, differs not a whit in principle of worship or in fact from him who stands before the people and prays at them.

The discussion at the late Church Congress upon "Aestheticism in Worship" showed not only by the leanings of the speakers, but by the acclamations of the hearers, that the present tendency in the American Church is not only toward more ornate churches, but also toward more ornate services. In other words, it may be said, that as art is fostered, as the taste of the people is cultivated, as indeed the earth and the air fix the dispositions and the tempers of the nation, so the nation itself will come to have some peculiarities in its forms of worship. There was a reason once for the stern worship of New Englanders. Equally true there is reason now for more majestic and more beautiful services.

SEWING-SCHOOLS.*

Looking over the field of the world "White unto the harvest," hearing the Macedonian cry "Come over and help us," from China, from Japan, from the isles of the sea, from the boundless prairies of the West, and the burning fields of the South, from souls hungering for the "Bread of Life," in remote hamlets, and dying by the thousands unfed in the crowded tenements of the cities, our hearts are appalled at the magnitude of the work to be done for the Lord with the apparently small means at command, and we are inclined to sink into a state of inactivity, thinking that we can do nothing to hasten the coming of the Lord's Kingdom. Ah, do we forget the twelve lowly men who went forth from Jerusalem, with no warrior's sword, no statesman's lore, and brought cultured Greece, warlike Rome, remote India, and the barbaric North at the foot of the Cross? In that state of life unto which it hath pleased God to call her, each woman can find her work to do in advancing God's Kingdom. In no branch of work can we look for such sure and far-reaching results as in the training of the young. While we must continue to hope, and pray, and labor that the wicked may be turned and softened, the careless and indifferent aroused, the fallen recovered, and the heathen converted, yet the fruits seen in older lives and hardened hearts will seem a scanty harvest until faith and zeal akin to that of the apostles bring down anew the Pentecostal fires. But we can mould the young hearts within our reach to such purity of life and earnestness of purpose, that they will never stray from the paths of the righteous, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

In many places, both large and small a sewing-school may be made a very effective agent in the Church's work. It will afford work to many a woman who does not find her niche in the Sunday-school or the Sewing Society, or the other branches of the Parish Guild, and it will help many a child for a life of usefulness. It is something very easily begun, and carried on with few appliances, and at a very small cost in money. Indeed its chief capital is patient, faithful labor, its rewards I will leave the workers to find out for themselves, in the satisfaction of seeing cleaner faces, tidier dress, gentler manners, growing deftness with the needle, all the nameless advances that will make better women, better homes here, and souls more fitted for the eternal Home hereafter.

Feeling that there are children who need your aid, gather a few together in a suitable room, and begin in the way that seems best to you, knowing that the work will be upon you, and experience teach you what things to alter and improve. It will probably be necessary for you to have your school on Saturday, in order not to interfere with the day-schools—a very busy day for house-keepers, but with a little planning and extra work on Friday, a day for the Church-daughters to practise self-denial and fasting, will enable one to give two hours on Saturday. It is scarcely necessary to say that the school should open with a brief service, the children being taught that no work should be begun without asking God's help and His blessing upon it.

A suitable hymn, the Apostle's Creed, that grand confession of the Faith, which every child can be taught it is a blessed privilege to repeat, the Lord's Prayer, and a collect or two, make a service of sufficient length. If the clergyman can open the school, so much the better, but if he be not present, the superintendent should never omit the service.

The work will be best done if the school be well graded, so that each teacher has but one kind of sewing to teach, and pupils are promoted as soon as proficient in that kind. When children have learned the different kinds of sewing (usually taught on pieces of cloth) garments can be given them to make.

It is usually well to have classes in knitting and crocheting useful garments, darning and patching, and it may be practicable to teach the use of the sewing-machine and the simpler kind of embroidery. It is often necessary to furnish a wash-basin, soap, and towel for the use of the pupils, that we may insist on the cleanliness we desire. There should be a brief and interesting catechizing or talk before the school closes with the singing of a hymn. In a parish in a neighboring diocese they have successfully combined two branches of work, which we feel it best to keep separate. They gather together the children of the rich and the poor, those who need to be taught to sew, and those who wish to give the work of their own hands to the Church's needs. After some months of faithful labor they offer for sale the articles made, and send the proceeds to some missionary. This plan might work well in other places. An excellent way to support the sewing-school, is to solicit small monthly pledges from individuals interested in the work. These can be collected by a treasurer, and can ordinarily be made sufficient for all needs, special contributions be asked for festivals, such as Christmas and Easter.

If you will give your heart to this work you will find as time goes by that it is not so dull as you fancied. Your interest will grow as your prayers and your labors abound.

You will feel that it is not a little thing to stamp your influence on the life of a dozen or more growing girls for two or three times most impressive years; to teach them neatness and order; to fit them to earn their own livings, to make their own homes and their future homes better, to lead them, perhaps into the Sunday-school, the confirmation class, and to the Lord's table, to have them look upon them in future years of trials and sorrow, as the friend and teacher who led them along earthly paths of usefulness to heavenly crowns of joy. You may not know this. You must be content to patiently sow the seed, watering it with your prayers, trusting to God for the increase, remembering that the final reward will be to have the Judge say: "Inasmuch."

ABSALOM who was a fool, wished himself a judge; Solomon, who was a wise man, trembles at the undertaking, and suspects his fitness for it. The more knowing and considerate men are, the better they are acquainted with their own weakness, and the more jealous of themselves.—Henry.

AN ADMIRABLE PLAN.

An important experiment in lay work is about to be tried in the diocese of Manchester, England. It is nothing less than the setting apart of a district to be worked entirely by laymen. For some years a mission service has been conducted during the winter months in the Drayton-street school, Hulme, by one of the curates of St. Mary's church. It appears that the rector, the Rev. F. C. Woodhouse, M.A., has now placed the district in the charge of laymen, who have thoroughly organized a complete scheme of mission work. The Sunday evening service will be conducted entirely by laymen. An efficient choir has been formed, and will undertake a full choral service. The addresses will always be delivered by a layman. On Wednesday evenings there will be meetings of the residents in the district for instruction and recreation. Under the auspices of the Manchester Sanitary Association, lectures on health will be given fortnightly, and the following gentlemen have promised their services: Dr. Emrys-Jones, Mr. J. Corbett, C.E., Mr. J. Priestly, M.R.C.S., Dr. Simpson, Dr. Ramsome, and Dr. Edge. On the intervening Wednesday evenings concerts will be given. A singing class in connection with the Manchester Tonic Sol-fa Association has been formed preparatory to the establishment of a choral society. In connection with the mission, a system of window gardening is being organized, and it is proposed to hold a flower show next year. The Sunday-school is thoroughly efficient, and the attendance is so large that the superintendent is compelled to refuse further admissions. A clothing club is well supported by the children, and it is intended to extend this to adults, and also to establish a branch of the Penny Savings Bank. A Band of Mercy and a Band of Hope are in course of formation.

ALL SOULS' DAY AND ITS OCTAVE IN ROME.

BY SHAKSPERE WOOD.

To your right hand as you approach the Farnese Palace is a street at the end of which you see an untidy-looking old church, whose front has not been cleaned or painted for years. It is at the end of the Via Giulia nearest the Ponte Sisto, and is the Church of St. Mary of Death, belonging to a confraternity so-called, who make it their duty to go out into the Campagna and take the bodies for burial of any poor persons who may have been murdered, or have died in consequence of an accident, or of fever. This confraternity was founded in 1575. The church was that in which the devotion of the Forty Hours was first instituted in or about 1560, and there was a covered cemetery attached to it, used for burying the bodies found in the country, and for any members of the confraternity who chose to be buried there, until intra-mural interments were prohibited in the early years of Pius IX. Until 1870 it was the custom of this confraternity to celebrate the day and octave of All Souls' by a wax-work exhibition in the cemetery beneath their church of a scriptural death scene—death of Jacob, raising of Lazarus, and other solemn scenes, taken either from the Old or New Testament. Sometimes it would be a death of a saint in more modern times. I remember seeing one of these representations in 1869 at another church, when the subject was the death of Cardinal Altieri, who fell a victim to cholera at Albano in 1867.

For fifteen years there had been a cessation of these lugubrious representations; but on the present sad commemoration of the departed, the Confraternity of Death announced that their cemetery was again to be thrown open for the week of the dead, and a representation of the Prophet Ezekiel in the valley of dry bones to be exhibited.

Much curiosity was excited, and many have been the visitors, especially such persons as had not seen the like before. I went there on Thursday morning, but stayed as short a time as possible, overcome with repugnance at the horrible and most unedifying spectacle. A long corridor on the level of the church leads to an equally long flight of stairs, ending at a door through which you enter the first chamber of horrors, the walls and ceiling of which are profusely decorated with arabesques formed of human bones and skulls. A headless skeleton adorns the holy-water basin, one bony hand dipping into it. Three skeletons stand in niches formed of bones and skulls. One of them bears the inscription that in life she was a pilgrim from northern lands, murdered in the Campagna on her way to the Apostles' Tomb. Another brandishes the scythe and holds out with threatening mien the hour-glass. Panels on the walls are ornamented with skulls in pyramids, purposely arranged so that the hollow cavities of the eyes produce the most dreadful effect. Candelabra formed of bones hang from the ceilings; everywhere you turn your eye meets these horribly grotesque decorations, and you have a confused impression of rifed sepulchres, patiently minute labor spent upon profaned materials, perhaps a fearful penance imposed for secret crimes which have escaped the tribunal of civil judgment. With a shrinking sensation of taking part in the profanation of the grave, one enters the second chamber or ghastly theatre. The stage is draped with black; the scenery a wild and desolate Eastern cemetery with opening tombs from which peer more skeletons large and small; a woman and child are already clothed in flesh and awakening; a wax statue of Ezekiel, rapt in ecstasy, stands in the midst. But a glance is enough; one hurries away half stifled with the close atmosphere of the crowd and the flaring lamps; the black-robed brethren swing their bags for chance contributions; you are afraid of stumbling over more bones, and hurry upstairs again, glad to get into the air, although the rain is pouring. In the church there is the brilliantly-lighted shrine and the Sacrament on high for the Forty Hours' devotion; but it is impossible to raise the soul then and there from the dust to which it is involuntarily depressed.

So much for an exhibition, originally intended, perhaps, for a good purpose, in rousing thoughtless sinners to a sense of the shortness of time and the need for repentance. But it is inopportune just now and generally disapproved of. On the contrary, the dedication of the second of November to the memory of the departed is more universally observed than ever. From early morning people might be seen carrying wreaths to the great city necropolis of San Lorenzo. Crowds streamed thither: on foot, in omnibuses, cabs, carriages. Lamps were lighted at the graves, flowers arranged, and sometimes even bread or cakes laid upon them, according to a custom older than Christianity. The spacious field of the poor at San Lorenzo presents a curious appearance toward the evening of this day, from the pinetto, or higher part of the cemetery, where the rich make their graves. Innumerable little lamps glimmer in the grass among the cypresses, and seem to say in the words of the Requiem: "Let perpetual light shine upon them," there where poor and rich alike share the glory of the Heavenly King!

Masses for the repose of the departed have been celebrated as usual in all the churches and basilicas. By day in every street memorial wreaths with inscriptions at every step reminded the passer-by of vanished friends. Some of these garlands of artificial flowers are very beautiful, others quaint and curious. The small yellow immortelles hold their own, and fresh chrysanthemums of every shade are especially sought for the graves. During the night the convent bells tolled at intervals, rousing the inmates for the offices.

Pope Leo XIII. celebrated mass for departed popes in his private chapel at the Vatican. Formerly there used to be a grand function in the Sistine Chapel, to which strangers were admitted by ticket. On that occasion the pope wore a dark crimson dalmatica and mitre of the same color.

The Church of Rome maintains that in the Jewish Church prayer was made for the dead, quoting the Second Book of Maccabees (chap. 12), which although not in the canon of inspired books, has always been reckoned an authentic historical record:

"Besides that noble Judas (V. 42) exhorted the people to keep themselves from sin, forasmuch as they saw before their eyes the things that came to pass for the sins of those that were slain. And when he had made a gathering throughout the company to the sum of two thousand drachms of silver, he sent it to Jerusalem to offer a sin-offering, doing therein very well and honestly, in that he was mindful of the reurrection: For if he had not hoped that they that were slain should have risen again, it had been superfluous and vain to pray for the dead. And also in that he perceived that there was great favor laid up for those that died godly, it was an holy and good thought. Whereupon he made a reconciliation for the dead, that they might be delivered from sin." Cyril of Jerusalem, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, St. Augustine, are all quoted for having mentioned the remembrance of the departed as usual in the liturgies of the Church from the earliest time. Hence the desire of emperors, kings, and great persons to be buried in the vestibules of churches. More than this, the foundations of churches, monasteries, colleges, etc., pro redemptione animarum suarum, prove that from Constantine downwards, the practice of praying for the dead was general in the Church, and especially in the English Church.

In a council of bishops subject to the See of Canterbury, in A.D. 816, it was ordained that after the death of a bishop, prayers should be made for him, and alms distributed. The same devotions for heads of families departed, and speedily grew into use. At last a day was established specially consecrated to the memory of the dead, and fixed for the second of November. Odilone, Abbot of Cluny, in 998, instituted this day of commemoration in all the monasteries of his order, and it was without delay sanctioned by the pope; whether Sylvester II. or John XVI. seems uncertain. The Council of Oxford, in 1222, declared All Souls' Day a holy day of the second class, upon which only works of necessity were to be done.

The persuasion is general among the common people and country folks that the "poveri morti" (our poor dead) of each family are aware of the remembrance of the survivors, and in return pray for them in their troubles and difficulties. In Sicily they are believed to revisit at this time the places they dwelt in in life. At Palermo the children receive their presents on All Souls' Day, instead of at Christmas; the "dear dead" bring the gifts: they are in the corners of the rooms—they know which child has been naughty, which deserves to be rewarded. The children sing this chant on the vigil:

"Armi santi, armi santi,
In sogno vani e vani sitti tenti,
Mentre sognate 'stra stu munnu di guai
Con di morti mittitiminai assai!"

Rendered into English: Holy souls, holy souls, I am one and ye are many, whilst I am in this world of woe things of the dead (presents) give me plenty!

In some parts of Sicily, as at Acireale and Mount Etna, the departed are supposed to pass in shadowy procession, with lighted tapers in their hands, and singing the litanies, each stopping at his former abode, and leaving a blessing. The little ones leave their shoes on the window-sills or in the balconies, and, of course, find something in them or beside them next morning, as their little Northern contemporaries find their stockings full on Christmas morning.

Not so thick is the throng of visitors to another Roman cemetery at this time, but not less deep and hallowed the memories we bear to it, when we, strangers and pilgrims from foreign lands, also carry wreaths to lay upon our darlings who sleep by the gate of St. Paul the sleep of peace. The birds are always singing there in the cypresses, and flowers blooming about the graves. May those dear resting-places never be ransacked to furnish forth material for such a revel of mortality as Rome has seen during the past week!

RELIGION AND THE DAILY LIFE.

In one of his sonnets Milton desired to live "as ever in my great Taskmaster's eye." St. Paul gave utterance to the same sentiment when he tells us that God is to be all and in all, and that whatever we do, whether we eat or drink, we are to do it to His glory. Centuries earlier still the royal Psalmist said, "I have set God always before me." The apostle did not mean that it is ever a Christian's duty to be always on his knees saying prayers. To comply with his injunction it is not necessary to neglect the business of life, or always, when we speak, to be uttering pious things, which would seem more of cant than of true piety. When rightly considered, our whole life, every act of it, one as much as another, is a part of our religion and is to be filled with its spirit; we live unto God. Here is a danger against which we should especially guard, that of separating Christianity from our daily life and regarding it as something to be practiced or talked about at set times. Under all circumstances and at all times we are the children of God and acting by and for Him. All our acts and thoughts are to be imbued with the influence of His Spirit. It should be in them all a pervading presence, like the perfume that fills the air and lends its savor to all surrounding objects.

John Wesley was once asked if he could be made certain that he would die in a given time, say in two days, how he would spend the intervening period. His answer was, that he should spend it precisely as he intended to do without that knowledge. He would make no alteration whatever, for his Bible and Prayer Book had taught him always to live in such a state as never to be afraid to die. His religion was his daily, hourly companion, sanctifying all his thoughts and acts, and not something to be put on and off with his Sunday clothes. It is something of the same spirit that is needed now, to understand that it is not the doing or not doing of certain specific acts that either makes or keeps us Christians, but it is the pervading influence of our whole lives. All our acts are religious or irreligious, if they are lawful at all, according to the motive that prompts them. To go to church, to say prayers, to partake of sacraments may or may not be acts of religion, though they are ordained of God; it depends largely upon the doer, but they are none the more ordained of God than are a thousand other acts of our lives, and are none the more a part of our religion; the Lord was no more present in the Mount of Transfiguration than He was at the wedding at Cana. The same God who said, Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, also said, six days shalt thou labor, and do all that thou hast to do. The two rest upon the same authority, and are a part of the same command, and the labor is as much a part of our religious life as the rest. It is a duty to pray, it is no less a duty to eat, and both are to be done alike to the glory of God—we can not separate our religion from our daily life.

"ONLY A PAUPER."

BY THE REV. CHARLES HOLLAND KIDDER.

Only a tenement-dweller,
Fallen in life's weary race,
There, in that damp, reeking cellar,
Lying with cold, ghastly face.

Vainly she sought for existence,
Toiling by night and by day,
Scorning to beg for assistance,
Wasting her strength for scant pay.

Worldly one, pampered with fashion,
Calling thyself "child of God,"
Who was the Christ-like compassion
Which would have lightened her rod!

Thou, in thy brown-stone front mansion!
She in that basement immured,
Shut out from heaven's expansion,
Hath every hardship endured.

There is a reckoning coming,
When, on that last, dreadful day,
Making each life's final summing,
Christ shall to such as thou say:

"False ones, ye stand here detected!
Claim not My servants to be!
When this poor soul was neglected
Then did ye it unto Me!"

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

CHARLIE'S FRIENDS.

"Oh, dear, how I wish I had something to do," and poor Charlie, with a dismal groan, tossed restlessly from one side of the bed to the other, upsetting the pillows that his mother had just carefully arranged for his comfort, and letting the dissected map with which he had been trying to amuse himself fall to the floor with a crash.

"Look at the window-sill and see your little visitor, Charlie," said his mother, as she quietly gathered up the pieces of the map, and re-arranged his pillows. Charlie's face brightened as he caught sight of a little bird, perched upon the window-sill, peering fearlessly into the room with his bright black eyes.

"Oh, what a pretty little bird!" he exclaimed. "Mamma, I do believe she is going to build a nest right on that branch in front of the window. How I wish she would, and then I could amuse myself watching her."

Much to Charlie's delight his hopes were fulfilled, for little Mrs. Jenny Wren selected a place at the end of a long, slender branch to build her nest, and she soon set vigorously to work.

Backward and forward she flew, collecting her materials, and Charlie, who was much interested in her proceedings, begged his mother to put some tiny bits of cotton wool on the window-sill, where they would be near at hand to line the little nest with.

Such a neat, pretty little nest as busy Mrs. Wren made, and out of such a variety of materials! Twigs, bits of twine, tiny tufts of wool that she found on the hedges, hay, horse-hairs, and a bit of red calico that had been almost too heavy for her to carry, and that had taken great patience to weave in and out, and a soft lining of cotton for the little birds to nestle in.

A happier pair of birds were never seen than Mr. and Mrs. Wren, when their little home was all complete, and Charlie forgot his impatience and restlessness while he watched them.

By the time Mrs. Wren was patiently sitting upon five little eggs, Charlie was well again, and he almost forgot his little bird friends who had cheered his loneliness while he had been sick.

One bright morning, instead of five little eggs, there were five little birds in the nest. Such ugly little birds, without any feathers, and with big heads and gaping yellow beaks that were always open and clamoring for something to eat; but Mr. and Mrs. Wren thought they were just the prettiest nestlings in the whole wide world, so they flew patiently backward and forward all day long, bringing fine fat worms and slugs for the hungry little ones, and scarcely ever stopping to get a meal for themselves.

Charlie was very anxious to get a peep into the nest, but his father forbid his venturing out on the slender limb, lest it should not be strong enough to bear his weight, so he had to content himself with such glimpses as he could get from his bed-room window.

One night there was a heavy storm. The wind swept through the trees and blew the branches backward and forward with such force that some were snapped off and fell upon the ground. Early in the morning, when Charlie woke up and looked out of the window, he saw the little nest lying on the ground and the half-fledged birds lying beside it.

"Oh, mamma, the poor little birds are dead!" he exclaimed, as he hastened out to the scene of the disaster. The parent birds were flying about uttering sharp cries of distress, and Charlie's kind heart was filled with pity for their evident sorrow over the loss of their home and nestlings.

Two of the little birds were dead, but the other three were still alive, although chilled from lying on the wet grass. Charlie picked them up carefully, and replacing them in the nest, which was uninjured, notwithstanding its fall, he brought them into the warm kitchen.

CHARLIE'S FRIENDS.

"These three are all right, mamma," he said joyfully. "I wonder if I couldn't fasten the nest up in the tree again so the old birds would come and feed them again. They must be awfully hungry, they chirp so loud and open their beaks so wide."

"I think you could put the nest back again in the tree," said mamma, pausing to look at the little birds. "You might try, at any rate."

"Oh, I have the best idea!" exclaimed Charlie, eagerly. "There's an old iron kettle out in the wood-shed, and I know it isn't good for anything, for it's all rusty and full of holes. May I have it for something?"

"Why, what do you want to do with it?" said his mother, smiling at his eagerness.

"I want to fasten it up in the tree so that it can't blow down, and put the nest in it. Then it will be safe from the wind and the rain, and it will make such a cozy warm house for the little birds. Please let me, mamma."

He scarcely waited to obtain his mother's consent before he hastened away in search of the kettle. He soon brought it back to the house in great triumph, and was so anxious to establish the birds in their new home that his mother had hard work persuading him to eat his breakfast first.

"Well, I must put the baby birds where they will get something to eat," he exclaimed, as he reluctantly obeyed his mother's call, and climbing up he put the nest on a high shelf, outside the kitchen door, where the cat could not reach it, but where the old birds could feed their little ones.

After breakfast he climbed up into the tree, drawing the kettle up after him by the rope which he had tied to it, and before very long he had securely fastened it so that it could not be blown down by the hardest gust of wind. Then he carefully put the nest in it, and descended the tree to watch the old birds and see how they approved of their new quarters.

At first they were rather suspicious of it, and fluttered around it without daring to alight upon its edge, but the shrill cries of the little birds soon induced them to trust themselves within it, and they soon made themselves quite at home.

"I guess they think they've got a better house than any other bird ever had," said Charlie, surveying his work with great satisfaction. "Now, if it rains they will be just as dry as if they had an umbrella over their heads."

Mr. and Mrs. Wren seemed to enjoy their strange home just as much as Charlie had hoped that they would, and I know no birds ever had a safer shelter from storms than they had in the depths of the iron kettle.

Every year they built their nest there, and Charlie came to regard them as his especial friends. His interest in them made him more considerate toward other birds, and he never robbed their nests nor stole their eggs for his own selfish gratification, as too many boys do.

If boys only stopped to think of the suffering they cause by robbing birds of their homes or their little ones, I do not think they would be cruel enough to wantonly inflict such pain, but they are too apt to forget everything else in their desire to gratify their love of sport, and so through mere thoughtlessness they take away a life which man, with all his wisdom, cannot restore.

SAMUEL heard the voice of the Lord as he rested at night in the Lord's house. Every child can make his nightly rest like that of Samuel in the house of the Lord, if he goes to rest as he did, with his thoughts and temper such as God loves and approves. And it is always to such that the voice of God comes. There is no better time than this Advent season for little children to begin to try and make their minds, by God's help, such as the child Samuel carried to his rest. Good temper, pure thoughts, and holy desires not only make the rest sweet, but the training of oneself to these makes the mind fit always for thoughts of God, and where these are there is no room for the enemy to sow those evil seeds which in later life yield so sad a crop.

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT.

RIDLEY'S 87TH ANNUAL CHRISTMAS GREETING.

As Christmas approaches the child never tires of prating about the annual visit of Santa Claus. As the children, therefore, religiously believe in him, take them to his grotto at the great establishment of Ridley & Sons, Grand, Allen and Orchard streets, New York, where Santa Claus is holding daily levees, and invites children and their parents to come and inspect the good things prepared for them.

There are of departments fifty and two, Replets with Novelties sure to suit you, And Santa Claus wishes all from far and near A "Merry Christmas" and "Happy New Year."

FINE PIANOS.

To-day the Knabe piano stands unsurpassed in tone and quality. Now that the interior work of the instrument has been perfected, the outer covering is receiving due attention. Among the latest styles are those made of rosewood and mahogany, with beautifully inlaid work, and those of mahogany, with inlaid brass and ebony, with artistic fancy work, in either square or upright pianos.—Baltimore American.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.

Beautiful Books in New and Ornamental Bindings.

The Celestial Country. From the Rhythm of St. Bernard of Cluny. Translated by John Mason Neale, D.D.

Printed upon hand-made paper, uncut edges, and title-page and initial letters rubricated. With four choice illustrations from original designs by J. H. Gratecap. Small 16mo., bound in Japanese leatherette, $1.25; in ornamental cloth, $2.00.

The fourteen cantos translated by Dr. Neale in this collection move with that strange rhythmic energy which characterizes the original, and are the most wonderful expressions that have ever been in our language of the 'heavenly homesickness,' which is the ruling passion that speaks and sings in St. Bernard's poem.

Christmas-Tide in Song and Story. Beautifully printed on hand-made paper, with rubricated title-page, and uncut edges. Small 16mo., bound in Japanese leatherette, $1.75; in ornamental cloth, $1.75.

A compilation in verse and prose, consisting of two parts: Para Sacra, containing the Gospel Narratives of the Nativity, and hymns and carols of a distinctively religious character; Para Secularia, containing selections from Dickens, Thackeray, Irving, and Hans Andersen, together with a large number of carols, lyrics, and poems by a variety of authors. Paper, printing, binding, and contents complete to make this one of the choicest gift-books of the season.

The Lady of La Garaye. By the Hon. Mrs. Norton. Printed on hand-made paper, with rubricated title and two steel-plate illustrations. Small 16mo., bound in Japanese leatherette, $1.50; in ornamental cloth, $1.50.

The substance of the poem is a "romance of real life," which represents, with all the literalism of which poetry is capable, the historic facts in the life of the Count and Countess of La Garaye at Duin, in Brabant. The interest of the poem is enhanced by the subtle impression made in every line, that the singer is herself disciplined in sorrow, and by the full disclosure of her own experience, into which the poem rises at the end, as into a kind of chorus.

Containing the latest improvements to the system.

ECLECTIC SHORT - HAND,

By Prof. J. C. CROSS, 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

This system, already acknowledged to be the briefest and most rapid in extension, has been again improved, and is now presented for special liability to every student. This new book contains the latest improvements and an additional chapter on 12mo-writing, with valuable suggestions to students.

Eclectic Short-Hand is the only system that can readily be mastered without a teacher.

From C. B. Atwood, Gen. Agt. of N. Y. Mutual Life Ins. Co., Boston, Mass., Oct. 30, 1867. "Miss Emily L. Tucker, who has written in every respect as an amanuensis in my office. Her short-hand work is excellent, and saves us a great deal of labor." From Rand, McNally & Co., Publishers, Chicago, Oct. 1, 1867. "We have had the Eclectic writers in our employ, both efficient and capable stenographers."

THE ANDOVER REVIEW

FOR 1886.

The success which has attended the publication of the ANDOVER REVIEW for the past two years has led to its establishment upon a permanent financial basis. Commencing the year 1886 with increased resources, the Review will be enlarged with each monthly issue to 112 pages, making an aggregate for the year of 1344 pages, and the annual price of subscription will be $4.00; single copies, 35 cents. Until January 1 subscriptions will be received at the present rate, $3.00.

THE ANDOVER REVIEW is a Religious and Theological Monthly, advocating the principles and methods of what is now known as Progressive Orthodoxy, but its discussions are not confined to the field of Theology. It is already recognized "as a strong exponent of the social questions of the day, promising a future of great influence." In future, articles upon Sociology will be supplemented by a department of Sociological Notes under the charge of the Rev. S. W. Dusk.

A Geographical and Missionary Department will also be added, under the care of the Rev. C. C. STREBCK.

Education of discussions will be continued, notably that introduced by Professor Palmer of Harvard in the November number.

The Moral aspects of Literary Topics will be considered in special papers.

A series of articles upon Church Architecture, by Professor Chubbell, will begin in an early number.

The Editorial and other departments will be conducted as heretofore, with increased attention to Book Reviews.

N. B. After Jan. 1, 1886, the price of the Review will be $4.00. Until that date subscriptions will be received at the present rate, $3.00, from old and new subscribers.

Postal Notes and Money are at the risk of the sender, and therefore remittances should be made by money-order, draft, or registered letter, to

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1885.

The noon-day meetings in Trinity church, held as a part of the Advent Mission in this city, were simply wonderful. All the seats, in pew and aisle, were filled, and the standing-room in the aisles was crowded to the doors. This vast assemblage was made up almost wholly of the best and the busiest men in New York. They came to the church with rapid steps, and at the last moment, as if they were keeping a business appointment. But they came. They left their earthly business, they quitted their Stock Exchange to gather in the Lord's house upon their business still, but business more lasting and more real than that they left behind. They rose up from the cares, and the worries, and the failures of money-gathering, and sought for and gained rest and peace in the contemplation of the sure, and certain, and steadfast hope of eternity.

These gatherings in Trinity church refuted most thoroughly the oft-repeated saying that the pulpit is losing, has lost its influence. Never, perhaps, was there a grander spectacle in all the history of preaching and preachers, than the upturned faces, intelligent, thoughtful, and self-possessed, of this vast assemblage of men, of all ages, awayed and visibly affected by the words of one of the simplest and plainest of preachers. These gatherings, too, refuted the common saying that religion has come to be of interest to women only. Here was an immense building positively packed with men as earnest, as eager to lay hold on the truths and the peace of Christianity, as they had been, a little before, to seek the surest information of the markets. It is not true that men care nothing for religion. They do care for it. They do respect it. They do more than that,—they long for its uplifting, its exaltation. Many a face, each day of these meetings, grew glad with the rest that came from the contemplation of things eternal, and from resolutions to lead a better life.

Another thought that came to members of these assemblages was the uselessness of divisions in the Church. Here were men, sitting or standing side by side, of all the divisions of Christians, and all finding in the words of the preacher the same truths to which they are accustomed to listen, Sunday by Sunday. There was unity of thought, there was unity of hope, there was the unity of love for Christ. Why should they any longer give themselves denomination? Why should they magnify their little differences. Why should they develop their differentiations? Nay, rather, why should they not strive to labor together—showing themselves to be one fold, under one Shepherd.

Further, these meetings justified the existence of Trinity church itself. It becomes apparent that after all it is not only the most beautiful, it is also the most important edifice, on a "quiet street." Its atmosphere is that of quietness and peace—there is no turmoil within its walls—but its business is the most real business that goes on in all its neighborhood. Standing rightly at the head of Wall Street, it invites men to come up, and affords them a place in which they may transact the business of their souls. How many men, on these days, found the gains of that single hour within these hallowed walls greater than the gains of all the other hours! Of all the values which can absorb the minds of men, there is none more important than that of themselves—of their own life, and that life is not worth even the living of it, except for that holy religion, which has its representative inside the doors of Trinity church, and speaks from the last resting places of the sainted dead within the loving shadow of her walls.

The Advent Missions bring to notice the relative positions of worship and preaching. These preaching meetings have shown clearly the great value of preaching, as well as the strong desire for preaching, among the men and women of to-day. The great truths of Christianity are not outworn, the old, old story is still as dear as ever, the needs and longings of the human heart are just as urgent as ever. So immense congregations have listened for two hours together to words of instruction, meditation, and exhor-tion. Therefore, preaching must have its full place in the Church's work. If it has lost that place, it must have it restored again. This may mean, that the present union of services and preaching must be loosened. And this, too, may be in the interest of the services as well as the preaching. Liturgically, for instance, the preaching should precede the worship, as preparing the heart and mind of the intending worshipper for approaching his heavenly Father. Thus its place is appointed for the beginning of the Liturgy, though this has become obscured by the prefixing of the Daily Prayer to the Communion Service. Following that analogy, it might be well, at times, for the clergy to preach before beginning Morning or Evening Prayer. How often would it be the case, that a well-directed address should shape the thoughts, and exalt the souls of the hearers into a fitting condition for the momentous joy of meeting their Lord and their God.

It is gratifying to note that the policy advocated by this journal of giving the Indians their lands in severalty and investing them at the earliest possible date, with the rights and responsibilities of citizenship, is constantly growing in favor. Attention has already been directed to the utterances of the President and the Secretary of the Interior on this subject, and to the report and recommendations of the Lieutenant-General of the Army. In his annual report which is just published, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs urges the same policy, and supports it by some considerations of great importance. He points out with much clearness and force the function of agriculture in conducing to civilization, and says that the large increase of acreage in farming and the growing interest in it are among the most hopeful signs of Indian progress and development. He declares that "it should be industriously and gravely impressed upon the Indians that they must abandon their tribal relations, and take lands in severalty as the corner-stone of their complete success in agriculture, which means self-support, personal independence and material thrift." He then goes on to recommend the maintenance of a protectorate over them by the government for twenty-five years, the government holding their lands for them in trust, but issuing trust patents to such as take lands in severalty; and the purchase of the surplus lands by the government, the proceeds to be invested for their benefit and used for fostering education, and promoting in other ways their civilization and material progress. He adds, "when the farm and school have become familiar institutions among the Indians, and a reasonable time has intervened for the transition from barbarism to civilization, then will the Indian be prepared to take on himself the higher and more responsible duty and privileges which appertain to American citizenship." Certainly there is abundant evidence that our government is about to enter upon a more rational and just as well as a more humane policy in its treatment of the Indians. To this there is no sort of doubt that the Protestant Episcopal Church has materially contributed in many ways. It is to be hoped that the one thing needed to make the proposed plan, or any plan, for the betterment of the Indian, successful, namely, genuine, ethical, Christian training, will also be supplied in more generous measure.

It is understood that the President reluctantly yielded his purpose to attend the funeral of the Vice-President last week, in response to the urgent solicitation of his advisers and friends, and especially because of the expressed wish to that effect of the family of Mr. Hendricks. The feeling is general that in doing this the President was well advised, and no criticism of his conduct in so doing has emanated from any respectable source in either party. The unfavorable comment, therefore, which the London Standard is reported to have made on President Cleveland's "allowing himself to be deterred from attending the funeral of his colleague by a risk so infinitesimally small as that of a railway accident on the way" will find no echo in this country. The comparison which that journal makes between the conduct of the late King of Spain, who, "having no male heir, went among his cholera stricken subjects," and that of the President of the United States remaining at Washington, is altogether lacking in fairness. In the first place it is one thing to incur a risk in the discharge of a duty to the suffering, by means of which the afflicted might be relieved, and the failing courage of the whole people be revived; and it is quite another thing to incur risk in the paying of a tribute of respect to a deceased associate, which, however appropriate and grateful, could hardly be called a matter of necessity or mercy.

An illustration of the extremely shallow and silly stuff that occasionally finds its way into the editorial and other columns of the daily press, is to be seen in the editorial comment which one of the New York daily newspapers made on an address by the Rev. Mr. Aitken at Trinity church. It is perfectly evident to any one who reads the article in question that the writer did not know and did not care, so far as his purpose in writing was concerned, what the preacher said or did not say. He simply took the subject of the address, "Is Life Worth Living?," wrote down at the head of his editorial his arcular condemnation of it as "A Silly Question," and then proceeded to descant upon the extreme silliness of asking such a question of a church full of "living men and women, all anxious to keep death off as long as possible." The great dailies of our large cities are generally conducted with fairness and conspicuous ability. Some of the best considered and most thoughtful writing of the day is to be found in their columns. To this fact is due the vast influence which they undoubtedly wield. It is easy to see, however, that along with the honest, thoughtful, manly thinking which they publish, there is a good deal of "stuff and nonsense." As "padding" it may be harmless enough, as a rule, though it always lowers the tone of the paper printing it. But when such writing undertakes by a phrase or an innuendo to condemn what the writer does not even take the pains to inquire into or understand, it becomes altogether unworthy of a place in the columns of a great newspaper.

Instances of successful and partially successful attempts at wife-murder and suicide are getting to be fearfully common in different parts of the country. There is no need to make special mention of any particular case. The lesson that all such cases teach is the same, and it is one that deserves to be seriously pondered. The evil effects of selfishness among husbands, and of vanity and worldliness among wives, in loosening the ties of the family and home, and letting evil into the sanctuary of domestic life, are being seen in the horrible crimes which have almost ceased to be startling because they are so common. It may be that in some particular case there is grievous guilt and wrong on one side only; but in most cases neglect on one side provokes or allows guilt on the other; and in all cases there has been something radically wrong in the domestic economy and in the social atmosphere in which the unhappy parties have moved. For the dreadful condition of social life which these crimes disclose there are many remedial agencies that ought to be invoked; but the one all-embracing remedy must be the revival of family religion. For the lack of this, society is being demoralized; and unless the one remedy be faithfully and timely applied the whole fabric will tumble. It is time to speak plainly, and to warn the men of this land that if they would keep the home inviolate they must introduce and foster piety around the hearthstone. And this not merely for their own sakes and the sakes of their wives and their children, but for the sake of our civilization and our country. For no people can long survive the banishment of religion from the home.

We are informed by journalists that Leo XIII. took extraordinary pains with his late "Encyclical," writing it many times over and over again. We can readily credit it. When one wishes to "patter in a double sense" he must be careful in the construction of his ambiguities.

This is what it amounts to: "The Papal Church is the friend of progress, of free-thought, of science, of well-regulated freedom, of republicanism, of United Italy, of toleration, of religious equality. Of progress, for there are Spain, and Mexico, and other Papal countries to prove it; of free-thought, for has not Leo XIII. permitted us all to examine Thomas Aquinas? of science, for is not the Ptolemaic astronomy a dogma of the Vatican since Galileo's day? of well-regulated freedom, for is he not prepared to regulate it? of republicanism, for, were not the Papal states a model republic? of United Italy, for who was Garibaldi but a son of the Church? of toleration, for does he not say that governments may properly tolerate when they can not do otherwise; and finally, of religious equality, wherever that means a lion's share for the parti prêtre, and a free hand in "the spoils." To this end, his people, everywhere, must patronize politics by taking every opportunity to bring all nations under the pontifical slipper, and making them as enlightened as Papal Italy was under Pio Nono and his predecessors. Our schools must be made as good as theirs, which left a large majority of the people unable to read; and then it will follow that no Bibles will be wanted, for, who denies that not a copy of the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue was ever published in Rome, till Victor Immanuel became king of Italy?

The "Holy Father," who calls on the Universe to help him into the throne of that sovereignty, is equally kind to the United States, and proposes to make himself our sovereign, as well. Who can be so unreasonable as not to admit, that with all these "concessions" to modern feeling and modern thought, we ought to welcome the pope to the autocracy he covets; and how can we make a more significant beginning than by voting for "The Freedom of Worship Bill."

Another revolution has broken out in Mexico, this time in the State of Nueva Leon, where the governor has abandoned his capital, leaving the commonwealth in the hands of the insurgents. The telegraphic reports that appear in the daily press, reveal a singular state of affairs in that unhappy country. It is alleged that the insurrection is instigated from the city of Mexico by the federal Secretary of State, Senor Rolo, who is the father-in-law of President Diaz, and who is a candidate for the presidency of the republic. The object of the uprising in Nueva Leon, it is said, is the overthrow of the existing State government and the appointment of a military government in its stead, which movement is secretly countenanced by President Diaz in the interest of the candidacy of his father-in-law. The same movement is likely to be encouraged in other States, it is said, for the same purpose. That such things could be done or even attempted is but another proof of the confusion and corruption which disgrace Mexican politics. It is perfectly evident that a people who will tolerate such a state of affairs are not fit to be free. Nor can they be made fit for freedom and capable of self-government, until they are rescued from the religious tyranny which keeps them what they are, and brought under the influence of that Ethical Christianity which alone can prepare a people for the duties and responsibilities of free citizenship. Hitherto the internal condition of Mexico has not been a matter of much concern to the United States; but now the more intimate commercial relations which are about to be established with that country, and the large investments which our people are making and seeking to make there, make the order and security of Mexican civil society a matter of recognized importance. It is not too soon, therefore, to urge the revival and enlargement of the work of the Church of Jesus in Mexico. No matter what mistakes may hitherto have been made in its administration and management, the need of such a religious reform as that Church alone can accomplish in that country, is most manifest, as is the manifold interest that we as a people have in its success. It is time for renewed effort in behalf of the evangelization of Mexico.

In one of the leading New York newspapers there is a letter from Rome, written by a Roman Catholic priest, which undertakes to defend the late Encyclical letter of the pope against certain assaults that are being made upon it by the public press in France and Italy. The defence which this correspondent makes is too general in its terms, and therefore too weak and inconclusive to deserve consideration in this place.

What does deserve to be pointed out, however, is the confession which is made of the severe criticism which the Encyclical is receiving at the hands of all the leaders of public opinion in France, and especially in Italy. In reply to this the writer, after the traditional manner of Romish controversialists, charges his opponents with all manner of religious and political unsoundness and damnable heresy, alleging that in France and especially in Italy the masses of the people are not only ignorant of the truth, but devoid of all religion, and filled with contempt for the teachings of the Holy See. To all this the reply is obvious. It cannot be denied that for this state of affairs the Roman Catholic Church alone is responsible. For centuries it alone has had control of all the religious and educational influences which have made the Italian people what they are. There is no pretense that Protestantism has had any voice or been able in any appreciable degree to reach and influence the masses in that country. Whatever infidelity and scepticism there are, therefore, and whatever immorality and impiety, they are the immediate result of the teaching and policy of the Roman See. The defenders of the papacy being the witnesses, the worst impeachment of Romanism that can be urged is to be found in the present condition of the Italian people—a condition for which the Church of Rome alone is responsible. It is thus demonstrated that Romanism has been an utter failure in the country and among the people where its influence as a religious system has been unchecked and undisputed. By its fruits it is judged and condemned.

A significant story comes from Detroit, of rioting and much disorder in a Polish Roman Catholic church. From the telegraphic report, which is given at length in the daily press, it seems that the Polish priest, under whom St. Albertus church had been built, and a congregation of several thousand Poles had been gathered, was removed by the Roman Catholic bishop of that city, and another priest appointed in his place in spite of the earnest protest of the congregation. When, on a recent morning, the new priest entered the church to celebrate mass, he was told by those present that it would not be allowed. A call was made upon the congregation to put him out, whereupon "the whole assembly instantly rose to their feet, and made a rush at the clergyman." "Out with him, we want only our own priest," was the cry. "The result is declared to have been that "for five hours the greatest excitement prevailed. A mob of more than twelve hundred women filled the streets, bore defiance to the police, and were only dispersed after a sharp struggle." On the following morning, the newly appointed priest again undertook to celebrate mass, being escorted thither by a squad of police. After one or two futile attempts they succeeded in gaining the inside of the church, when the priest proceeded with his function in the midst of the most riotous disorder on the part of the congregation. The account at hand says that "the policemen guarded the aisles, but the men and women clambered over the pews, and made a rush not only to the altar rail, but even inside the holy space, until the priests fled into the vestry-room in dismay." Twenty-five additional policemen, however, succeeded in restoring such order that the obnoxious priests were able to go through with the service after a fashion; but on retiring they were again pelted with stones and missiles. The same account reports the utmost dissatisfaction, not only in that congregation but in others in the same city, at what is considered the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of the Roman bishop, who is accused of desiring to give the management of affairs into the hands of the Jesuits and Franciscans, to the detriment of the interests and rights of the local parishes. From all this, and from other like occurrences, which are not uncommon, it is plainly to be seen that the boasted peace and concord of the Roman domination are a delusion. There is not less discord and division, but more, rather, in it than in the denominations whose differences are more talked about. It is true that the despotic and arbitrary Romish government is able, for the most part, to suppress the evidences of discord, and to maintain an external submission that looks like peace; but beneath this outward show of tranquillity there are more unrest and discontent than are dreamed of by those who see merely the outside; and these elements of disorder are liable at any time to break out into open confusion and every evil work. As time goes on, moreover, and its people realize their liberty more and more under the influence of our free institutions, they become more impatient of the tyranny which is ruthlessly exercised over them from abroad. Multitudes of the young and prosperous emancipate themselves from it altogether. Others, like the riotous congregation of St. Albertus, rise now and then in fruitless insurrection; but at last they are forced to make an abject submission to a despotism that is unchanging and inexorable.

IMPRESSIONS AMONG THE ADVENT MISSIONS IN NEW YORK.

The purposes of these various missions are identical; their modes of working, various and strongly contrasted, as we shall see by studying the progress of the work in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, the Holy Trinity and St. George's, where missionaries from the Mother Church in England, trained and experienced in this latter-day field of parochial evangelization, have, at no little sacrifice of personal considerations, entered unreservedly into the work. It seems that each missionary falls into or develops a method of his own, which becomes in a degree characteristic in the development of his work. Every successful missionary is presumably a man of generous intellectual gifts as well as mature spiritual culture. In the existing methods of work it is inconceivable that a superficial, unsound, or feeble man should survive the severe ordeal of this species of ministrations. For a single masterpiece, or a second or a third in the pulpit counts for little or nothing where all effort is subordinated, and looks forward to the crowning result. The summing up of the fortnight's work measures and stamps the capacity and staying power of the missionary. He must concentrate, hold, and mature the entire movement through his own penetrating and prevailing individuality.

These English missionaries are all tested men, each with an admirable record, and yet they are thoroughly unlike and work in independent and original ways.

The Rev. Dr. Pigou, missionary at the Heavenly Rest, already introduced to the readers of THE CHURCHMAN, undertakes his work quite unassisted. Indeed, he lays his hand on extra ministerial duties. He travels, so to speak, with his own army. He brings his hymns and tunes with him, such as have taken root in his own experience on the field. He discards the church choir and organ. He sits down at the keyboard of a little cabinet organ, and accompanies the plaintive and pathetic tunes which have gained his affection. The Rev. D. Parker Morgan assists in the services and opening prayers; but all the preaching, lecturing, Bible-readings, and mission sermons are the missionary's work, and so are mainly the informal ministrations among inquirers and those specially drawn into the work.

There are three assemblies daily—at 8 A. M., Holy Communion and an address; at 11, Bible Reading, and at 8 P. M., short Evening Prayer, sermon, and after-meeting. There are also special addresses to men and to the young.

There is neither scholastic nor liturgical grand plan in Dr. Pigou's work. It is neither catechetical nor homiletic. It is profoundly scriptural, practical, and subjective. His imperturbable quiet and tranquility differentiate him from all his brother missionaries. To the superficial observer he passes for a man with little religious emotion or enthusiasm. Only to one who looks closely and catches the play of the facial muscles, the hesitating conscientiousness and reticence of speech, and the occasional involuntary throb in the voice, does the preacher disclose himself.

Given sound learning, profound convictions, and a devoted spirit, the words spoken by such a man and in such a way have a specific weight and power of their own. The preacher takes no one by storm, exercises no fascinations, and throws himself upon the inherent power as he conceives and presents it for fruitfulness in his work. Indeed he distrusts, if he does not discredit, the intervention of all religious stimulants of art and symbolism and ritual in the prosecution of his ministry. He does not hesitate to caution his hearers against them as unsafe adjuncts in the religious life. There is almost a Quakerish severity and asceticism in this direction. So his delivery is without passion either in gesture or intonation. There is the deep gravity of the scientist or jurist in unfolding his line of thought. The voice keeps near a monotone, save an inflection to a lower and deep note at long intervals.

His exegetical use of the Holy Scripture is peculiarly searching in his practical applications; and his spiritual insight in the analysis of motive and character, and in determining the main-springs of moral determinations is keen and penetrating. He ploughs deeply and with the patient energy of a stout-hearted husbandman. He loses the buoyancy and enthusiasm developed in general mission work, but his ministry will suffer less from the after-chill, and blight, and blast. There may be an apparent scarcity of fruitage, but it will be mainly sound, and of "good keeping quality." Our popular mis-directions and predilections as to mission and revival methods are not unlikely to lead people to undervalue the sterling and thorough-going quality of Mr. Pigou's work. But those who have caught the secret of it will get strength and refreshment. Here the work is thoroughly organized and systematized. The entrances are furnished with attentive ushers, eager to impart information, and such visible welcome as gather and hold a congregation. The missionary has unconsciously sacrificed one element of immediate influence by overlooking the congregational efficiency of familiar hymns and tunes, and depending upon selections, which, however stirring they may have proved in his own experience, are quite unknown and unfamiliar at the Heavenly Rest.

The missionaries and revivalists meet widely and deeply felt in evangelistic ministrations have invariably recognized the necessary element of hymns and melodies thoroughly popularized.

At the Church of the Holy Trinity another English missioner is at work, and single-handed—the Rev. E. Walpole Warren, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Lambeth, London. Here the great dimensions of the edifice, with its interminable amphitheatre galleries, implies a great congregation, and a commensurate body of missioners. But the work is intelligently organized, and that incessant whirl and bedlam confusion of the Grand Central Depot region neither bushes nor hinders. Here a Christian mission, with its spiritual sanctions and energies, is pitted against the fiercest, strongest current of the great world-life in this great metropolis. Elsewhere it is worldliness, luxury, voluptuousness; here it is the incessant ebb and flow of incoming and outgoing thousands, the din of great express lines, interminable street cars and a shifting hotel population.

In such a conjunction, a highly gifted personality, magnetic, sympathetic, ardent, and master of forensic fascinations, seems indispensable in the missioner, and such a missioner is Mr. Warren. He is a cosmopolitan man, used to great congregations, and the exigencies of extended mission work. The assured confidence of a well grounded and successful experience places him directly at ease in his new congregation, and the perfect understanding is reached at once.

He is eminently persuasive in his preaching—touches with great firmness, yet unerring tact, the infirmities, sins, and spiritual exigencies of daily life among real men and women. And he is at home among the widest ranges of social conditions. The world, or under world of the Jerry McAuley's Mission would hear his voice and recognize him as their evangelist, no less than the refined and fastidious worshippers at Holy Trinity. So he utilizes a wide range of illustration. He opens up the experiences of all sorts and conditions of sinning and repenting people. He is intensely and always humane, brotherly, helpful, hopeful. He arouses no misgiving or apprehension without the finest remedial provisions. And yet he stands in wide contrast with the old-fashioned stock revivalist, for his methods are purely constructive and so conservative no man's emotions will run away with his sober second judgment, the missioner consenting; and there will be few unintelligent, blindfold conversions. His personal influence is already marked and established, and the rector of the church has already arranged for a continuance of the mission under the same missioner for a supplemental week. Mr. Warren is liturgic in use and feeling—not ritualistic—uses the Prayer Book constantly as the fluctuations of the work suggest, resorts often but briefly and cogently to extempore prayer, is without a trace of cant or extravagance, and an atmosphere of healthy, churchly evangelism pervades the meetings, all of which follow the conventional type. And here it may be noted that at each and all these missions under notice, the Holy Communion is celebrated at least once each day. The advance in sacramental life of the whole Church may be read at a glance in such a statement. The order observed at Holy Trinity is, on week days, at 8 A.M., Holy Communion with a short address, at 11 A.M., short service and instruction on the Spiritual Life (each day, with Holy Communion on Thursday); at 8 P.M., the Mission Service, sermon and after meeting. Services are also held specially for men, boys, and girls. It is observable, as a homiletic trait immediately interesting our own clergy who are studying mission work, that these English missioners very generally resort to historical passages of the Old Testament, after the manner of an allegoric instruction or object lesson; often avowedly pushing analogies and types beyond the confines of strict interpretation, thus subordinating the narrative strictly to the purposes of illustration and enforcement, and by this expedient helping a great number of listeners who are easily wearied with abstract or doctrinal subjects to a living interest in the discourse. Thousands keep track of an instruction thread—along an Old Testament story who otherwise would wander into inextricable confusion.

In the matter of extempore preaching, these gentlemen prove valuable examples. There is fluency without verbosity or redundancy. Things are put often in a strikingly crisp, epigrammatic way. There is a freedom of handling, but no wandering discursiveness. Every man sticks to his text, and is never tempted by rhetorical or declamatory opportunities to jump the track of his premeditated discourse. Scholarship, learning, culture, theology, all are put in work-day harness. There is a prevalent realism; an absence of mere elegance and pedantry. These gentlemen, too, are perfectly versed in those practical matters whose successful administration has much to do with the immediate and ultimate success of a mission—the multitude of seemingly unimportant particulars which might escape the notice of the most devoted and capable missioner. The success of Mr. Moody's missions, it is clearly recognized, has been not a little due to his masterly conduct of precisely this line of incidentals.

The mission of St. George's, Stuyvesant Square may be taken for a good type of the mission. For the rector himself is, by temperament, experience, and choice, always a missioner; and his spirited group of assistants constitute an inimitable staff of fellow-workers. The parish was already enthused and ripe for the sickle. In immediate preparation the population between Nineteenth and Twelfth streets, and Fifth Avenue and the East River, had been closely canvassed by thousands of pastoral letters and personal visitations. Then the most experienced and perhaps the most gifted missioner of his school in the Mother Church—the Rev. Wm. Hay Aitken—was secured for the work. With him is associated the Rev. James Stephens, a missioner on the staff of the Church of England Parochial Mission Society. Mrs. Crouch also holds women's meetings in the chapel daily at 3 P.M. The daily round of mission work is, with a few exceptions, at 8 A.M. Holy Communion, a second celebration on Thursdays; at 10:30 a short service, with address on "The Christian Life" by Mr. Aitken; at 3 P.M. women's meeting in the chapel by Mrs. Crouch; at 3:30 children's service in church, Mr. Stephens; and at 8 mission service in church. At noon Mr. Aitken preaches to men in Trinity church. Here are three separate sermons or discourses daily, besides the constant succession of personal interviews concerning spiritual interests daily growing out of the ministrations. With devoted co-workers at every possible point, ready for any office or duty, Mr. Aitken never releases himself from the main burden of the mission. No detail of practical administration escapes his vigilance. If the singing weakens or the time slackens, his ringing voice comes to the rescue, or his hand plays the part unconsciously of a metronome. He pauses in his speech to look after the comfortable seating of the people. He "handles" his coming and going multitudes as easily and rapidly as a captain his files of soldiers; yet all without noise or visible effort. He is a natural leader, and the people quickly learn to interpret the language of his glances and gestures. Perhaps no preacher with a cosmopolitan reputation has fewer eccentricities or hints of meretricious or ad captivandum expedients. To the hasty or superficial observer, here lies one of the hidden paradoxes of the missioner's drawing and holding power. For such direct, ascetic methods in the pulpit, as a rule, do not win and hold congregations. Yet Mr. Aitken both draws and holds the people, and with a hand stronger and firmer as the days go on. For, almost at any hour you shall find the church where he is at work swarming with people; not merely professional church-goers, and that morbid strain of Christians who literally stimulate on sermons, but throngs of strangers to any and every church—people who are awakened perhaps to their first experience of spiritual responsibility while listening to the strange preacher.

At half past ten there is literally a great congregation, day after day; so there is at Trinity, at noon, where hundreds are sometimes unable to gain entrance, and then at the Evening Mission Service, St. George's is again often strained for sitting and even standing room. From early Communion until half past ten at night, when the after-meeting is dismissed, the lines of the old hymn find illustration, for "Here congregations ne'er break up, and Sabbaths have no end." With all this there is surprising naturalness and repose in the religious atmosphere. One breathes freely and in a normal way. There is an absence of strain, of intensity, of that merely social excitement of the occasion, which invariably follows the popular revivalist. On the contrary there is no quieter more restful heaven for a jaded, shelter-seeking soul in New York to-day than a seat at St. George's at any stage of any service.

Mr. Aitken is a perpetual worker, yet he never betrays weariness. His voice holds its resonance and his attitudes their elastic vigor, until the last of the after-meetings. The public never catch a suggestion of physical or spiritual declension. Studied as a preacher, Mr. Aitken is an example no earnest student can afford to neglect.

His preaching is penetrated with a wide range of outlying learning; scientific, classical and literary suggestion are everywhere in solution. There is rapidity without haste, and climatic development without visible or sensible effort. The logic is clear, swift and above board, for he presumes on no man's ignorance or credulity. There is, also, a spontaneous undercurrent of exegesis which here and there floods a word or a clause or a verse with sudden and wonderful radiance. And yet the man of scholarship and the hard-handed laborer listen with equal and parallel edification—not on the same plane, it is true, but the degree and quality of the edification may be very much the same.

Few preachers dwell upon the larger truths and mysteries of religion without immediate betrayal or feebleness or inadequacy of grasp. Mr. Aitken dwells upon the duration and significance of eternity, the unspeakable gift of everlasting life, of immortality, of redemption, the ineffable mercy of the Cross, the exceeding sinfulness of sin, until the mind approaches an overwhelming conception of these outlying verities of the spiritual life and world. During this mission he will have preached and lectured—and a lecture and a sermon are much alike with him—more than forty times, that is between November 29 and December 13, and there is no reason to anticipate any declination in the vigor and impressiveness of his work.

It may be well said, in this connection, however, that great missioners are workers in a severely limited field—that their opportunities are so narrowed as to narrow and deepen the channel of their preaching which thereby gains intensity and penetrative force. Besides a small field may illustrate the superiority of high gardening or high farming over the desultory tillage of a wider range. It's not unlike the results of conservatory culture; while yet the staples of our social and religious life must depend on the open air and the vicissitudes of the seasons. Such work as Mr. Aitken's and his brother missionaries is special, and supplemental to liturgical ministrations in parish life. They build up by timely and the most salutary reinforcement. Above all, they constitute the aggressive element which seeks conversions, and carries the war well over into hostile territory. Each mission for the most part repeats itself, and the missionary fills his brief yet intense cycles of duty, one after another, with a concentrated, convergent round of labors all pointing to a strongly localized result.

The "after meeting" has abundantly tested the health and integrity of this work. Here the gifted preacher might naturally enough fall short; for it's only a short step to rant and the offensive extravagance of the incendiary. But Mr. Aitken is very strong at the heart, as well as at the head. His great urgency of appeal, one minute to his flock and the next to his Lord, stirs many hearts that have long been sluggish and untried in the Church fellowship itself.

The Church of St. Mary the Virgin is a quiet, somewhat out-of-the-way little church, built for the Liturgy "use" of Salisbury and the theological cultus of that "use." It calls to mind the frontispiece in the "Directorium Anglicanum." This is its first mission. The parish clergy have, without reserve, handed over the spiritualities of the parish for the time being to the Rev. George C. Betts, of St. Louis, and the Rev. Edward A. Larrabee, of Chicago, while acting in conjunction with, and under the direction of the missionaries. There is perfect congruity among them. No shocks or surprises will break or mar the spiritual struggle now going on. Days and hours are crowded to the full. Daily, there are four celebrations; at 6:30; at 7:30, followed by a short instruction; at 8:30, and at 9:30, followed by a meditation; Evening Prayer at 4 P.M., with sermon, and at 8 the mission sermon—the central point of present interest. On Sundays, the leading features are preserved adding a children's celebration and sermon at nine A.M., and a children's service at half-past two P.M.

For hardly eight hours out of the twenty-four is there pause; only an occasional lull in the work, and these chinks and corners of spare minutes are much taken up with the indirect and out-of-sight labors of the mission.

The missionaries assume a stated part of the public ministrations, Mr. Betts giving the "meditation" in the morning, daily; an address to women on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and to men on the other days, at 3 P.M.; and also preaching the mission sermons at 8 o'clock. Mr. Larrabee gives the morning instruction, preaches at 4 P.M., and immediately before the mission service and sermon answers inquiries and questions of a religious, practical character which have been dropped in a box for their reception at the door.

The parochial clergy in cassocks and beretas are at hand to welcome strangers, impart information, distribute mission tracts and manuals of worship, representing a hospitality which would be the making of almost any church, anywhere. At other times they are found helping the missionaries in the numerous personal ministrations growing out of a thoroughly worked mission. The instruction, it should be borne in mind, is clearly and sharply doctrinal teaching concerning the sacraments and Creed, reduced to its simplest and most luminous form, while the meditation is quite as decidedly practical in substance, and directed to reach the emotional and subjective experience of the people. Nothing can be simpler, more direct, or less liturgic than a mission service and sermon. Here a large congregation, most of them strangers, are waiting in devout silence. Mr. Betts enters the chancel, a number of requests for intercessory prayer are read, and the people are hidden to labor with the missionary in supplication, which continues for a few minutes of silence, closed by a collect. Then a familiar "Revised Hymn," is sung heartily with an organ accompaniment, when, kneeling, he offers a short, stirring prayer, reciting in conclusion, Veni Creator Spiritus—Come Holy Ghost our souls inspire—in which the people join. Then another people's hymn, "I need Thee every hour," is sung with stirring fervor, after which the preacher enters the pulpit, and after the Invocation, gives out his text. He grasps again and again the congregation with his searching glances, as he slowly, and with almost judicial solemnity, announces his text—"It is appointed unto men once to die, but after that the judgment."

There is deliberation, not for thought or word, but of crisis and eagerness and solicitude. It almost approached dryness and literalness at first. Not a breath or word was given away to rhetoric or conscious oratory. The missionary was "sent," and the visible burden of his message was on his lips and his heart. An orderly, face-to-face meditation on death held the people in profound attention; familiar scenes of domestic bereavement suddenly grew afresh in many hearts. The sermon gained in volume and vehemence momentarily, yet without loss of penetrative energy. The tremendous realities of these "last things" seemed projected upon the immediate present, while pungent and impassioned appeals to sinful, evil-living souls, as well as to spiritual loiterers, and deserters from Christ's fold and flock, brought the discourse to a ripe climacteric, when the preacher paused, and remained kneeling in prayer, while the people sang, "Rock of Ages Cleft for Me." Resuming his discourse, the speaker developed the mediæval theology of the intermediate state in its practical bearings—the charity and efficacy of prayers and eucharistic celebrations for the departed in the Lord, all in a spirit of most resolute faith—not as a theological situation, but as a revealed disclosure of the great hidden life, concluding with an unfolding of the general judgment in its relations to each individual life, with a vehemence that seemed to sweep through the congregation almost oppressively. After a brief prayer, partly extempore, and another hymn, the preacher laid aside his surplice and opened what is called the after meeting, in which he clenches the nail driven home by the sermon. He moves freely up and down the aisle among the people, discussing informally the great spiritual crisis in our lives, the emergency of responsibilities, the sacramental mediation of the Church, waiting to forgive, absolve, and bless in the Master's name and place, elucidating the doctrine of priestly abolition, and the efficacy and wholeness of confession, with its contrition and absolution—anticipating and answering cavils and objections until the mission work, for that day seemed fully ripe. With much tenderness inviting those troubled in conscience to avail themselves of the personal ministry of any of the clergy, the people were dismissed and sent away.

The clergy move in a friendly way among the people as they separate; counsel is offered, encouragement given, and kind, helpful words abound.

The Church of the Redeemer, Eighty-second Street and Park Avenue, Rev. Dr. Shackelford, rector, occupies a small but interiorly attractive edifice, and here a first mission is in progress. Again there is a pair of missionaries, the Reverends C. C. Grafton of Boston, and O. S. Prescott of the Diocese of Wisconsin. Here early English preaching goes with early English Liturgy; and here, as at St. Mary the Virgin, the missionaries assume and prearrange shares of the work, and command the cooperation of the rector at their pleasure. In both these churches, the mission keeps in parallel lines with the sacramental and ecclesiastical system of the Church as Anglican "Catholics" apprehend it. Appeals to emotional and subjective experiences are altogether secondary and occasional.

Here is outlined an exacting and comprehensive line of ministrations. There are celebrations at 7 and 7:45, with an intervening meditation, an instruction on the Christian life, at 4 P.M.; a children's service and address at 5 P.M. Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays; an office of praise at 7:30; a preparatory address at 7:50; and the mission sermon (except Saturdays) at 8 o'clock. On Sundays there is an additional celebration at 11, with a mission sermon.

Father Grafton, for so he is commonly spoken, is the chief speaker, and gives all the mission sermons. These sermons present a remarkable series and sequence of teachings, all sharply converging upon this mission in this church—and here lies one of the secrets of efficiency in mission work. These clergymen, one and all, begin upon a thoroughly elaborate plan of battle, for such it is held to be, against the spiritual foes of the flock. There are no blank cartridges; no stretches of fancy or diversions, rhetorical or declamatory. The mission means consecutive, hard, unremitting work, and a minute cannot be wasted from its immediate furtherance. So there is a noticeable absence of merely edifying, entertaining preaching.

The Church of the Reconciliation, the Rev. Newton Perkins, rector, has its house of worship in East Thirty-first Street, near the Second Avenue, in a quarter of the city where it meets the spiritual wants of a plain, industrious class of people. The edifice is a substantial building, unpretending in appearance, and attached to it is a parish house, that greatly facilitates the charitable activities of the congregation. One use to which this latter building is put is to afford room for a Day Nursery, which accommodates a large number of children, the admissions for October being eleven hundred. The applications are increasing so rapidly, and the space is so limited, that it is hoped that means will soon be obtained to rent a small house in addition in which to carry on the work that is practically one of the best helps to the industrial poor.

On All Saints' Day a beautiful marble font was placed in the Church, a gift from Miss Pulling in memory of her father, the late Mr. A. C. Pulling, who for many years was warmly interested in this parish, and contributed liberally to the support of its work. The font is of dove colored marble, quarried in Vermont, and made by Geissler. The bowl is octagonal, supported on a round polished column with ornamental base and capital, and around the bowl is the legend, "One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism."

This parish was early enlisted in securing the benefits of the Advent Mission, engaging the Rev. Campbell Fair, D.D., of Baltimore, to be missionary, and preparing for the work by much vigorous effort. The result has been highly gratifying, and Dr. Fair has adapted himself remarkably well to the wants of this field. His addresses were marked by great simplicity and plainness, only familiar terms being used, and every point was warmly urged with directness. Using no notes he spoke fluently without rapidity.

As an instance of his manner of popular instruction: On Friday evening, December 4, a congregation well filling the house of worship was addressed by him from the text, Acts II, 37. The whole passage in connection was read, relating the effects of St. Peter's sermon. It is remarkable, he began, that people, who at the commencement of the hour were mockers, were at the close penitent and believing people, ready to be baptized, and were baptized at the hands of the very men whom they had just reviled. First, then, the change was sudden. If at that time such a sudden change was made, why not now! The change can be just as sudden and as real now as then. Secondly, it was an expressive change. By this I mean, that as soon as the feeling came they expressed it in words, spoke out as they felt. This Dr. Fair made the basis for urging confidential relations between pastor and people, who should open their minds freely to their spiritual guide, tell him their sorrows and difficulties and seek his advice and prayerful help. He showed that to express feelings in words is to deepen the impression and render more definite and firm the resolutions and convictions which are formed. Again, thirdly, this change was practical and permanent. "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" these convicted persons asked. They were baptized, became Communicants, gave of their property to support the Church. Things went on with them as with us, the Sacraments were observed, the ordinances administered, the worship was carried on, and the work of the Church was taken up. This is always the Scriptural mode which is set before us. In Holy Scripture there is no instance given of a person being saved who has lived and remained entirely outside the Church, and has partaken in no way of its Sacramental privileges. That this change, which is recorded in the book of the Acts, was permanent is evident from the fact that these newly believing and baptized people continued in the doctrine and fellowship of the apostles, just as now regularly received Christian people go on in a Christian life.

Personal appeal was then made in a direct and affectionate manner, after which the missionary offered an extemporized prayer. At the "after-meeting," to which most of the congregation remained, the prayers offered were interesting, presenting subjects mentioned in requests which had been sent in. There were many requests, for were thus remembered in special prayers, for one in sorrow, for one desiring more Christian light, for an interperate person, for certain persons using profane language, for one accused of wrong doing, for a family desiring a better ordered Christian home, and for others. A separate prayer was offered for each request, the congregation continuing in a kneeling position during all this after-meeting.

ENGLAND.

ENGLISH CHURCH ENDOWMENTS.—In these days, when disestablishment and disendowment is so prominent a factor in English politics, it is pleasant to learn that at least an attempt has been made to give the public an idea of the truth as to the English Church endowments. It is a very common occurrence to hear it said that the English Church was endowed by the State, or that the State supports it. A list has recently been published which gives some idea of the proportion of private endowments of religious houses compared with royal gifts. It must be remembered also that the royal gifts were generally merely restored gifts from lapsed religious donations. The footing-up reads curiously. From the reign of William I. to that of Henry VIII, previous to his plunder of the religious houses, the private endowments were 1,162, and the royal gifts were 62.

The parish churches arose after the sacking of monastic churches by the Danes, though, of the Conquest, there were one hundred well-endowed abbays. In the "Domesday Survey" of 1083, there are mentioned 1,700 churches and chapels, and 995 priests. But none of these were ever given by the State.

DEPARTURE OF BISHOP SELWYN.—On Wednesday, November 11, a service was held in Lichfield Cathedral for the purpose of taking leave of Bishop John Richardson Selwyn, on his return to his diocese of Melanesia. The bishop has been in England during the past six months, much engaged in active Church work, particularly on behalf of missions. He has received the distinction of Doctor in Divinity from his university, in recognition of his zeal and services as a missionary bishop. He has married a lady of New South Wales, and returns as a married man to the scene of his labors. There was a large congregation present at the services, in which the Bishop of Lichfield and the dean took part. After a shortened service, Bishop MacLagan addressed Bishop Selwyn in earnest words, to which the latter made a touching reply.

RESTORATION OF A PRIVILEGE.—It is stated that the Archbishop of Canterbury has resolved to restore to the clergy of his diocese the privilege of electing their rural deans.

GERMANY.

A GENERAL GATHERING.—At the consecration of the English Church at Leipzig, on Sunday, November 1, the congregation of five or six hundred who crowded the church included not only different nationalities, but different confessions. Ministers of nearly every denomination in Leipzig were present, including fourteen Lutherans, the Archimandrite of the Greek church, and the Chief Rabbi of the Jewish synagogue. The Roman Catholic clergy would not have been wanting from the list, had not their duties in their own church prevented their attendance. The civil institutions of the city, and the University and Royal Conservatorium of Music, were officially represented.

INDIA.

HINDU CONCEPTION OF GOD.—The Indian Witness says that a curious point was made by a missionary preaching at a meeting in Beadon Square, London, on Sunday, November 15. He said that we have become so accustomed to bear Hindus, whether conservative idolaters or not, speak of the Supreme Being as the perfection of holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, that we forget that the conception of God has been adopted by them from Christianity. No such god is found in the Hindu pantheon. The Supreme Being of orthodox Hinduism is nirguna, that is, destitute of every attribute and faculty, being, in fact, nothing but breath. As it is well known, all their inferior gods are hideous and malevolent demons.

ALBANY.

SARATOGA SPRINGS.—Bethesda Church.—The rector of this parish (the Rev. Dr. Joseph Carey) entered on the thirteenth year of his rectorship on Advent Sunday. During the past year there have been fifty six baptisms, thirty two confirmations, nineteen marriages, and fifty-six burials. There have been celebrations of the Holy Communion, public and private, 73; public services, 446, and pastoral calls, 1,700. During the twelve years there have been 768 baptisms, 598 confirmations, 105 marriages, 304 burials, 506 celebrations of the Holy Communion, 4,367 public services and 16,309 pastoral calls.

In the afternoon of the same day the Sunday-school of the parish held its anniversary exercises. The attendance was large and the exercises were interesting. After a brief service the rector made a few remarks with regard to Advent, and extended a hearty greeting to all. He then made a report of the Home of the Good Shepherd. Number of meals served at the Home during the year, 16,309; given at the door, 2,545; quarts of soup given out last winter, 438; garments given to the needy, 525. He thanked the lady managers, the trustees, and all those contributing. The Mission School reported: Whole number in attendance during the year, 161; average attendance, 70; regular teachers, 10; temporary, 8; library, 225 volumes. The Treasurer reported: Balance at beginning of year, $13.56; collections, $71.33; total, $84.89; disbursements, $62.55; balance, $22.34. Value of property, $10,000.

The main school reported: Teachers, 40; officers, 9; scholars, 540; average attendance of teachers, 29; officers, 7; scholars, 192. The library contains 748 volumes. Twenty scholars were confirmed during the year. The Treasurer reported, total amount received, $1,020.14; disbursed, $900.65; balance, $119.46.

The rector presented a handsome card to each of the regular attendants.

BALSTON SPA.—Christ Church.—The work of repairing, altering, and improving the chapel and Sunday-school building of this parish (the Rev. Charles Pelletreau, rector), has just been completed under the supervision of the rector. The edifice, which is a substantial brick structure, was formerly a State armory, and was purchased by the vestry twelve years ago for $6,000. The corner-lot on which it is situated is almost opposite the church, and was considered a very valuable acquisition to the parish property; but the building was poorly arranged in its internal appointments for the purpose to which it was put. Some of the present changes are very radical. The introduction of a broad and handsome staircase in ash, leading from the first floor into the chapel room above, tinted cathedral glass in all the windows, a new floor in hard wood, the decoration of ceiling and side walls in neutral tints, a new robing-room, a rich chancel carpet, and handsome gas-fixtures are some of the more noticeable features in the chapel. The room is warmed by a hot-air furnace from below. The parish school has been thoroughly renovated, and the work-room or kitchen provided with the necessary equipments for parish work and social entertainments. The outside of the building has been neatly painted. A pretty gable, capped with a gilded cross and iron cresting has taken the place of an armorial decoration. The completed work is very satisfactory in all its details. In response to an appeal from the rector funds sufficient to cover all expenses were subscribed, and all bills were promptly paid. On the evening of Tuesday, November 10, the rector held an informal reception in the chapel for the parishioners and other friends, who expressed their appreciation of the many improvements.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK.—Church of the Holy Communion.—The mission which was begun on Nov. 28, and is in progress in this parish (the Rev. Henry Mottet, rector) is under the care of the Rev. Dr. Frederick Courtney of Boston. The parish has been preparing by much especial work and prayer for this season of grace, and the evident interest which at once was manifest is a grateful sign that the field is a fruitful one. The congregations of Sunday were overflowing. Again on Monday evening, Nov. 30, long before the hour for the service to begin, the congregation assembled, filling the Church and gallery, and the seats in the aisles. Some who came were aged people, and a few were clergy and devout life of eminence, but most were evidently of the middle ranks of life, clerks, porters, young women from stores and factories, mechanics, and others of the working classes. The crowded assembly had a great many men in it. The bearing of all was quiet and reverent in a marked degree.

The service began with a hymn, a copy of "Gospel Hymns," prepared under the sanction of the assistant-bishop, having been handed to each person on entering. Then appropriate prayers from the Prayer Book were offered, followed by Hymn 104, sung by the choir (not surpliced) standing, and the people, by request of Dr. Courtney, sitting. This hymn, not one of praise, beginning, "Oh, turn ye, Oh, turn ye, for why will ye die?" as read, and as thus sung was very impressive and touching. Many were evidently affected by it.

The Rev. Dr. Courtney, occupying the pulpit, then said: I am not going to take a text to-night, but I am going to ask a few plain questions and give a few plain answers. The first question is one which many are asking, Does it really matter if I commit sin? Their reply is that it doesn't matter, and the reason they give is that they are lost in the crowd. A man may indeed be well lost in the crowd in a great city like this, but it is a mistake for you to think that you are lost in the crowd so far as God is concerned. God's discriminative eye does keep every individual person separate from every other on the face of the globe. The speaker aptly illustrated this by citing the example of Cain, and more fully by the story of Achan's sin. He continued: But you may say I am not Achan, yet remember that God singles you out by conscience. The lot is not needed, conscience brings the sin into view. So it does matter whether you commit sin.

My second question, he went on, is, What does it matter? Let me define sin. Sin is doing what one knows or believes to be wrong. You were not born to be a sinner; you were made to be good. You have a feeling that you ought to be good. If, then, I ask, What does it matter if I commit sin? my reply must be, It makes me a sinner. And that is a great matter. Punishment comes with that, great suffering and trouble are upon the sinner. I know how men find fault with God because of His punishment of sin, but it would be a cruel wrong for Him not to punish. In reality the sin brings its own punishment. Every sin I commit deadens my sense of the particular virtue against which I sin. I put before you the virtue of truth. In a crowd of people, not one of whom may in practice care whether they themselves are truthful or false, if a little child stands forth with blanched cheek, fearful lest it tell not the truth, every one in that crowd will revere the majesty of truth. I put before you the beauty of the virtue of sobriety. The preacher drew a picture of the decay of this sense through the sin of drunkenness. I put before you the beauty of the virtue of chastity. Here he rose to impassioned and fervid eloquence, using very carefully chosen words and beautiful figures, and weaving in very tender allusions to home and family, to wife and mother, and sweetheart and sister. His pathetic tones, and portrayal of the fall of men, as well as women, from purity into sensualism by sin against chastity, profoundly moved every hearer.

I put before you, he continued, the beauty of pure kindness. There is a great beauty in this, and it is not so common as some think. Men sin against it until they make themselves intensely cruel and fiend-like. I ask you to look at the beauty of forbearance. When one sins against forbearance by indulging the sin of resentment, he comes at length to be implacable. You cannot get such a one to forego his rights under any circumstances.

Similarly he illustrated transgressions against love, humility, and the virtue of bountifulness. Then, coming back to the question What does it matter if I sin? his answer was, It makes me an enemy of God. What, makes God my enemy? No, I didn't say that; I said It makes you an enemy of God. Your sin doesn't alter God, but it does alter you. And when your sin has gone on you won't make a full confession. You are ready with excuses, and say that there were extenuating circumstances, and claim that you were in the hands of so many companions.

It matters, again, if I sin, because it helps drag other people down. No one lives alone. His life touches others, what he does affects them for good or evil. Oh, the writhing agony of a man dying and remembering in that hour those whom he taught to sin, who were young and innocent until he corrupted them.

It matters if I sin because it helps to make an evil place. There are spots in this city that are evil. As you go along parts of the city you pass streets, and houses, and quarters that are evil. Men's sins have made them so. It was sin made Solomon an abomination.

In conclusion, the reverend speaker drew a graphic picture of Jesus in the hour of His trial and crucifixion, the pure and good One in a world of sin, and made a very pathetic appeal as he thus held up to view the Lamb of God as the hope of the sinner.

The prayer that followed was in part from the Litany and in part extemporized, followed by a few impressive moments of silent prayer by the hushed and solemn congregation. During the singing of the closing hymn opportunity was given to those who did not wish to remain to the after meeting to retire, but nearly all remained.

At this after meeting Dr. Courtney spoke informally, urging in a very simple way two points: That Satan tries to persuade men that sin is nothing in reality, and then when they have been led on by him to commit sin, he tries to persuade them that God is implacable and will not possibly forgive.

Invitation was now given to any who wished further help and counsel, to stay until the rest of the congregation had dispersed and come to the clergy in the vestry or sit in the seats and the clergy would come to them. A considerable number waited for this opportunity to have spiritual direction.

The moment you look at society you discern that it may be divided into two classes: The self-helpful, those competent to care for themselves; and the helpless.

EPISCOPAL VISITATION.—The assistant-bishop of the diocese held a service on Tuesday, November 24, at 3 P. M., the rector and his assistant reading a short special service, and the bishop delivering a very felicitous address, in which he said:

What has human wisdom, apart from the religion of the New Testament, to say to the atter of these! In effect this: "Accept your fate, and acquiesce in it. The law of life is the survival of the fittest."

Over against such a philosophy stands the figure of Christ. He "took little children into His arms." He commissioned men to teach, "Bear ye one another's burdens," and "Ye that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak."

It is this that explains our presence here today. Of all helpless ones the most so are (a) the aged, (b) the babes.

But how shall we care for them?

The moment that the gospel enters the world it calls woman up from her inferiority, her almost serfdom, and gives her ministry.

Read the salutations at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, see how St. Paul speaks of Phoebe of Cenebra. For the first time in the history of the race woman is called to take her place of service in the kingdom of God. Thus here, on one hand is the Home for the Aged, on the other for infants, and hiding the two together in the links of a loving ministry is the Sisters' House.

My brethren, we talk of a living Church. What is a living Church? Not stately structures, not splendid services, not eloquent preaching, not emotional feeling, but service, loving, unselfish, and out-reaching. In such a service this Church has from the beginning been rich. May God make it, more and more, a power for good! But if this is to be, our relation to it who are here to-day must be something more than congratulating.

There is a place for each of us, if we will seek it. One may pray and another may give and a third may help in other and more active ways. But the true "God speed" is one that turns the prayer of the lips into the service of the hands and feet and purse. Be it ours to render it in the Master's strength and for the Master's sake.

The assistant bishop afterwards reopened the Sisters' House and the Home for Aged Women, which had been closed for several months and thoroughly renovated, and also dedicated the Babies' Shelter, No. 118 West 21st Street, all under the care of Sister Eliza.

A darker, drier day could hardly be imagined; but the great interest always manifested on such occasions was not wanting on this. The face of the sister in charge was sunshine in itself, and the presence of former parishioners who came long distances to attend the services, contributed to make it one of the most enjoyable and happy events in the annals of the church. The dreary outside world was forgotten as the visitors passed from the church, so filled with hallowed memories of the many saints who have gone from it to their rest in Paradise, into the Sisters' House, with its bright and pleasant rooms for the children of the Training School, who are at present to find a home there.

Next in order came the "Home for Aged of the Parish," a retreat for all who, having no one else to care for them in old age, have come to their mother—the Church—and have not been disappointed. Everything has been done to make their last days as comfortable as possible, and many of them enjoy a rest now that never would have been theirs but for the self-denying labors of loving Christian men and women. One old lady once said to me, "I was the first one here, and Dr. Lawrence took me right up in his arms and carried me in."

Then came the dedication of the Babies' Shelter—a house purchased and fitted up during the past summer as a memorial to its founder, Dr. Lawrence. If the knowledge of what has been accomplished in loving memory of all that he was while here to high and low, rich and poor, alike, can reach him where he is, then must new joys await him, because faithful and earnest workers are ever carrying forward the plans so near to his heart in this life.

Over three of the endowed beds are brass tablets to the memory of Miss Plucknett, Miss Draper, and Miss Robbins, all lovers of the little ones when living, and gratefully remembered when dead.

There is a thought from the Gospel for the Twenty-fifth Sunday after Easter that we may well find a place here: "There is a lad here which hath five barley loaves and two small fishes, but what are they among so many?" In a city where there is such great and constant demand for assistance for the distressed, one is tempted to say: "What is the use of the little we can do! It cannot make much impression on the masses, and we may as well fold our hands." Not so. What is done may seem as small in proportion to the work to be done as the five loaves and two fishes were to the multitude to be fed; but "the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon Him," and may make the result of the smallest endeavor, done in the right spirit, exceed all expectations.

May this blessing, so earnestly implored by all present for these charities, so "plentifully bring forth the fruit of good works," that men shall be compelled to say, as they said when they saw the miracle of the loaves and fishes: "This is of a truth that Prophet that should come into the world," and thus "the name of our Lord Jesus Christ be glorified."

NEW YORK — St. Philip's Church.—The mission services in this church, six in number daily, were conducted by the Rev. A. S. Craspey, rector of St. Andrew's, Rochester, and were remarkably successful. The sermons in the evening, lasting one hour and forty minutes, were listened to with utmost eagerness, and all the services were well attended. The vestry have determined to keep the church open daily, and to have a weekly celebration of the Holy Communion. They have elected the Rev. Mr. Bishop of South Carolina to the rectorship.

NEW YORK — Trinity Church.—The mission services in this church, which are held daily at 12:15 P. M. for men only, are probably the most successful work of the Advent Mission in this city. They are conducted by the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, in addition to his other mission work, and consist of a series of discourses on the subject "Is Life Worth Living?" The church is filled on each occasion with business men, who take the forty-five minutes from their business and work to attend the services. These are very simple, consisting of a few collects and hymns, and followed by the missionary's address. The congregation comes almost entirely from Wall Street and the neighboring streets, and the constant attendance and the marked interest shown, indicates that the mission is doing a good work.

NEW YORK — St. Mark's Chapel.—The scenes at St. Mark's chapel, on Tompkins Square, every night during the week, were sometimes as many as fourteen hundred children have assembled at a time, vividly suggest the gathering of the young at Cologne and St. Denis in the middle ages for the purpose of forming an army for the conquest of the Holy Land. The waving of banners and the volume of so many voices in the singing combine to render the occasion an unusual one, although the principal attraction is the preaching by the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton, of Philadelphia, who is known the world over as the patriarch and prince of all preachers to the young—a work in which he has been assisted by his son, the Rev. W. W. Newton, who has achieved almost equal fame in this direction.

The work at this chapel has probably filled the measure of expectation more completely than any other in connection with the Advent Mission. The crowds of old as well as young at all the services have been so great that overflow meetings have always been held, oftentimes in as many as two places, and the attendance of the police has been necessary to prevent noise and overcrowding. The location of the chapel is one peculiarly suited to such work, it being one of the most densely populated in the world. The chapel, which has recently been erected by Rutherford Stuyvesant at a cost of nearly $200,000, is constructed with special reference to work for the young. It is a part of St. Mark's Parish, of which the Rev. Dr. J. H. Rylance is rector, and the minister in charge, the Rev. J. E. Johnson, is called "the theatre preacher," on account of his having held religious meetings for years in Philadelphia and elsewhere for non-churchgoers in theatres and public halls. So that all the means at this mission seem to have been suited to the requirements of the undertaking.

The Rev. Dr. Newton is now nearly ninety years old, but is as ruddy and vigorous as ever. His innumerable volumes of sermons to children have been translated into thirty languages. He is still editor of the Sunday school paper issued by the American Sunday School Union, the chief publication of the sort in the world. His "Life of Christ for the Young" is the only production of the kind extant. His appearance in the pulpit, with his long white locks, crowned by a velvet skull cap, is magnificent and patriarchal in the extreme. When he stands erect, surrounded by a dense throng of children, who sit all over the chancel floor and steps, it is equal to a Bible picture—a tableau out of Oriental life.

The Rev. William W. Newton, who has usually conducted one of the overflow meetings, nearly sustains his father's reputation as a preacher to the young. He is best known, however, as an author and poet, and enjoys an English reputation even greater than that at home. He is the originator and manager of the "Congress of Churches" which was held last year at Hartford, Conn., and which promises so much for the promotion of Christian union and charity. Altogether, the Advent Mission to children on the East Side, at St. Mark's chapel, has been unique in the history of work for the young. Many older people have profited by it, and it will be remembered a long time in that neighborhood.

NEW YORK — Bellerose Hospital.—On the afternoon of Advent Sunday, the assistant-bishop visited the hospital, and preached from the gospel of the day, after which he confirmed twenty-seven of the hospital patients. The chaplain (the Rev. M. E. Willing) and the Rev. C. T. Woodruff, superintendent of the city missions, took part in the service. These services are thought to have been the most impressive ever held in the hospital. The confirmation of the thirteen sick and crippled persons in the chapel awakened the sympathy of all, and when the assistant-bishop proceeded through the wards of the hospital to confirm the fourteen sick and dying ones in bed, this feeling was intensified. The assistant-bishop made appropriate prayers at the bed of each, and the sight of so much suffering humanity touched the hearts of all.

HIGHLAND — Holy Trinity Church.—The assistant-bishop visited this church (the Rev. Henry Tarrant, rector), and confirmed seventeen persons presented by the rector, and one presented by the warden of St. Stephen's College, the Rev. Dr. R. B. Fairhair. In five weeks the rector has baptized twenty-six persons, thirteen being adults.

CLINTONDALE — Consecration of the Church of the Holy Cross.—Among the many missionary efforts of the Rev. J. H. Johnson, formerly rector of Holy Trinity, Highland, was the building of a church at Clintondale, a village about seven miles southeast of Highland. At the time of his resignation he had succeeded in putting up the shell of a handsome frame building, but unfortunately had to leave it in that state. None of his successors remained long enough to complete the work. In the spring of the present year, the Rev. Henry Tarrant became rector at Highland, and affairs took a more hopeful turn. The parish at Highland regained its former strength and influence, and the work at Clintondale was taken up with renewed vigor. Mr. Tarrant took the work in hand and raised about $800. There is still needed $100 more to pay the last bill; this Mr. Tarrant took upon himself to raise on the day of the consecration, so that the church might be declared free of debt. It is hoped that the rector may soon be relieved of this obligation. Gifts of furniture, etc., were made by various parishes, and much self-denying labor on the part of minister and people has been bestowed on the work.

On Saturday, November 25, the church was consecrated by the assistant-bishop. The service began at 11:30 a. m. The instrument of donation was received by the assistant-bishop, and the sentence of consecration read by the Rev. H. L. Ziegenfuss. Morning Prayer was said by the rector and the Rev. Messrs. J. W. Buckmaster and H. L. Ziegenfuss. The sermon was preached by the assistant-bishop. The music was rendered by the choir of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Highland. After the service the clergy and visitors were entertained by the ladies of both parishes, at the home of Mrs. D. R. Heshbrook.

The Church of the Holy Cross, Clintondale, is the only church between Milton on the east and Ellenville on the west, nearly forty miles, and between Walden on the south and Rosendale on the north, more than thirty miles. From it as a centre an energetic missionary can reach with occasional services at least six, if not more, places. The Rev. Henry Tarrant, rector of the Holy Trinity, Highland, would be glad to receive at once two things, (1) one hundred dollars, to pay off the last bill due on the church; (2) one thousand dollars, in his own hands, or that of the assistant-bishop, to pay the salary of a missionary for one year. If the funds are provided, a good missionary is ready. It is to be sincerely hoped that the good work so auspiciously begun will not languish for want of means.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN — Church of the Incarnation.—The rector of this parish (the Rev. James W. Sparks) began, on November 29, a course of lectures on Christian belief. The subject of the first lecture was "The Future Life," a theme which he treated with a good deal of fullness, tracing the history of the sentiment found in various forms of religion, and showing the distinction between the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body.

BROOKLYN — Church of the Messiah.—On the evening of Sunday, November 29, at this church (the Rev. Charles R. Baker, rector), the fifth in a series of lectures on topics of popular interest was delivered by the Rev. A. Mackay Smith. His subject was "Civil Service Reform in Relation to the Law of Righteousness." This he divided into three parts: "What is Civil Service? How shall it be reformed? How does that reform touch the moral and religious life of the nation?" The lecture on the surface, he said, would be entirely secular, but there was a religious significance which lay under the topic, and this he trusted his hearers would not fail to see. Thus introduced, the subject was handled with great clearness and force. The points made were these: Civil Service in a republic is eminently democratic and very necessary to the conservation of republicanism in institutions: First, because it tends to produce and reward those virtues which make men and nations great, by industry, perseverance, and merit.

Secondly, Because it justifies our common schools and dignifies them. Thirdly, Because it destroys the power of bosses, who are the curse of republics, as favorites are the curse of monarchies. Fourthly, Because it averts anxiety and distress from five hundred thousand people, the families of government employes, who every four years are liable to have their faithful service rewarded by removal. Fifthly, This reform tends to righteousness, because it tends to the good fame of free government, and all free government is God's blessing to the world. Sixthly, It tends to righteousness because the spoils system, which it opposes, corrupts honesty in the private affairs of the nation.

The reform, therefore, he claimed to be in very close relationship to the moral and religious life of the people, and to have a distinct effect for righteousness. It is in sympathy with the American idea of progress and advancement, and does not tend to create an official aristocracy any more than the regulations of the police and fire departments tend to create such a class because they provide for keeping a good man when he is once engaged.

BROOKLYN—St. Stephen's Church.—On Advent Sunday the Rev. Joseph Reynolds, Jr., entered upon his duties as rector of this parish, to which he was lately elected. Formerly assistant minister in St. Luke's parish, and more lately chaplain at the Church Charity Foundation, Mr. Reynolds comes to his new work with valuable experience. He succeeds the Rev. Thomas F. Cornell, who died last summer while rector. In his sermon, from Isaiah i. 18, Mr. Reynolds made tender reference to the earnest and successful work of the late rector, and the warm affection in which his memory is now held, and asked for himself the prayerful co-operation of the people now committed to his own charge.

St. Stephen's occupies a situation in the midst of a growing section, having promise of soon becoming well populated. There is a valuable site secured, but the edifice at present used is an insufficient frame building, that cannot fall soon to give way, with the advance of the parish, for a suitable and much larger house of worship.

BROOKLYN—Sheltering Arms Nursery.—The Annual Thanksgiving Reception of this institution was held on Friday, November 27. The rooms were well filled, both afternoon and evening, with interested guests who took opportunity to observe the excellent management and the delightful Christian work which is accomplished. They were entertained also by the children with recitation of the Catechism, the Gospel for the Sunday previous, and several songs and hymns.

The Nursery, which has nearly completed fifteen years since its inception, has had, during the past year, three hundred and sixty-five applications; has cared for one hundred and seventy; and admitted one hundred and seventy-three. There are now in the nursery seventy-three little children, the youngest not quite two months old. These, with the matron and nurses and servants, make a family of ninety. Worship is attended in a body at the Church of the Redeemer (the Rev. Charles R. Treat, rector).

At the beginning of the summer, the grounds attached to the home were put in thorough order, and in them, during the warm weather, the children had much out of door life. Nine excursions to Prospect Park, and to the sea-side, were provided the past season. The good effects of these trips, and of their open-air privileges upon the health of the little ones show how desirable is a fresh-air fund. The importance of having a farm-house or seaside home, to which the children may be taken in the summer heats, is also felt, and a subscription has been started for this object, a kind friend promising to give $500 when a certain sum shall have been raised.

With one exception, this is the only institution in Brooklyn that provides for children under three years of age.

BROOKLYN—Emmanuel Church.—The young people of this parish (the Rev. Dr. Henry B. Walbridge, rector), held a parlor entertainment on the evenings of Monday, November 30, and Tuesday, December 1. The exercises, which were rendered with much spirit, were enjoyed by a large gathering of persons belonging to the congregation, and others. The proceeds, amounting to a considerable sum, will be applied to aid in the payment of the indebtedness still remaining on the property of the parish.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Christ Church.—On the evening of Advent Sunday, November 29, the first of a series of missions, to be continued on successive Sunday evenings, was held in this church (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Darlington, rector). Three other parishes unite in these missions—Calvary (the Rev. C. L. Twing, rector), Grace (the Rev. Edwin Coan, rector), and St. Mark's (the Rev. Dr. S. M. Haakins, rector). All these clergy were present on this occasion, and, in addition, the Rev. Dr. Thomas Galland and the Rev. Messrs. J. B. Jennings, W. S. Rainford, and William Walsh of Newburgh. The church was crowded, many failing to gain entrance.

For a half hour, beginning at 7:30 o'clock, a service of song was conducted by the rector, who, with the other clergy and the choir, were without surplices. This service consisted of the singing of four hymns, after which the choir and clergy retired, respearing surplices and in procession. The sermon was by the Rev. W. S. Rainford, who, in an easy and conversational way, described the work of our Lord and of St. John the Baptist, St. Stephen, and St. Paul, whom he named as the first missionaries of the Church. After treating somewhat fully these historical references, he spoke with feeling of the need of personal religion, and pressed upon all the importance of a humble and faithful walk with God.

The other missionaries who will follow are the Rev. Messrs. J. Edgar Johnson, D. Parker Morgan, and Lindsay Parker.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—The American Church Missionary Society.—This organization held its Twenty-sixth Annual Meeting at the Church of the Epiphany on Monday, November 30, the Rev. Dr. W. F. Faddock presiding for most of the time. The report of the Executive Committee stated that this had been a memorable year in its history.

The yearly receipts from the Burr estate up to August 31 were reported to be $68,007.33, and the income from other sources as follows: For general work, $6,106.73; for special objects, $693.40; for foreign missions, $561.13; bond paid on account of Ely Professorship, Griswold College, Iowa, $7,000; balance from last year, $280.53; total, $82,658.12. The balance in the treasury on August 31 was stated to be $5,397.40. Of the legacies received as above, $18,000 from Miss Mary Burr's will and $25,000 from Miss Margaret Burr's will, were said to be for the general work of the Society, and $30,000 from the former's will, for missionary work in Nevada. The list of securities on hand were classified as follows: General funds, $37,400; for missionary work in Nevada, $30,000; for Ely Professorship, Griswold College, Ia., $21,225; for Anthony Professorship, Griswold College, $11,300; for Rhinecliff Missions, New York, $15,000; total, $105,025.

A touching reference was made to the death of the late Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng. The Rev. Dr. J. P. Tustin spoke of the importance of missionary work among the Spanish speaking people in Mexico, Cuba, South America, as well as within our own borders. The subject was referred to the Executive Committee with power to act.

A resolution was adopted looking towards a conference with the Evangelical Education and Evangelical Knowledge Societies for the purpose of securing the most efficient and economical management of the three organizations. The Hon. John W. Andrews was re-elected president.

PHILADELPHIA—The Theatre Services.—The services in the Arch Street Opera House were renewed on Sunday evening, November 30, when a large number of non-church goers were present. The music as during previous seasons was by the Weacoco Band. After a short service addresses were delivered by the Rev. Dr. C. G. Currie, and the Rev. Messrs. Frederick Palmer and S. D. McConnell.

PHILADELPHIA—Grace Church.—The Workmen's Club of this parish, (the Rev. Dr. R. F. Alsop, rector), which has now 100 members, opened their new club house at 1210 Cherry Street on Monday evening, November 30. Addresses were delivered by the rector and the Rev. Dr. Thomas L. Franklin. The exercises were interspersed with singing by the choir. The new club house is handsomely furnished, having reading, reception and other rooms. A goodly supply of papers and magazines is to be found in the reading room.

MARYLAND.

HAGERSTOWN—St. John's Church.—The bells of this church (the Rev. W. A. Mitchell, rector), have just been replaced by others, the peal now consisting of three, instead of the four originally given by Mr. C. C. Baldwin. Their joint weight is thirty-six hundred pounds. This parish now numbers about one hundred families, and about five hundred individuals, of whom two hundred are communicants; there are twenty Sunday-school teachers, and two hundred pupils. The total yearly contributions were $1,600, and the Communion alms $161.

The late service for mutes was interesting, not only to that class of the attendants, but to the congregation at large. The venerable Rev. Job Turner delivered the sermon—a mute himself, who travels from one part of the country to another seeking those who are afflicted in like manner. The services conducted by the rector were simultaneously interpreted by Mr. Turner, who seems to know by heart all the services of the Prayer Book, as well as many of the lessons.

VIRGINIA.

ALEXANDRIA—The Theological Seminary.—A visitor to this spot would be much pleased. The original seminary was placed in this city in 1823, but in 1827 the institution was removed to the crown of a hill about two and a half miles west of the city, two hundred and fifty feet above the level of the Potomac, whence its buildings are visible from Washington and other points within ten or fifteen miles distant. In 1854 a charter was obtained from the Legislature. Many commanding buildings rise to view, scattered here and there about the grounds and woods. The library building was built in 1855 with a legacy left by Mrs. Sophia Jones, of Virginia, and another gift, that of Mr. John Bohler, of Philadelphia. St. George's Hall was built in 1856 by a lady member of St. George's Church, New York. In this are some of the rooms of the students—rooms which, with others, afford comfort to the students, and are replete with historic associations. Aspinwall Hall was built in 1858 by the Messrs Wm. H. and John L. Aspinwall, of New York. Here are the Prayer Hall, lecture rooms and other rooms for the students. Meade Hall was built in 1860 by the gifts of Alumni a loving memorial to the late Bishop of Virginia of that name. Here are other rooms for students.

The Chapel, which is a beautiful structure, was erected in 1880, the site of a former one which had been destroyed during the late war, from funds contributed by the Alumni and other friends in different parts of the country. Wyman Hall was built in 1883, by the gifts of numerous friends, chief among whom was the late Samuel G. Wyman, Esq., of Baltimore, Md. It is a completely equipped and commodious gymnasium. A chapel for the colored people of the neighborhood was built in 1883 by the Alumni and others. Besides these are the residences of the professors in different portions of the tract. Within a few hundred yards is the Episcopal High School of Virginia. The seminary is reached from the city daily by conveyance. A post-office on the spot adds to the convenience of the students and others. The Bishop of Virginia is President of the Board of Trustees; the Board numbers sixteen clerical and lay members, and the Rev. James Grammer is Secretary.

The Faculty of the Seminary consists of the Rev. Dr. Joseph Packard, Meade Professor of Biblical Learning, and Librarian; the Rev. Dr. Cornelius Walker, Professor of Systematic Divinity and Homiletics; the Rev. Dr. J. J. McElhinney, Professor of Apologetics and Church Polity; the Rev. Dr. Kinloch Nelson, Professor of Ecclesiastical History, Pastoral Theology, and Canon Law and Mr. Henry Dixon (Harvard), Professor of Vocal Culture. This institution, which has in the sixty-five years of its existence had seven hundred and fifty-nine students, five hundred and seventy-one being graduates, and numbers among its Alumni nineteen bishops. There are at the present, thirty-seven students in attendance, nine of whom are in the preparatory department. Expenses here are light, being from $195 to $205 per year. The Education Society, of which Mr. C. F. Lee, of Alexandria, is Secretary, helps, as far as its funds allow, to defray the expenses of the needy student, and none are turned from the doors of the Seminary who seek admission and are properly commended.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

CINCINNATI—Church Work.—Church work in this city during the coming winter promises to be carried on with more than usual interest. The clergy seem to be wide awake and anxious to lead their congregations in every good work. A Pre-Advent Mission has just closed at Trinity church (the Rev. S. H. Boyer, rector), and other movements of similar character may follow. Certainly there never was greater need here than there is of all the energy and enthusiasm possible in Christian work on the part of earnest Churchmen.

MICHIGAN.

FLINT—Deaf-mute Service.—On Tuesday evening, December 1, the Rev. A. W. Mann officiated at the State School for Deaf-Mutes, baptizing one of the pupils.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

MUSKOGEE—Semi-Annual Conference.—The annual meeting of the Semi-Annual Conference of the diocese was held in St. Paul's church, Muskogee (the Rev. J. N. Rippey, rector), on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, November 17, 18, and 19. The bishop and a large number of the clergy were present. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Samuel Earp. Sermons were also delivered by the Rev. Messrs J. N. Rippey and E. O. Nock. A number of very interesting papers were read, and the discussions were animated and participated in by the bishop and the clergy present. The music was rendered by the vested choir of St. Mark's church, Grand Rapids, under the leadership of the Rev. F. A. De Rosset. During the session, at the request of the bishop, prayerful remembrance was had of the Missionary Celebration in Philadelphia, the Convention at Easton, and the bereaved diocese of Florida, with the family of the late Bishop Young. Members of the Woman's Auxiliary, from different parts of the diocese, were also present.

KALAMAZOO—Deaf-Mute Service.—The Rev. A. W. Mann conducted a service for deaf-mutes in St. Luke's church (the Rev. R. E. Jones, rector), on the afternoon of Sunday, November 29. In the evening a combined service was held, at which two deaf mutes were baptized.

CHICAGO.

CHICAGO—St. James's Church.—The Brotherhood of St. Andrew, an organization of the young men in this parish (the Rev. Dr. W. H. Vibbert, rector), held its second anniversary on the afternoon of Advent Sunday. The bishop of the diocese presided, and made an address full of words of encouragement, and heartily endorsing the movement. He was followed by the rector, who spoke in high terms of the good work the young men were doing. The Rev. L. S. Osborne urged the young men to turn away from infidel teaching and follow Christ. The Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke advised them to improve their present opportunity in working for their own souls.

The president, Mr. J. L. Houghstetter, presented the annual report. Among the things mentioned was the statement that forty young men had been confirmed, three hundred included at attend church, and all young men had been welcomed and provided with seats in the church. It is the intention of those interested to encourage the formation of similar societies in every parish in the diocese.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The Advent Mission.—It is impossible for us to give accounts of this very important work in all the twenty-one parishes which engaged in it. We have depicted the work in several parishes as being specially typical. The Mission was successful everywhere, among poor and rich alike. It is right and just that we should say that the missionaries of the American Church were not one whit behind their brethren from England, who came with long experience to engage in the mission. Bishop Tuttle and Bishop Elliott, for instance, at Calvary church, were met at their coming by a body of the parishioners, who had made thorough preparation, and were still ready to co-operate with them most heartily.

They held six services daily, making no use of the ordinary mission methods. They simply multiplied and intensified the Church's regular offices of preaching and of worship. The result was most satisfactory to the rector of the parish, who, from the beginning has been most earnest in forwarding the mission throughout the city. As the mission is still going on as we go to press, we have to give further and fuller accounts next week of the movement.

PERSONALS.

The Bishop of Jersey returned from Europe on Friday, November 6, after a six months' absence.

The Rev. Henry Lubec's address is Lyons, N. Y. (not Lyons, Pa.)

MARY M. BRADEN.

"Gone away" to the Paradise of God. On Monday night, Nov. 22, from Trinity Church Rectory, Littlefield Minnesota, MARY MARGARET BRADEN, only daughter of Mrs. Mary J. Braden, aged 15 years, 6 months, 19 days, entered into the restland (city of those "who sleep in the Lord Jesus"). In all my Christian ministry I have never seen up lot to witness such beautiful childlike trust, linked with such marvellous grasp of the verities of our most Holy Faith, as was shown at the death-bed of this dear "child of God." For three hours ere the final shadow fell, we held sweet communion about the communion table. And when the word came from her dying lips, "so dark, I cannot see you" the memory of her departed father's "I am not worthy to stand in the death's troubled stream. Calling her by her pet name, "Little Missy," I asked, "Are you going to rest in trouble, with halting speech, yet full of triumphant faith, come the answer, "I'm not afraid," "Little Missy's" daylight vanished, and her bright young spirit went away to God.

"Requiescat in pace."

Precious child of our love,

Thy our hearts are ever moved,

Yet we'll meet soon above.

It is not now a good by,

But it's only adieu.

For our life's end soon awaits,

Paradise is in view.

May thy bright, pure, young spirit,

No full of Christ's power,

At our life thro' his joy lead

And a stay in death's hour.

T. G. CRUMP.

APPEALS.

The development of the work committed to me demands a Clergy House and chapel in the City of Jackson, the railroad centre of the State, which shall be the home of an Associate Bishop. I have the site, elevated and picturesque, the gift of a former benefactor, on which stood the episcopal residence destroyed during the national troups during the war.

I appeal for help in our poverty for this purpose, also, for the development of the colored work, which will be begun, and for funds to educate two young men and more if we had the means, also for the fitting of one chapel and the holding of one or more ruled when used as a U. S. hospital during the siege of Vicksburg.

For any of these purposes, or for our general work, I appeal to our brethren, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ."

All offerings for Church work in the diocese of Mississippi should be sent to, and will be thankfully received and acknowledged by,

HUGH MILLER THOMPSON, Asst. Bishop, Oxford, Mississippi.

NASHOTAH MISSION.

It has not pleased the Lord to send Nashotah, The great and good work entrusted to her requires, as in times past, the offerings of His people.

Offerings are solicited: 1st. Because Nashotah is the oldest theological seminary in the north and west of the continent.

2d. Because the instruction is second to none in the land.

3d. Because it is the most healthfully situated seminary.

4th. Because it is the best located for study.

5th. Because everything given for it goes directly to the work of preparing candidates for ordination.

Address, WILLIAM ADAMS, D.D., Nashotah, Waukesha County, Wisconsin.

BUSINESS DIRECTORY.

BUY YOUR WRY GOODS IN NEW YORK.

In matters of ladies' fashions, New York is to-day the Paris of the United States, and many thousands of ladies living at a distance from the great metropolis avail themselves of its large and varied stocks of elegant materials, and are clothed in the latest and most approved styles, both as to cut and materials, and yet they rarely pay a visit to the city.

This is accomplished by ordering through the mails. While all mercantile houses will not take the trouble to send samples of their choice fabrics by mail, and rather discourage this branch of trade, yet some of the foremost of New York merchants make a specialty of it. Prominent among them is Le Boutillier Brothers, Broadway and Fourteenth Street, a house which was established in 1840. This house keeps a large force of experienced clerks whose sole duty it is to fill mail orders with care and promptness. Read their advertisement in another column.

SHOPPING FOR CHRISTMAS.

Those in search of goods suitable for presents should not fail to consult the advertising columns of this and late numbers of THE CHURCHMAN, overflowing with the announcements of leading firms, who offer all the attractions in their line which are looked for at this season. Want of space forbids our especial mention of any establishment in this issue. We are compelled to add six pages to the ordinary number to avoid curtailing of the usual amount of reading matter.

OFFERINGS FOR MEXICO.

Contributions in behalf of the work of the Church in Mexico are earnestly solicited, and may be forwarded to the treasurer of the League aiding that work, Miss M. A. STEWART BROWN, care of Brown Bros. & Co., 59 Wall street, New York.

WANTS.

Advertisements under Wants from persons not subscribers should not be accompanied by the endorsement of a subscriber.

NEW BOOKS.

THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS (Second Part). A JOURNAL OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA FROM 1847 TO 1862. By the late Charles C. F. Greville, Esq., Clerk of the Council. Edited by Henry George, Registrar of the Privy Council. 2 vols. [New York: D. Appleton & Company.] pp. 576-588, Price $4.00.

We have seen very varied criticisms upon this book. But this one might be said in its favor, that the greater part of it must be strictly true in one sense of the word. For the greater part of it is the actual appearance which the things told had to the writer, and set down at the very moment. A journal, like a file of newspapers, may be wonderfully incorrect in its details, but on the whole it gives an impression which is better, because more truthful than the most studied summary. Unless the writer is a mere gossip, or one of those unhappy journalists who see everything awry, the daily journal can hardly fail to make out something of interest, provided he is not writing for future effect. If there be added to this the chance of exceptional knowledge, if one stands at a centre of public interest, it is next to impossible to write a stupid book. As a rule history is read in the concentrated form only. In the unrolling, panoramic form a history in the making—it is found only in such pages as those of Pepys, Evelyn, Wrasell, and Greville. And one special charm about these two volumes is that it is not too remote from our own time, and yet not crowded upon by the events of yesterday. Most of the readers of this book probably began their thinking not very far from the accession of Victoria. But the period it covers is one about which the contemporary reader is likely to remember (and to have read) the least. It begins before the Sirius had led the march of ocean steamships into the harbor of New York. It precedes the era of telegraphy and Atlantic cables. It deals with a time when only the fortunate possessor of English newspapers was likely to know much of events beyond the seas. No "wholesale" history had summed up the events which followed the great turning point of the first Reform Bill. Mr. Greville too, possessed unusual capacities for his task. He held an office independent of ministerial changes, yet very near the charmed circle of ministerial life. He was not a violent partisan, though by family and personal friendships something akin to the side of the Whigs. He occupied a position something like what one might call a "home diplomat." He was frequently called upon to go between high negotiating parties, to say the things both wished to say or hear, but which neither could appear in directly. He had, too, an interest in life which took him singularly apart from the things he moved in and recorded, and this helped to make him a more impartial chronicler. He was a great turfite, and while his regular trips to the great races courses of England often interfered with his personal witness of much interesting in English politics, it prevented that absorption in the whirlpool of public events, which might have hindered his clear and unbiased view. The reader who expects to get a perfect bird's-eye view of the period may be disappointed in some points. There is nothing said of the great literary history of the Victorian era. One sees no more than Mr. Greville cared himself to see. He frankly sets down his own shortcomings, indeed, his motto might justly be the classic "Meliora probo, Aetiora sequor." But this limited range gives almost the vividness of photography to what he does see. The men of the time, the eccentric and able Lord Brougham, the Iron Duke, the darling Palmerston, the calm Lord John Russell, the insouciant Melbourne, the reticent and cold Sir Robert Peel, are like a gallery of portraits by Van Dyke. We are agreeably dis-pointed in one thing. We expected when we opened the book to find not a little ill-natured but amusing gossip, a second edition of the letters of Horace Walpole, in fact, and we find much more solid and useful matter. And one thing we can say in conclusion, that there is no little light thrown upon the English politics of to-day. While parties and measures are changed, the character of English citizenship remains, especially in minor matters, wonderfully the same.

THE APOSTOLICAL FATHERS. Translations of the Fathers down to A. D. 325. The Rev. Alexander Roberts, D. D., and James Donaldson, LL. D., editors. Second Report of the Edinburgh Edition. Revised and Chronologically Arranged with Brief Prefaces and Occasional Notes, by A. Cleveland Coxe, D. D., Vol. II., Fathers of the Second Century. Hermas, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus and Clement of Alexandria (entire). [Buffalo: The Christian Literature Publishing Company, 1885.] pp. 605.

On the appearance of the first volume of this most valuable and unique edition of the Anti-Nicene fathers we set forth at some length its chief characteristics, and bore willing testimony to its very great importance. It places in the hands of scholars and patristic students the works of the Christian writers of the first three centuries perfect and entire, and at a very small cost. These writings are the interpreters and witnesses of Christianity in the first and purest ages of the Church, when she might be supposed best to know what the Lord taught in regard to doctrine, discipline and worship, and it is the summary of their testimony that we find formulated into words in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. Hence the great value of these writers, and it has been a misfortune that until now they have not been made generally accessible. They have been kept either locked up in the language in which they have been written, or, if translations have been made, they have been of only portions of them, without any attempt at chronological or scientific arrangement, and without any careful editing or explanation of what was difficult and obscure. This was true of what was known as the "Oxford Library of the Fathers." Neither the Ante-Nicene nor the Post-Nicene portions of that library professed to be or were complete, but they were indigesta notes, and the selections and omissions would seem to have been made without any definite principle or rule. In this edition, following the text of the Clark-Edinburgh edition, but with careful editing and revision of the text, we have a complete collection of the writings of the Ante-Nicene Fathers, and it is greatly enhanced in value by new historical prefaces, notes and elucidations furnished by the American editorial staff, carefully supervised by Bishop Coxe, the editor in chief, who not only lends the influence of his name to the publication, but the results of a life-long study of patristic writings, and all this at just one-third of the cost of the Edinburgh edition. This volume contains the works of Hermas, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus and Clement of Alexandria (entire), it is handsomely printed in double columns, on fine paper, and is strongly bound at $3, while the same works in the Edinburgh edition, without the American prefaces and notes, cost $9. Even the country clergyman can now have his Library of the Fathers superior to any one ever before published, and need not be obliged to receive their testimony at second hand. It has given us great pleasure to know of the success of this important venture, and we are hardly less glad to know that the same publishers will in due time give us a collection of Post-Nicene authors, edited with the same care and on the same principles. The revival and spread of patristic knowledge and study cannot but benefit the Church. She teaches a historical theology and a succession of truth, and is glad to see the testimony of the witnesses in every hand, that the people themselves may be able to apply to faith and practice the great rule of St. Vincent of Lerins, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus, creditum est.

A HARMONY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS IN GREEK. Newly arranged, with Explanatory Notes, by Edward Robinson, D.D., LL.D. Revised Edition, with Additional Notes by M. B. Riddle, D.D., Professor of New Testament Exegesis in Hartford Theological Seminary, [Hartford: Hurdnet, M. & Co., 1881.] 8vo, cloth, pp. xxvii., 728. Price $2.

It is not necessary, at this time, to speak of the value of Dr. Robinson's Harmony of the Gospels. It is recognized as the work of a reverent and learned student of the Scriptures. By its arrangement of the sacred text it has facilitated the study of the Gospels; and by its notes it has thrown much light upon their meaning. Dr. Robinson's preface, however, is dated in 1851, and during the last thirty-four years very much has been done, both in determining the text of the New Testament and in the careful study of that text. The devout and ripe scholarship of Dr. Riddle has added to the work the results of the discoveries and studies of these years. He has replaced the text which Dr. Robinson printed (that of Hahn) by that of Tischendorf's eighth edition—the same, by the way, as that employed by Dr. Gardiner in his excellent Harmony; and at the foot of each page he has given full critical notes, presenting the more important readings in which Tischendorf's text differs from that of Tregelles, of Westcott & Hort, or of the Revised Version, with the authorities on either side. The so-called Received Text, is not collated. A very few changes in the arrangement have been made; the only one of importance is one which will commend itself to most students—the anointing at Bethany being placed on the eve of the Saturday instead of the eve of the Thursday before the Passover. The notes have been considerably enlarged, more by the addition of new matter than in the way of connection. A decided improvement, in our judgment, has been made by adopting for the Holy Week the schedule of days which Dr. Robinson adopted in his earlier editions, practically the same as Dr. Gardiner's. In almost every point, however, it is gratifying to note that the conclusions at which Dr. Robinson arrived have been confirmed by the studies of his editor; and, in particular, we are pleased to see that Dr. Riddle has not felt it necessary to make any modification, except in the way of a slight abridgment in the valuable and, to us, most convincing note on the Passover.

The volume is almost indispensable to the student of the Gospels. It is no little credit to the New Testament scholarship of our country that it should have produced two so valuable and learned works as the Harmony published in 1871 by Dr. Gardiner, and this which has just been issued under the editorship of Dr. Riddle. The student who has both before him, who notes many points of agreement between the editors, and inquires into the reasons which have led them, at times, to different opinions, will be well furnished for the study of the history of the Gospels; and the more he studies the Gospels, the more he will be convinced of the truth of what Dr. Riddle so well says, that the spirit of the sacred writings can never be learned without the careful study of the letter.

THE COMMON SENSE OF THE EXACT SCIENCES. By the late William Kingdon Clifford. [New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1885.] 12mo, cloth, pp. 271. Price $1.00.

This fifthth volume of the International Scientific Series is a really remarkable book. The preface tells us how the work was projected by the late Professor Clifford, and partly prepared by him for the press; how on his death, in 1879, it was taken up by Professor R. C. Rowe, who also did not live to complete the labor of editing it; and how at last it has been completed by the present editor, who, as we see from his initials, is Professor Karl Pearson of University College. The five chapters of the work treat of Number, Space, Quantity, Position, and Motion. Beginning with the simplest mathematical ideas, basing them on "common sense," explaining them so as to get at their exact meaning, and at all their meaning, the authors lead the reader on by a few easy, but vigorously demonstrative steps, to really advanced ideas or formulae. Thus, the chapter on Number brings us very soon to a demonstration of the binomial theorem; the chapter on Space to a proof of the proposition in regard to parallels and to some idea of the conic sections; that on Quantity to the proof of Euclid's definition of a fourth proportional, to the determination of the area of a circle and of irregular figures, the measurement of angles, and the meaning of fractional powers; while the chapter on Position teaches us almost before we know it, the principles of quaternions (including the multiplication of vectors), the Cartesian method, and the nature of logarithms, ending with some very remarkable suggestions as to the way in which we may come to an apprehension of what is meant by a possible bending of space and the determination of absolute position; and finally the chapter on Motion carries us on to the idea of fluxions, of the hodograph, and of the right conception of mass as unconnected with matter and force.

The whole method of treatment is, as it professes to be, that of common sense; of accepting nothing as true in a symbol which cannot be stated exactly in words; and of showing how new uses of symbols grow out of those which have already been accepted, though they have entirely new meanings. Thus $\sqrt{-1}$ is a symbol "completely unintelligible so far as a quantity is concerned; treated, however, as a symbol of operation, it has a perfectly clear and real meaning; it is here an instruction to step forwards a unit length, and then rotate this length counter clockwise through a right angle." So again, "Although $2 \times 2 = 4$ and $2 \times 3 = -3 \times 2$ may be sheer nonsense, when 2 and 3 are treated as mere numbers, it yet becomes downright common sense when 2 and 3 are treated as directed steps in a plane."

The work is certainly most valuable and suggestive. We cannot help wondering, however, whether a non-mathematical scholar could carry all the arguments without feeling overwhelmed and wise to the mysteries of anomalous space and the fourth dimension—to say nothing of quaternions—without having been well drilled in mathematical reasoning. We must also venture to say that we cannot feel satisfied with the way in which the doctrine of limits is taught. The publishers who have printed this book so handsomely should supply figures more plainly lettered.

A BAPTIST MEETING-HOUSE: THE STRAITS TO THE WEST PAULS, the Open Door to the New World. By Samuel J. Barrons. [Boston: American Unitarian Association.] pp. 271.

The writer's best apology for his present position is found in his account of his early religious surroundings and education. For his Unitarianism, his defence, so far as it is founded on Scripture study, is so weak as to be all but disingenuous. When, for instance, he declares that there is no trace of the Lord's divinity in the New Testament, and takes no notice of the first chapter of St. John's Gospel, it is manifest that only the anxiety to get out of the deep waters of Calvinism can excuse his failure in the elementary processes of right-reasoning. We doubt if he is quite correct in what he says are the tenets of Baptists—for instance, that they do not believe baptism a saving ordinance, nor in the damnation of infants. This little volume is entertaining reading, and we should say that its author is a frank and genial man, of rather uncertain education, and with no very great grasp of mind. What he will do in the Unitarian Ministry is rather a curious problem, he being as unlike the typical product of the Harvard Divinity School as can well be imagined. We trust he will not drift into free religionism, which is the ultima thule of some of his contemporaries.

AMERICAN ETCHINGS: A Collection of Twenty Original Etchings. By MORAN, PARTIS, FERRIS, SMITH, and others. With Descriptive Text and Biographical Matter by S. K. Koehler and others. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat. 1884.] Folio.

The value of such a collection depends both upon the quality of discrimination in the selection of subjects and etchers, and also upon the literary comment which marks the capacity of the editor. There is a felicitous conjunction of both in this charming volume. Mr. Koehler is appreciative, as well as conscientious and intelligent; and both art and artist fare well at his hands.

The style of publication is dainty and attractive. Three out of the twenty contributors are ladies who have gained a good degree among contemporary etchers—Mrs. M. Nimmo Moran, Mrs. Eliza Grantorex, and Anna Lee Merritt. France, Holland, and England are felt in the various modes of expression. Yet there is an indigenous atmosphere, a creditable Americanism, seen throughout. People nowadays may safely and prudently buy and read American books; and this brochure demonstrates that they may with equal confidence buy and study American etchings.

THE WRITINGS AND SPEECHES OF SAMUEL J. TILDEN. Edited by John Biglow. In Two Volumes. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 600, 601.

In the bearing of these documents upon present politics it is of course out of our province to express any opinion upon them. We are confined to the fact that Mr. Biglow enjoyed remarkable facilities for doing his work as an editor, and that his own reputation is a sufficient pledge that the task has been faithfully and ably fulfilled. The reader will of course be influenced somewhat by political predilections in estimating the value of these writings. But no one can question their right to form part of American history. Mr. Tilden as Governor of the State of New York, and as candidate for the Presidency of the United States, has filled a sufficiently large place in the public eye to make his words of interest and of authority. That he did great service toward breaking up the "Tweed Ring," is conceded by his political adversaries.

The work begins with the administration of President Van Buren and comes down almost to the present day.

THE FIRST NAPOLEON. A Sketch, Political and Military. By John Codman Ropes, Member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, etc. [New York and Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Company.] pp. 247. Price $2.00.

These pages were first produced as "Lowell Lectures," in Boston, and now appear in book form. They are a very able analysis of Napoleon's career, and seem to be free from the opposing errors of most biographers—enthusiastic partisanship, and unreasoning hate. There are selected points in the Emperor's history taken up for special consideration. Much space is given to the history of the battle of Waterloo and the examination of Grouchy's fatal mistake. It is a valuable contribution to history as well as being of absorbing interest. There is an entire absence of the vices of the book-maker. We especially call attention to the portion treating of the charge that Napoleon destroyed French liberty. Mr. Ropes shows very clearly that he enlarged it, and that what he overthrew on the 18th Brumaire was simply an incapable despotism.

A WOMAN'S INHERITANCE. By AMANDA M. DOUGLASS. AUTHOR OF "Floyd Grandon's Honor," "In Trust," "The Old Woman who Lived in a Shoe," etc. [Boston: Lee & Shepard, New York: Charles J. Bittington.] pp. 345. Price $1.50.

The plot of "A Woman's Inheritance" does not vary very much from the conventional love-story. Her birth (the heroine, Christmas Ormiston's birth) is a disappointment. Her father intended it should be "Dombey & Son," and, since fate made it "Dombey & Daughter," tries to bring her up to be his business heir as well as his pecuniary one. She accepts the situation, and tries to live apart from the woman's world, of course, without success; and in the final chapter accepts the husband marked out by fate for her. It is a well-written story, with a very respectable feminine ideal standard, and a decidedly high male ideal, as women's novels are apt to have. The authoress has rather too strong a fancy for romantic names, such as are not easy to be found in the city directories.

THE JOY OF THE MINISTRY. An Exhorter to Increase the Efficiency and Deepen the Happiness of Pastoral Work. By the Rev. FREDERICK R. WYNE, M. A., Canon of Christ Church. [New York: James Post & Co.] pp. 322. Price $1.00.

One striking feature in the new activity of modern religious life is the way in which the clergy are striving to take counsel together. This volume is the outcome of one such effort. The author, Canon Wyne, gathered together at his house a party of divinity students and young clergymen during their university terms. Their addresses were delivered to them, and are therefore practical work. To the younger clergy we can especially commend this book as one which will find ready acceptance, and will do them good service in their early ministry. In one sense the clergy are to consider themselves always young, in so far that they have always something to learn, and can always find profit in words of fraternal advice and kindly sympathy from the experience of another.

EXPOSITIONS. By the Rev. Samuel Cox, D. D., Author of "A Commentary on the Book of Job," "Belshazzar, an Exposition and a Study," "Salvator Mundi," etc. [New York: Thomas Whitaker.] pp. 453. Price $1.50.

Dr. Cox is a very lively writer, and his expositions have the merit of being striking and suggestive. But we are bound to say that he is hardly a safe guide as an expositor. We have found various places where it is manifest that his dealing with Scripture is governed much more by a daring fancy than by a careful exegesis. For instance, on page 73, where he affirms that St. Paul said: "No creature can enter the kingdom of Heaven," (I Cor. vi: 9, 10), there is hardly a shadow of support for his view. Dr. Cox confesses himself a "restorationist," and that is enough to color his views on other points of exposition. Where he is not heterodox, he is well worth attending to, and he certainly has the gift of writing exceedingly well.

THE MERRY SCULPTOR (En Chemin de Fer). By M. MOUNET-CUFFY of the Comedie Francaise. Illustrations by Ch. DAUX. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat, 1886.]

This is a specially elaborated trifle—one of those unapproachable exploits in delicate, dainty art hardly worth the doing. And yet in Parisian handicraft it catches more than a fleeting charm. It is a series of dainty cartoons on sheets of heavy paper. Cupids are sportively used as properties, and the artist and poet tells the innocent little story with equal refinement and effectiveness. Indeed the photo-gravures of Ch. Daux made a very intelligible disclosure without the verses.

THE TWO HANDICRAFTS, or a Friend in Need is a Friend Indeed. By Madeline Bonavia Hunt, Author of "Little Empire," etc. [New York: Cassell & Company.] pp. 160.

We are glad to meet with a story of the London poor which does not credit them with all the virtues. This is an honest picture of the real difficulty in dealing with street-nar-tured "Arabs," and proves that the authoress knew what she was writing about. We place it above the average of the works usually found in great numbers in the Sunday school Library literature, and consider it worthy of attention.

SUZETTE: a novel by Mary Spear Tilden. Author of "Onesie," etc. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.] pp. 348.

The scene of the novel is laid in Richmond, "befo' the wa'," and is almost exclusively there. "Suzette" is a very clever little story, with characters which have a very life like appearing, and are suspiciously like studies from real persons. Indeed, it is not everybody who can draw the transition of a young girl into womanhood as deftly as it is done here. We think "Innis Pago" a very charming heroine, and we greatly enjoyed the unfolding of her young life. The negro personages are admirable sketches also, and represent a type which will be only known by tradition to the coming generation—the petted and devoted household servants of the days of slavery.

HOLIDAY BOOKS.

ETCHING: An Outline of Its Technical Processes, and Its History, with some Remarks on Collections and Collecting. By S. R. Koehler. Illustrated by Thirty Plates by Old and Modern Etchers, and Numerous Reproductions in the Text. [New York, London, etc.: Cassell & Co.] Folio. pp. 298.

This is an important attempt at a two fold history of this exquisite art; that is, both literary and pictorial. Mr. Koehler is confessedly one of the most conscientious and accomplished among writers on art subjects; and is not only a very intelligent critic, but a patient and trustworthy investigator. The scope and extent of this costly publication provide him, therefore, an adequate field for a presentation of the results of his labor, and it is not too much to say that he has supplied, in their completion, a great desideratum in this branch of art—Literature. The book contains a technical account of the art of etching in its various methods, sufficiently explicit to satisfy the exacting of the artist, while it is particularly acceptable to the amateur, and this is the substance of the first and second chapters. The remaining fourteen present with excellent discrimination a history of the various schools of etching in their successive development, taking the reader through the various countries in which they have arisen.

Thirty page-plates very considerably illustrate the more striking phases of the art; while ninety-five, scattered throughout the text, serve as a constant basis for the writer's historical as well as critical undertaking. Our American etchers have, perhaps, the lion's share among these multiplied plates. It is almost superfluous to add that the style of publication quite sustains the reputation of the enterprising firm whose imprint it bears.

POEMS OF NATURE. By John Greenleaf Whittier. Illustrated from Nature. By Eldridge Kingley. [Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.]

Whittier being the oldest as well as the most famous of our living American poets, a new edition of his poems is always acceptable. In the present volume, those of his verses which have particular reference to nature, both on land and sea, have been gathered. They are handsomely illustrated, very finely bound, and printed in unusually clear, large type.

CHILDREN'S FLOREADE. A Romance. By Lord Byron. Illustrated. [Boston: Ticknor & Co.]

Such artists as Garrett, Schell, Anthony, Fenn, Woodward and Perkins, have furnished the material for the engraving tools of Andrews, Dana, Johnson, Kilburn and several others, to beautify this new edition of Lord Byron's famous poem. A more attractive volume has seldom been issued.

EYE OF SAINT AGNES. By John Keats. Illustrated by Edmund H. Garrett, under the supervision of Geo. T. Andrew. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat.]

LEMOINE. By Edgar Allan Poe. Illustrated. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat, 1866.]

ONE OF IMMORTALITY AND LINES ON TINTINN ABNEY. By William Wordsworth. Illustrated. [Cassell & Company.]

These standard and favorite poems are put in a very fine dress both of paper, letterpress, and engraving. The illustrations are in good taste and really illustrate.

WILD FLOWERS OF COLORADO. From original water-color sketches drawn from nature. By Emma Homan Thayer. [New York: Cassell & Co.]

The authoress gives a rambling, but pleasing account of her wanderings in Colorado while in search of these flowers. The freaks and beauties of nature as seen in wild flowers are very carefully reproduced. The volume is a fine one.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS

FAIRY TALES FROM BREITANO. Told in English by Kate F. Crocker and pictured by F. Carruthers Gould. [New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1885.]

This presents in a well prepared English garb some of the work of a member of the German Romantic School, which flourished at the beginning of this century. Though Brentano was brilliant and clearly a genius, he has been left in considerable obscurity even in his own country. This collection of his Märchen cannot fail to delight all who revel in fairy tales, and they are found among all classes and ages. The pictures are not numerous or striking.

CHILDREN'S STORIES IN AMERICAN HISTORY. By Henrietta Christian Wright. Illustrated. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1885.]

This narrative of early American annals is fresh as a good story of fiction and entirely clear to a child's mind. Beginning with the glacial period, there is a continuous succession of interesting description, enlivened by personal accounts of the mound-builders, red men, Northerners, discoverers, adventurers, and settlers, told in an easy and familiar way. The pictures are, like the reading matter, not repetitions of things familiar in the school-books.

By NICHOLAS SOMOS. With illustrations. [New York: The Century Company.]

A very beautiful, amusing and instructive book has been the result of the attempt to set one hundred and twelve of the St. Nicholas' poems to music. The original illustrations have been preserved, and the music written in a key calculated to bring the songs within the compass of childish voices. It will afford to all a genuine musical and poetic pleasure. The book is, of course, richly and conveniently bound.

ZORAK JOHNSON IN THE LEVANT. WITH A TALMUDIC STORY-TELLER. By Hezekiah Butterworth. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat.]

This is a profusely illustrated volume. Mr. Butterworth has a rare skill in picturesque narratives, and weaves into his details of travel curious myths and legends that are graced with the charm of Oriental life. Much valuable information is given incidentally, and the book will have on interest for both old and young.

CAROLINA'S CAREER. By Emma Marshall. New York: Robert Carter and Brother, 1885.

A good story, lacking humor, of healthy sentiment, well told, illustrating manners and morals. The plot is simple, but natural.

LITERATURE.

THE "Memorial Sermon of the Rev. Nathaniel Pettit," by Rev. Dr. Geo. M. Hills, is appropriately published.

"SONGS OF THE MASTER'S LOVE," by Frances Ridley Havergal, beautifully illustrated in colors, is published by E. P. Dutton & Co.

LIPPINCOTT closes volume ten with its November number. The next volume is to be under new editorial management.

ROBERTS BROTHERS publish a "Louisa M. Alcott Calendar," with extracts from some of her works for every day, and a portrait.

HUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. have published an illustrated catalogue of some of their books. It contains portraits of many popular authors. "READINGS and Recitations," easy and amusing, for French classes, in paper covers, comes from the Writers' Publishing Company, of this city.

E. & J. B. YOUNG & Co. have issued an illustrated catalogue of Christmas books and a new "Bishop Doane List of Sunday School Books."

"LULU'S LIBRARY," Vol. 1, by Louisa M. Alcott, contains twelve stories which will please children. It is from the press of Roberts Brothers, Boston.

THE December North American Review has three papers upon General Grant, and one upon Rome and Inquisitions, the latter by Alfred K. Glover.

BEDELL BROTHERS & Co publish a tract entitled, "A Weekly Eucharist, the Practice of the Apostolic Church and the Rule of the Anglican Communion."

DR. PHILIP SLAUGHTER'S "Memoirs of the Life of Bishop Meade," reprinted from the New England Geographical Society, has reached a third edition.

THOMAS WHITTAKER publishes "Questions on the Four Gospels in Harmony," by the Rev. Joseph Packard, D.D., and a Catechism of the Christian Year, by the Rev. Geo. C. Foley.

The November number of the Pulpit of the Day contains eight sermons by notable divines, English and American, besides much other matter. It is published at Westfield, N. Y.

The second number of Mrs. Twing's new magazine, Church Work, is full of interest. We are more and more sure that its wide circulation will greatly advantage the Church.

ART AND DECORATION is an illustrated monthly devoted to interior and exterior ornament. Its illustrations are good, and the second volume begins with the November number.

THE eleventh volume of the Sanitary Engineer, twenty-six numbers, contains thirteen special architectural illustrations, and the articles are upon the most important practical subjects.

HUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. have just published Mrs. A. D. S. Whitney's "Bonnyborough." The author has written a round dozen and more of stories and they are pleasant reading.

FRANG & Co., as usual, have provided a rich collection of cards which may be used for souvenirs at Christmas. They are very pretty indeed, and many of them have genuine artistic merit.

REV. L. S. OSBORNE'S address before the Chicago Branch of the Women's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has been published by request. It was delivered in Trinity Church of that city, of which Mr. Osborne is rector.

"SERVANTS FROM THE GOLDEN LAND," by Frances Ridley Havergal, is issued by H. H. Carter and Kerrick Bros in unique style, being printed in gold. "Christmas Pearls" is issued in the same style, but is printed in silver.

CASSELL & Co. publish a "Year Book of Serious and Golden Texts" in a neat form. On the left pages are spaces for text and outline of Sunday sermons, and on the right the Golden Text and Bible readings for the week. It may be made very useful.

AMONG the new illustrated books of E. & J. B. Young & Co. is "Topsy Turvy," by C. M. C. B., illustrated by H. F. A. Miles. It gives an account of the wonders of the world of waters, with a sufficient thread of story to make it more attractive to the young.

CHILDREN would be very hard to please who would not go into raptures over "Ring-around-a-Rosey," by a dozen little girls, the verses and pictures by Mary A. Lathbury. It is a quarto of thirty pages, the designs in bright colors and is published by R. Worthington.

KATE SANBORN believes that women have both wit and humor, and has compiled a good-sized volume to prove it, which Funk & Wagnalls have issued in a goosy form. It is delightful reading, and, if not filled with wit, it is filled with what will pass as a good counterfeit of it.

MR. WHITTAKER'S "Clergyman's Companion" contains the offices of the Prayer Book oftenest used in private, and a fuller collection of prayers and offices for divers occasions than we have yet seen. The clergy will find it invaluable in their ministrations, and, indeed, indispensable.

"COLLEGE SERMONS," by Dr. Fairbairn; "The Children's Sunday Hour," by the Rev. Benjamin Waugh; and Mrs. Ewing's tales, "Six to Sixteen," "A Flat-iron for a Fartling," "Mrs. Over-the-Way's Remembrances," and "Jan of the Windmill," are among Mr. Whittaker's most recent issues.

"THE TWO VIOLETS," "A Sprig of White Heather," "The Two Friends," "The Little Old Portrait," "Under the Snow," and "Lob-Lie by the Fire," are pleasing books for children, illustrated in colors, and bearing the imprint of E. & J. B. Young & Co., and the Christian Knowledge Society of London.

THE Christmas number of the Book Buyer, Charles Scribner's Sons, made up largely of extracts from their publications and of copies of many illustrations besides some original papers, with a unique cover, makes a very acceptable annual and one worthy of preservation. The frontispiece is the Orleans Madonna of Raphael, as engraved by Thomas Cole.

"OUR Little Ones and the Nursery," edited by Oliver Optic, with its three hundred and forty-nine illustrations, will be a favorite with all little people, and "Three Vassar Girls in Italy," with one hundred and six illustrations, written by Lizzie W. Champney, will please people of larger growth. They are published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston.

MACMILLAN & Co. publish in handsome quarto a new edition of the "Water-Babies, a Fairy Tale for a Land-Baby," by Charles Kingsley. The illustrations, one hundred in number, are by Linley Sambourne. They also issue "Ua," an old-fashioned story, by Mrs. Molesworth, with pictures by Walter Crane, thus assuring a double attraction.

"CHRISTMAS-TIDE IN PROSE AND STORY," a collection of poetry and song, and from sacred and secular sources, is very handsomely printed and bound by A. D. Randolph & Co., who also send us "A Year of Blessings and a Blessed Year," a text and comment for every day in the year, compiled by Rose Porter, and also her "Honor, or the Gospel of a Life."

E. P. DUTTON & Co. have issued in quarto an illustrated edition of the Poetical Works of Frances Ridley Havergal. It is bound in a style worthy of the poems of this favorite author. Hymns by John Henry Newman, D.D., are from the press of the same publishers. It has a portrait, and will be welcome to those who are familiar with the author's "Lead, Kindly Light."

MRS. NELLIE V. WALKER has done a genuine kindness to those who desire something besides prettiness in their souvenirs. With womanly delicacy and churchly taste she has prepared a considerable number of souvenirs, which, while they are beautiful, will also convey a religious idea, or a really Christmas thought. They may be obtained of E. P. Dutton & Co.

"HUMOROUS master-pieces from American Literature" is in preparation by G. P. Putnam's Sons, edited by Edward T. Mason; and also "Songs of Sleepy Hollow," by S. H. Hayes; and "Louisiana Purchase," by Bishop Robertson; and the "Political History of Canada," by Prof. Goldwin Smith. The last two works are to be issued for the American Historical Association.

"TRUXT, or those who Live in Glass Houses should not Throw Stones," by Maggie Symington; "Tim Thomson's Trial, or All is not Gold that Glitters," by Geo. Weatherly; "Fritters," "Ursula's Stumbling Block, or Major Monk's Motto," are volumes of Cassel & Co.'s Provincial Series, illustrated. They also issue "Ralph Northreeb's Trust," by William Westall, designed for readers of large growth.

REV. E. P. GRAY, author of the prize paper in the last number of the Church Review, "Did Christ Rise from the Dead on the First Day of the Week?" has in manuscript a treatise on the "Sabbath and the Lord's Day, their Origin and Relations," which he desires to publish by subscription. Mr. Gray is a scholar of high repute, and his work is able and exhaustive, and we hope soon to see it issue from the press.

A VERY beautiful book is the Flower Song Series, poems from various authors, with colored designs, presenting "Flowers for Winter Days," "Spring Blossoms," "Midsummer Flowers" and "Flowers from Sunlight and Shade." They are arranged by Susie B. Skelding, and are published by White, Stokes and Allen. There are separate designs for the covers in colors, and plates representing the flowers, also in colors.

DR. W. M. THOMPSON'S "Lebanon, Damascus and Beyond Jordan" (Harper & Bros.) completes his series of volumes on the Land and the Book. The author was forty-five years a missionary in Syria and Palestine, and in this volume and in "Southern Palestine," and "Central Palestine," has given us the results of his observations and study. It is handsomely printed on toned paper, with many illustrations, and will be a valuable aid in the study of the Bible.

The English Illustrated Magazine, published by Macmillan & Co., presents a superb Christmas number. This magazine is thoroughly interesting to American readers, not in spite of, but because of its English flavor. No one can be thoroughly abreast of the times unless he is familiar with the current literature of England, and of that literature this English Illustrated Magazine deserves the chief place. The article upon the House of Lords, in the present number, is one of the most remarkable that we have seen in any magazine.

"WORDS of the Sun," "Wonders of European Art," and "Wonderful Escapes," are the three latest volumes of the Wonder Series issued by Charles Scribner's Sons. Dr. Henry M. Field's "Greek Islands" and "Turkey after the War," from the same publishers just at this time is full of interest. It is furnished with a map. "Story Thoughts or Poems," by Maria H. Parker, is handsomely printed by Cupples, Upham & Co. It is gilt and illustrated. The same house publishes "Rico and Urseil," a book by Johanna Spyrri, translated from the German by Louise Brooks.

THE December Art Amateur is the first number of volume fourteen. It has a portrait study, a colored plate by J. C. Beckwith, and eleven supplement designs, several of which are ecclesiastical in character. Among them are designs for Christmas decorations, sermon cases, book markers, alms bags, stole and chasuble, which those fond of embroidery will find pretty and useful. Its frontispiece is a study of cupids and infants after old masters. Some studies in drapery by E. Burne Jones will greatly assist amateurs, as will also a paper upon amateur photography. This number is one of unusual value.

THE coming of the Christmas Number of Harper's Magazine in the early weeks of November is like the arrival of the first strawberries in February. It is certainly enterprising. The frontispiece for this December Number is a copy of Raphael's "The Madonna del Granduca," in the Pitti Gallery, in Florence. "The Maturity of Art," by Henry T. Van Dyke, Jr., illustrated by photographs from the Reginald paintings, is the opening paper. It deals altogether with the story of the Nativity of Christ as portrayed by the brushes of the earlier painters. "A Winter Walk" with Wm. Hamilton Gibson, is an enjoyment too seldom shared by his many admirers. The illustrations are Mr. Gibson's—the letter press, his also. It would be impossible for us to render him more sincere or greater praise than this statement. The stories of Craddock, Phelps, George Broughton, as well as one by Brander Matthews are remarkably good; so also is a poem by William Black.

"Grandmother's Spring," "Mother's Birthday Review," "Convalescence," "Mill Stream," "The Poet and the Brook," and "Baby, Puppy and Kitty," written by Juliana Horatia Ewing, and illustrated by R. Andre, bear the imprint of E. & J. B. Young & Co., and of the Christian Knowledge Society, are printed with numerous illustrations in colors, and will be an unending well-spring of delight to the children. They are in prose and poetry, and the covers and pictures present a never failing variety. Happy are the children who get them. The same publishers also send us "Tales from Dame Marjorie's Chimney Corner, and China from her Cupboard," printed in blue and very beautiful, and "In a Good Cause,"—stories, poems and illustrations, the latter published for the benefit of a hospital. It is a series of sketches by well-known litterateurs—Lady Noel, Bishop How, Frances Cassel, etc., and Callegott, Lampon, Calboun, and other artists furnish the illustrations.

THE December number of St. Nicholas contains a copy of Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Portrait of a Little Girl," a quaint little maid, with a queer little hood over her soft curls—a very pretty picture. "The Little Christmas Tree," by Susan Coolidge, tells us in verse how one baby fir tree made a little baby bappy, the lesson of being content with small things being slipped in between the lines. Mrs. Burnett's story, "Little Lord Fauntleroy," promises to be not only one of the best stories published in this kind of magazines for children, but also one of Mrs. Burnett's very best stories, both in its literary aspect as well as in its readability and loveliness. It is very hard to have such a story dealt out to one by instalments of a chapter or two at a time. In the illustrations the spirit of the story has been thoroughly caught and reproduced. Among the many good things in this Christmas number of the magazine should be mentioned, "School Life at Rugby," by Elizabeth R. Pennell, and "A Morning at Rugby during Vacation Time," by Edwin D. Mead, profusely illustrated. These sketches will be of the greatest interest to every boy and man who has read "Tom Brown at Rugby," and what man or boy has not done so!

SONNET.

BY WILLIAM STRUTHERS.

Listen; weep not. They say that we shall hear
 No Christmas chimes together; that the snow
 Shall lie upon me, and above me blow Keen winds; that I shall be so deaf—ah, dear!—
 That never voice of anguish, joy, nor fear Shall reach to me. Love, think you they can know!
 Dream you that they could lay me down so low
 As not to catch your faintest whisper, dear!
 If truth they speak, in this that we must part,
 Oh, cast that other dread from out your heart!
 And when church-bells declare the Holy Birth,
 Deem not they for the unbreft do ring Alone; but smile; for, mayhap, midst the mirth,
 A new-born angel, love, shall nigh you wing!

WHAT'S MINE'S MINE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

CHAPTER X.—Concluded.

Ladies in Alistar's fields were not an every-day sight. Hardly before had his work been enlivened by such a presence; and the joy of it was in his eyes, though his behavior was calm. Christina thought how pleasant it would be to have him for a worshipping slave—so interpreted with her charms that, like Una's lion, he would crouch at her feet, come and go at her pleasure, live on her smiles, and be sad when she gave him none. She would make a gentleman of him, then leave him to dream of her! It would be a pleasant and interesting task in the dullness of their winter's banishment, with the days so short and the nights so unendurably long! The man was handsome!—she would do it!—and would proceed at once to initiate his conquest!

The temptation to patronize not unfrequently presents an object for the patronage superior to the would-be patron; for the temptation is one to which slight persons chiefly are exposed; it affords an outlet for the vague activity of self-importance. Few have learned that a man is of no value except to God and other men. Self would fain be worshipped instead of worshipping; and such was the spirit in which Miss Palmer dreamed of a friendship de haut en bas with the country fellow.

She put on a smile—no difficult thing, for she was a good-natured girl. It looked to Alistar quite natural. It was nevertheless like Hamlet's false friends, "sent for."
 "Do you like ploughing?" she asked.

Had she known the manner of the country, she would have added "laid," or "Macruadh."

"Yes, I do," Alistar answered; "but I should plough all the same if I did not. It has to be done."

"But why should you do it?"

"Because I must," laughed the laird.

What ought she to answer? Should she condole with the man because he had to work? It did not seem prudent! She would try another tack?

"You had some trouble with your oxen! We saw it from the road, and were quite frightened. I hope you are not hurt."

"There was no danger of that," answered Alistar with a smile.

"What wild creatures they are! Isn't it rather hard work for them? They are so small!"

"They are as strong as horses," answered the laird. "I have had my work to break them! Indeed, I can hardly say I have done it yet! They would very much like to run their horns into me!"

"Then it must be dangerous! It shows that they were not meant to work!"

"They were meant to work if I can make them work."

"Then you approve of slavery?" said Mercy.

She hardly knew what made her oppose him. As yet she had no opinions of her own, though she did catch a thought sometimes, when it happened to come within her reach. Alistar smiled a curious smile.

"I should," he said, "if the right people were made slaves of. I would take shares in a company of Algerine pirates to rid the world of certain types of the human!"

They looked at each other. "Sharp!" said Christina, to herself.

"What sorts would you have them carry off?" she asked.

"Idle men in particular," answered Alistar.

"Would you not have them take idle ladies as well?"

"I would see first how they behaved when the men were gone."

"You believe, then," said Mercy, "we have a right to make the lower animals work?"

"I think it is our duty," answered Alistar. "At all events, if we do not, we must either kill them off by degrees, or cede them this world and emigrate. But even that would be a bad thing for my little bulis there! It is not so many years since the last wolf was killed—here, close by; and if the dogs turned to wolves again, where would the domestic animals be? They would then have wild beasts instead of men for their masters! To have the world a habitable one, man must rule."

"Men are nothing but tyrants to them!" said Christina.

"Most are, I admit."

Ere he could prevent her, she had walked up to the near bull, and began to pat him. He poked a sharp wicked horn sideways at her, catching her cloak on it and grazing her arm. She started back very white. Alistar gave him a terrible tug. The beast shook his head and began to paw the earth.

"Don't go near him," he said, "But you needn't be afraid; he can't touch you. That iron band round his nose has spikes in it."

"Poor fellow!" said Christina: "it is to wonder he should be out of temper! It must hurt him dreadfully!"

"It does hurt him when he pulls against it, but not when he is quiet."

"I call it cruel!"

"I do not. The fellow knows what is wanted of him—just as well as any naughty child."

"How can he when he has no reason?"

"Oh, hasn't he!"

"Animals have no reason; they have only instinct!"

"They have plenty of reason—more than many men and women. They are not so far off as you pride makes most people think! It is only those that don't know then that talk about the instinct of animals!"

"Do you know them?"

"Pretty well for a man; but they're often too much for me."

"Anyhow that poor thing does not know better."

"He knows enough; and if he did not would you allow him to do as he pleased because he didn't know better? He wanted to put his horn into you a moment ago!"

"Still it must be hard to want very much to do a thing, and not be able to do it!" said Mercy.

"I used to feel as if I could tear my old nurse to pieces when she wouldn't let me do as I wanted!" said Christina.

"I suppose you do whatever you please now, ladies?"

"No, indeed. We wanted to go to London and here we are for the winter!"

"And you think it hard?"

"Yes, we do."

"And so, from sympathy, you side with my cattle?"

"Well—yes!"

"You think I have no right to keep them captive, and make them work?"

"None at all," said Christina.

"Then it is time I let them go!" Alistar returned and made for the animals' heads.

"No, no! please don't!" cried both the girls, turning, the one white, the other red.

"Certainly not, if you do not wish it!" said Alistar, staying his step. "If I did, however, you would be quite safe, for they would not come near me. They would be off up that hill as hard as they could tear, jumping everything that came in their way."

"Is it not very dull here in the winter?" asked Christina, panting a little, but trying to look as if she had known quite well he was only joking.

"I do not find it dull."

"Ah, but you are a man, and can do as you please!"

"I never could do as I pleased, and so I please as I do," answered Alistar.

"I do not quite understand you."

"When you cannot do as you like, the best thing is to like what you have to do. One's own way is not to be had in this world. There's a better, to be sure, which is to be had!"

"I have heard a parson talk like that," said Mercy, "but never a layman!"

"My father was a parson, as good as any layman. He would have laid me on my back in a moment—here as I stand!" said Alistar, drawing himself to his height.

He broke suddenly into Gaelic, addressing the more troublesome of the bulis. No better pleased to stand still than to go on.

he had fallen to digging at his neighbor who retorted with the horn convenient, and presently there was a great mixing of bull and harness and cloddy earth. Turning quickly towards them, Alister dropped a rein. In a moment the plough was out of the furrow, and the bulls were straining every muscle, each to send the other into the wilds of the unseen creation. Alister sprang to their heads, and taking them by their noses forced them back into the line of the furrow. Christina thinking they had broken loose, fled; but there was Mercy with the reins, hauling with all her might!

"Thank you, thank you!" said the laird, laughing with pleasure. "You are a friend indeed!"

"Mercy! Mercy! come away," cried Christina.

But Mercy did not heed her. The laird took the reins, and administering a blow each to the animals, made them stand still.

There are tender-hearted people who virtually object to the whole scheme of creation; they would neither have force used nor pain suffered; they talk as if kindness could do everything, even where it is not felt. Millions of human beings but for suffering would never develop an atom of affection. The man who would spare due suffering is not wise. Because a thing is unpleasant, it is folly to conclude it ought not to be. There are powers to be born, creations to be perfected, sinners to be redeemed, through the ministry of pain, to be born, perfected, redeemed, in no other way. But Christina was neither wise nor unwise after such fashion. She was annoyed at finding the laird not easily to be brought to her feet, and Mercy already advanced to his good graces. She was not jealous of Mercy, for was she not beautiful and Mercy plain? but Mercy had by her pluck obtained an advantage, and the handsome ploughman looked at her admiringly! Partly therefore because she was not pleased with him, partly that she thought a little out-cry would be telling, she cried out,

"Oh, you wicked man! you are hurting the poor brutes!"

"No more than is necessary," he answered.

"You are cruel!"

"Good morning, ladies."

He just managed to take off his bonnet, for the four-legged explosions at the end of his plough were pulling madly. He slackened his reins, and away it went, like a sharp knife through a Dutch cheese.

"You've made him quite cross!" said Mercy.

"What a brute of a man!" said Christina.

She never restrained herself from teasing cat or puppy, did not mind hurting it a little even, for her amusement. Those capable of distinguishing between the qualities of resembling actions are few. There are some who will regard Alister as capable of vivisection.

On one occasion when the brothers were boys, Alister having lost his temper in the pursuit of a runaway pony, fell upon it with his fists the moment he caught it. Ian put himself between, and received, without word or motion, more than one blow meant for the pony.

"Donal was only in fun," he said as soon as Alister's anger had spent itself. "Father would never have punished him like that!"

Alister was ashamed, and never again was guilty of such an outbreak. From that moment, indeed, he began the serious endeavor to subjugate the pig, tiger, mule, or whatever animal he found in himself. There remained, however, this difference between them—that Alister punished without compunction, while Ian was sorely troubled at having to cause any suffering.

CHAPTER XI.

The Fir-Grove.

As the ladies went up the ridge, regarded in the neighborhood as the chief's pleasure-ground where nobody went except to call upon the chief, they must, having mounted it lower down than where they descended, pass the cottage. The grove of birch, mountain-ash, and fir, which surrounded it, was planted quite irregularly, and a narrow foot-path went winding through it to the door. Against one of the firs was a rough bench, turned to the west, and seated upon it they saw Ian, smoking a formless mass of much deflated sea-foam, otherwise meerschamun. He rose, uncovered, and sat down again. But Christina, who regarded it as a praiseworthy kindness to address any one beneath her, not only returned his salutation, but stopped, and said,

"Good morning! We have been learning how they plough in Scotland, but I fear we annoyed the ploughman."

"Fergus does sometimes look surly," said Ian, rising again, and going to her; "he has had rheumatism, poor fellow! And then he can't speak a word of English, and is ashamed of it!"

"The man we saw spoke English very well. Is Fergus your brother's name?"

"No; my brother's name is Alister—that is Gaelic for Alexander."

"He was ploughing with two wild little oxen, and could hardly manage them."

"Then it must have been Alister—only, excuse me, he could manage them perfectly. Alister could break a pair of buffaloes."

"He seemed rather vexed, and I thought it might be that we made the creatures troublesome—I do not mean he was rude—only a little rough to us."

Ian smiled, and waited for more.

"He did not like to be told he was hard on the animals. I only said the poor things did not know better!"

"Ah—I see!—He understands animals so well, he doesn't like to be meddled with in his management of them. If they didn't know better, I daresay he told you he had to teach them better. They are troublesome little wretches. Yes; I confess he is a little touchy about animals!"

Somewhat Christina felt herself rebuked, and did not like it. He had almost told her that, if she had quarrelled with his ploughman-brother, the fault must be hers!

"But indeed, Captain Macruadh," she said—for the people called him captain, "I am not ignorant about animals! We have horses of our own, and know all about them.—Don't we, Mercy?"

"Yes," said Mercy; "they take apples and sugar from our hands."

"And you would have the chief's bulls tamed with apples and sugar!" said Ian, laughing. "But the horses were tamed before ever you saw them! If you had taken them wild, or even when they were foals, and taught them everything, then you would know a little about them. An acquaintance is not a friendship! My brother loves animals and understands them almost like human beings; he understands them better than some human beings, for the most cunning of the animals are yet simple. He knows what they are thinking when I cannot read a word of their faces. I remember one terrible night, winters ago—there had been a blinding drift on and off during the day—and my father and mother were getting anxious about him—how he came staggering in, and fell on the floor, and a great lump in his plaid on his back began to wallow about, and out crept his big colly! They had been to the hills to look after a few sheep, and the poor dog was exhausted, and Alister carried him home at the risk of his life."

"A valuable animal, I suppose!" said Christina.

"He had been, but was no more what the world calls valuable. He was an old dog almost past work—but the wisest creature I poor fellow, he never recovered that day on the hills! A week or so after, we buried him—in the hope of a blessed resurrection," added Ian, with a smile.

The girls looked at each other as much as to say, "Good heavens!" He caught the look, but said nothing, for he saw they had "no understanding."

The brothers believed most devoutly that the God who is present at the death-bed of the sparrow does not forget the sparrow when he is dead; for they had been taught that He is an unchanging God; "and," argued Ian, "what God remembers, He thinks of, and what He thinks of, is." But Ian knew that what misses the heart falls under the feet. A man is bound to share his best, not to tumble his seed-pearls into the feeding-trough, to break the teeth of them that are there at meat. He had but lifted a corner to give them a glimpse of the Life eternal, and the girls thought him ridiculous! The human caterpillar that has not yet even begun to sicken with the growth of her psyche-wings, is among the poorest of the human animals!

But Christina was not going to give in! Her one idea of the glory of life was the subjugation of men. As if moved by a sudden impulse, she went close up to him.

"Do not be angry with me," she said, almost coaxingly, but with a visible mingling of boldness and shyness, neither of them quite assumed; for, though conscious of her boldness, she was not frightened; and there was something in the eagle-face that made it easy to look shy. "I did not mean to be rude. I am sorry."

"You mistake me," he said gently. "I only wanted you to know you misjudged my brother."

"Then, if you have forgiven me, you will let me sit for a few minutes! I am so tired with walking in the sticky earth!"

"Do, pray, sit down," responded Ian heartily, and led the way to the bench.

But she sank gracefully at the foot of the next fir, while Mercy sat down on the bench.

"Do go on with your pipe," she said, looking up as she arranged her dress; "I am quite used to smoke. Papa would smoke in church if he dared!"

"Christy! You know he never smokes in the drawing-room!" cried Mercy, scandalized.

"I have seen him—when mamma was away."

Ian began to be a little more interested in the plain one. But what must his mother think to see them sitting there together! He could not help it; if ladies chose to sit down, it was not for him to forbid them! And there was a glimmer of conscience in the younger!

Most men believe only what they find or imagine possible to themselves. They may be sure of this, that there are men so different from them that no judgment they pass upon them is worth a straw, simply because it does not apply to them. I assert of Ian that neither beauty nor intellect attracted him. Imagination would entice him, but the least lack of principle would arrest its influence. The simplest manifestation of a live conscience would draw him more than anything else. I do not mean the conscience that proposes questions, but the conscience that loves right and turns from wrong.

Notwithstanding the damsel's invitation, he did not resume his pipe. He was simple, but not free and easy—too sensitive to the relations of life to be familiar upon invitation with any girl. If she was not one with whom to hold real converse, it was impossible to hlow dandelions with her, and talk must confine itself to the commonplace. After gentlest assays to know what was possible, the result might be that he grew courteously playful, or drew back, and confined himself to the formal.

In the conversation that followed, he soon found the younger capable of being interested, and having seen much in many parts of the world, had plenty to tell her. Christina smiled sweetly, taking everything with over-gentle politeness, but looking as if all that interested her was, that there they were, talking about it. Provoked at last by her persistent lack of genuine reception, Ian was tempted to try her with something different; perhaps she might be moved to horror. Any feeling would be a find! He thought he would tell them an adventure he had read in a book of travels.

In Persia, alone in a fine moonlight night, the traveller had fallen asleep on his horse, but awoke suddenly, roused by something frightful, he did not know what. The evil odor all about him explained, however, his bewilderment and terror. Presently he was bumped on this side, then bumped on that; first one knee, then the other, would be struck; now the calf of one leg was caught, now the calf of the other; then both would be caught at once, and he shoved nearly over his pommel. His horse was very uneasy, but could ill help himself in the midst of a moving mass of uncertain objects. The traveller for a moment imagined himself in a boat on the sea, with a huge quantity of wrecked cargo floating around him, whence came the frequent collisions he was undergoing; but he soon perceived that the vague shapes were boxes, pannierwise on the backs of mules, moving in caravan along the desert. Of not a few the lids were broken, of some gone altogether, revealing their contents—the bodies of good Mussulmans, on their way to the consecrated soil of Mecca for burial. Carelessly shambled the mules along, stumbling as they joggled over the uneven ground, their boxes tilting from side to side, sorely shaken, some of them, in frustration of dying hopes, scattering their contents over the track—for here and there a mule carried but a wreck of his wooden panniers. On and on over the rough gravelly waste, under the dead cold moon, weltered the slow stream of death!

"You may be sure," concluded Ian, "he made haste out of the ruck! But it was with difficulty he got clear, happily to windward—then for an hour sat motionless on his horse, watching through the moonlight the long dark shadow flitting toward its far-off goal. When at length he could no longer descry it, he put his horse to his speed—but not to overtake it."

As he spoke, Mercy's eyes grew larger and larger, never leaving his face. She had at least imagination enough for that! Christina curled her pretty lip, and looked disgusted. The one at a horrible tale was horrified; the other merely disgusted! The one showed herself capable of some reception; the other did not.

"Something might be done with that girl!" thought Ian.

"Did he see their faces?" drawled Christina.

Mercy was silent, but her eyes remained fixed on him. It was Ian's telling, more than the story, impressed her.

"I don't think he mentions them," answered Ian. "But shall I tell you," he went on, "what seems to me the most unpleasant thing about the business?"

"Do," said Christina.

"I think it must be for the poor ghosts to see such a disagreeable fuss made with their old clothes."

Christina smiled.

"Do you think ghosts see what goes on after they are dead?" asked Mercy.

"The ghosts are not dead," said Ian, "and I can't tell. But I am inclined to think some ghosts have to stay a while and look on."

"What would be the good of that?" returned Mercy.

"Perhaps to teach them the little good they were in, or got out of it," he answered. "To have to stick to a thing after it is dead, is terrible, but may teach much."

"I don't understand you," said Mercy.

"The world is not dead!"

"Better and better!" Ian thought with himself. "The girl can understand!—A thing is always dead to you when you have done with it," he answered her. "Suppose you had a ball-dress crumpled and unsightly—the rows on it withered, and the tinsel shining hideously through them—would not the dress be a dead dress?"

"Yes, indeed."

"Then suppose, for something you had done, or for something you would not stop doing, you had to wear that ball-dress till something came about—you would be like the ghosts that cannot get away.—Suppose, when you were old and wrinkled,—"

"You are very amusing, Captain Macrurdh!" said Christina, with a bell-like laugh. But Ian went on.

"Some stories tell us of ghosts with the same old wrinkled faces in which their bodies died. The world and its uses over, they are compelled to haunt it still, seeing how things go, but taking no share in them, beholding the relief their death is to all, feeling they have lost their chance of beauty, and are fixed in ugliness, having wasted being itself! They are like a man in a miserable dream, in which he can do nothing, but in which he must stay, and go dreaming dreaming on without hope of release. To be in a world and have nothing to do with it must be awful! A little more imagination would do some people good!"

"No, please!—no more for me!" said Christina, laughing as she rose.

Mercy was silent. Though she had never really thought about anything herself, she did not doubt that certain people were in earnest about something. She knew that she ought to be good, and she knew she was not good; how to be good she did not know, for she had never set herself to be good. She sometimes wished she were good; but there are thousands of wandering ghosts who would be good if they might without taking trouble: the kind of goodness they desire would not be worth a life to hold it.

Fear is a wholesome element in the human economy; they are merely silly who would banish it from all association with religion. True, there is no religion in fear; religion is love, and love casts out fear; but until a man has love, it is well he should have fear. So long as there are wild beasts about, it is better to be afraid than secure.

The vague awe ready to assail every soul that has not found rest in its source, reader the more honest the soul, has for the first time laid hold of Mercy. The earnest face of the speaker had most to do with it. She had never heard anybody talk like that!

The lady of the house appeared, with kind dignity, asking if they would not take some refreshment: to a highlander hospitality is a law where not a passion. Christina declined the offer.

"Thanks! we were only a little tired," she said, "and are quite rested now. How beautifully sheltered your house is!"

"On the side of the sea, yes," answered Mrs. Macrurdh; "but not much on the east where we want it most. The trees are growing, however!"

When the sisters were out of sight of the cottage—

"Well!" remarked Christina, "he's a nice young man, is he not? Exceedingly well bred! And what taste he has! He knows how to amuse ladies!"

Mercy did not answer.

"I never heard anything so disgusting!" added Christina.

"But," suggested Mercy, "you like to read horrid stories, Chrissy! You said so yesterday! And there was nothing in what he told us that oughtn't to be spoken about."

"What!—not those hideous coffins—and the bodies dropping out of them—all crawling, no doubt?"

"That is your own, Chrissy! You know he did not go so far as that! If Colonel Webberly had told you the story, you would have called it charming—in fun, of course, I mean!"

But Christina never liked the argumentum ad feminam.

"I would not! You know I would not!" she exclaimed. "I do believe the girl has fallen in love with the horrid man! Of the two, I declare, I like the ploughman better. I am sorry I happened to vex him; he is a good stupid sort of fellow! I can't bear this man! How horribly he fixed his eyes on you when he was talking that rubbish about the ball-dress!"

"He was anxious to make himself understood. I know he made me think I must mind what I was about!"

"Oh, nonsense! We didn't come into this wilderness to be preached to by a lay John the Baptist! He is an ill-bred fellow!" She would not have said so much against him, had not Mercy taken his part.

Mercy rarely contradicted her sister, but even this brief passage with a real man had roused the justice in her.

"I don't agree with you, Chrissy," she said. "He seems to me very much of a gentleman!"

She did not venture to say all she felt, not choosing to be at absolute variance with her sister, and the threatened quarrel blew over like a shower in spring.

But some sort of impression remained from the words of Ian on the mind of Mercy, for, the next morning she read a chapter in the book of Genesis, and said a prayer her mother had taught her.

CHAPTER XII.

Among the Hills.

When Mr. and Mrs. Palmer reached Inverness, they found they could spend a few days there, one way and another, to good purpose, for they had friends to visit as well as shopping to do. Mr. Palmer's affairs calling him to the south were not immediately pressing, and their sojourn extended itself to a full week of eight days, during which the girls were under no rule but their own. Their parents regarded them as perfectly to be trusted, nor were the girls aware of any reason why they should not be so regarded.

The window of Christina's bedroom overlooked a part of the road between the New House and the old castle; and she could see from it all the ridge as far as the grove that concealed the cottage; if now they saw more of the young men their neighbors, and were led farther into the wilds, thickets, or pasturage of their acquaintance, I cannot say she had no hand in it.

She was depressed by a keen sense of failure; the boor, as she called him, was much too thick-skinned for any society but that of his bulls! and she had made no progress with the Valentine any more than with the Orson; he was better pleased with her ugly sister than with her own beautiful self!

She would have given neither of the men another thought, but that there was no one else with whom to do any of that huckster business called flirting, which to her had just enough harm in it to make it interesting. Life without it would be a waste! She was one of those who can imagine no beauty or enjoyment in a thing altogether right. She took it for granted that had and beautiful were often one; that all the pleasures of the world owed their delight to a touch, a wash, a tincture of the wicked in them. Such have in themselves so many crooked lines that they fancy nature laid down on lines of crookedness. They think the obliquity the beauty of the campanile, the blurring the charm of the sketch.

I tread on delicate ground—ground which, alas! many girls tread boldly, scattering much feather-bloom from the wings of poor Psyche, gathering for her hoards of unlovely memories, and sowing the seed of many a wish that they had done differently. They cannot pass over such ground and escape having their nature more or less vulgarized. I do not speak of anything counted wicked, but of gambling with the precious and lovely things of the deepest human relation. If a girl with such an experience marry a man she loves—with what power of loving may be left such a one—will she not now and then remember something it would be joy to discover she had but dreamed? will she be able always to forget certain cabinets in her brain which "it would not do" to throw open to the husband who thinks her simple as well as innocent? Honesty and truth, God's essentials, are perhaps more lacking in ordinary intercourse between young men and women than anywhere else. Greed and selfishness are as busy there as in money-making and ambition. Thousands on both sides are constantly seeking more than their share—more also than they even intend to return value for. Thousands of girls have been made sad for life by the speeches of a man careful all the time to say nothing that amounted to a pledge! I do not forget that many a woman who would otherwise have been worth little, has for her sorrow found such consolation that she has become rich before God; these words hold nevertheless:—"It must needs be that do offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh!"

On a morning two days later, Christina called Mercy, rather imperiously, to get ready at once for their usual walk. She obeyed, and they set out. Christina declared she was perishing with cold, and they walked fast. By and by they saw on the road before them the two brothers walking slow; one was reading, the other listening. When they came nearer they descried in Alister's hand a manuscript volume; Ian carried an old-fashioned fowling-piece. It was a hard frost, which was perhaps the cause of Alister's leisure so early in the day.

Hearing the light steps of the girls behind them the men turned. The laird was the first to speak. The plough and the fierce bulls not there to bewilder their judgment, the young women immediately discovered their perception in the matter of breelling to be less infallible than they had imagined it: no well-bred woman could for a moment doubt the man before them as a gentleman—though his carriage was more courteous and more natural than is often seen in a Mayfair drawing-room, and his English a little old-fashioned. Ian was at once more like and more unlike other people. His manner was equally courteous, but notably stiffer; he was as much at his ease, but more reserved. To use a figure, he did not step out so far to meet them. They walked on together.

"You are a little earlier than usual this morning, ladies!" remarked the chief.

"How do you know that, Mr. Macruadh?" rejoined Christina.

"I often see you pass—and till now always at the same hour."

"And yet we have never met before!"

"The busy and the"—he hesitated a moment—"unbusy seldom meet," said the chief.

"Why don't you say the idle," suggested Christina.

"Because that would be rude."

"Why would it be rude? Most people, I suppose, are more idle than busy!"

"Idle is a word of blame; I had no right to use it."

"I should have taken you for one of those who always speak their minds."

"I hope I do, when it is required, and I have any to speak."

"You prefer judging with closed doors!" The chief was silent; he did not understand her. Did she want him to say he did not think them idle? Or, if they were, that they were quite right?

"I think it hard," resumed Christina, with a tone of injury, almost of suffering, in her voice, "that we should be friendly and open with people, and they all the time thinking of us in a way it would be rude to tell us! It is enough to make one vow never to speak to—anybody again!"

Alister turned and looked at her. What could she mean?

"You can't think it hard," he said, "that people should not tell you what they think of you the moment they first see you!"

"They might at least tell us what they mean by calling us idle!"

"I said not busy."

"Is every body to blame that is idle?" persisted Christina.

"Perhaps my brother will answer you that question," said Alister.

"If my brother and I tell you honestly what we thought of you when first we saw you," said Ian, "will you tell us honestly what you thought of us?"

The girls cast an involuntary glance at each other, and when their eyes met, could not keep them from looking conscious. A twitching also at the corners of Mercy's mouth, showed they had been saying more than they would care to be cross-questioned upon.

"Ah, you betray yourselves, ladies!" Ian said. "It is all very well to challenge us, but you are not prepared to lead the way!"

"Girls are never allowed to lead!" said Christina. "The men are down on them the moment they dare!"

"I am not that way inclined," answered Ian. "If man or woman lead for anything, success will justify the leader. I will propose another thing!"

"What is it?" asked Christina.

"To agree that, when we are about to part, with no probability of meeting again in this world, we shall speak out plainly what we think of each other!"

"But that will be such a time!" said Christina.

"In a world that turns quite round every twenty four hours, it may be a very short time!"

"We shall be coming every summer, though I hope not to stay through another winter!"

"Changes come when they are least expected!"

"We cannot know," said Alister, "that we shall never meet again!"

"There the probabilities will be enough!"

"But how can we come to a better—I mean a fairer opinion of each other, when we meet so seldom?" asked Mercy, innocently.

"This is only the second time they have met, and already we are not quite strangers!" said Christina.

"On the other hand," said Alister, "we have been within call for more than two months, and this is our second meeting!"

"Well, who has not called?" said Christina.

The young men were silent. They did not care to discuss the question as to which mother was to blame in the matter. They were now in the bottom of the valley, had left the road, and were going up the side of the burn, often in single file, Alister leading, and Ian bringing up the rear, for the valley was thickly strewn with lumps of gray rock, of all shapes and sizes. They seemed to have rolled down the hill on the other side of the burn, but there was no sign of their origin: the hill was covered with grass below, and with heather above. Such was the winding of the way among the stones—for path there was none—that again and again no one of them could see another. The girls felt the strangeness of it, and began to experience, without knowing it, a little of the power of solitary places.

After walking thus for some distance, they found their leader halted.

"Here we have to cross the burn," he said, "and go a long way up the other side."

"You want to be rid of us!" said Christina.

"By no means," replied Alister. "We are delighted to have you with us. But we must not let you get tired before turning to go back."

"If you really do not mind, we should like to go a good deal farther. I want to see round the turn there, where another hill comes from behind and closes up the view. We haven't anybody to go with us, and have seen nothing of the country. The men won't take us shooting; and mamma is always so afraid we will lose ourselves, or fall down a few precipices, or get into a bog, or be eaten by wild beasts!"

"If [this frost last, we shall have time to show you something of it. I see you can walk!"

"We can walk well enough, and should so like to get to the top of a mountain!"

"For the crossing then!" said Alister, and turning to the burn, jumped and jumped it, as if to let them see how to do it.

The bed of the stream was at the spot narrowed by two rocks, so that, though there was little of it, the water went through with a roar, and a force to take a man off his legs. It was too wide for the ladies, and they stood eyeing it with dismay, fearing an end to their walk and the pleasant companionship.

"Do not be frightened, ladies," said Alister; "it is not too wide for you."

"You have the advantage of us in your dress!" said Christina.

"I will get you over quite safe," returned the chief.

Christina looked as if she could not trust herself to him.

"I will try," said Mercy.

"Jump high," answered Alister, as he sprang again to the other side, and held out his hand across the chasm.

"I can neither jump high nor far!" said Mercy.

"Don't be in a hurry. I will take you—no, not by the hand; that might slip—but by the wrist. Do not think how far you can jump; all you have to do is to jump. Only jump as high as you can."

Mercy could not help feeling frightened—the water rushed so fast and loud below.

"Are you sure you can get me over?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Then I will jump."

She sprang, and Alister, with a strong pull on her arm, landed her easily.

"It is your turn now," he said, addressing Christina.

She was rather white, but tried to laugh.

"I—I—I don't think I can!" she said.

"It is really nothing," persuaded the chief.

"I am sorry to be a coward, but I fear I was born one."

"Some feelings nobody can help," said Ian, "but nobody need give way to them. One of the bravest men I ever knew would always start aside if the meanest little cur in the street came larking at him; and yet on one occasion when the people were running in all directions, he took a mad dog by the throat, and held him. Come, Alister! you take her by one arm and I will take her by the other."

The chief sprang to her side, and the moment she felt the grasp of the two men, she had the needful courage. The three jumped together, and were presently walking merrily along the other bank, over the same kind of ground, and in the same order—Ian bringing up the rear.

The ladies were startled by a gun going off close behind them.

"I beg your pardon," said Ian, "but I could not let the rascal go."

"What have you killed?" asked his brother.

"Only one of my own family—a red-haired fellow!" answered Ian, leaving the path and going up the hill.

The girls looked, but saw nothing, and following him a few yards, came to him behind a stone.

"Goodness, gracious!" exclaimed Christina, with horror in her tone, "it's a fox!—Is it possible you have shot a fox?"

The men laughed.

"And why not?" asked Alister, as if he had no idea what she could mean. "Is the fox a sacred animal in the south?"

"It's worse than poaching!" she cried.

"Hardly!" returned Alister. "No doubt you may get a good deal of fun out of Reynard, but you can't make game of him! Why—you look as if you had lost a friend! I admire his intellect, but we can't afford to feed it on chickens and lambs."

"But to shoot him!"

"Why not? We do not respect him here. He is a rascal, to be sure, but then he has no money, and consequently no friends!"

"He has many friends! What would Christian or Mr. Sercombe say to shooting, actually shooting a fox!"

"You treat him as if he were red gold!" said the chief. "We build temples neither to Reynard or Mammon here. In the south they seem to worship both!"

"Oh, no, they don't!" said Mercy.

"That is only what poor people say!"

"Do they not respect the rich man because he is rich, and look down on the poor man because he is poor?" said Ian. "Though the rich man be a wretch, they think him grand; though the poor man be like Jesus Christ, they pity him!"

"And shouldn't the poor be pitied?" said Christina.

"Not except they need pity."

"Is it not pitiable to be poor?"

"By no means. It is pitiable to be wretched—and that, I venture to suspect, the rich are oftener than the poor.—But as to master Reynard there—instead of shooting him, what would you have had us do with him?"

"Hunt him, to be sure."

"Would he like that better?"

"What he would like is not the question.

The sport is the thing."

"That will show you why he is not scared here: we do not hunt him. It would be impossible to hunt this country; you could not ride the ground. Besides, there are such multitudes of holes, the bounds would scarcely have a chance. No; and the only dog to send after the fellow is a leaden one."

"There's another!" exclaimed the chief—"there! sneaking away!—and your gun not loaded, Ian!"

"I'm so glad!" said Christina. "He at least will escape you!"

"And some poor lamb in the spring won't escape him!" returned Alister.

"Lambs are meant to be eaten!" said Christina.

"Yes; but a lamb might think it hard to feed such a creature!"

"If the fox is of no good in the world," said Mercy, "why was he made?"

"He can't be of no good," answered the chief. "What if some things are, just that we may get rid of them?"

"Could they be made just to be got rid of?"

"I said—that we might get rid of them: there is all the difference in that. The very first thing men had to do in the world was to fight beasts."

"I think I see what you mean," said Mercy: "if there had been no wild beasts to fight with, men would never have grown able for much!"

"That is it," said Alister. "They were awful beasts! and they had poor weapons to fight them with—neither guns nor knives!"

"And who knows," suggested Ian, "what good it may be to the fox himself to make the best of a greedy life!"

"But what is the good to us of talking about such things?" said Christina.

"They're not interesting!"

The remark silenced the brothers: were indeed could be used without interest?

But Mercy, though she could hardly have said she found the conversation very interesting, felt there was something in the men that cared to talk about such things, that must be interesting if she could only get at it. They were not like any other men she had met?

Christina's whole interest in men was the admiration she looked for and was sure of receiving from them. Mercy had hitherto found their company stupid.

To acknowledge an error is to confess oneself wiser than he was. To do so to man is a noble; to humble oneself before God is sublime. The penitent and the impenitent sinner are the clauses into which it is of the most value to divide mankind. On the one side hardness, on the other softness of heart. To the one is turned God's face as a flint, to the other His countenance as that of a tender father. If the wicked man will but reverse the stylus with which he writes his biography in the Great Book, he may be sure that angels will drop tears over the erasures, and God will no longer brim but smile, such is the comfort of the Promise. But confession must always precede forgiveness. It is manly and womanly, and God demands it of men and women, as only a natural condition precedent.

CHURCH OF THE HOLY COMMUNION, NEW YORK.

The Church of the Holy Communion of the City of New York has the high honor of having been founded by the distinguished Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg. Its history dates from the year 1846. Most parishes develop by slow degrees, advancing in the form and methods of their Church life; this one, through the foresight of Dr. Muhlenberg, started at once in a mode of activity to which others have come only by many steps. The Church of the Holy Communion was the first free church in this country, the first to have daily Morning and Evening Prayer, the first to have the Holy Communion weekly, the first to have early Christmas and Easter celebrations, the first to decorate the chancel with flowers on festival days, the first to establish a boy choir, the first in the whole English speaking Church to introduce a sisterhood, for its sisterhood antedates those of England. All these now common features of a large and active city parish were started here by Dr. Muhlenberg. St. Luke's Hospital was also a child of his mind and heart.

The present rector of this interesting parish, the Rev. Henry Mottet, was born in Stuttgart, Germany, May 20, 1845. The family were originally French Huguenots. One branch came over and settled in New Rochelle, N. Y., another migrated to Port Royal, S. C., and the third, to which the subject of our sketch belongs, took residence in Switzerland. Mr. Mottet's father was connected with the Swiss embassy to Germany, and it was during the temporary stay of his parents there on this service that he was born in Stuttgart.

At the age of nine he came to the United States. His preparatory education was received at the New York Grammar School No. 33, from which he passed to the College of the City of New York, where he was graduated in 1869. For five years he was engaged in teaching in the public schools of the city. At the expiration of this period he entered the General Theological Seminary passing the junior as well as the entrance examinations, and beginning at middle year, by which he was able to be graduated after a course of two years' duration.

While a student in the seminary he assisted the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg as a licensed lay-reader, and on graduation, being in the deacon's order, he became the recognized assistant in the parish, and continued in this relation under the ministry of the much-beloved Rev. Dr. Francis E. Lawrence, Dr. Muhlenberg's successor. Mr. Mottet is in person spare, wiry and active in temperament, deeply in earnest, and in manner kind and affectionate. His qualities of character endeared him to the people, and on the death of Dr. Lawrence, in 1879, he was elected rector. This election was significant of the affection and confidence which he had already won. The Church of the Holy Communion has instead of a vestry a board of trustees. In electing a rector notice is given on three successive Sundays designating time and place where the congregation can express their wish by nomination. In this instance there were three nominees, two of whom received one vote each, and Mr. Mottet all the rest. He was therefore chosen unanimously by the board of trustees.

The flourishing condition of the parish fully justifies the wisdom of this selection. For the year 1883 the voluntary contributions for all purposes amounted to over $33,000, which was fully one-fifth more than the highest receipts that had ever been reached in the parish until then; but in 1884 the receipts went far beyond this, reaching a total of $48,211.19. It is peculiar to this church that its work is entirely one of faith. No pledges are exacted, and no appeals made. Facts only are stated, and the truth is left to make its impression on the hearts of the people. As an instance, on hundred and seventy are received during three months. This Summer Home is in Westchester County and comprises, besides buildings, ninety-five acres of ground.

Of several of these organizations a few additional words are important. The dispensary is the first established in this city, and is of excellent service in furnishing medicine and medical attendance to needy parishioners. The Sisters' House was erected by the late Mr. and Mrs. John H. Swift to the memory of their daughter, Virginia Swift. It is used as a home for the "Sisterhood of the Holy Communion," and for the lay workers who are in charge of the Home for the Aged and the Babies' Shelter. The Training School for Servants has recently been organized. The girls, particularly orphans, who are in preparation for domestic service, have also their residence in the Sisters' House, and are expected while there to assist in the care of the parish charities, the instruction being designed to lead them to become intelligent, self-supporting Christian women. On Sundays the first floor of the house is occupied by Bible Classes, and on week-day evenings by Mothers' Meetings and a Working Girls' Club. This house, which has been thoroughly renovated and re-furnished, during the past summer, depends almost entirely upon donations in order to support its work and provide for its inmates. An account of the re-opening of it and of the Babies' Shelter by the assistant-bishop of the diocese with appropriate services appears elsewhere in our columns.

Very helpful toward this gratifying success is the enthusiasm with which all, old and young, rich and poor, take hold of these various departments of church activity. This spirit pervades the Sunday School which in one year was instrumental in raising for the Babies' Shelter over five thousand dollars. This general participation in the work protects all interests, and thus they are not dependent on the devotion and care of a few individuals only.

The rector and the parish of the Holy Communion prepared for the Advent Mission with many vigorous measures. Eight thousand copies of the "Missioners' Prayer" were circulated in a quiet personal way; notices of services were widely spread; the heads of the principal business establishments were seen and their promise obtained to arrange for the attendance of their employees, and these latter were affectionately invited.

It is often easier to make great sacrifices than little ones, to right some great wrong than to prevent a multitude of small ones. It is easier to do battle for a grand idea than to give up a prejudice, to establish a man's right to citizenship than to respect in silence his right to dress as he pleases. Yet it is the little things of life that contribute most largely to its fret and worry, or to its peace and gladness; and he who possesses the true spirit of conciliation knows that no right is to be respected, no kindness too trifling to be rendered, no part of life too insignificant to command consideration.

THE REV. HENRY MOTTET.—(Photographed by Rockwood.)

the first Sunday of 1885 the rector, in reviewing the field of parish work, threw out suggestions as to how important and needed advance could be made in benevolent effort. As a result, within that same week offers of financial support in the direction which had been set forth came in to the aggregate of $12,000.

The Church of the Holy Communion has nine hundred enrolled communicants, seven hundred members in its Sunday-school, and three hundred and fifty in its Industrial school. It has a great number of parochial organizations covering all the usual objects of charitable work, and besides these a Dispensary, a Sisters' House, a Home for Aged Women with twenty-six inmates, a Shelter for Respectable girls, and Training School for Servants having fifteen inmates, a Babies' Shelter with twenty-four inmates, a Working Men's Club numbering two hundred and thirty members, and a Summer Home for the poor, where an average of one

"MAKE THOU ALL HIS BED IN HIS SICKNESS."

BY ELIZABETH ROBINSON SCOTL.

Tossing restless on his pillow
Through the long, long, weary night,
Lies the sick man, watching sadly
For the blessed morning light.
All the pleasant things that pleased him
Vanished from his daily life,
Knowing that the new day brings him
Only weakness for the strife.

What was once a couch of comfort
Turned into a bed of pain.
Tender touch of wife or mother
Tries to soothe it, but in vain.
So we turn to Him whose presence
All the dark as light doth make,
For His angels guard the sleeping,
While He stays with those who wake.*

And we ask that from this pillow
He will take the thorns away,
Make this bed of restless anguish
Soft as faith and patience may,
Teach the lessons that are needed,
Still the doubts, the love inflame,
Shield him while he lies there helpless,
Raise him up to praise His name.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

BY THE REV. J. I. MOMBERT, D. D.

Much has been said and written of the catacombs, those standing monuments of the character and genius of primitive Christianity in western Europe, but excepting the instructive and fascinating pages of the slender volume, entitled "Christian Institutes," from the gifted pen of my sainted examiner and friend, the late Dean Stanley, I cannot recall any book in Christian literature which deals with the subject so comprehensively, and indicates so clearly, graphically, and, I may add, poetically, its vast and many-sided bearing and interest.

Foremost, and of constant recurrence in those chambers of the dead, inscribed with the prevailing thoughts uppermost in the minds of Christian mourners, and ornamented with the symbols expressive of their thought, their feelings, and their faith, is the figure of the Good Shepherd. That figure, now, I rejoice to think, restored to the prominence given to it in primitive Christianity, not only in the catacombs of Rome, but in primitive Christian literature, is perhaps the most expressive of all Christian symbols.

Before I take up this thought, the allusion just made to early Christian literature, deserves a brief expansion. I refer to a book, unquestionably the product of the second century, which for several centuries enjoyed a popularity, continuous with Christendom, extending from the shores of Italy, throughout the lands washed by the Mediterranean, to the remote regions of Abyssinia, and excelled in modern times only by Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." I mean the "Shepherd of Hermas," which, though often bound up with the Scriptures, and regarded as inspired, was never raised to the dignity and authority of a canonical book. That part of the allegory, from which its title is derived, bears upon the matter in hand, and runs thus:

"After I had been praying at home, and had sat down on my couch, there entered a man glorious in appearance, dressed like a shepherd, with a white goat's skin, a wallet on his shoulders, and a staff in his hand, and saluted me. I returned his salutation, and forthwith he sat down beside me, and said unto me, 'I have been sent by a most venerable angel to dwell with thee the remaining days of thy life.' I thought he had come to tempt me, and said unto him: 'Who art thou? For I know unto whom I am committed.' He said unto me: 'Dost thou not know me?' 'No,' said I. Then he said: 'I am that shepherd to whom thou art committed.' Whilst he was yet speaking, his figure was changed, and then I knew that it was he to whom I had been committed; I became confused, fear took hold of me, and was utterly overwhelmed with grief for having spoken so foolishly unto him. He said unto me: 'Be not confounded, but receive strength in thy mind from the commandments which I am about to give unto thee. For I have been sent,' said he, 'to show again unto thee all those things which thou hast seen before, especially those which are most profitable unto thee. First of all, then, write down my commandments and similitudes, and the other things put down as I shall show thee. For I bid thee write the commandments and similitudes first, that thou mayest the more easily read and keep them.'

Then I wrote down the commandments and similitudes, even as he bade me. Which things, if when ye have heard them, ye shall keep and walk in them, and exercise with a pure mind, ye shall receive from the Lord all that He has promised unto you. But if, after having heard them, ye do not repent, continuing to add to your sins, then shall ye receive from the Lord adverse things. All these words did that Shepherd, the angel of repentance, command me to write."

From this remarkable extract we gather one idea of the popular Christianity of the earliest ages; from the catacombs we cull another. The figure of the Shepherd traced on their walls is that of a strong and beautiful youth, the crook, or the shepherd's pipe in one hand, a lamb laid on his shoulders, held with the other. We might almost fancy here a reminiscence of Grecian art, or at least a connection with the then still living, but now extinct religion of paganism. Why should this figure not be the representation of Hermes with the ram, or of Apollo playing with his pipes to the flocks of Admetus, especially since in one of these delineations the figure of the Shepherd is surrounded by the Three Graces? We may admit, I think, that the pagan mythology, or, if the term be preferred, pagan poetry, did in this instance supply the beautiful youth. For beauty and goodness were indissolubly connected and united in the classic mind; one word expressed both, the beautiful was good, and the good was beautiful; and thus, I imagine, it came to pass when the early Christians read in St. Luke's Gospel the parable of the lost sheep, of the Good Shepherd going after the stray sheep, and having found it, carrying it home on his shoulders rejoicing, and in St. John's Gospel the words in which Jesus, so touchingly, so lovingly, so beautifully explains why He is the Good Shepherd, in the simplicity of their faith and the strength of their warm affection, clothed the most beautiful ideal of perfect physical manhood with the attribute of perfect moral manhood. They took the most beautiful man and invested him with the attribute of infinite love, exalting the Apollo of paganism into the beautiful figure of the Good Shepherd, radiant, happy, rejoicing. How far the instruction of Oriental teachers may have deepened or moulded that feeling, or rather the expression of it, we may not be able to indicate, but that the early preachers of the Gospel in their running comment on the passages of the evangelical record already referred to, did dwell on the courage and the love of the Palestinian shepherd, and pointed to the analogy of the Apennines we cannot doubt. The second idea, then, to be drawn from the figure of the Good Shepherd in the catacombs is that of love, true, broad, deep, Catholic love, filling the hearts and moulding the lives of the sainted and martyred dead, whose ashes lie or lay in that church among the dead.

This is especially clear from a striking departure from the ordinary and typical delineation of the figure of the Good Shepherd, carrying a lamb or surrounded by sheep in the attitude of meek docility, or sullen and unreasoning disregard with their faces turned away from Him. The departure is the substitution of a kid of the goats for a lamb of the fold. The cold indifference of the pagan world, the revolting and fanatical selfishness of the perverters of the Mosaic code, so scathingly rebuked by Christ, and the fierce bigotry of a man like Tertullian, uniting in the sentiment that the sheep, that is, the wealthy or distinguished mortals among the Gentiles, the chosen few of the house of Israel, or the chosen few in the Church were to be saved, and the rest of mankind, that is, the goats, were repudiated and doomed to perish—that was not the religion of the Christians who worshipped in the catacombs—they believed in the seeking love of Christ, and emphasized their belief in One who came to seek and to save that which was lost, in the touching representation of the Beautiful Good Shepherd who tenderly carries in His bosom a kid of the goats.

All honor and gratitude to the sainted dead, most of them uncanonized by ecclesiastical procedure, but exalted to a high place in the kingdom of heaven, who still proclaim to us what they felt, believed, and hoped for, and by those expressive symbols put to the blush the Pharisaic intolerance and bigotry, which still continues here and there.

There is yet another connection or association of the Good Shepherd which occurs to me as I write. I refer to the exquisite cartoon of Raphael, now in the South Kensington museum, which treats of the charge to St. Peter. It is one of the most interesting and touching creations of the genius of Raphael. I would call special attention to the fact seldom noticed, but doubtless connected with the Charge, and the working of the apostle's conscience, that the ideas of the Shepherd, the Pastor, and the pastoral relation stand out quite prominently in his first epistle. The Petrine idea, and, indeed, the idea of all the Catholic epistles, is the seeking love of Christ, anticipated, and certainly foretold, if not prefigured, in the Psalms, especially the twenty-third, and the touching concluding verse of the hundred and nineteenth. The Church of the Dispersion, the strangers scattered, etc., are the sheep of the house of Israel and the early converts to Christianity. At one time all to whom he sent his epistle had been like sheep, straying, but found, recovered and restored to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

Again, who that recalls the conduct of Peter, and the solemn, tender, earnest admonition of the Lord, so emphatically repented, "Feed my sheep," "Feed my lambs," can doubt that the memory of those words lay in his mind, and was echoed in the exhortation: "The elders which are among you, I exhort, who am also an elder, . . . pasture the flock of God which is among you . . . not as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock. And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

St. Peter's example and faithful pastoring of the Church, attested by the evidence of the epistle, is a far nobler, truer and more beautiful illustration of the seeking love of a Christian bishop in the imitation of Christ, than the distorted, not historical, almost certainly mythical Quo vadis and inverted crucifixion, fabled in the Lives of the Saints, and books inspired by them.

MORE "WORDS OF COMFORT."

BY THE REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

"Having read your 'Words of Comfort' with much pleasure, I venture to beg that you will again write on the subject. If I could only believe that He will bow down His ear to me; or will He let me be like unto them that go down to the pit? I try hard not to give up in despair. Will He really comfort my heart? Hoping to hear from you through THE CHURCHMAN, etc."

Thus runs a letter from a total stranger, who only signs herself, "One who tries to hope and trust." I reply the best I can. Maybe, you have only the blues. If you have what we sometimes dignify with the name of doubts, let them alone, and like sparks in a blacksmith shop, they will go out of themselves. Indifference to them makes a good apron of leather. Or, push them off, as you do bones in eating fish—off on the edge of your plate. Bones for the body, doubts for the soul, make poor diet.

You write like a Churchwoman. Then act like one, live like one; and when the time comes, die like one. You may say in reply, "Oh, yes, but you have not my trials, nor yet my temperament, nor possibly my temptations." Granted. Still, my advice is sound, for all that. I know, too, that even in bravery is an admixture of fear, but it is not cowardice. Nor have I died yet, and therefore, perhaps I ought to be careful how I tell people how to do it. Addison sent for a fast earl and showed him how a Christian could die. And the martyrs. Still, if it be noble to die well, is it not nobler to live well? Live life well, do duty aright, and the blues will change color and beat a retreat. If you are a Churchwoman, you are well instructed in holy things, for, were even the pulpit faithless, the Church has not left herself without a witness in her book of Common Prayer, the reflex of her other Book, the Word of Life. I say hers; for wrote she it not? Before it was, she was; and the writers are her officers, her witnesses, and she the keeper and interpreter of the Holy Writ. Perhaps there are many troubled as you are, and my words may reach them. Be true to God, and He will be true to you. Stand by the Church, strive to catch the inspiration of her mind, and act and live it out—reproduce her lowly and trusting spirit, and "as face answereth to face in water," so will answer your heart to hers, and all shall go well for this life and the next, for the mercies of David are sure, and the promises of God, Yea and Amen.

You say you "try hard." Then try harder. Keep on trying. Endure hardness as a good soldier. Once in the ranks, never desert. Bear the forced march; put up with the rations; face the enemy, for, "resist evil and it will flee from you."

Said Goethe: "Epochs of faith are epochs of fruitfulness." Lives of trust have ever been lives of nobleness. So, trust on, till trusting comes as easily as breathing. Don't try to give yourself importance by doubting! It is one and a very insidious form of self-conceit. Ten to one you are better and holier than you think. I am sure you have days of clear skies. Go out and stand under them; walk abroad; look around; down with the umbrella; sing and make a joyful noise. God means you to. Quit brooding; He is your father; He means you when He says "My child;" He is Love; He has given eternal hope to every creature. Trust Him, and distrust only yourself, and go on living and doing, and sing no de profundis, but a jubilate, for He covereth the head in the day of battle, and will "give us our hearts' desire, and deny not the request of our lips." (If you are wilfully sinful, that is another thing; does your conscience accuse you or excuse you of this? If excuse, then comfort yourself with these words of Comfort:

"Will he really comfort my heart?" "Am I meant?" This is a common difficulty, yet, folks sometimes take a pride even in humility. Are you of so much consequence as to be excluded? Why, you are swallowed up in the love of God. God does not so much love as He is love. It is His essence. He loves as the flower exhales, and the sun emits. Love is His being. Caesar could call every soldier of his great armies by name. God knows each child of His vast family, from our eldest brother down to the least prattler at his knee, and the least babe born into the circle. You shut out! If so, it is by wilful and persistent sin. If you be no such sinner, but really and truly "one trying to hope and trust," then you are included, and can't escape the infinite embrace, I might say, if you would. Don't be a spoiled child. Don't be selfish. Don't require too much coaxing. All is well. Trust your Father. Take your place at the board. If prodigal, come home; stay away no more. Don't disturb the family quiet and happiness by a false importance. Of course, you're wanted. Of course, it is all for you, just the same as if you were the only one around the great hearth, where the fire is aglow, and the coals so red that even a stray tramp feels that he is welcome, if only he come in good intent, and behave him well. "Are you meant in all the promises?" Read my "Divine Debtor," when it comes out in this series, and you will see not only how much you are wanted, how truly you are loved, how fully all is as much for you as if you were the only one, but how wonderfully you are honored by being allowed to share it all, and how rigidly you may reckon with God, and hold Him up in the very closest sort of calculation, to the "promises" which He has vouchsafed to make you.

And now I pause, though much would I like to go on. Stay in the family. Don't be ugly. Keep to the Church. Says the Jewish Ossian: "She is beautiful as Tirzah, and comely as Jerusalem; her teeth are like a flock of sheep which go up from the washing; her lips are a thread of scarlet." May she never, like Peter, deny her Master; do thou never deny her. "Grow in grace;" expect not to leap into it. Some Christians are mere Bedouins; they ramble and wander, and spend much of their time pitching and striking their tents. Others are a sort of idiots—they never attain to much. Life is a prolonged childhood; faith, weak as ever; the walk, feeble and tottering; general development, feeble. I am not personal; I know not even who you are. Take all the promises and comforts to yourself, greedily. A multitude can listen to a band, and all (and each) have the music. A million can view a landscape, and each eye own and appropriate it as if no other eye were on it. Excuse all this, if I be far off the mark. If I knew you, or more of you, I might strike nearer. Once more, and finally, if you love God, the Saviour, and the Church, and are trying as you say you are, your doubt and despair are wicked. Love more, and you will doubt less! There is a sort of spiritual "specific gravity" here; love displaces doubt, and trust, despair. May you yet be able to cry your glad "Eureka!"

THE CHRISTMAS BAZAAR.

For the Benefit of the New York Exchange for Women's Work.

BY MRS. ELLEN E. DICKINSON.

At no one of the shops where novelties are displayed to tempt purchasers of Christmas gifts, are choicer or more beautiful articles than can be found at the bazaar now open for visitors at the Exchange for Woman's Work, 329 Fifth Avenue. Everything that can be manufactured by the deft manipulations of a woman's fingers seems to have found a place for exhibition in these elegant show-rooms—such as every variety of Kensington stitching, decorated china, water-colors, oil-paintings, fancy articles in endless variety, toys, baby outfits, children's clothes, etc. Three rooms are tastefully arranged with an embarrassment of pretty trifles and more substantial articles, all suitable for holiday remembrances. Besides these new devices there are choice old laces, India shawls, jewelry, historical fans, and other elegant articles that have been sent to the society for sale by ladies who are obliged to part with them.

In the lunch-room, in the basement of the building, will be found the English puddings, for which the society has become so famous, sending them not only to various parts of this country, but to our mother country, for sale.

The Christmas sales will continue through December. Besides this bazaar for the benefit of the Exchange, there is to be an entertainment at the Academy of Music, at which Salvini has offered to perform. This will take place the 21st of December. Seats and boxes can be secured at the Exchange.

It is only one year since this society removed to Fifth Avenue from East Twentieth Street, where the building was too small to accommodate the increasing demands made upon it. A gentleman gave $10,000 to make this change. During the year previous to removal the sales of consignments amounted to a little more than $9,000. During the past year they have amounted to over $38,000, showing that with a more convenient locality for the patrons of the Exchange, and better facilities for business, as well as the appearance of success, the income has been more than doubled. This is an exchange of money for woman's work, and is intended as a means of assisting impecunious ladies in a self-support. The industries received are sold on a commission of ten per cent. Mrs. William G. Choate is President of the Society, and Mrs. Dr. Agnew is Vice-President. These ladies, with a number of other managers who are well and prominently known in social circles, are nobly aiding in the thorough establishment of this long-needed encouragement to ladies who have been reared in comfort, and through misfortune find it necessary to earn a precarious living. It is not ten years since the Exchange was opened in two rooms, with thirty articles for sale. Its growth has been rapid. The society needs money now to make some further additions to the work, such as a bureau to supply educated women with places as governesses and teachers. Also to assist in paying the rent of the house in Twentieth Street, of which the lease is unexpired. Certainly, if there is any class of people in our great city to be commiserated, it is the struggling, impoverished educated women who are trying to keep the wolf from the door. The Exchange opens the way to assist such women, and to smooth the rough edges of broken fortunes, frequently by timely hints and encouragement; developing some half-hidden talent into such perfection that they go on their way rejoicing and hopeful.

NOVEMBER 25th, 1884-1885.

BY M. T. B.

A year in Paradise! a year
Of holy calm and peaceful rest,
Of converse sweet with kinsfolk dear,
And happy ones forever blest.

A year in Paradise—at last—
After a life of busy care,
In gentleness and patience passed,
In words of love, and earnest prayer.

A year in Paradise! How bright
Those endless days of joy must be!
For Thou, O Lord, perpetual light
Dost shed on those that rest in Thee.

At rest in Paradise! And we Still live and labor here below.
Lord grant us all at last to be Together, and that rest to know.

ANYTHING which makes religion its second object makes religion no object. God will put up with a great many things in the human heart, but there is one thing He will not put up with in it—a second place. He who offers God a second place, offers Him no place.—Ruskin.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

JACK'S TEMPTATION.

Jack sat on the porch steps, one bright Saturday morning in October, whittling busily away, and whistling as blithely as any bird. He had finished all his morning duties and was trying to decide whether he should spend his holiday in shooting or in fishing.

The question was decided for him by Ned Evans, his chum and desk-mate, who paused at the gate, with his fishing-rods over his shoulder, to call:

"Don't you want to go fishing, Jack? I'm going up to Long Pond to stay all day. Come on and go along."

Jack needed no second invitation.

"I'll be ready in a minute, Ned," he answered. "Come in and wait till I get a little lunch, and hunt up my lines. I won't be long."

"While Ned rested himself on the steps to wait for his companion, Jack hastened to the kitchen, and coaxed his busy mother to stop her work long enough to put up a bountiful lunch for him, and then he went in search of his fishing lines.

Jack never could find any of his possessions without having a good hunt for them first.

"Have a place for everything, and keep everything in its place, Jack," his mother used to say to him sometimes, after he had turned almost everything in the house topsy-turvy in his search for some lost article, but Jack would always answer:

"That's just exactly what I do, mother dear. My place is every where, and I always keep things there; that's why I have to hunt so long for them."

"Come and help me look for my fishing lines, Ned," he said as he heard his friend beating an impatient tattoo with his feet as he waited for Jack. "I can't think where I put them last time I had them."

The two boys went up-stairs together, and going to Jack's room, rummaged in all his drawers and boxes in vain.

"Oh, I know where they are," exclaimed Jack, suddenly, his face brightening up. "I am sure I left them in Aunt Martha's room on the window-sill. I wonder if they are there yet."

Aunt Martha's room was the one spot in the house that Jack seldom invaded, but he could see her moving around down in the garden, bending over her flowers, so he did not hesitate to enter the room in search of his missing tackle.

He had not been mistaken for once, and pushing aside the curtain by which they were partly concealed, he found them just where he had left them a day or two before, when he had gone to Aunt Martha's room to take her a letter.

In his delight at regaining possession of his treasures he forgot to look where he was going, and carelessly stumbled against a small stand, upon which stood the tray with the remains of Aunt Martha's breakfast.

She was an invalid, and always had her breakfast sent up to her carefully arranged on the tray, and served in some of the delicate old china that had been a family heirloom.

Jack's careless push overturned the light stand, and with a loud crash the tray fell upon the floor before he could make an effort to save it.

He looked at the wreck in dismay. Broken bits of china were scattered all about, while the remains of the cream and coffee poured over the carpet in little brown and yellow streams.

"What will Aunt Martha say?" exclaimed Jack, stooping to gather up some of the little pieces of china. "She will be awfully angry at me, for she's often told me not to come in here, unless she was here, too, but I just wanted to get my fishing lines, and I never thought of doing any harm."

Old Tabby, the cat, came in just then, and came over to Jack, rubbing lovingly against him, and purring loudly as he patted her. She saw the cream and began to lap it up eagerly, wondering, no doubt, how it had happened that a lunch, so much to her liking, had been put in such a convenient place for her.

"Oh, dear, there comes Aunt Martha now," exclaimed Jack, as he saw Aunt Martha coming slowly up the garden walk, leaning on her stick. "Now, I'll catch it, and I 'spose I won't get to go fishing either."

"Come here, quick, I have an idea," exclaimed Ned, leading Jack from the room and closing the door softly after them. "Now the cat is shut up in there, and everybody will think she upset the table, trying to get the cream, and no one will suspect you at all. Let's start off now. We'll go down the back stairs, and then Aunt Martha won't know that we have been up-stairs at all."

The boys stole softly down the back way and started off on their fishing expedition before Aunt Martha had slowly mounted the stairs and gone to her room.

Ned laughed as he thought of the clever way in which he had saved Jack from punishment, and he tried to get Jack to join in his amusement at the thought of Aunt Martha's indignation at the innocent cat, but Jack could not laugh.

"Why, what's the matter with you?" asked Ned, impatiently, as Jack walked slowly along, all the sunshine vanished from his face, snapping the heads off all the daisies he passed, with a little switch. "Are you afraid Tabby will tell your aunt on you? You're all right. Nobody will ever know that you had anything to do with it."

"Yes, they will," answered Jack, stopping short, "for I shall tell them myself."

"You will," exclaimed Ned. "Well, you must be fond of getting into scrapes. Why, what harm is there in letting the accident be blamed on the cat? You didn't mean to break the things, so what's the use in being blamed for it?"

Jack hesitated for a moment. Ned's reasoning seemed plausible, and he was sorely tempted to yield to it. He walked along a few steps farther, turning the matter over in his mind, while Ned used every argument he could think of to prevent his companion from turning back and acknowledging his fault.

Jack tried to stifle the voice of conscience, and think of nothing but the pleasure of the day before him, but he could not do it. All the sunshine seemed to have gone out of the sky; and he did not hear the birds singing, nor notice the wild flowers that bloomed in such profusion along the pathway.

They reached Long Pond at last, and Ned began at once to bait his hooks and prepare for fishing. But Jack stood irresolute, leaning against a tree, trying to throw off the heavy weight that rested upon him. How could he enjoy the day's sport when he had purchased it by deception? Better go home, even now, and confess the truth, and bear reproof or punishment like a man, than to sneak off in this way and let the blame rest upon poor Tabby.

There was something besides the thought of the scolding that Aunt Martha would surely give him that made it hard for Jack to obey his better impulses. She had promised to give him a silver watch on his birthday, if he was a good boy; and now, if she knew that his carelessness had caused the mischief, she might withdraw her promise; and how could he endanger his chances of the watch that he had been longing for so impatiently.

It was only a week to his birthday, so there was no hope that she might forget this offence before the time to get the watch.

Aunt Martha was very nervous, and had little sympathy with boys, and no excuse for any mischief that their heedlessness might lead them into; so Jack knew pretty well by experience what kind of a reception he might expect his confession to receive.

It would be hard to own up, when just by keeping silent he could let the blame rest upon Tabby; but Jack was an honest boy, and he felt that it would be far harder to carry the heavy weight that rested upon his conscience.

"What are you waiting for?" cried Ned, impatiently. "Hurry up, and get your lines ready. Here's lots of bait."

"I'm going home to own up," answered Jack. "It's no use talking, Ned, it's just as bad to act a lie as to tell one, and I can't feel comfortable about it."

He hurried off without listening to Ned's remonstrances, and walked as fast as he could, lest his courage and determination should fail him before he reached home.

"I s'pose I may as well say good-bye to all hopes of the watch now," he thought to himself. "Aunt Martha will never get over my breaking all that china, she thinks such a lot of it."

"Aunt Martha had gone up to her room, and, as Ned had expected, when she saw the wreck of her beloved china, and Tabby still enjoying the cream, she naturally thought that the cat was the culprit. Elsie had heard Aunt Martha's exclamation of surprise, and ran into the room just as Aunt Martha was about to give Tabby the punishment that she thought she richly deserved.

"Oh, don't, Aunt Martha," exclaimed the little girl, catching her pet up in her arms. "Just see what the mischievous creature has done," exclaimed Aunt Martha, pointing to the broken china. "My cup and saucer that I have had all these years, broken into bits, and everything else that was on the tray."

"What makes you think Tabby did it?" asked Elsie, trying to shield her pet from punishment.

"Why, when I came up here, the door was shut, and she was in here, making a fine breakfast in the cream. She must have jumped upon the table and knocked it over."

"But Tabby was down stairs lying under the stove till just a few minutes ago," persisted Elsie. "Don't you remember seeing her there, when you came in after your basket and scissors?"

Aunt Martha thought a moment. Yes, she certainly did remember having seen Tabby taking a comfortable morning nap in the kitchen, but then, how had she been able to get into the room through the closed door? It puzzled her for a moment, and then she remembered that she had heard Jack and his friend go up stairs, just as she was going into the garden.

Could it be possible that they had been the culprits, and had shut Tabby in, that the blame might fall on her?

She did not mention her suspicions to Elsie, but much to the child's delight, acquitted her pet of blame, assenting to her supposition that the wind might have blown the table over.

She gathered up the fragments of china, sighing over them, but really her greatest trouble was in the thought that Jack, whom she loved dearly in spite of her frequent reproaches, should stoop to such a deception.

She remembered distinctly now that she had left her door open when she went down stairs, and some one must have closed it, and shut Tabby in.

It was not possible for a draught of air to have closed it, and yet it was very unlike honest, impulsive Jack to have covered up his mischief in this sly way.

She took her knitting and sat down in her big rocking chair, gently swaying to and fro as her needles clicked rapidly together. Presently she heard the gate open and shut, and looking up she saw Jack approaching the house, not with his usual light step and cheery whistle, but slowly and quietly.

Was he coming back to confess?

If Jack had only known how Aunt Martha longed to have him own up to his fault, and how small it seemed to her in comparison with the deception which had been practised in covering it up, it would have made his task a far easier one.

He came slowly up stairs, one step at a time, instead of bounding up two or three steps at once, as was his wont, and even after he had reached the top of the stairs, he felt as if he could not summon up courage enough to enter the room, where he knew Aunt Martha was sitting.

Aunt Martha heard the reluctant step coming along the hall, and her heart softened toward the boy, as she realized what an effort it would cost him to confess.

He knocked at the door.

"Come in," said Aunt Martha, and poor Jack, feeling that there was no longer any chance of escape, entered the room.

"Well?" said Aunt Martha, interrogatively, and although she meant to speak encouragingly, it seemed to Jack that she had never spoken so sternly.

"I thought you had gone fishing," she went on.

"I did go," answered Jack, "but I've come back to tell you something. I came in your room this morning to look for my fishing lines, while you were in the garden, and I didn't mean to, but I knocked the little table over and broke the things. I'm awfully sorry about it, and I'm sorry I didn't tell you right away, instead of sneaking off and shutting Tabby in here."

There was silence for a moment, and Jack was afraid to look up lest he should see the anger that he knew would be in Aunt Martha's face; but if he had looked, he would have seen a strangely softened expression on her face, as she put her hand on his shoulder lovingly.

"Jack, I was sorry about the loss of my china, for you know how I prize it, but I would rather have lost every piece in the closet than have had you persist in such a deception. I knew the cat couldn't have done it, for she was down stairs when I went out, and I should have been much disappointed in you, if you hadn't come back and told me about it. Always be honest about things, Jack; remember it more than doubles your fault to hide it by deception, and the truth is sure to come out sooner or later."

Don't you think that Jack was glad that he had come back and owned up to his fault?

"It weighed me down like a hundred tons," he said to Elsie, "and it wasn't half as hard telling Aunt Martha as it was to get my mind made up not to tell her. She was so nice too, she didn't scold me a bit, and I am going to try not to upset her things any more. I wonder if she will give me the watch on my birthday just the same."

"I guess she will," said Elsie, hopefully, nor was she disappointed.

Jack was delighted, when the eventful day at last arrived, by the gift of a watch far prettier than he had hoped for, and often when he looks at it, it reminds him of the time when he so nearly yielded to temptation that he might be more sure of winning it; and I need not tell you that he is glad that he resisted, and confessed his fault.

BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY GIFTS.

LAMIA.
 By JOHN KEATS. With Illustrative Designs by Will H. Low. A superb quarto, printed on plate paper 12 x 16 inches, and containing Forty Reproductions in Fine Chromo-lithography from the original Drawings. Handsomely bound in extra cloth, $15.00. Elegantly bound in Japanese silk, $20.00.

Every effort has been put forth by the publishers to make this luxurious volume the finest art-book of the year.

"As an art production and an example of book making it is the most important work of the year, and reflects great credit upon the publishers and upon Mr. Low, who has put his best endeavors into the task of making the drawings. They are extraordinarily worthy, and will rank with the very best figure drawing of our art."—The Art Age.

"The Lippincotts will bring out for the holidays one of the finest art books yet seen in this country. It is the opinion of those who have seen some of the proofs of drawings and reproductions of the letter-press that this book will be the most sumptuous art-book of the year."—The Art Exchange.

THE HERMIT.
 A Ballad. From OLIVER GOLDSMITH'S "TRAVEL IN SWITZERLAND." Illustrated with 12 Engravings on Full-page Paintings by Walter Shirlaw and a number of smaller designs in the letter-press engraved and colored by Fred. Douglass. The whole engraved and printed on plate paper. Uniform in size with Artists' Edition of "Gray's Elegy." Handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges, $4.00. Alligator, $3.50. Morocco, new style, $4.50. Tree calf, extra $7.50.

In preparing this series of pictures for the beautiful and familiar ballad from "The Treat of Walsfield," Mr. Shirlaw has aimed to make his work tell the story of itself, as an accompanying picture, rather than a necessary part of a whole whose popularity is so fully established without such embellishment.

Mr. Jaenigling, being in the fullest sympathy with the painter, has rendered his designs with a degree of excellence that will place this work among the foremost achievements of wood engraving.

LIPPINCOTT'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.
 A New, Thoroughly Revised, and Greatly Enlarged Edition. A Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, Containing Memoirs of the Eminent Persons of All Ages and Countries, and Accounts of the Various Subjects of the North, Hindoo and Classic Mythology, with the Pronunciation of their Names in the Different Languages in which they Occur. By J. B. Lippincott. Contains 1500 pages and several thousand new names. Sheep, $12.00. Half Turkey, $15.00. Hard Binding $18.00.

OUR YOUNG FOLKS' ROMAN EMPIRE.
 By Wm. Searsh. Uniform with "Young Folks' Pilate's." etc. With Illustrations. Extra cloth, gilt, $2.50.

"An admirable piece of literary and historical work. It is not merely a story of the making of giving amusement, but it shows the reasons of Rome's fall in a way that appeals to a bright soul. It may be easily read in connection with the ordinary school studies."—Philadelphia Press.

YOUNG FOLKS' QUERIES.
 A Story. By UNCLE LAWRENCE. Beautifully Illustrated. Uniform with "Young Folks' Pilate's," etc. With 40 Colored Maps and Wherefore's." Extra cloth, gilt, $2.00.

This volume, like its predecessor, "Young Folks' Why's and Wherefore's" and "Young Folks' Pilate's," presents in the form of a story, written in a simple and pleasing style, a great deal of useful and interesting information.

HORSE AND MAN.
 THEIR MUTUAL DEPENDENCE AND DUTIES. By the Rev. J. G. Wood. M. A. Editor of "Homes of 715 and 717 Market St., with Illustrations. 160 pp. Extra cloth, $2.50.

The above work contains much valuable information in regard to the general management and treatment of horses, and will prove an excellent treatise for all lovers of this noble animal. It aims to show the best and most profitable and obedient, how his life can be prolonged as far as possible, and how he can be enabled to do the maximum amount of work during his lifetime.

THE GOLDEN TREASURY CALENDAR.
 An Elegant Design. By WILL H. LOW. Chromo-lithographed in 22 Printings on card-board 10 x 14 inches. With a Table containing selected Selections from the Poets of the "Golden Treasury" for each day of the year. $1.00.

For VOICE CULTIVATION, and the cure of CATARRH, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, and all Pulmonary Affections.

The AMMONIAPHONE is invaluable in all Pulmonary Affections, and may be regarded as a specific in all cases of Asthma and Bronchitis. It is a tube about 20 inches in length, constructed of a specially non-corrosive metal with handles having patent spring valves. It is charged with a chemical compound, combined so as to resemble in effect that which is produced by the soft balsam air of the Italian Peninsula when inhaled into the lungs, hence the term—Artificial Italian Air.

THE AMMONIAPHONE

Should be used by Clergymen, Vocalists, Public Speakers, Readers, Reciters, Lecturers, Leaders of Piousness, School-teachers, Amateurs, Church Choirs, and Lawyers, and all persons who have to use their voices professionally, or who desire to greatly improve their speaking or singing tones, producing a rich, powerful, melodious voice of extraordinary ringing clarity and range. A poor weak voice becomes Rich and Massive, while Great good is done to the General Health.

CURES THE CLERICAL SORE THROAT.

Reduced fac-simile of the AmmoniaPhone.

PRICE $8.00, EXPRESS PAID. WILL LAST A LIFETIME.

Recommended by the best Physicians. Has won its way to Royal favor.

5,000 TESTIMONIALS have been received in the last few months, from which the following extracts are selected:

- "I have certainly derived benefit from the use of the AMMONIAPHONE."—REV. DR. VANDERMA, MASTER OF THE TEMPLE.
- "The effects on the weakness and soreness of the throat which I have usually experienced as the consequence of a severe stricture of the vocal organs."—REV. ARSLET C. PARK.
- "It enables me to get through my work with much less trouble and fatigue."—REV. W. HAY, M. H. AITKEN. (Now in New York, at St. George's Church.)
- "It imparts strength and endurance to the voice."—REV. H. R. WALKER. (Now in the United States.)
- "It is calculated to invigorate and permanently benefit the organs of respiration."—H. L. CARO, M. D., (Chicago.)
- "In recommending the AMMONIAPHONE, I consider I am doing my duty to mankind."—PROF. ALBERTO LARUSSO.
- "I find the AMMONIAPHONE satisfactory. It improves and strengthens the voice undoubtedly."—H. REED, M. D., (New York.)
- "I am fully in accord with everything you state and claim for the AMMONIAPHONE."—W. PORTER, M. D., (New York.)
- "I cordially recommend its use for beneficial irritation and external affections of the throat, larynx and lungs."—W. F. HOLZNER, M. D. (For fifteen years Professor in N. Y. Medical College.)
- "I have used the AMMONIAPHONE and found its effects most beneficial."—ANGELINA PARTI.
- "The AMMONIAPHONE is the indispensable friend of all who use their voice in public."—MORRISKA.
- "I consider it the most marvelous invention of the age."—MARI ROSE MARSDEN.

The AMMONIAPHONE will be sent, express paid, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of M. O. or New York check for $8.00, payable to The Baby's Journal.

Designed and compiled by S. Alice Bray. New edition, enlarged. Beautifully printed in color by L. Prang & Co. Oblong 12mo, bound in cloth, red edges, $2.00.

A dainty little oblong book, consisting of eight or ten short lyrics, of which Babyhood and its belongings is the theme, and as many full page drawings in keeping therewith, the speciality of the text being that it is printed in a light purple and in gold and initial letters in gold, and of the illustrations that they combine the effects of both, against a background of purple. The drawings are exceedingly graceful, and the text tender and winsome.

The book is certainly one of the most dainty of its kind, and will admirably serve to preserve a record of the little people, whose career it illustrates with so many touches of fancy.

A SUPERB VOLUME.

ETCHING.

An Outline of its Technical Processes and its History, with some Remarks on Collections and Collecting. By S. R. KOEHLER. Illustrated by Thirty Plates by Old and Modern Etchers, and nearly One Hundred Reproductions in the Text. One folio volume, gilt top, price $20.00; one-half morocco, gilt, $30.00; full morocco, gilt, $40.00.

63. PORTRAIT OF REMBRANDT, BY HIMSELF, FROM "ETCHING."

This volume is of special interest, as it is the first connected history of etching ever written, all the books on engraving hitherto published having treated it merely as a subordinate division of the general subject. It is very fully illustrated, containing no less than one hundred and twenty-five specimens, thirty of which are etched plates by old and modern masters, including Lalanne, Whistler, Flameng, Rajon, Unger, Jacquemart, Jacque, R. Swain Gifford, Farrer, Thomas Moran, Mrs. M. Nimmo Moran, Peter Koran, Platt, Parrish, Smillie, Gaugengig, etc. Among the etchings by old masters are several (C. B. Hopper, Dietrich,) printed from the original plates, while others (Dürer, Rembrandt, Berghem, etc.) are heliographic facsimiles. The ninety-five examples in the text consists of phototypic reproductions of old etchings, illustrating the whole history of the art, from the beginning of the sixteenth century down to our own day, in Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, France, Spain, England and America.

"A work of great magnitude and importance. . . . There is little or nothing relating to the art which has not been included in the text."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

"There are few writers who know more of the art of etching, practically, theoretically, and historically, than Mr. S. R. Koehler. . . ."N. Y. Herald.
"A noble folio. The first fairly complete history of the art of etching, and an admirable one. . . . The book is cheap at twenty dollars. It will attract more attention from those fond of art than any other illustrated book of this season.—The Christian Intelligencer.

"A handsome holiday art book."—The Critic.

"The Gem of the season's collection is undoubtedly the book on etching, published by Cassell & Company."—The Delineator.

"This work will occupy the front rank among books this year."—Utica Herald.

"There is no writer who can more directly appeal to the best sentiments of the heart and conscience, and at the same time hold the reader in the most intense interest. 'An Original Belle' is the story of a gifted and beautiful girl with everything at her command that wealth can bestow, who is suddenly awakened from her aimless life of frivolity, and gradually grows into a glorious woman, living for others rather than for self. The most graphic description that we have ever read, is given of the battle of Gettysburg, as related by one who participated in the fighting, and in depicting the part that its principal hero took in the riots of New York, Mr. Roe has outdone himself, in the power of his descriptions and narrative of that episode, hardly paralleled by the Commune riots of Paris. The story is as intense in its interest as it is healthy in its high moral sentiment."—Boston Home Journal.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1885.

The marked success of the Advent Mission services in New York has been doly chronicled in the secular press, and has been warmly acknowledged by the newspapers of other religious bodies. Among the latter, the Observer says editorially, "We have attended many of these services in the Episcopal churches, and bear our testimony to the simplicity and fidelity with which the fundamental truths of the Gospel have been proclaimed, and the faithfulness with which those who profess and call themselves Christians have been urged to a consecration of themselves to Christ in holy living, and in earnest effort to bring others to a saving knowledge of Christ as a Saviour." In another place the same journal says, in speaking of a similar movement in England carried on by the Established Church, "If it continues, it will make that Church, whether established or disestablished, the greatest religious factor in the life of the English nation. When the Church ministers the grace of evangelism with such power there is no room for a Salvation Army, with its errors, vulgarities, and other horrors." It is gratifying to note, also, that Christians of every name throughout the country have been aroused to renewed zeal and effort by the Advent Mission. Surely this is as it should be; for it shows that this Church is realizing its function as the leader of the religious thought and work of the whole land.

The Advent and Epiphany Appeal of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society has been issued. Whatever may be thought of the terms of the appeal itself, and of the cogency of the motives for increased zeal and liberality which it invokes, there can be no doubt of the eloquence of the facts and figures by which the appeal is accompanied. When it is said that less than forty thousand dollars per annum are being expended for work of all kinds by this Church among the Indians, though it is upon the speedy extension of that work among the Indian tribes that their very existence is now seen to depend, no words are needed to tell that the Church has not yet so much as dreamed of her duty and responsibility. Even more startling is the utter inadequacy of the Church's work among the colored people of the South. Though these number more than four millions, or about fifteen times as many as the Indians, yet the amount expended for all kinds of work by this Church among the colored people of the South is only about twenty thousand dollars per annum, or about half as much as that expended among the Indians. The case of the freedmen is even more urgent than that of the unenfranchised aborigines. The former are our fellow-citizens, invested with all the rights and responsibilities of citizenship; but the mass of them are yet to be fitted for the discharge of their duties and the appropriation of their privileges as citizens, by such influences as this Church is best prepared to bring to bear upon them. Unless this be done speedily and effectively, the race cannot long keep their place in our national commonwealth of free and equal citizens. In view of the immense work which lies before this Church among the colored people of the South, it ought to startle the Churchmen of the land to read that for all that there is to be done in this matter only about twenty thousand dollars per annum are devoted. Surely the Board of Managers must feel the reproach upon the Church's zeal and devotion that these figures imply, and have refrained, for very shame, from making any comment on them. Perhaps some other and more effective method of arousing the Church's conscience than the issuing of the Advent and Epiphany Appeal, is being meditated.

By the will of Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt, various institutions and societies in the Church receive bequests amounting to six hundred thousand dollars. Among them are the General Theological Seminary, the New York Bible and Common Prayer Book Society, and St. Luke's Hospital. These are largely dependent upon legacies and will be greatly benefited by these bequests. The other bequests, also, are most useful, but there needs to be special care in the use of them. Especially is this the case with the General Board of Missions and with the New York City Mission. The Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society is to receive two hundred thousand dollars. The society is composed of all the members of the Church acting through its Board of Managers.

Now both the members and the managers must be careful as to the use of this money. The members must not practically appropriate it to themselves, by shutting their purses, and leaving the contracts already entered into by the Board of Managers to be met by these legacies. For we venture to say that they were made for the promoting of the Church's missionary work, and not to the individual members of the Church. Indeed, if they were in the least to come between Churchmen and their duty, to check the flow of their contributions, and put away from them their sense of obligation to give of the means with which God has blessed them, these legacies would be working a great harm.

On the other hand the Board of Managers should, and we are sure they will, exercise great care in the use of these legacies. We hope that they will speedily make known to what purpose the moneys shall be applied, and that they will apply it to some permanent object. The endowment of missionary episcopates seems to be sufficiently insured already, that is to say, the movement already on foot for that purpose seems likely to meet with sufficient success. We suggest, then, that this sum of two hundred thousand dollars be made the nucleus, at least, for a building to be used by the missionary society for its offices, and those of all societies aiding it. This is an object to which the Board of Managers cannot devote the offerings of the Church's members, but which would be of utmost advantage in promoting its missionary work.

We are glad to note the signs of the success of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society and to wish it ten-fold more. It now has a membership of 344; and its capital fund, now $25,000, is likely to increase by $4,000 yearly. It is thus an assured success, and it should interest every clergyman and parish in the Church. The dues are not large, and every parish, if not every clergyman, could pay them; and every clergyman who had been a member for five years and had reached the age of sixty would be entitled to his proportional annuity. If any died before reaching the annuitant age, his dues paid would benefit others if not himself. The plan is simple and effective, and we wish we could see every parish and clergyman interested in it. It helps to supply a great want and deserves abundant success.

In a remarkable paper entitled "Bad Times," just published in England, Mr. Alfred Russell Wallace discusses with much thoroughness the various causes which have brought about the depression of trade which is now embarrassing that country. Among such causes he names one which is operating here also, and must sooner or later lead to grave circumstances. In the last ten years, he declares, nearly two millions of the rural population of England "have been forced by the struggle for existence to leave the country for the towns."

that in this way their producing power has been vastly diminished, and that the large majority of them have become pauperized because of the change. While it cannot be said that our rural population are driven to the cities by "the struggle for existence," yet there is a constant and increasing tendency among them to abandon rural life, which demands the exercise of the difficult virtues of prudence, foresight, and patient industry, and to resort to the towns and cities where more so-called conveniences and comforts may be had. Along with this movement, which is draining away from the farms of the country a large part of the strength and enterprise which could there be best employed, there is a vast accumulation of foreigners in all our larger cities, who have already become a dangerous element of the population. If such foreigners could be settled on farms throughout the country and in homes of their own, the process of Americanizing them and their children, of emancipating them from their race peculiarities and other disabilities, and qualifying them for free and intelligent citizenship, would go speedily and naturally forward. But by congregating in cities they perpetuate their servile or truculent socialistic traditions and ideas, they resist in large measure the influence of our language and institutions, which would otherwise emancipate them, and they constitute an organized proletariat which is sure to be dangerous to the liberties of the entire country. What the remedy is to be, it is difficult to say. Perhaps the only remedy will be the disintegration of these masses in our cities by the individualizing and elevating influence of Christianity. Let the work of city missions in all our larger towns be plied with increased vigor, and let the true effect of the Gospel in individualizing men and rescuing them from the insignificance of class-combinations be followed up by the right kind of teaching. In this way a counter current of emigration from the town to the country may be established; for men will, under such influences, be brought to see the greater dignity and larger blessing for themselves and their children, of a country life with its home religion and its manly independence.

The Message of the President has been received with general favor by the press of the country. Whatever differences of opinion may exist in regard to some of its recommendations, it is generally conceded that Mr. Cleveland has, in his first official communication to Congress, fully met the expectations of his friends both within and without the ranks of his own political party. Such of the questions discussed by him, as may be regarded as party issues, will not be considered here. There are some topics treated of in the message, however, that are of such general interest and importance that they ought not to be excluded from the columns of a progressive religious journal. One of them, undoubtedly, is the policy suggested by the President of making the legislation restricting Chinese immigration to this country more effective, while at the same time he insists that the lawless persecution of the Mongolians who are within the protection of our laws shall be sternly repressed. That a strong race prejudice against the Chinese prevails in many parts of the country has already been pointed out more than once in these columns. It rests upon differences which nothing but Christianity can undertake to deal with and obliterate. Such prejudice is a factor in the problem which the President does well to take into consideration. Perhaps the only solution which practical statesmanship can wisely suggest at this juncture is the better enforcement of the restrictive regulations against Chinese immigration which have been provided for by treaty. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that this attitude of our people towards the Chinese imposes upon the Christians of this land increased obligations to do all that they can for the evangelization of China. If we dare not permit the Chinese, in their present condition, to come to our shores because of their heathen debasement, then we are bound to send the Gospel to them at whatever cost. All accounts agree that a great and effectual door is now opened in their own country for missionary effort. Instead of the languishing interest in Chinese missions which has lately been apparent, there is at the present juncture, and for many reasons, an urgent call for a more hearty and generous support of our work in China.

The recommendation of the President that the sanction of the Senate be not given to the international convention which undertook at Berlin last year to bind the signatory powers to keep open the great Congo basin in Western Africa to the world's trade, is founded, no doubt, on wise and statesmanlike considerations. For this government to enter into an agreement to maintain a protectorate over a distant region, or in any way to interfere with its political administration, would contravene the traditional foreign policy of the republic, and lead almost certainly to the gravest complications. Nevertheless one cannot but admire the noble work undertaken by the King of the Belgians in fostering the establishment and maintenance of the Independent State of Congo with his own personal means, and wish that it might be possible for this country, of all others, to give to his most beneficent enterprise some sort of official support. The President says of King Leopold's movement, that "it is fortunate that a benighted region, owing all it has of quickening civilization to the beneficent and philanthropic spirit of this monarch, should have the advantage and security of his benevolent supervision!" The powers which signed and ratified the Berlin Convention will at least be so far connected with King Leopold's unique and admirable work among the heathen in Africa, that they will be entitled to foster and protect the commercial and missionary ventures of their people in these parts. Our own policy of non-intervention, unless it can be supplemented by the establishment of early and extensive commercial relations with Western Africa—which, indeed, the President recommends—will probably operate to the discouragement of our missionary work in a country to which our people owe a large debt of evangelical duty.

In his treatment of the Indian question, the President justifies the commendation which has hitherto been bestowed upon the practical wisdom of his views. After pointing out the vast diversity of civilization and character between the different tribes, and declaring that it would be unwise to adhere too strictly to any one general plan, he is quite emphatic in commending the policy of giving them their lands in severalty at the earliest practicable time, and investing them with the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. He also makes grateful acknowledgement of the efforts of Christian Missionaries to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, and says that "the history of all the progress which has been made in the civilization of the Indian will disclose the fact that the beginning has been religious teaching, followed and accompanied by secular education." Finally, he recommends the appointment of six commissioners, of whom three are to be detailed from the army, whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the actual condition of all the Indians, and to recommend such action in regard to them, from time to time, as shall promote their well-being and progress towards the attainment of citizenship. In this recommendation and the admirable summary of the duties of the proposed commissioners, Mr. Cleveland gives ample wisdom of a clear and statesmanlike understanding of this subject.

Perhaps the most vigorous part of the President's message is that in which he denounces polygamy, and declares that the laws in force against the polygamous practice of the Mormons must be rigorously enforced, and, if necessary, re-enforced by additional legislation. The President recommends with much force that "a law be passed to prevent the importation of Mormons into the country." It is undoubtedly true, as he says, that the chief re-enforcements which are received to Mormonism come from foreign lands. One of the reasons why Mormonism is so difficult to deal with is that it is embraced by ignorant Europeans who regard polygamy as one of the results of their emancipation in coming to a free country. Nevertheless, the difficulty of preventing "the importation of Mormons into the country" will be great. It is well known, for instance, that many Mormon recruits, or people who continually range themselves as such, do not go at once to Utah on arrival in this country, but settle in some other part of the country, and finally drift to Utah. While it is no doubt true that most of the converts are of foreign birth, yet multitudes of them go to Salt Lake after a residence of some months or years in other parts of the United States. The recent disturbance at Salt Lake City, and the prompt measures resorted to for the enforcement of the law and the preservation of the public peace, indicated that the government is prosecuting a vigorous policy in dealing with this crying evil. It is greatly to be hoped that all success may attend the repressive and exclusive measures that are in force and to be put in force. It is almost certain, however, that success cannot be attained without the influence of genuine, vital Christianity, which shall so do its work in the homes of Utah that the people may be elevated out of the savagery of polygamy into the civilization of the Christian life. It is to such work, after all, as Bishop Tuttle is doing in Utah, through his schools and otherwise, that we must look for the redemption of that wretched people.

To the list of men among us who had special gifts, and knew how to use them, but whose lives were snatched away in the midst of great usefulness, before their thought had taken permanent shape—such men as Dr. E. A. Washburn, Dr. John Cotton Smith, and Prof. E. E. Johnson—must now be added that of Dr. Elisha Mulford, who had shown the fine quality of his mind in "The Nation," and "The Republic of God," which are permanent contributions to political and theological literature, but whose writings had rather illustrated than exhausted his resources. The latter work is a most original treatise in positive theology, and a very remarkable statement of principles of Christian belief as they are related to the scientific method. His aim was to put together a construction of the facts known to the people of God behind which the rationalist cannot go, and in following which the scientist feels that no violence is done to his own rules of thinking. The book made a great impression in this direction. He was thinker, moralist, prophet, all in one. He had a singular power of discerning and stating truth, so that its freedom and absoluteness stood out with great boldness, and his intellectual sincerity was only surpassed by the modesty and simplicity of his life. He was a constructive and organizing thinker, and had just begun to advance further upon lines already laid down, when the fatal illness appeared which has taken him away.

The final result of the English elections has been declared. The Tories and Parnellites will have a small majority over the Liberals in the next Parliament. It remains to be seen, however, whether the alliance which Lord Salisbury effected, or at least countenanced, with the Irish Nationalists, for election purposes, will be sufficiently firm and intimate to enable him and the present government to continue in power. It is hardly possible to believe that such will be the case. The continuance of the Conservatives in place on such terms would be equivalent not merely to granting all the demands of the Home Rulers for Ireland, but to handing over the virtual control of the imperial government to Mr. Parnell and his contingent. Such a state of affairs would be unwelcome to most Englishmen, and quite intolerable to the majority of Lord Salisbury's party. Indeed, it would be more natural and easy for Mr. Gladstone and the Liberals to arrange for a modus vivendi with the Parnellites, based on some definite plan of local self-government for Ireland; for whenever the Irish question is out of the way, the Liberals and Parnellites will be in agreement on most questions of domestic and foreign policy. It is quite likely, however, that on this very account these two parties are so much exasperated with each other over the result of the late campaign, that an alliance between them at this juncture will be impossible. The only alternative, for an escape from the present intolerable condition of affairs, will be the formation of a coalition between the moderate Liberals and Conservatives with the declaration of their purpose to resist the demands of Mr. Parnell and to defend the Established Church. There is no doubt that under skilful leadership such a coalition for such a purpose would command the hearty support of a large majority of the English people.

England has easily and speedily succeeded in another one of the "little wars" for which her foreign policy has long been famous. King Thebaw's capital has been taken, and the king himself has surrendered himself unconditionally into the hands of his conquerors. What to do with him is a question that need not vex England much. She has had so many overthrown emperors, kings, princes, on her hands in time past, and has disposed of them so variously, that she can easily find a precedent in her own history for almost any disposition she may choose to make of the mad King of Mandalay. Meantime, Gen. Fredderick sends him to the rear, and proceeds to arrange matters to his liking in the conquered country. Of course it is only a question of a little time and of a little conventional diplomacy when Northern Borneo will become an English dependency. Nor is there any ground for impeaching England's course in this matter. Not only was it necessary to overthrow King Thebaw in the interest of English trade, and for the protection of European residents in his dominion, but it was obligatory upon England to do this promptly in order to forestall French intrigue, and prevent complications which would have been extremely embarrassing, not to say disastrous. With this extension of English territory and influence in the East, and the simultaneous contraction of French influence in Tonquin, it may be said that the hope long entertained by France of gaining an empire in the East will be brought to an end. That the result will be better both for European interests and for the true well-being of the peoples of Farther India, cannot be doubted. France has yet to show herself capable of gaining and wisely administering colonial dominion; but the power to colonize and so to spread the beneficent influence of their civilization, is one of the marked and persistent characteristics of the English people.

THE "ADVENT MISSION" AT CALVARY CHURCH, NEW YORK.

It was with the utmost fear and trembling that I came on to New York to take part in this mission. Some relief and courage came to me from the knowledge that my dear friend and brother, the Bishop of Western Texas, was to be associated with me in the work. I feared lest the unwholesome impatience characterizing our age might be seizing upon Churchmen; and lest, for vital forces in the spiritual life, emotion and excitement were in a fair way to be substituted among us for the soberness of the ways of the Church, and the nobility of the teachings of the Prayer Book. I could not but think that such substitution would be a calamity. I had known fields burned over by excitements promoted by some phase of popular religion outside the Church. The blackened ashes and arid wastes are not such good things, one must conclude, as to induce thoughtful Christians to employ excitement for a healthful spiritual force. And if "Missions" meant that at times and seasons spasms of growth and shouts of change are to take the place of faithful pastoral care, and steady Christian culture, and the slow and sure processes of religious edification, then would "Missions" be mistakes, and their results disasters. Personally, also, a deep and shrinking dread laid fast hold upon me at thought of being a missionary. Known inexperience, want of time to prepare, and reflection of the awful harm to souls that may be wrought by weakness, or unfitness, in the leader of the mission, contributed to that dread.

But I did not feel at liberty to decline the pressing call of the rector of Calvary. I came on, the week before the mission was to begin, to be in his home and take counsel with him. During the long journey thither I gathered thought that the aim of "Missions" seemed to be, to make Christians more faithful in time, and more thoughtful for eternity; and to lead the impatient to turn from their hardness, to seek forgiveness, to arise to their duties, and to seek rest after their privileges. If so, thought I, the Church year has two seasons set for these very purposes—Advent and Lent, and hence an "Advent Mission" would not be in the eye of a Churchman, so greatly wrong or fraught with frightening danger.

On my arrival in the city, therefore, the "fear" for the Church was much dispelled. Afterward the admirable address by the Assistant-bishop of New York to the missionaries and clergy in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, the day before the opening of the mission, made that fear as though it were not.

The "trembling" for myself remained unabated. But, under God's merciful providence, help came to my inexperience. I was enabled to spend incoincidentally the entire day of Sunday, November 22, at Trinity Church, Newark, where the Rev. Mr. Aitken was conducting a mission. Sitting in a pew, I attended four services with the after-meetings. What I learned as an observer that day became of inestimable value afterward to me as a worker.

When Bishop Elliott came, he and the rector and myself, in conference, agreed with cordial consent in the following thoughts to guide the conduct of the mission at Calvary Church:

1. That faith in the work of God, the Holy Spirit, and trust in Him as the Helper, should ever be kept uppermost in our minds and shrouded deepest in our hearts.
2. That arousal should not be fixed as the one only aim of the mission, but rather arousal and instruction.
3. That in both services and preaching there was no call for us to obscure Church doctrines or diverge from Church lines.
4. That in dealing with persons there should be no departure from thoughtful courtesy and no approach to rudeness in attempts to intrude into the personal inner life of people against their wish, or to force decisions of the will under the heat of excitement or by the stress of undue personal influence.

So we began our mission. It was preceded by prayer. It was sustained and hallowed by prayer. It is being followed by prayer. A meeting for intercessory prayer was held every day of the mission, at which requests for prayer for friends that had been handed in were read and heeded. And fervent prayers for the Holy Spirit's special presence and gracious guidance, from homes and hearts, in the pews and the chancel, abounded. Speakers, worshippers, listeners, were all conscious of sweet and strong help from breathing this atmosphere of earnest prayer. Multiplied services awakened interest, and gave healthful direction to it when awakened. There were six services every day. Holy Communion, 8 A.M.; Morning Prayer, 9 A.M.; short service and sermon, 11 A.M.; short service and address, 3:30 P.M.; intercessory prayer, 7:15 P.M.; mission service and sermon, 8 P.M.

I preached from my written sermons at 11 A.M., and extempore at night. Bishop Elliott made the afternoon addresses, to men, to women, to children, to employers, to employees, to communicants, on different days, respectively. The evening sermons were upon Fear, Repentance, Faith, Obedience, Hope, Love, Sobriety, Righteousness, Godliness.

The "short service" consisted of the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, a psalm, a lesson, and collects, with two or three hymns. The last were sung by a large volunteer choir of the members of the congregation.

After the sermon in the evening a hymn would be given out and I would say, "During the singing of the hymn the congregation will kindly retire, but all those willing to remain for a short time of further instruction and devotion are affectionately invited to do so."

Two-thirds of the congregation, I think, if not more, always remains. During the singing of the hymn the clergy and myself would retire to the vestry-room and remove our surplices, and return into the church in our socks. Standing at the head of the middle aisle I then would speak for five or ten minutes, trying to strengthen and deepen what had been said in the sermon. Then followed a hymn, some verses of it sometimes sung by us all on our knees. Then a short time of silent prayer, always most impressive, I trust always also most helpful. Then a short collect or two. After this the congregation was dismissed, with these words added: "If any persons are in perplexity or doubt or need the counsel, guidance or sympathy of the missionaries or clergy in any matter, will all such kindly remain in their seats till the rest of the congregation have withdrawn, and in order that we may meet them personally? Do not be afraid of us. We only want to help you, if you need it. We have no desire to intrude where you do not wish, or to force aught upon you."

At the 8 A. M. communion, usually from seven to thirty came. On the last morning nearly one hundred and fifty. Our 11 A. M. and 3:30 P. M. congregations numbered from fifty to a hundred. The evening ones from two hundred and fifty to five hundred. Only a few remained each night to the second after-meeting for personal counsel.

If we may venture to pass judgment, we would name the following as the good results of our mission:

1. The preparatory work was big with blessing. Under the wise and zealous rector all Calvary congregation was aroused. Some practiced for the singing, some attended to the printing, a large amount of which was judiciously done. Some prepared themselves to be courteous and intelligent ushers. Some provided for the things specially needed for the children's service. A great many started out in willing zeal and visited every house in a large district around, telling of the mission and inviting to it. All were bidden and urged to earnest prayer in public and in private for the special presence and blessing of the Holy Spirit upon the mission. All this, of itself, was a precious arousal of the people to unselfish and beneficent activity.

2. The people of the congregation have come to know each other better, and have grown nearer in mutual sympathy and helpfulness. The frequent services and the holy atmosphere of fervent prayer and religious earnestness so warmed and cheered those who came that coldness melted away, and a delightful appreciation grew of our oneness in Christ Jesus, in the things of spiritual faith and hope that touch the deepest and tenderest interests of human souls.

3. Many Christians have roused themselves to ask, each one of his or her own soul, "Is it well with thee?" and to resolve, with God's help, to do better duty, and to avail themselves more gratefully and earnestly of their privileges. Nor shall the resolve settle into the stagnant lees of selfishness. One and another are asking in heart "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" and they will be asking their pastor with their voice, "What can we take in hand to help you and to help our fellows?"

4. Some have been moved out of their indifference and impotence, and are crying aloud, "Sirs, what must we do to be saved?" It must be candidly confessed, however, that few of this class presented themselves than we had hoped to see. Yet, in answer to the invitations of the visitors, and the notices on the handbills distributed, numbers of strangers were in constant attendance.

My brother of Western Texas and myself desire to put on record that the mission was singularly precious and profitable and blessed to us and our own souls. We humbly thank God the Holy Spirit led and helped the work. We have heartily prayed Him, and do heartily pray Him now, to bless the work and its results in human hearts, and souls and lives.

DAN'L S. TUTTLE.

THE ADVENT MISSION AT ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, NINETY-NINTH ST. AND TENTH AVE., NEW YORK.

The mission began most auspiciously on Sunday evening, November 29, and continued throughout the week, closing on Saturday night with a service designed to be preparatory for the celebrations of the Holy Communion, which followed on Sunday.

The services were conducted by the missionary, the Rev. Geo. R. Van de Water, of St. Luke's church, Brooklyn. He was assisted at all the meetings by the rector of the parish, the Rev. T. M. Peters, S.T.D., and his assistants, the Rev. Frank Draper and the Rev. J. G. Fawcett.

The opening sermon in the course was on "Sin, Its Character and Penalty," and was a masterly and eloquent presentation of the subject. Indeed, the same may be said of all his discourses.

Following is a list of the subjects in their order, preached about on the succeeding evenings: "Repentance," in which the preacher drew a marked distinction, and in a very graphic manner, between a mere worldly sorrow for sin, and that Godly sorrow which worketh repentance to salvation; "Faith," in which he set forth three kinds: emotional, abstract, and intellectual; "Obedience," two kinds, passive and active; "Jesus," a witness; "Seeking the Lord, and the Danger of Delay;" and lastly, "The Feast of the Christian," of which the Sacrament is the symbol.

His afternoon addresses to Christian people were on: (1) "Searching the Heart." (2) "Comfort in Zion." (3) "Faith Attended by Works." (4) "Bearing Our Own and Our Another's Burdens." (5) "The Contemplative and Active Sides of the Christian Life." (6) "The Sacrament of the Holy Communion."

At the children's services he told his little hearers the familiar Bible stories, drawing from each the particular moral lesson he wanted to impress on their youthful minds.

His first talk was upon the story suggested by the text, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me." This was followed on the next afternoon by the story of Jacob's Ladder. He also told them about the three children in the Fiery Furnace, and the story of the Shunamite woman and Elisha. At his last meeting with the children, a lovely and pathetic scene took place which is worth telling. He had been talking to them about the triumphal entrance of our Saviour into Jerusalem, just before His crucifixion, how the little children followed in His train, waving their palm-branches, and shouting and singing His praises; and then, of only a few days afterward, when these same children were crying for His death.

The little ones were almost breathless, so vividly was the picture drawn. He then put the question to them: "How many of you, my dear children, will wave your palms for Him?" In an instant every little hand went up, as if pulled to its upright position by an invisible cord from above. The preaching of the Rev. Mr. Van de Water was characterized especially by its definiteness of aim, its wonderful adaptation to the various classes of people to be reached, and its intense earnestness.

His language was so simple that the most child could comprehend his meaning. Entirely free from all cant, all on fire with enthusiasm, yet in perfect command of himself, the effect of his preaching was plainly visible by the intense and quiet solemnity of his congregations. His sermons were so simple and so earnest, and pleaded so affectionately that his hearers listened with absolute attention.

This was particularly the case at the children's services. I never saw a congregation that seemed to listen with such rapt attention, and on whose faces there beamed an intelligence that betokened a perfect understanding of the preacher's words.

The singing at all the services was loud and hearty. The "Mission Hymnal" was not used. We thought the Church's tunes and hymns would be better suited to our purpose, and we were not disappointed.

The after meetings presented strong evidence of a deepening spirituality that was most gratifying.

The results of those quiet, prayerful talks promise much good fruit and souls won to Christ.

At the porch of the church was placed a box intended to receive any requests of prayer that might be desired. Missioner Van de Water kept this constantly before the people in attendance, and during the mission a very large number were received. These were read at the afternoon meetings, and fervent prayers were offered that God would graciously answer them, if in accordance with His holy will, and the welfare of those for whom the special blessings were desired.

Many availed themselves of this opportunity of personal contact with the clergy. It will, with God's blessing, result in great good. The whole mission has been attended with a great outpouring of the Holy Spirit; and for the great blessing the parish has received, we all—missioner, clergy, and parishioners—feel most profoundly grateful.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

[FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.]

A very important movement, having for its object the augmentation of clerical incomes, has been commenced in the Diocese of Toronto, with the full sanction of the bishop. From a carefully prepared statement which has appeared in all our Church papers and in the leading dailies, it appears that in the Diocese of Toronto there are twenty-two clergymen who receive less than $1,000 per annum, two less than $800, and two less than $500. These clergymen have all served from fifteen to twenty years. Of clergymen who have served from ten to fifteen years, twelve receive less than $800, and one less than $500. Of those who have ministered from five to ten years, thirteen receive less than $800, and three less than $500. It will be seen that six clergymen in the Diocese of Toronto receive less than $500. No less than eleven parish fail to contribute $200 per annum. To remedy this state of things it is proposed to classify the clergy as follows: Class A, consisting of clergymen who have served for fifteen years and upward, $1,200 per annum. Class B, consisting of clergymen who have ministered

For ten years and upward, $1,000; and Class C, consisting of clergymen of five years' standing and upward, $800. All in addition to a parsonage, if any. Fifty-eight clergymen will come under this category, to raise whose salaries to the proposed amount will require at least $1,600 per annum. A committee of clergymen and laymen have the matter in hand and prospects seem fairly promising. Toronto, though one of the wealthiest dioceses in the Dominion, has always possessed the unenviable reputation of starving its rural clergy who are, as a class, intellectually and socially, second to none in the Anglican communion.

The Bishop of Harco held an ordination on Advent Sunday, in London, when one deacon was advanced to the priesthood, and four candidates were ordained to the diaconate. The agitation for a special synod to settle the Wright lawsuit seems to have failed of its object.

The Langtry v. Dumoulin case, I am sorry to say, is to be revived upon a side issue which, if established, will reopen the case upon the main issue, and indefinitely prolong this most unavourable of scandals. When Rev. Canon Dumoulin decided to wash his hands of the affair, the defence fell to the ground as far as he was personally concerned, and the judge in Toronto, before whom the case had been argued, ruled that his action finally disposed of the question. The churchwardens of St. James's, however, claimed that they were parties to the defence; which contention, upon an appeal to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, was allowed. The case, it appears, can now be carried on independent of the nominal defendant, Canon Dumoulin.

Another secession from the ranks of the rapidly-dwindling Cumminsist schism is reported from the Diocese of New Westminster, British Columbia. Mr. Gill was received back into the Church at a very interesting service composed specially for the occasion, a portion of which I give:

Archdeacon, Reverend Father in God, I present unto you this person, that he, publicly expressing his sorrow and repentance for the sins of heresy and schism, and humbly desiring reconciliation with and restoration to the Church, may receive the same at your hands.

Bishop. Take care that the person whom ye present unto us be sincerely and intelligently desirous of such reconciliation and restoration.

Archdeacon. I have inquired of him, and also examined him, and think him so to be.

Bishop. William Gill, dost thou here, in the presence of God and of this congregation, declare thy sorrow and repentance for the sins of heresy and schism into which thou hast been betrayed by the fraud and malice of the devil, or by thy own carnal will and frailness?

Answer. I do declare my sorrow and repentance.

Bishop. Are you sensible of the grievous sacrilege of which you have been guilty in celebrating the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, having never been duly authorized to do so by the Church?

Answer. I am sensible of the sacrilege, and do heartily repent of it.

Mr. Gill took leave of his congregation in an address of considerable power, in the course of which he urges them to follow his example and return to the fold of the Church. The diocesan synod of New Westminster will meet this month, but will be adjourned until the week before Lent.

A branch of the Church of England Workmen's Society has been founded in Toronto with the sanction of the bishop. Though based upon the same general principles, it will be independent of the English society, which is perhaps a little ultra.

The Rev. N. F. Wilson, principal of the Shingwauk Indian Home, Diocese of Algoma, is making an appeal for funds to enlarge the present Home, and to erect a branch establishment in the diocese of Qu'Appelle. This appeal is the result of a tour made by Mr. Wilson in the Northwest just subsequent to the late rebellion, when he visited no less than eight reserves totally destitute of churches, schools, or ministers of any denomination.

ENGLAND.

CHURCH REFORM.—There is a growing impression that, if the present storm blows over, the heads of the English Church will make a great effort to reform certain abuses, and introduce more elements of strength and popular organization into its constitution. The sale of cures will be done away with; an attempt will be made to invest the conge d'elire with more reality, and to invest the faithful laity with more power in Church matters.

HEALTH OF CANON LIDDON.—Canon Liddon has been ordered abroad immediately by his physicians for a lengthened period. He is ordered to abstain from preaching and literary work, and take a complete rest. Dr. Liddon had just gone into residence at St. Paul's, and has had to provide for supply.

DISSOLUTION OF CONVOCATION.—The Convocation of Canterbury was formally dissolved by royal writ on Saturday, November 20. A writ was issued immediately after directing the archbishop to summon a new convocation, to assemble on January 13, 1886.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.—The results from the Parliamentary elections in England are all in, and indicate that the Liberals are in a small minority. From the fact that of the Liberals elected, many have declared themselves positively against disestablishment, it may be taken for granted, whatever else happens, that subject will not be brought up in the coming Parliament.

TER-CENTENARY SERVICE.—On Monday, Nov. 23, being the ter-centenary of the death of Tallis, the father of English Church music, a musical service, consisting chiefly of his compositions, was held in Greenwich parish church, where the great composer was buried. The sermon was preached by the Dean of Manchester.

IRELAND.

IRISH CHURCH PROGRESS.—A Dublin correspondent writes to The Rock: "In the midst of all that is adverse and threatening, we are certainly taking possession of the land as far as bricks and mortar can do it. I suppose more new churches have been built and old ones restored within the last fifteen years than a hundred years previously. I think there is scarcely a church in this city which has not been restored, and almost every church possesses a new parochial hall in close proximity with it. We are showing some of the courage of the old Romans, who antedated the very ground their enemies were encamped on outside the city."

GERMANY.

CONSECRATION OF ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH.—The new St. George's English church, in Berlin, was consecrated by Bishop Titcomb, commissary to the Bishop of London, on Saturday, November 22.

ROME.

A NEW WORK ON THE CIVIL POWER. It is reported that a new work has just appeared that is calculated to make some noise in the ecclesiastical world. It comes out under the name of Julien Armhoff, a Russian Roman Catholic priest, and treats of the temporal power of the pope. It takes up Padre Curci's favorite text, and looks at it in an entirely new light. Curci was honestly of opinion that the papacy should renounce all claim to this power, but Armhoff is more subtle. He draws a distinction between the civil and temporal power, and avers that the pope can take upon himself the exercise of the former when impelled by force of circumstances, but always with a view of freeing himself from it at the first opportunity. Therefore, of course, the pope is hidden to rejoice at the return of his functions to the purely spiritual extreme. The book is going on the Index.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE BISHOPRIC OF BLOEMFONTEIN.—It is stated that the Bishopric of Bloemfontein, which has been for some time vacant, has been offered to the Rev. G. W. H. Knight-Bruce, chaplain to the Bishop of Bedford and in charge of the district of St. Andrew's, Bethnal-Green.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON—Bishop Brewer's Address.—The Missionary Bishop of Montana addressed the clergy of Boston and vicinity at the Church Rooms on Monday, November 23, giving an account of his jurisdiction and its pressing needs. He also spoke in various parishes, awakening considerable interest in his almost unknown field of labor. One gentleman is reported as coming to the vestry-room of a church after service and emptying his pocket-book into the bishop's hands, and expressing regrets that he could not do more. If people generally get into the habit of emptying their pocket-books into bishops' hands, the valleys of Montana, and all other mission fields, will not be long without missionaries.

BOSTON—Standing Committee.—At a regular meeting of the Standing Committee, held on Tuesday, December 1, testimonials were signed in favor of Archibald Colman and William Dwight Porter Bliss (late a Congregational minister), recommending them to be admitted candidates for Holy Orders.

BOSTON—St. Paul's Church.—A series of Advent lectures is delivered daily at noon in this church (the Rev. Dr. F. Courtney, rector). There is a brief service and then follows the lecture, the whole time consumed being about half an hour. The lecturers are the Rev. Drs. A. St. J. Chambré and G. W. Shinn, and the Rev. Messrs. W. F. Cheney, S. U. Shearman, Edward Abbott and H. E. Cotton.

ANDOVER—Christ Church.—Through the generosity of Mr. John Byers of New York, this parish (the Rev. Leverett Bradley, rector) is to have a new church building. It will cost about $35,000, and the expense of erection and furnishing has been offered by this gentleman, who has also aided in the purchase of a very desirable lot. He intends the church to be a memorial of his mother and father. The five chancel windows will be in memory of his brother, Mr. Peter Smith Byers. The architects are Hartwell and Richardson.

CAMBRIDGE—Death of the Rev. Dr. Mulford. The Rev. Dr. Elisha Mulford, Lecturer in Apologetics and Theology in the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, died on Wednesday, December 9, aged 51. Dr. Mulford was a native of Montrose, Penn., and a graduate of Yale College of 1835. He is well known through his work, "The Republic of God" and other writings.

NEWBURYPOR—St. Paul's Church.—The rector of this parish (the Rev. J. H. Van Buren) preached his first anniversary sermon on Sunday, December 6, in which he mentioned the following facts: There are connected with St. Paul's parish, two hundred and thirty-three families, representing about eight hundred souls. The parish is entering on its one hundred and seventy-fifth year, a fact which he hoped would be celebrated in some way next summer. Over $1,000 had passed through his hands or had been reported to him by the various organizations in the parish; and at Easter the parish had reported of contributions a total of $4,083.69. There had been 20 baptisms, 8 confirmations, 6 marriages, 11 burials, and 182 sermons and addresses. A surprised choir will make its first appearance at Easter.

CONNECTICUT.

HARTFORD—Society for the Increase of the Ministry.—This society has recently received two important contributions to its permanent fund. The first is a legacy of $10,000 by the will of the late Mrs. Benjamin Oyle Taylor, of Washington, D. C. It was provided for as a fund for the purposes of Christian education by the will of her sister, Mrs. Brooks, previously deceased. Mrs. Taylor directed that it should be used to endow two scholarships of the society. The second gift of $3,000 comes from "A Friend in New York," with the wish that it be added to the general funds of the society, the interest only of the same to be available to its uses.

NEW HAVEN—St. Luke's Church.—In 1844 a few colored people in New Haven formed a parish organization, and had services in one of Trinity parish mission chapels on Green Street. Nine years later the congregation had grown to such an extent that a church was needed, and they purchased a building on Park Street, which had been occupied by a colored Baptist society. This purchase was made by the advice of the late Dr. Harry Crosswell, and was secured for $1,000. Part of this money was paid down, and a note given for the remainder, which was paid at maturity. A year ago the Rev. Alfred C. Brown became rector of the parish, and under his charge the congregation has increased so that an enlargement of the church, which had been for some time spoken of, became an absolute necessity. The new rector took hold of the matter earnestly, and, by the aid of the city clergy and the parishioners, soon raised about $1,500 to enlarge the church. The Rev. J. G. Jacecks also left the parish $500 in his will. The work was begun last June, and has just been completed, and the church has been enlarged by a chancel and extension of twenty-one feet. Generous contributions from friends have furnished the church and supplied the windows.

On Monday, December 7, St. Luke's church was presented to the bishop of the diocese, free from debt, to be consecrated. At the consecration addresses were made by the bishop and the Rev. Dr. E. E. Beardsley. Dr. Beardsley gave a brief, but interesting history of the parish, and concluded by saying: "St. Luke's is the only congregation of this people belonging to our Church in New England, and the thanks of the members who compose it are due to their friends in these helping them to improve and beautify their house of worship."

GUILFORD—Dr. Bennett's Semi-Centennial.—The Rev. W. G. Andrews, rector of Christ church, Guilford, writes us as follows of the Rev. Dr. Bennett's reception, which we reported two weeks ago:

"Permit me to make two or three additions to your account of the reception lately given to the Rev. Dr. Bennett of Guilford.

"Dr. Bennett has not only been fifty years in priest's orders, but he celebrated his eightieth birthday just one week earlier. On both occasions the venerable mother of Mrs. Bennett, ninety years old, and not resident in Guilford, was present. Besides the verses prepared by the Rev. A. G. Shears, M.D., others were sent by the Rev. Dr. Horton of Cheshire. Dr. J. B. Robertson, from Trinity parish, New Haven, one of four surviving subscribers to a testimonial presented to Dr. Bennett, in 1837, when he was an assistant minister in that parish, read the list of nearly fifty names from the original paper, recently found by Mr. Frederick Rowland, son of an other subscriber, and kindly forwarded. Mr. A. L. Kidston, whose name appears on the old document, was also present. The Rev. E. S. Lines of St. Paul's church, New Haven, not only displayed a warm interest throughout, but is entitled to the credit of having brought about the celebration by calling attention to the near approach of the anniversary. Among the guests of our own clergy should be mentioned the Rev. George C. Griswold and the Rev. Emerson Jessup, and the name of the Rev. E. T. Sanford of Fair Haven should be substituted for that of the Rev. D. L. Sanford of Thomaston. Many letters of congratulation were received from clergymen unable to be present, and the bishop of the diocese particularly regretted his inability to attend.

"Another welcome guest was the pastor of the First Congregational church, the Rev. E. M. Vittum. It is worth mentioning that his earliest predecessor, Henry Whitfield (in Episcopal orders) was an ancestor of the late Dr. Tyng, and a collateral descendant, through his mother, Mildred Manning, of Geoffrey Chauver, Whitfield's wife, furthermore, was first cousin of the poets Giles and Phineas Fletcher. The other Congregational pastor, Mr. Banks, in speaking for the community, very happily styled Dr. Bennett 'the pastor emeritus of Guilford.' More than a third of those who thronged the house in the evening were of other communions, and the reception took somewhat the aspect of a tribute from the town to its most honored citizen. But it was first and chiefly the expression of the respect and love of Dr. Bennett's old parishioners, and the overflowing hospitality of the ladies of the congregation was only one token of the hearty good will with which all was done.

"One thing might have been said then, and may properly be said now, namely, that the present rector has felt his predecessor's continued residence in the parish only as a blessing."

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Church of the Holy Comforter.—The Advent Mission at this seamen's church, on West Street (the Rev. T. A. Hyland in charge) began on St. Andrew's Day, and continued until Sunday, December 6. The minister was the Rev. W. R. Jenrey, and the after meetings were conducted by the pastor. A number of requests for prayer were sent in and in addition about fifty persons arose and expressed sorrow for sin and asked the prayers of the congregation. The attendance was large and increased daily. The singing was lively and of a most inspiring character. The preaching was clear and direct, and made a good impression. The majority of those attending the services of the mission were people who had not been inside a church for years. Some of these came evening after evening, and it is hoped that a lasting impression for good has been made upon them. On the whole, this mission to seamen was a great blessing, and will no doubt be productive of happy results.

NEW YORK—Church of St. John the Evangelist.—The rector of this parish, the Rev. Dr. B. F. De Costa, made the results of the Advent Mission the subject of his discourse on Sunday, Dec. 13. He congratulated the Church on the success which has followed the special efforts made. He also thought the Mission had given additional proof how strongly entrenched the enemy is, and how large is the mass comprised in what he termed the unchurched portion of the population. He believed that improved methods of conducting Christian work are needed, and that there must be fuller cooperation of the laity. The Church needs to be brought to act as a unit, the individualism of separate parish action being subordinated to the demands of diocesan life.

The Mission in this parish was conducted by the Rev. Dr. Albert C. Bunn, of Brooklyn, and the Rev. Henry L. Foote, of Massachusetts. Several services daily were held, and although the attendance was not large, a good work was accomplished. In the opinion of the rector, expressed in his sermon above referred to, the beginning only was made, and the minds of Christian people awakened to see how great a struggle awaits the friends of Christ who would overthrow the strongholds of sin in the city.

Dr. De Costa has been exceedingly interested in the Mission from the first, while he was very active in promoting it at its very inception, and thus his estimate of the situation has unusual weight.

NEW YORK—City Mission.—The fifty-fourth anniversary of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society will be held in St. Thomas's church on Sunday, December 20. The assistant-bishop will be present, and preside, and the sermon will be preached by the Rev. C. W. Ward. The society is making its annual appeals for Christmas remembrances to those under its care.

On Christmas Day there will be service at St. Barnabas's House and Chapel at 10:30 A. M. The Christmas dinner will be at 2 P. M. The children are looking earnestly for their annual Christmas feast. Donations for the same should be sent to Sister Ellen, or to the superintendent, the Rev. C. T. Woodruff, 306 Mulberry Street.

LITTLETON—St. Peter's Church.—This parish is one of the oldest religious organizations in the eastern part of Dutchess County. It is said to have existed under royal charter. However this may be, the parish was incorporated under the laws of New York in 1801. The Rev. Philander Chase, subsequently Bishop of Ohio, and afterwards of Illinois, but then rector of Christ church, Poughkeepsie, held occasional services in that vicinity in 1800 and 1801, and on May 12, 1801, "at the house of Elijah Prindle," proceedings were taken to incorporate the parish, and the certificate of incorporation was duly recorded on May 30, 1801. In August, 1806, an acre of ground was deeded to the parish by David Johnston, for the erection of a church and for a burial place. No church building was erected, however, until many years later. In 1832, under the inspiration of the Rev. G. B. Andrews, then rector of Zion parish, Wappinger's Falls, a subscription was made, and in 1833 a church was built. During the next forty years fortune and misfortune attended the parish. At no time strong in numbers, the few faithful ones were called upon to withstand and overcome difficulties that not infrequently have borne down very much stronger congregations. Not the least among the disheartening events in its history was the loss of the church building by fire in 1880.

The nave of a new church was erected, during 1881, on new ground, and the old site devoted entirely to burial purposes. The cemetary has been placed under the management of a cemetery committee, and all moneys received are funded and allowed to accumulate as a permanent fund, the interest of which shall maintain the grounds in proper condition. In 1882 the rectory was remodelled, enlarged, and improved. During the past year a recess chancel has been added to the church, and the vestry-room has been more than doubled in size, and is intended as the rector's study as well as a robing-room. A window has been placed in the chancel, in memory of one of the first vestrymen, Mr. John Fitch, and his wife. Other memorial windows will be added. A sweet-toned bell, of Mensey & Co.'s make, was used for the first time at the assistant-bishop's visitation, on the Twenty-third Sunday after Trinity, when the rector (the Rev. J. C. S. Weill) presided for confirmation the largest number of candidates ever presented in the history of the parish.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Peter's Church.—Advent Mission services to be continued for eight days were begun in this parish on Sunday, December 6, by the rector, the Rev. C. A. Tibbals. His sermon was based on St. Luke iii. 9, 10, and sketched the true work of a mission and the practical results which may be expected to come from it. In the evening of the same day the Rev. Theodore B. Foster, assistant-minister of St. Luke's, Brooklyn, and experienced in mission services in that parish, conducted the worship, and preached the sermon. His discourse described the future judgment, and was listened to with solemn interest.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Incarnation.—At this church the rector (the Rev. James W. Sparks) delivered the second of the Advent lectures in progress, his subject being "Science and Revelation." There are, he said, two distinct conceptions of Christianity in Europe and America at present. The one is that Christianity is the religion of a book, the other that it is a living corporation. The two may be easily combined by accepting the view that the Christian Church is a living body, the Bride of Christ, as St. John describes her, but that the New and Old Testaments are her title deeds and charters.

BROOKLYN—Church of the Messiah.—The last of a series of Sunday evening lectures on popular topics, which have been delivered in this church by various clergymen, was given December 6, by the rector, the Rev. Charles R. Baker. His subject was "The Moral Responsibility of the Press." After showing the advance which has been made under Greek, Latin, and Gothic influence, God educating mankind by the lesson of beauty, the lesson of order, and the lesson of justice, he traced the dominant influence of the pulpit from the middle of the fourth century to the close of the sixteenth. But with the invention of the printing press the pulpit became specialized, being left to treat of moral and religious questions solely, while the new agent became the guide of secular life. By the term press, he included literature in general as well as the newspaper. He then proceeded to show very forcibly the vast power which the public press wields, and to point out its grave faults and shortcomings. He believed, however, that the press is yet to produce its heroes and saints as the drama and the pulpit did in their ages. And he held that of all the careers open to men to-day none is to be coveted so much as that of the journalist.

BROOKLYN, E. D.—Union Advent Mission Services.—The second of these services, in which the rectors, congregations, and choirs of St. Mark's, Grace, Calvary, and Christ churches unite, was held in Christ church on Sunday evening, December 6. The large edifice was crowded. Besides the rectors of the respective parishes, the Rev. Drs. J. H. Darlington and S. M. Haskins, and the Rev. Messrs. C. L. Twing and Edwin Coan, there were in the chancel the Rev. Dr. L. W. Bancroft and the Rev. Messrs. J. Edgar Johnson and J. R. Jennings. The sermon was by the Rev. J. F. Johnson from St. Mark v. 34. Relating the incidents in the story of Jairus's daughter, he presented our Lord as the Physician of souls, and urged all to seek Him. The discourse was also illustrated by facts in modern life, and was practical and impressive.

LONG ISLAND CITY—Church of the Redeemer, Astoria.—On Advent Sunday the Rev. Dr. E. D. Cooper celebrated the nineteenth anniversary of his rectorship of this parish, which was also the nineteenth anniversary of the parish itself. The church was filled, and the service was hearty, the musical portion being rendered by a full surpliced choir, assisted by a choir of ladies in the organ-chamber. The only decoration was the wreathing of the lecturn with flowers and the figures 19 on the ante-pendium. Bishop Southgate was present, and pronounced the benediction at the close of the service. The rector preached the sermon from I Sam. viii. 12. It was an interesting discourse briefly reviewing the history of the nineteen years of the parish, and answering certain questions that had been put to him with reference to the character of the services of the Church and certain supposed or apparent changes therein. The statistics for the past year are: baptisms, 27; confirmations, 23; marriages, 9; burials, 20; families, 133, containing 532 persons; communicants, 380. The statistics for the nineteen years are: baptisms, 461; confirmations, 383; marriages, 89; burials, 242; communicants, 687.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

PATERSON—St. Paul's Church.—The bishop of the diocese made his annual visitation of this parish (the Rev. E. B. Russell, rector,) on the morning of the Second Sunday in Advent, and confirmed thirty-six persons. Nearly one-half of the number were young men. All the newly confirmed received at the Holy Communion the same morning.

PATERSON—Trinity Church, Totowa.—At this church (the Rev. Frederick Graves in charge) the bishop on the evening of the Second Sunday in Advent, confirmed seventeen persons.

ORANGE—All Saints' Church.—The bishop of the diocese made his first visitation of this parish (the Rev. William Richmond, rector,) on the afternoon of Advent Sunday, and confirmed fifty-one persons.

NEWARK—Christ Church.—An interesting memorial service was held in this church (the Rev. J. N. Stansbury, rector,) on Monday, December 7, memorial of the late Rev. Dr. R. M. Abercrombie. The bishop celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the rector, the Rev. Dr. W. W. Holey and the Rev. E. B. Russell. There were many friends of Dr. Abercrombie present.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Clement's Dispensary.—One part of the scheme of having a hospital in connection with this parish has taken shape. It is open every evening from 7 to 8, at the house which has been secured, No. 110 Friedland Street. A medical staff has been secured, some one of whom will be in attendance each evening, and a specialist to treat diseases of the eye on Wednesday evening. An apothecary is also in charge of the drug store to put up the prescriptions. It was opened for visitors on Saturday, November 28, and received its first patients on the following Monday.

PHILADELPHIA—Clerical Brotherhood.—One of the largest meetings of the Clerical Brotherhood was held on Monday, December 6, to hear the discussion of the New York Advent Mission by those who had been present or had taken part in it. The first speaker was the Rev. Dr. W. N. McVickar, who was followed by the Rev. Dr. Richard Newton and the Rev. Messrs. B. W. Maturin, and S. D. McConnell.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Philip's Church.—The Bishop of Central Pennsylvania, acting for the bishop of the diocese, who is still confined to his room by reason of his severe illness, visited this parish (the Rev. E. B. Killikelly, rector,) and, after preaching, confirmed eleven persons.

PHILADELPHIA—The Seamen's Mission.—The annual report of this association has just been issued. From it we glean the following statistics for the five months during which the present missionary in chief, the Rev. J. J. Sleeper, has been in charge: 51 Church services, with an attendance of 2,577, of which 777 were seamen, and 10 guild and other services. The Holy Communion has been celebrated 29 times in public and 7 times in private; 59 sermons and addresses delivered. The Sunday-school has 194 members, with 10 officers and teachers; 1391 visits have been made. Over 36,000 pages of tracts and nearly 1,100 books and papers have been given away, beside 101 Prayer Books, 34 hymnals, and 447 Bibles and New Testaments in nine different languages. A reading-room has been opened. The missionary-in-chief has, during the past August, visited the churches for seamen in New York and Baltimore as well as some life-saving stations on the coast. The work of the mission, which is supported by voluntary contributions, is among seamen, their families, and those who live in the immediate vicinity of the church. The Rev. Messrs. Isaac Martin and J. F. Harrigan are active in ministering to seamen at distant points around Philadelphia, under a board of managers, of which the bishop of the diocese is ex-officio president.

PHILADELPHIA—Archdeacon Farrar's Visit.—The venerable the Archdeacon of Westminster was in this city on Tuesday and Wednesday before his departure from our shores. Every moment was availed of, so that he must have been glad when the days were past. On Tuesday evening he was introduced by Dr. William Pepper Provost, of the University of Pennsylvania, to an audience of fully two thousand persons, and delivered a lecture upon "Farewell thoughts on America." At its close he was driven to the rooms of the Journalist's Club, where he made an address and was tendered a reception from 10 to 12 P.M.

On Wednesday morning a reception was given him by Mr. George W. Childs, who had invited the clergy and ministers of the city to meet the archdeacon at a luncheon at the Aldine Hotel. Over six hundred people assembled and paid him their respects. At 3:30 a large number of invited guests, besides the trustees, faculty and students of University of Pennsylvania, were assembled in the chapel, where after an introduction by Provost Pepper, the archdeacon gave a talk on education.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

BELLEFONTE—Ordination.—The assistant-bishop held a special ordination in St. John's Church, Bellefonte, on Thursday, December 3, and advanced to the priesthood the Rev. John R. Robinson, minister in charge of the parish. The sermon was preached by the assistant-bishop, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. Dr. C. F. Knight, who with the Rev. Drs. J. H. Hopkins and F. J. Clerc, and the Rev. J. H. Black, joined in the imposition of hands.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Meeting of the District Clergy.—A meeting of the clergy of the District of Columbia was held, at the instance of the Rev. James A. Buck, late chairman of the Monday Clerics, at the Reading Room of the church of the Epiphany, on Monday, November 23. The object of the meeting was to confer about the parochial missionary work of the district, to revise the clerics, dispose of the funds on hand, and other business. Fifteen clergy were present. The Rev. J. A. Buck was chosen chairman and the Rev. Irving McElroy secretary and treasurer. The Rev. Drs. S. H. Giesey, J. H. Elliott and T. G. Addison were appointed a committee to take into consideration the parochial missionary work of Rock Creek Parish as laid before the meeting by the rector, and to report what can be done by the clergy of other parishes to further it. Besides the chapel now nearly completed at Mount Pleasant, within the limits of this large parish are other important points at which lay or clerical help could be extended to great advantage. The Rev. Drs. A. Crummell, T. G. Addison, and S. Giesey, were appointed a committee to secure pledges of money from the District Churchmen and others, by which two-thirds of the annual interest on the mortgage now resting on St. Luke's Church may be met for at least three years to come. The remaining third it is supposed that the congregation, though poor, may be able to pay. They do what they can, and deserve help from outside. The Rev. Drs. I. L. Townsend and J. H. Elliott were appointed a committee to confer with the other ministerial associations of the city in reference to burials on Sunday. It was determined to revive the clerics, and hold its meetings on the third Monday of each month at the Epiphany Reading Room.

EASTON.

THE REV. DR. SMITH'S DECLINATION.—The following is the text of the letter of the Rev. Dr. G. W. Smith, declining the bishopric of Easton.

Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., Nov. 27, 1885. To the Rev. Theo. P. Barber, D.D., President, and the Rev. James A. Mitchell, Secretary of the Convention of the Diocese of Easton.

Reverend and Dear Brethren: With a deep sense of the honor done me, I gratefully acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of the 18th, and your letter of the 20th, informing me that the Convention of the Diocese of Easton, had, on the day first named, elected me to succeed the late Right Reverend Henry Champlain Lay, D.D., LL.D., as bishop of the diocese. Although reluctant to cause any delay in filling the episcopate, the gravity of the question submitted to me, the dignity of the office, and the interests of the Church in Easton, appeared to justify a request for time for consideration. Accordingly, on receipt of the telegram, I asked two weeks for the purpose, and I beg, through you, to thank the convention for granting the request. After carefully and prayerfully considering the whole subject, I regret to have to announce that I cannot see my way clear to accept the high and responsible office to which I have been undeservedly elected. Believe me, brethren, that no ordinary consideration would have brought me to this reluctant conclusion.

Praying God to guide you to one more worthy than myself to fill the holy office in succession to the sainted Lay, and thanking you for the kind manner in which you have discharged your duty towards me, I am in the highest esteem, your brother in Christ.

GEO. WILLIAMSON SMITH.

DIOCESAN NOTES.—The Rev. Dr. George Williamson Smith having declined the recent election to the bishopric of this diocese, a second special convention has been called for December 16. This diocese comprises the eight counties of Maryland on the Eastern shore of the State, and consists of about forty parishes and congregations, its clergy numbering about thirty-six, the average lay attendance in convention being about thirty. For general purposes, in 1885, the contributions of the diocese amounted to $600; diocesan, $5,500; parochial, about $32,400; other uses, $4,000; total, $40,900. The value of the rectories of the diocese (twenty-six in all), is $62,400; insurance on them, $36,000; there are sixty-three churches, valued at $201,600, and insured at $94,000.

The Glebes comprise 434 acres, valued at $20,000; the invested funds of the diocese are nearly $17,000. The number of communicants is 2,638; baptisms last year, 400; Sunday-school teachers, 228; pupils, 1,680. There is one parish school having about twenty pupils. It is estimated that there are 1,440 families, representing about 7,000 souls, attached to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Church. There are three convocations within the diocese. During the last year of the late Bishop Lay's life, he confirmed fifty-four persons.

NORTH CAROLINA.

RALEIGH.—Ordination.—On the Twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity, the bishop held an ordination in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh. Morning Prayer having been said at an earlier hour at both Christ church and the Church of the Good Shepherd, the two congregations assembled at the latter church at 11:30 a. m. There were present besides the bishop, the Rev. Drs. F. M. Hubbard, R. B. Sutton, M. M. Marshall and James Carmichael, and the Rev. Messrs. Bennett Smedes, Gilbert Higgs, J. Huske, J. R. Cheshire, Jr., and the two candidates, the Rev. Messrs. W. J. Smith, and Robert Strange, the latter the rector-elect of the parish.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. B. Cheshire, Jr., from Ephesians iv. 11, 12, 13. The sermon was listened to with much interest and attention by a large congregation. Much regret was expressed at the unavoidable absence of the Rev. Dr. J. C. Huske, who had been originally appointed to preach the sermon. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Messrs. G. Higgs and John Huske, and all the presbyters present joined in the laying on of hands.

The Rev. Mr. Smith will remain as assistant in Calvary church, Tarboro', and the Rev. Mr. Strange will soon be instituted into the rectorship of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh.

ALABAMA.

THE DIOCESAN INSTITUTIONS.—Orphan Asylums.—There are two orphan asylums in Mobile, one for girls, the other for boys, both under the management of the bishop and his deaconesses, of whom there are twelve. Both asylums are in a healthy condition and doing a work of which the diocese may be justly proud. There is a substantiality about this work of charity, most trustworthy and commendable; and as a result the offerings from the Church and the world, especially in Mobile, make these asylums almost self-sustaining, without drawing upon invested funds. Church Schools.—There was a Church School proposed in Mobile last summer by the Rev. J. S. Johnson, and efforts were made for its establishment, whether successful or not, we are not informed.

Hanner Hall, the diocesan institute for girls under the direction of the Rev. Dr. G. M. Everhart has maintained for years a very high character, and the present year seems to be, if any thing, even more prosperous than previous ones. As in similar institutions the daily service in conformity with the Christian year, and the teachings of the Church in lectures and sermons, and the atmosphere which such a religious system necessarily creates, are sending out, year after year, the daughters of the land deeply imbued with the principles of a higher and better life. The resources of the diocese, however, are entirely unequal to the claims which such a school presents. There should be an endowment or some funds provided especially for the gratuitous education of the daughters of the clergy. Most of our clergy live at parts remote from good schools and are wholly unable to incur the expense, even at very reduced rates, which a boarding school education necessarily imposes. Something early should be done to give relief in cases like this, without imposing upon the recipients too much personal obligation.

The statement is authorized by the rector, that he will receive the daughters of our clergy for one hundred dollars each, and give them board, tuition and the "extras" for an entire year. As Christmas is at hand this benefaction is most earnestly commended to those blessed with means as one of paramount excellence. The money might be sent either to the rector of the school, at Montgomery, or to the bishop of the diocese, to be devoted in the manner indicated.

MISSISSIPPI.

VICKSBURG.—Christ Church.—Advent Sunday, November 29, was the twentieth anniversary of the assumption of the rectorship of the parish by the Rev. Dr. Henry Sansom. He took charge at the end of the civil war, when the congregation was suffering under heavy losses both in numbers and in material property. But ninety-five communicants remained of all who had been numbered with the congregation. Since Dr. Sansom undertook the work of rehabilitation, the course of the parish has been steadily upward—numbers have increased and upward of $80,000 has been raised for parish support and general purposes.

At the morning service the rector made an address, in which he gave a brief and entertaining history of the parish from its foundation in 1836.

In honor of the anniversary and as a testimonial of the affection which they bear for their rector, many of the congregation presented him with some handsome pieces of silver plate. The names of the donors were unknown, so the rector expressed his thanks generally to the congregation.

TENNESSEE.

MOUNT PLEASANT.—Oley School for Boys.—This school has done much to solve the problem of good and cheap education. It does not depend for support entirely on tuition fees. A compact and fertile farm attached to the school furnishes the equivalent of much money, and furthermore ensures a good and bountiful table. The question of food and fuel in this healthy and fertile region can cause no anxiety. The school is a good one; its patrons are among the best families in the state. That they are pleased and satisfied proves the quality of the work done at the school.

The Convocation of Nashville has taken this school under its charge in a special way. It therefore may be looked upon as one of the prominent features of the educational work in this diocese.

The only thing to be deplored is the limited capacity of the school building. It is determined that there shall be no crowding. There are no funds in hand to build any additions at present so that vacancies in the full complement of boarders cannot exist long.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE—John N. Norton Memorial Infirmary.—This handsome edifice was opened on Saturday, December 3, with appropriate ceremonies. This institution was projected ten or twelve years ago by the Home Mission Society of St. Paul's parish. The ladies of the society had raised by their own work $5,000, when Mrs. Norton, the widow of the Rev. Dr. J. N. Norton, then recently deceased, offered to add $10,000 to the amount conditionally that the infirmary should bear its present name. Since then she has made two other large donations to the work, and gives it much of her time and attention. Dr. Norton, who at the time of his death, was associate rector of Christ Church, was well known by his writings to the Church at large, and particularly so in Kentucky from his earnest and zealous labors.

The building is a large structure of pressed brick with stone foundations and trimmings, four stories in height, with two wings, one of which is not yet ready for occupancy. It was erected solely for its present purpose, is large, light, and airy, and provided with all modern conveniences. The institution is incorporated and under the control of a board of trustees; $5,000 endows a bed, with perpetual right of nomination to the subscriber; $300 entitles the donor to nominate the occupant of a bed for one year. There is a board of lady managers. Though the infirmary is under Church control, the managers have secured the interest and cooperation of charitable people of all names, and it seems to be the desire to make it a memorial not only of Dr. Norton, but of many other departed loved ones. Eleven wards and rooms had already been furnished as memorials of departed friends, before the opening day, and during that day there were more offers than there were rooms ready to be furnished; but when the north wing is completed these offers can be accepted. The Home Missionary Society of St. Paul's church has furnished the first room for the parlor floor as a library, and has also furnished the Women's Ward, in memory of Miss Ella Phillips. The congregation of St. Paul's has furnished a room, to be known as the Perkins Ward, after the rector, the Rev. E. T. Perkins. The Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, has fitted up a room in memory of Dr. Norton, who was its rector for twenty-two years. The ladies of the Second Presbyterian congregation have handsomely furnished a room in memory of their deceased pastor, the Rev. Stuart Robinson, and the Central Presbyterian congregation, one in memory of the late Dr. W. C. Brewster. The Children's Ward has been furnished by the Society of the Ministering Children of St. Paul's parish. All the other wards and rooms have been furnished or bespoken by different persons in memory of departed friends.

The lady managers and the wives of the trustees projected and arranged the opening, and made it a success. The doors were opened at 1 P. M., and during the afternoon and evening the large building was well filled with admiring visitors, who examined all the accommodations. About fifteen hundred people visited the infirmary during the day.

The managers are now in correspondence with a graduate of Bellevue Hospital, New York, with the view of securing her to take charge of the wards. A board of the leading surgeons and physicians of Louisville will appoint a visiting staff. None but trained nurses will be employed, and it will be the object of the management to make a national reputation for the Infirmary.

HOPKINSVILLE—Grace Church.—A Harvest Home service was held in this church (the Rev. J. W. Venable, rector,) on Thanksgiving Day. The church was tastefully decorated with grain, fruit and vegetables, and a large congregation assembled to give thanks for the mercies and benefits of the past year. The rector preached from Genesis viii. 22, and the offerings were devoted to charitable purposes.

On Advent Sunday the bishop of the diocese visited the parish, preached twice, and confirmed ten persons.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

GRAND RAPIDS—St. Mark's Church.—The Thanksgiving Day services at this church (the Rev. E. S. Burford, rector) were participated in by a large congregation. The music was rendered by the surpliced choir, assisted by several musical instruments and led by the assistant minister, the Rev. F. A. De Rosset. The chancel was decorated with grain, vegetables, etc., which, with the money offerings, were presented to the Church Home.

On the evening before Thanksgiving Day the Home was the scene of generous giving and grateful receiving of donations. A committee of ladies was in waiting to receive the gifts, which consisted of money, clothing, bedding, fuel, groceries and other necessities. The entire cash contributions, including the offerings at St. Mark's church, amounted to $360.91.

The Home and Hospital has opened its doors to a portion of the State's disabled soldiers, giving them care and shelter, with medical attendance, if needed, until such time as the Soldier's Home is ready for occupancy.

CHICAGO.

CHICAGO—The General Convention.—The general committee appointed at the late diocesan convention, for the purpose of making arrangements for the General Convention, which will be held in Chicago, in October, 1886, met November 20, at the Palmer House. The committee consists of the rectors of all the churches in the city, and three laymen appointed from each parish. There were about thirty gentlemen present, and Bishop McLaren occupied the chair. The coming convention, which meets triennially, will be composed of four clergymen and four laymen from each diocese in the United States, making in all 320 delegates. A number of important subjects will be considered by this convention, among which will be a revision of the Prayer Book. The last convention was held in Philadelphia, in 1883. After a general discussion of the manner of providing the ways and means for the convention, the chair appointed Revs. Dr. Clinton Locke, T. N. Morrison, Jr., and E. A. Larrabee, and Messrs. M. D. Talcott, A. Eddy, Jr., and William M. Tilden, as a committee to select a suitable place in which to hold the convention, which will probably continue for three weeks. Central Music Hall was preferred for that purpose, by the members present. The rectors of all the city churches were authorized to nominate one or more laymen from each parish, as a committee on finance, to secure contributions to defray the expenses of the convention. The committee then adjourned, to meet again January 4, 1886.—Local Paper.

CHICAGO—Western Theological Seminary.—It is with great pleasure that we announce the gift of $300 to our seminary from Miss Elizabeth Clarkson Jay, of New York city, for the purpose of establishing "The Pierre Jay Prize" for the best paper on the Foreign Missionary Work of the Church. The prize is $100, each year for three years. The judges are the Bishop of Chicago and the Rev. Drs. Locke and Vibbert, by appointment of Miss Jay. It is understood that several of the students will prepare papers. The successful paper will be read before a congregation some time in January.

We earnestly pray that this kindly and generous act on the part of this respected lady may develop a larger interest in the foreign work of the Church. May it do more—may it lead to our young seminary being represented by some of its coming alumni in the far-off lands where Satan's seat is!—Diocesan Paper.

CHICAGO—The Bishop's Tenth Anniversary.—Tuesday, December 8, was the tenth anniversary of the consecration of the bishop of this diocese. According to his usual custom he celebrated the Holy Communion on that day at 10.30 A. M. A number of the clergy and laity were present.

MINNESOTA.

ST. PAUL—Ordination.—On Monday, November 30, in Christ church (the Rev. M. L. Gilbert, rector,) the bishop of the diocese advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Sydney G. Jeffords, deacon in this parish. The sermon was preached by the bishop, and the candidate presented by the rector of the parish.

NEBRASKA.

FREMONT—Memorial Services.—Services memorial of the late Rev. Dr. John McNamara were held in St. James' church, Fremont, on Sunday, November 22. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Robert Doherty.

Dr. McNamara died suddenly in North Platte, where he was a rector of the Church of Our Saviour, on October 24. He was stricken with paralysis, and survived only seven hours. He was buried at Geneva Lake, Wis., which was his first Western parish.

Dr. McNamara's history is a peculiar and interesting one. He was born in Dromore, Ireland, in 1824, and was the son of a skilled and intelligent stone mason, who was fond of books and intellectual pursuits. He came with his parents to Middletown, Conn., where he worked in a printing office for a time, and then was apprenticed to a manufacturer of wall paper. During his apprenticeship he became acquainted with the Rev. Dr. Jarvis, and attended his school for boys. Dr. Jarvis took a great interest in him, and volunteered to teach him Greek and Latin. The wall paper factory being burned, he was released from his apprenticeship, and he went, mostly on foot, to Dr. Muhlenberg at Flushing, and obtained permission to attend the class recitations. The kind-hearted Dr. Muhlenberg took him into his own house. He entered, and was passed through St. Paul's school, Flushing, and entered the General Theological Seminary in 1846. In 1849 he was ordained to the diaconate in Brooklyn by Bishop Whittingham, and went to Wisconsin, where in 1850 Bishop Kerver advanced him to the priesthood. He served as missionary in Missouri, and for a time had a parish in Chicago, but in 1854 accepted a missionary appointment to Kansas. Here he met misfortune. He sympathized so earnestly with the measures of the Free State party in the settlement of that territory, that he lost many of his most influential friends, and was forced to build himself a cabin, in which both to live and officiate. Here he lost two daughters, and very nearly died himself, having to be taken with his sick wife out of his cabin and carried to Atchison and St.

Joseph, where his health was with difficulty restored.

Mr. McNamara published a book entitled, "Three Years on the Kansas Border," and made several earnest speeches in New York and other Eastern places, on behalf of the Free State settlement in Kansas. He returned to Wisconsin and founded the parishes at Geneva Lake, White Water, Fond du Lac, Wis., and Waukegan, Ill., and labored at Kenosha, La Crosse, and other important points. During the civil war he was chaplain of the First Wisconsin, serving throughout the war. He remained in Wisconsin until 1870, when he assumed the presidency of Nebraska College, and the rectorship of St. Mary's, Nebraska City. In 1875 he resigned those positions, and accepted duty under Dr. Muhlenberg in St. Luke's Hospital, New York, and St. Johnland. At the death of Dr. Muhlenberg he returned to Nebraska and became rector of St. James's, Fremont. For a short time he engaged in missionary work in New Mexico, but resumed his rectorship at Fremont very soon. A thorough missionary, he again accepted missionary work at Crête, Beatrice, and other points; was recalled to Nebraska College, but resigned it to take the Church of Our Saviour, North Platte, which he held for the last year of his life.

Dr. McNamara had the earnest missionary spirit as part of his nature, and he was never so happy as when planting parishes in a new field. Many flourishing parishes in the Northwest are memorials of his devoted missionary work.

KANSAS.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—The annual convention of the diocese was held in Grace cathedral church, Topeka, on Wednesday, December 2. The attendance of clergy and laity was large, and much interest was manifested. The question of an assistant-bishop was brought up, and after much discussion it was decided to elect an assistant at a special convention to be held in Topeka in May, 1886.

LEAVENWORTH.—St. John's Church.—The first anniversary of the assumption of this parish by the Rev. F. S. De Mattos, occurred on Sunday, December 5. The rector preached an appropriate sermon on the occasion. When he assumed charge there were 8 families, about 35 individuals, 21 communicants, 10 Sunday scholars. There are now 34 families, about 125 individuals, 44 communicants, and 75 Sunday scholars.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

SYRACUSE.—St. Paul's Cathedral.—The new St. Paul's church, or, as it is henceforth to be known, St. Paul's Cathedral, was opened on Sunday, December 13. Long before 10 o'clock the members of the congregation, friends of the Church, and citizens generally, began to assemble, and soon the spacious edifice was crowded to repletion. It soon became necessary to fill the aisles with chairs, and these, too, were speedily occupied. The church presented a brilliant and beautiful appearance, and constant exclamations of delight were made manifest by those present. The church was beautifully illuminated for the occasion, and the hundreds of gas jets served to heighten and bring out in bold relief the beauties of design, decoration and ornamentation. The acoustic properties of the church are admirable, and every word uttered from the pulpit was distinctly heard, even in the furthestmost corner, while the rich and solemn notes of the organ reverberated with impressive effect throughout the interior.

The services were conducted by Bishop Huntington. They were opened by Dr. Ashley who read through the psalms. The Rev. George Heathcote Hills read the lessons and the Rev. John Downs Hills read the collect and the litany. The bishop officiated at communion, the rector reading the Epistle. At the conclusion of the service the rector, the Rev. H. R. Lockwood, announced that the trustees and vestrymen of the church had tendered to Bishop Huntington the use of St. Paul's as the cathedral church of the diocese and that the bishop had accepted the offer. A pew has also been set apart for the use of the bishop's family. St. Paul's therefore is to be henceforth known as St. Paul's Cathedral.

The Rev. Dr. George Morgan Hills, of Burlington, N. J., then preached an able and instructive sermon from the text: "The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." Psalm lxxxvii, 2.

Concluding, Dr. Hills said: "The solemnities have not the sublime function of a 'consecration,' which we pray God to hasten in His time; but the tenderer and comparatively private character, where the families of one tribe come together to give thanks unto the name of the Lord for some great and special blessing common to them all. We have assembled, some from long distances, former parishioners and present parishioners, former pastors and present pastor, bishop, clergy, and laity, to 'dedicate this house of God with joy.' And if those departed this life are cognizant of things on earth, have we not with us a company unseen? I speak not of the blessed angels, but of those once mortal like ourselves, of like passions as we are, those whom we have seen and known, and those of whom we have heard with our ears and our fathers have told us. Is not every one who, with a faithful and true heart, has given little or much to this parochial Zion an interested spectator of this scene? Have we not with us John McCarty, the deacon from Onondaga Hill, who, in 1826, in the district school-house on Church Street, presided at the organization of this parish? Have we not with us William Barlow, the first resident missionary who in two years' time saw the earliest church fabric completed and consecrated? Have we not Palmer Dyer, who, after the little flock of eight communicants had been for eighteen months without a shepherd strengthened the things that remained, and during four years had 'the good report of all men and of the truth itself'? And John B. Gallagher, whose failing health alone caused frequent intermission of his telling services? And Henry Gregory, that man of God who seemed like one of the old prophets risen again, and who after five-and-twenty years of toil, 'fell on sleep,' leaving for monuments two temples of stone, and two well instructed congregations, and the imperishable title, 'Father of the Church in Syracuse'?

And Simon Greenleaf Fuller, that splendid young man, your rector only two-and-twenty months, and then removed so instantly that his departure was like translation rather than death! And if these are with us, are not the lion-hearted Hobart, who consecrated the first church fabric, and the wise-minded De Lancy, who consecrated the second?

By a concurrence, no doubt undesigned, to-day is the feast of St. Lucy, the patron of ancient Syracuse, after which this city is named. This concurrence is to me beautiful and suggestive. It reminds me that in the first dwelling ever erected in this locality there were six communicants of the Church, and all of them were women. It reminds me that the first religious rite performed in this place was the marriage of one of these. It reminds me, too, that the wife of the proprietor of the first Syracuse home, likewise a communicant, when in the winter of 1822 the Rev. Lucius

Smith of Auburn came out here to officiate, turned her parlor temporarily into an oratory for the first public worship. It reminds me further how always here and everywhere, holy women have "labored much in the Lord." Their names are in the book of life. They shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

Brethren, since the two former rectors present first ministered among you, a generation has gone, a generation has come. The men and women who are the hope of this parish are the children whom we catechised, the infants whom we christened. Two, born in your first rectory, now a priest and a deacon, have come back to the home of their nativity to be with their elders in this hour of gladness. Can you conceive the emotions of the heart that can say, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me?"

Right reverend father in God, chief pastor of this jurisdiction, I congratulate you on this event in the mother parish of this city, and the announcement just made from the chancel, that you accept this church as your cathedral is the drop which makes our cup of joy overflow. For forty years its rectors will bear witness that this is a congregation of great resources and vast capabilities. None more so except in Central New York, and few more so except in the great cities. May it be yours, right reverend father, always to be able to say that this "hill of Zion is a fair place," and the joy of the whole diocese. May its gifts so continue to flow, that it continue to merit the distinction which Bishop De Lancy gave it, when, with a set of alms basons brought from England, he added, "in testimony of St. Paul's parish being among the most liberal supporters of diocesan missions and other Church objects."

My beloved brother, rector of this large and influential parish, "for myself and all here present, and many afar off," I congratulate you on the completion of this noble work. The three priests next preceding you desired such a consummation and cried, "O Lord, how long!" Two of them are permitted to take you by the hands this day and "rejoice with exceeding great joy."

Laity of this congregation of St. Paul's, beloved by every tie, you are to be congratulated beyond all. You have reared these walls as those who know "That in this place is One greater than the temple." Keep as solidly in your hearts as are the foundation stones which uphold its superstructure, that it become, and that you belong to the One Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, the historic Church which has transmitted to us English literature and English laws not only, but the English Bible and the English liturgy. Believe in this Church, pray for it, work for it, give to it. Never compromise it. Would you compromise your mother! So shall "the Lord build up Zion, and His glory shall appear." For "the Lord thy God, O Zion, shall be King for evermore, and throughout all generations."

At the conclusion of the services the congregation of St. Paul's crowded about the chancel and extended hearty welcome to Dr. Ashley and Dr. Hills. Many an eye was dimmed with tears, as fond reminiscences of the parastates of these beloved divines were recalled.

At the evening service, the Rev. Dr. W. B. Ashley delivered an able and eloquent discourse, taking for his text the second verse of the 32d chapter of Isaiah, "A man shall be an hiding place from the wind, a covert from the tempest, as the rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

Dr. Ashley's discourse was an able theological effort, and partook of an entirely different character from that of Dr. Hills in the morning.

WANING INFLUENCE OF THE MINISTRY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Although Mr. Hughes seems to have dismissed the subject in your last issue, he certainly will not be unmerciful enough to refuse a woman "the last word."

While your first correspondent may have been somewhat sweeping and censorious in his remarks, he is not without truth on his side.

If there were among our clergy the willingness for voluntary self-sacrifices which characterized the Apostles and their immediate successors, we should not hear the pitiful appeals that come up to us from foreign missionaries, and our own missionary bishops, for help in their difficult fields.

Let us be fair, and acknowledge that we, all clergy and lay, have fallen far away from the devotion and the simplicity of the early Church.

If we loved God better than the things of this world, the only question would be: "How little can I get along with myself? How much can I give, of time as well as money, to His service?"

"A reasonable and holy life" we are all pledged to. It need not be an ascetic one, and it can hardly be a luxurious one. And here may I, in all kindness, say one word to my brethren the clergy about an indulgence so common among them—smoking, which gives you no necessary or reasonable comfort, but can be called either: I will not profane the Master's name by such a suggestion, but can you imagine His disciples, or St. Paul, giving way to a habit so useless, expensive, and injurious? If you plead with us for self-denial, do it with lips clean from such indulgence. I love you so well, I honor you so much, that I want you free from this and every reproach.

I do not believe the influence of the Christian ministry is waning, but it might be measuredly greater. It will be if you fashion your lives closer and closer to the humble, stainless one of Him who is our Priest forever.

I. L. LATTAN.

SOUTH DAKOTA, NIOBRARA DEANERY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I have been spending several days in this delightful school, St. John's. The more I see of it the more I like it. A set of more industrious children, a set of happier children, I have never seen. No private home I ever was in was cleaner than this home is kept by these girls under the superintendence of their teachers, and in none was the work more noiselessly done. Nothing but rare gifts in the officers of the school and rare devotion to their work could have achieved such results. Miss Elaine Goodale of Hampton Institute, and Mr. Herbert Welsh visited St. John's School in September, and the former, in an editorial in the Southern Workman of November, remarks:

"I have never seen more complete control, more tact, grace and personal magnetism, more delightful order and method, with an equally delightful spontaneity than I saw in St. John's School on an Indian Reservation."

The Indians are quick to recognize such success in the care of their children, and St. John's School ranks very high in their esteem. The school opens August 1, and there were thirty-nine girls for supper. If the building had been sufficiently large I am quite sure Mr. and Mrs. Kinney could have taken a hundred pupils, and that without solicitation, so pleasant and friendly is the existing feeling among the Indians. One man, Long Log, had imported them for two years to take his little Mary. They had evaded his questions until finally he said, giving them a very sharp look, "I will bring my little girl and sit on the stoil the morning school is to open, and when the bell rings I will not be too late." They took the child.

Some two or three weeks before school opened, Lucille, a little girl who had been in school one year, came up to see Mr. and Mrs. Kinney, and brought her little sister and her cousin, both of whom she had put in order for the occasion. They had brought with them as sort of propitiatory offering a few half-pipe plums, which they carried in the shell of a watermelon. Poor souls, it was all they had to give. Watching Mr. and Mrs. Kinney's faces, and judging it a fitting moment, Lucille stepped forward and asked that her sister and cousin might come to school. To take them both was impossible, but they compromised and took the cousin. They called her Bessie. She was a bright, attractive little girl, but it was soon found that she had always been in poor health. In a short time she developed signs of quick consumption, and only lived a few weeks. When she found that she was going to die, she requested that the sister might be taken in her place.

The girls are very desirous that others shall share their happy lot. A little one came up to me the other day and put in my hand fifty cents which her parents had given her with which to buy candy, and said, "To put a little girl in school." Another and another have followed her example. Another, a sort of pupil-teacher, has insisted upon my receiving an offering of $10—half of it to help put a girl in school and half for Missions; while the father of one of the girls has given a young steer worth $18, which he wishes divided and used in the same way. The girls and I have had a council over the matter, and we have concluded to begin a new scholarship in St. John's School, to be called "The Bessie Scholarship," after the little schoolmate whom they lost, and who was so anxious that when she died her sister might be taken in her place. The contribution here amounts to $20.70. For the rest of the $30 needed we must look to our friends at the East.

Missionary Bishop.

NEW BOOKS.

THE SONG CELESTIAL, OF BHAGAVAD GITA. From the Mahabharata, Being a Discourse Between Arjuna, Prince of Indraprastha, and the Suffering Teacher, Krishna. Translated from the Sanskrit Text by Edwin Arnold, A. Author of the "Light of Asia," etc. (Boston: Roberts Brothers,) pp. 185. Price $1.00.

The power of Mr. Edwin Arnold as a translator is not to be questioned. There is great grace and beauty in his rendering, and in the "Song Celestial," there is less employment of the Indian terminology, which is so unintelligible to any but a Sanskrit scholar, than in some of his other poems. We presume this is, I fear, probably flattering, presentation of the Braminical teaching. The poem sets forth the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, the attainment of Nirvana by mental concentration, the Pantheistic theology, and the anti-nomian mysticism, which have all been known to the students of the Hindu beliefs. We cannot say that we are disposed to look upon these ideas with any of that enthusiasm which is now directed toward East Indian teaching, or to see in it any great likeness to the Christianity it is said to have anticipated. And we think that the use of English words to render Sanskrit ideas goes very far to keep up this latter delusion. There is probably not much of parallelism between the English word "piety," for instance, and that which is its Hindu equivalent. "Pius Arcturus" in Virgil is certainly very ill-translated by the "piams" of the school-boy version. We think that much of this East Indian religion is transfigured by the mirage which comes from Christian thought. As a striking English poem, founded on a Hindu origin, we accept the "Song Celestial," but to claim for its utterances any parity with Scripture, or even to place it on the level with Hellenic or Norse mythologies, is, we think, to over-value it.

We do not understand the self-control and self-renunciation here set forth to be other than mystical anti-nomianism, which has always been found in the wilder dreams of unchecked speculation. It is found in Marcionite Gnostics. In fact, much of the inspiration of Gnostic metaphysics came, no doubt, from East Indian sources. We fully recognize the presence of the original revelation made to the Church of the Patriarchs in all the corrupted forms of ancient belief. But we reject as utterly the attempt to make these the real prototypes and parents of Christianity. We reject it as being false to all true literary criticism, as well as being false in theology. We are reminded of the tricks of unworthy discoverers, who bury simulated or real relics in ancient mounds, and then dig them up to prove a theory. We desire to do all justice to Mr. Arnold's poetry, but we look upon it as very greatly carried to rather than found in the sources where he discovers in. There are two sorts of genius, or rather two operations of genius, that which reveals the hidden beauties of nature, unseen to the ordinary eye, and that which idealizes the commonplace and vulgar. We hold Mr. Arnold's genius to be of the latter sort rather than the former. Indian thought is an Indian art, grotesque, subtle, but lacking in the higher qualities. One studies them as curiosities, but can never love and admire them in themselves. It is only when it is Europeanized by the magic of a mind like Mr. Arnold's, that the theosophic wisdom of India can have attraction for a Western and Christian mind.

THE COMING STRAGGLE FOR INDIA. Being an Account of the Encroachments of Russia in Central Asia, and of the Difficulties Sure to Arise Therefrom to England. By Arminius Vamberry. (Cassell & Company, New York, 19 pp.)

No one can say that Prof. Vamberry has not the courage of his convictions. He has no question as to the designs of Russia upon India, and he does not hesitate to speak of those designs in the plainest way. As a Hungarian, he is probably better fitted than almost any Englishman to understand Orientals, and he has traversed the countries of which he writes, not as a wealthy and privileged observer of the mere outside, but as a man of the people, and under his dervish disguise admitted into the very heart of the ideas and feelings of those nations he moved among. If one can rely upon his good faith, he is likely to be by far the most trustworthy writer who has undertaken the subject. The objection made to him is that he is a Hungarian with the old grudge against Russia. But it seems to us as if he proved every step of the way, and the map accompanying will show the deliberate progress of Russia toward the conquest of Asia. His defence of British rule in India is very striking, in fact the entire topic which the title indicates is treated in a very masterly manner. It is for the reader to say whether the case against Russia is made out; but there is certainly strong confirmation from other sources. The point most in doubt is whether the defence of India is to be made at Herat, or at the actual frontier of the British empire. On the one hand it is claimed that Herat is the key of India, and that through that gateway the successive conquerors of India came. On the other hand it is argued that England would have to fight too far away from her base, and that the India is the proper line of defence. Mr. Vamberry's idea is that the stand should be made at Herat, and for this he cites no mean military authorities. We commend this book as one to be read by every one who wishes to understand the great political questions of the day. Sooner or later the inevitable collision will take place. Whether the menace to India is a mere pretext to secure Constantinople, or is for its own sake, is, perhaps, uncertain, but in either event England must encounter Russia. The present complications in the East, which, as we write, appear serious, may or may not find issue in war. The results to Russia may be the putting back of her designs for another term of years, but the whole aspect of the future points to an inevitable conflict upon the Indian frontier. Mr. Vambrey deprecates this in the interests of humanity. He holds, and we think justly, that whatever may be the shortcomings of England toward India, no civilization in the world will do as much as the English civilization has done to prepare the way for an enlightened self-government in some coming time, and from the spectacle of what Russia has wrought in her own borders he draws a gloomy picture of the effects of Russian rule in Asia.

THE TERRIBLE CATASTROPHE: of Biblical Deluge Illustrated and Corroborated by Myology, Tradition, and Geology. To which is added a Brief Interpretation of the Creation, with Notes from Theologians, Philosophers, and Scientists. By the Rev. G. C. H. Hasskarr. (Philadelphia: C. Henry) pp. 376.

This is a defence of the biblical account of the deluge literally taken. We confess that we never saw any attack upon the Mosaic story which gave very much trouble to one who wished to answer it. The whole trouble has been made by mistaken proofs of it, which have been adduced in unscientific times. The argument which is drawn from its inconsistency with the goodness of God, is simply a cavil. The population of the world when put at the highest figure possible, would be less than the numbers born since then up to the date of the Christian era. Now since every one of those lives has gone out, not to speak of a few millions more dead in the later period, we cannot see the force of the argument. If the terror of the catastrophe is alleged, the probability, judging from the late tidal wave following the volcanic eruption in the Indian Archipelago, is that it was remarkably painless. Mr. Hasskarr takes the extreme orthodox view both of the deluge and the creation, and certainly has got together a strong body of arguments and authorities. We think it wise in the author that while he is quite decided in his view of the literal interpretation, he does not stand or fall by it, but leaves room for a larger liberty. There never seemed to us to be insuperable scientific difficulties in the way of a strict interpretation, seeing that the evidences of the world's great antiquity are not a demonstration so long as science remains ignorant of the forces employed, and while it discloses possibilities in the elements of the natural world of immense and rapid change. But on the other hand there is no need to subject the Book of Genesis to any such crucial test.

THE SILVER SOURCE, Together with the Freedman's Case in Equity and the Convict Lease System. By George W. Cable. With portrait. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. 187. Price $1.00.

This book deserves to be read. Whatever bears Mr. Cable's name is sure to receive attention, and whatever bears upon the subject he has taken up demands it. Where there is so much conflicting opinion as there is upon the right way of dealing with the freedmen, or rather the negro problem, it is too soon to say that any man has found the right solution. But the spirit in which Mr. Cable approaches it is the right spirit. He is a Southerner by education and sympathy. He understands the Southern people. He sees that the real interest in the matter lies in the welfare of the white race, and that right, and wise, and Christian dealing with the black race is essential to the prosperity of their former masters. He understands that the color line cannot be ignored where it touches masses, and not individuals merely. We bespeak for his book a respectful attention. On the one hand, it will show that the question is not to be disposed of by Northern theories, and, on the other hand, it will point out to the South that they must work out their own salvation. Now that slavery is a thing of the past, and a South has arisen which does not want it back, its good features (and it had some), can be temperately discussed. The South must see how to get that good which lay in the old system, freed from its great and inevitable evils. But the South, while it has a right to ask Northern help in its plans, ought to be free from Northern intermeddling. No good can be done save through the voluntary action of the parties most nearly concerned—the two races who live side by side. Education and Christianity are the two essentials.

THE STORY OF ROME. From the Earliest time to the End of the Republic. By Arthur Gilman, M.A., Author of "A History of the American People," Editor of "The Poetical Works of Geoffrey Chaucer," etc. (New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1885.) pp. 325.

This volume is one of the first of a series entitled "The Story of the Nations," published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, and it is a very hopeful representative and spokesman for the volumes to follow. The idea of the series is to give the story of the various nations of the world in an attractive form, presenting the latest developments of historical research in the form of a popular narrative. If the rising generation is not grateful for all the signed tracts that are being laid for it, little can be said in its defense.

Though marred by a tendency toward fine writing, and a fondness for "lustrous" adjectives on the part of the author, the book is both pleasing and valuable. The last three chapters upon "Some Manners and Customs of the Roman People," "The Roman Reading and Writing," and "The Roman Republicans, Serious and Gay," are particularly good, and give a vivid picture of the daily life and habits of the Romans. The boy who reads "The Story of Rome" will not only derive much pleasant enjoyment from it, but will find that it will throw a new light upon the pages of his text-books, making them no longer a dreary catalogue of uninteresting events, but part of a living history of living men.

ITALIAN POPULAR TALES. By Thomas Frederick Crane, A.B., Professor of the Romance Languages in Cornell University. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Company.) pp. 399. Price $2.50.

These are tales of the people, fairy stories and the like, such as "Blue Beard," "Cinderella," etc. We have read them carefully and have been surprised to find that in some shape or other, they are familiar to many nations. Some of them we never saw in print, but have found them floating about as nursery stories. Some are as old as the Odyssey. Many of them are from the "Arabian Nights," others are familiar in the "Folk Lore of Germany." It is a very curious study to see how the frame work will be the same with endless variations in mere new and local coloring. There is much to be learned from the comparison of these versions with the same story as told in other nations. And though this does not perhaps represent the highest class of literary art, it will well repay a reader who has leisure. Professor Crane has done his work admirably and given in notes, indices and arrangement, all the care which could be required to make his volume acceptable.

A MORTAL ANTI-PATHY. First Opening of the New Portland. By Oliver Wendell Holmes. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Company.) pp. 307. Price $1.50.

Whatever the material of the dainty dish Dr. Holmes sets before the reading public, the seasoning and cooking are sure to be exquisite. He cannot write a novel without a medical theory being the component part, and this his third long story is no exception. Readers of the Atlantic Monthly will not need to be told what the "Mortal Antipathy" was, nor how it was managed, but other readers must find out for themselves. We have no mind to spoil their enjoyment of the story by any hint. There are the same features in this as in his other tales: a young ladies' seminary, a country town, and some literary sketches, but each is as freshly treated as if the others had never been. We cannot see the slightest symptom of repetition or falling off, and we could wish, if it suited him, that the genial doctor might live a half century longer and write a new book in every decade.

THE ORIGIN OF REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. By Oscar S. Straus. (New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1885.) pp. 149.

The object of this work, which is beautifully printed, on excellent paper, and tastefully bound, is to prove that the origin of the Republican form of Government in this country is to be ascribed "Mainly to ecclesiastical causes, which operated from the time the Pilgrims set foot upon our continent, and to the direct and indirect influence of the Hebrew Commonwealth." There is no law that forbids the author holding or publishing any opinion he likes upon the subject, but we should be inclined to think that the excellence of the paper and printing of this volume was a needless extravagance. All the familiar glorification of the Puritans appears in it ad nauseam, as well as the equally worn and threadbare distastes against the Church of England and the doctrine of non-resistance; but if there is anything in the book either new, or interesting, or important, we have not been so fortunate as to discover it.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN THE ORIGINAL GREEK. The Text Revised by H. J. Van Westcott, D.D., and F. J. Giesey, D.D. (Cambridge and London: Macmillan & Co., 1885.) pp. 618.

It is needless to recommend again to our readers Westcott and Hort's Greek Testament, but we may congratulate them and ourselves at the appearance of this very beautifully printed cheap edition of this valuable work. It contains the text of the larger edition of 1881, and has gained in simplicity by the removal of the alternative readings from the margin to the foot of the page, and by transferring to the end of the volume all such rejected readings as had been allowed to stand in the margin on account of some special interest, together with such other rejected readings as had been noticed only in the appendix.

The general explanation which was appended to the text in the larger edition is given also in this, together with a "Summary of Documentary Evidence." The list of Old Testament quotations is also appended.

The type used, though fine, is admirably clear and distinct.

ANNA, THE PROFESSOR'S DAUGHTER. By Marie Daal. Translated from Dutch by Col. Charles Mueller. (Boston: Lee & Shepard; New York: Chas. T. Dillingham.) pp. 240.

The only thing lacking to this story in rounded completeness is a dedication to Mr. Bergh. It is a novel founded upon humanity to animals. Its story turns upon the illness of a pet dog. It contains a long lecture upon cruelty to animals. We cannot say how far this ethical element enters into Dutch fiction, for this is the first Netherlandish novel we have ever met with, but the effect is not unnecessary, and we dare say may be very necessary in a land where canals are handy and cats in disfavor. The translation is evidently the work of a foreigner. There are words and phrases which are not used in the current acceptance of the English tongue. But as a specimen of Dutch literature it deserves study, and is in itself not uninteresting.

OSBERT AND PETER. Verses, Grave and Gay. By Helen Gray Cook. (New York: Cassell & Company.) pp. 140.

We take it that this is the production of a young writer, and we hasten to say it has in it more promise than almost any little volume of verses we have lately met with. Some of the flower pieces are perfect in their way and the "gray" verses are admirable, the burlesque imitation of Walt Whitman and Oscar Wilde is as clever as anything going. If the authoress will only escape woman's greatest danger and not write too much, but work out her own thoughts fully and carefully she may make a decided mark. There is still an unreal mannerism in what she has written, by which we mean, a use of conventional words and phrases and images. This will pass away, we are sure, when she knows precisely what she wants to say and has a strong enough motive for saying it. It is the lack of these two which is the fault of modern poets.

SERMONS BY T. DEWITT TALMAGE. Delivered in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Photographically reported and revised. First series. [New York: Funk & Wagnell, pp. 86.]

So long as Mr. Talmage can fill the Brooklyn Tabernacle of a Sunday, it is hardly wise to publish these sermons to be read in cold blood. Much that would go down in the heat of earnest delivery is anything but attractive in print. There is some good sense, some striking expressions, and some sound teaching in these sermons, but we can advise no one to wade through the mass of stuff in which these are imbedded to get at them. We hold that the range of pulpit composition is much too limited. We believe in using plain words and plain thoughts, but vulgarism is not plainness, nor is buffoonery point.

A POLITICAL CRIME. The History of a Great Fraud. By A. M. Gibson. [New York: William S. Gottsberger, pp. 402.]

This is the story of the contest over the Presidential election of 1876. It is a partisan production, not a history, and therefore lies outside of our province as reviewers. If it will have any influence toward a revision of the awkward and untrustworthy electoral system it will do good. It is quite time that the constitutional plan for electing a President was put into proper shape, so that the results of an election might be made less doubtful. Otherwise we cannot see what value such a book can have, except to maintain a partisan antagonism which ought to pass away.

SERMONS ON THE CHRISTIAN LIFE. By John DeWitt, D.D., Professor of Church History, Lane Theological Seminary. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] pp. 420. Price $1.50.

These sermons do not bear any polemical character. They might be written by a clergyman of almost any denomination, and we can only say that the denomination is to be congratulated which possesses a clergyman who can write such sermons. They are clear, earnest and spiritual, and we take no little pleasure in commending them to the notice of readers who might not otherwise come across a volume so full of good and suggestive reading.

WORDS OF SCRIPTURE. By Louis Viardot. Illustrated. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, pp. 48. Price $1.00.]

A popular hand book which one can read in a couple of hours, can hardly be an exhaustive treatise on so large a topic. But it can give good and correct general ideas, sufficient for one who only desires a general acquaintance with the subject. It will serve to furnish a good deal of information which will make a visit to an art museum more profitable and pleasant. The illustrations are sufficiently good, and the writing is that of a Frenchman, clear, point, and concise.

FOUR FEET, TWO FEET, AND NO FEET; OR, LAUREY AND FEATHERY PETS, AND HOW THEY LIVE. Edited by Laura E. Richards. [Boston: Estes & Lauriat, 1886.]

Nothing so pleasing a child as to read or hear of animals. This volume is full of fresh and lively stories about them, set off by many engravings. Paper and type are of the best, and the cover is illuminated in bright colors.

LITERATURE.

E. P. DUTTON & Co., have issued in small quarto form, price 35 cents, the pathetic story of "Wickey," recently published in THE CHURCHMAN.

"PARKER'S PEOPLE'S BIBLE" is to be a series of discourses by Dr. Joseph Parker, of London. The first volume published by Funk & Wagnall is entitled Genesis.

MESSRS. E. P. DUTTON & Co. will publish early in January a new volume by Mrs. Brock, called "Church Echoes," and "Under the Mendips," by Mrs. Marshall.

ADDITIONAL volumes of the Wonder Series of Charles Scribner's Sons, are the "Wonders of Glass-making" and the "Wonders of Bodily Strength and Skill." They are illustrated.

A CONTRIBUTION to the holiday books is "Young Folk's Queries," by Uncle Lawrence, published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., a quarto with many good illustrations and a pleasant story.

"ENGLISH HOME LIFE," by Robert Laird Collier, sometime a minister in Chicago, afterward residing in London, is a pleasant little book from the press of Ticknor & Co., Boston.

"CHARLES DICKENS," "TURNER the Artist," and "Handel" are the subjects of brief biographies in Cassell & Co.'s series of the "World's Workers." They are interesting and beautifully bound.

In January L. R. Hamersly & Co., Philadelphia, issue the first number of the Church Magazine. It will include papers on all topics of living interest to the Church, and from writers of recognized ability.

"WHEN I WAS A CHILD," is a beautiful poem handsomely illustrated and bound in flexible covers. The illustrations are twelve in number, by Hassan. This dainty book will be welcome to all lovers of children.

LATINE begins a new volume with change of form and title. It is now Latine et Græce, edited by Professor Shumway, and is published at New Brunswick, N. J. We have often spoken of it in terms of praise.

THE CHRISTMAS number of the Publisher's Weekly contains some one hundred and seventy-eight pages of text and advertisements, with a large and pleasing variety of illustrations from holiday and other books.

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT for November-December has a good paper on "The Family in the History of Christianity," by the Rev. S. W. Dike, who has long made the subject a special study. There are three other able papers, besides book notices, etc.

"NEW HONORS," by Cecilia Selby Lowndes, with original illustrations by Edith Scannell, is one of Frederick Warne & Co.'s publications, a well-known London house that has recently established a branch in this city. It is an interesting, pathetic story, handsomely printed and bound.

A. D. F. RANDOLPH & Co. issue a volume of "Letters by Frances Ridley Havergal," which will be gladly welcomed. "Friendship's Diary," illustrated, with a blank page for every day in the year, and the "Heavenly Vision" and other sermons, by the Rev. H. M. Booth, are from the same house.

THE JANUARY Art Amateur gives a "Breton Peasant" in a colored plate, and as a frontispiece, a portrait of Val Prinsep. Besides six supplement designs we notice an extra supplement, a "Decorative Head," by Ellen Welby. The letter-press of the number is of unusual interest, and the illustrations are numerous and excellent.

LEE & SHEPARD, Boston, have issued "Our Father in Heaven," the Lord's Prayer, in a series of sonnets, by William C. Richards. It is a small quarto, beautifully bound, and illustrated by fourteen full-page engravings. They also send the "Hunters' Hand Book," a practical work, and a novel, anonymous, in whose title, "Tell Your Wife," is a mine of wealth.

"SOME CHRISTMAS SOUVENIRS," published by John Ireland, will make one of the most acceptable gifts of the season. They are in four series, each containing six fine photographs of the Holy Family, the Nativity, Madonna, etc., some by "old masters," and some by recent artists. They are mounted in excellent style, and underneath each picture is a poetical selection.

The December Andover Review has the conclusion of its editorials on progressive orthodoxy, its subject being Christianity, Absolute and Universal. Among its book notices "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" occupies a liberal space. Dr. Lyman Abbott has a paper on "Evolution and Theology," and Professor Torrey gives a third paper on the "Theodice of Leibnitz," the special subject being Criticism. The number brings to an end the fourth volume of this very able review.

"THE WOMEN FRIENDS OF JESUS," a course of twelve lectures by the Rev. Henry C. McCosh, D. D., is a handsome volume from the press of Foris, Howard & Hulbert, and will greatly interest all readers. "The Infant Philosopher, or Stray Leaves from a Baby's Journal," by Dr. T. S. Verdi, is from the same press, and will be found both amusing and instructive. It is a defense of babies as against careless nurses and mothers. It reads like pages from Babyland which we have a foretime commended.

The eighth volume of the Century, new series, is substantially bound and handsomely, and contains nearly a thousand double column pages of valuable literary matter, illustrated with many fine engravings. Its war papers make it more than usually interesting. It would make a most acceptable gift for the holidays. The same may be said of the two parts of volume twelve of St. Nicholas, separately bound in bright decorated covers. They are filled with good things and pictures, assorted by Mary Mapes Dodge, and the colored frontispiece to the second part showing "Great-Grandmother's Girlhood," is a '5; hint that St. Nicholas is interesting to children of every age.

THE "Church Almanac," James Pott & Co., "The Protestant Episcopal Almanac," Thomas Whitaker, and the "Living Church Annual," Young Churchman Co., Milwaukee, are issued promptly at the close of the year. The second and the third contain parish as well as clergy lists, and they are all with their valuable statistical tables indispensable to both clergy and laity. The "Church Almanac" will issue an edition with parish lists a little later, and the "Living Church Annual" will publish a quarterly clergy list. In the statistical tables there are of course discrepancies, for the sources from which they are gathered are incomplete and imperfect, but they are not greater than we might naturally expect. We notice in Mr. Whitaker's almanac a decrease in the number of missions, candidates for orders, and marriages, but in other respects there is a gratifying increase. The clergy are 3,725; parishes, 3,013; baptisms, 50,502; confirmations, 30,068; communicants, 398,990; Sunday-school scholars, 323,685; contributions, $5,690,044.43. The "Living Church Annual" gives the contributions at $9,017,135.16, and the "Church Almanac" at $8,717,281.11. The general statistical summary is best arranged in the "Church Almanac."

WAITING.

O long-expected God, the oracles are Thine;
 Come as the swallow comes, in the sweet harvest time:

The corn is ripe.

The world prepares Thy cradle, why delay
 Thy birth!

Thy infant cries alone will fill the silent earth,
 Of heaven the type.

A cry goes up for Thee, man tears his aching heart,

He thirsts for Thee, he strains in every part
 To catch Thy view.

Wilt Thou the uprooted tree shall bloom once more

And yield the blessed fruit it erstwhile bore!
 Then faith renew.

WHAT'S MINE'S MINE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

CHAPTER XIII.

The Lake.

Silence lasted until they reached the shoulder of the hill that closed the view up the valley. As they rounded it, the sun went behind a cloud, and a chill wind, as if from a land where dwelt no life, met them. The hills stood back, and they were on the shore of a small lake, out of which ran the burn. They were very desolate-looking hills, with little heather, and that bloomless, to hide their hard gray bones. Their heads were mostly white, with frost and snow; their shapes had little beauty; they looked worn and hopeless, ugly and sad—and so cold! The water below was slaty gray, in response to the gray sky above; there seemed no life in either. The hearts of the girls sank within them, and all at once they felt tired. In the air was just one sign of life; high above the lake wheeled a large fish-hawk.

"Look!" said Alistair pointing; "there is the osprey that lives here with his wife! He is just going to catch a fish!"

He had hardly spoken when the bird shot into the water, making it foam up all about. He reappeared with a fish in his claws, and flew off to find his mate.

"Do you know the very bird?" asked Mercy.

"I know him well. He and his wife have built on that conical rock you see there in the middle of the water many years."

"Why have you never shot him? He would look well stuffed!" said Christina.

She little knew the effect of her words; the chief restrained his. He hated causeless killing; and to hear a lady talk of shooting a high-soaring creature of the air as coolly as of putting on her gloves, was nauseous to him. Ian gave him praise afterwards for his unusual self-restraint. But it was a moment or two ere he had himself in hand.

"Do you not think he looks much better going about God's business?" he said.

"Perhaps; but he is not yours; you have not got him!"

"Why should I have him? He seems, indeed, the more mine the higher he goes. A dead stuffed thing—how could that be mine at all? Alive, he seems to soar in the very heaven of my soul!"

"You showed the fox no such pity!" remarked Mercy.

"At least I did not kill the fox to have him!" answered Alistair. "The osprey does no harm. He eats only fish, and they are very plentiful; he never kills birds or hares, or any creature on the land. I do not see how anyone could wish to kill the bird, except from mere love of destruction! Why should I make a life less in the world?"

"There would be more lives of fish—would there not?" said Mercy. "I do not want you to shoot the poor bird; I only want to hear your argument!"

The chief could not immediately reply. Ian came to his rescue.

"There are qualities in life," he said. "One cannot think the fish-life so fine, so full of delight as the bird-life!"

"No. But," said Mercy, "have the fishes not as good a right to their life as the birds?"

"Both have the right given them by the maker of them. The osprey was made to eat the fish, and the fish, I hope, get some good of being eaten by the osprey."

"Excuse me, Captain Macraugh, but that seems to me simple nonsense!" said Christina.

"I hope it is true."

"I don't know about being true, but it must be nonsense."

"It must seem so to most people."

"Then why do you say it?"

"Because I hope it is true."

"Why should you wish nonsense to be true?"

"What is true cannot be nonsense. It looks nonsense only to those that take no interest in the matter. Would it be nonsense to the fishes?"

"It does seem hard," said Ian, "that the poor harmless things should be gobbled up by a creature pouncing down upon them from another element!"

"As the poor are gobbled up everywhere by the rich!"

"I don't believe that. The rich are very kind to the poor."

"I beg your pardon," said Ian, "but if you know no more about the rich than you do about the fish, I can hardly take your testimony. The fish are the most carnivorous creatures in the world."

"Do they eat each other?"

"Hardly that. Only the cats of Kilkenny can do that."

"I used a common phrase!"

"You did, and I am rude; the phrase must bear the blame for both of us. But the fish are even cannibals—eating the young of their own species! They are the most destructive of creatures to other lives."

"I suppose," said Mercy, "to make one kind of creature live on another kind, is the way to get the greatest good for the greatest number."

"That doctrine, which seems to content most people, appears to me a poverty-stricken and selfish one. I can admit nothing but the greatest good to every individual creature."

"Don't you think we had better be going, Mercy? It has got quite cold; I am afraid it will rain," said Christina, drawing her cloak around her with a little shiver.

"I am ready," answered Mercy.

The brothers looked at each other. They had come out to spend the day together, but they could not leave the ladies to go home alone; having brought them across the burn they were bound to see them over it again! An imperceptible sign passed between them, and Alistair turned to the girls.

"Come, then," he said; "we will go back!"

"But you were not going home yet?" said Mercy.

"Would you have us leave you in this wild place?"

"We shall find our way well enough. The burn will guide us."

"Yes; but it will not jump over you; it will leave you to jump over it!"

"I forgot the burn!" said Christina.

"Which way were you going?" asked Mercy, looking all around for road or pathway over the encircling upheaved wildernesses.

"This way," answered Ian. "Good-by!"

"Then you are not coming?"

"No. My brother will take care of you."

He went straight as an arrow up the hill. They stood and watched him go. At what seemed the top, he turned, and waved his cap, then vanished.

Christina felt disappointed. She did not much care for either of the very peculiar young men, but any company was better than none; a man was better than a woman; and two men were better than one! If these were not equal to admiring her as she deserved, what more remunerative labor than teaching them to do so?

The thing that chiefly disappointed her in them was, that they had so little small talk. It was so stupid to be always speaking sense! always polite! always courteous!—"Two sir Charles Grandisons," she said, "are two too many!" And indeed the History of Sir Charles Grandison had its place in the small library free to them from childhood; but Christina knew nothing of him except by hearsay.

The young men had been brought up in a solemn school—had learned to take life as a serious and lovely and imperative thing. Not the less, upon occasions of merry-making, would they frolic like young colts even yet, and that without the least reaction or sense of folly afterwards. At the same time, although in the village, Ian from childhood had the character, especially in the workshops of the carpenter, weaver, and shoemaker, of being full of humor, he was in himself always rather sad, being perplexed with many things; his humor was but the foam of his troubled sea.

Christina was annoyed besides that Mercy seemed not indifferent to the opinion of the men. It was from pure inexperience of the man-world, she said to herself, that the silly child could see anything interesting in them! Gentlemen she must allow them—but of such an old-fashioned type as to be gentlemen but by courtesy—not gentlemen in the world's count! She was of the world; they of the north of Scotland! All day Mercy had been on their side and against her! It might be from sheer perversity, but she had never been like that before! She must take care she did not make a fool of herself! It might end in some unhappiness to the young good! Assuredly neither father nor mother would countenance the thing! She must throw herself into the breach! Which was she taking a fancy to?

She was not so anxious about her sister, however, as piqued that she had not herself gathered one expression of homage, surprised one look of admiration, seen one sign of incipient worship in either. Of the two she liked better the ploughman! The other was more a man of the world—but he was not of her world! With him she was a stranger in a very strange land!

Christina's world was a very small one, and in its temple her own image stood. Ian belonged to the universe. He was a gentleman of the high court. Wherever he might go throughout God's world, he would be at home. How could there be much attraction between Christina and him?

Alister was more talkative on the way back than he had been all day. Christina thought the change caused by having them, or rather her, and an old Scotch ballad which it sprang from the prospect of soon rejoicing his brother without them. Some of the things he said, Mercy found well worth hearing; and an old Scotch ballad which he repeated, having learned it of a lowland nurse, appeared to her as beautiful as it was wild and strange. For Christina, she despised the Scotch language; it was vulgar: Had Alister informed her that Boewulf, "the most important of all the relics of the pagan Anglo-Saxon, is written in undeniable Scotch, the English of the period," it would have made no difference to Christina! Why should it? She had never yet cared for any book beyond the novels of a certain lady, which, to speak with due restraint, do not tend to profitable thought. At the same time, it was not for the worst in them that she liked them; she did not understand them well enough to see it. But there was ground to fear that, when she came to understand, shocked at first, she would speedily get accustomed to it, and at length like them all the better for it.

In Mercy's unawakened soul, echoed now and then a faint thrill of response to some of the things Alister said, and, oftener, to some of the verses he repeated, and she would look up at him when he was silent, with an unconscious seeking glance, as if dimly aware of a beneficent presence. Alister was drawn by the honest gaze of her yet undeveloped and homely countenance, with its child-like in process of sublimation, whence the woman would glance out and vanish again, leaving the child to give disappointing answers. There was something in it of the look a dog casts up out of his beautiful brown eyes into the mystery of his master's countenance. She was on the edge of coming awake; all was darkness about her, but something was pulling at her! She had never known before that a lady might be lovely in a ballad as well as in a beautiful gown!

Finding himself so listened to, though the listener was little more than a child, the heart of the chief began to swell in his great bosom. Like a child he was pleased. The gray day about him grew sweet; its very gryness was sweet, and of a silvery sheen. When they arrived at the burn, and, easily enough from that side, he had handed them across, he was not quite so glad to turn from them as he had expected to be.

"Are you going?" said Christina with genuine surprise, for she had not understood his intention.

"The way is easy now," he answered. "I am sorry to leave you, but I have to join Ian, and the twilight will be flickering down before I reach the place."

"And there will be no moon!" said Mercy: "how will you get home through the darkness?"

"We do not mean to come home to-night."

"Oh, then, you are going to friends?"

"No; we shall be with each other—not a soul besides."

"There surely can't be a hotel up there?"

Alister laughed as he answered; "There are more ways than one of spending a night on the hills. If you look from a window—in that direction," he said, pointing, "the last thing before you go to bed, you will see that at least we shall not perish with cold."

He then sprang over the burn, and with a wave of his bonnet, went, like Ian, straight up the hill.

The girls stood for some time watching him climb as if he had been going up a flight of stairs, until he stood clear against the sky, when, with another wave of his bonnet, he too disappeared.

Mercy did not forget to look from her window in the direction Alister had indicated. There was no room to mistake what he meant, for through the dark ran a great opening to the side of a hill somewhere in the night, where glowed and flamed, reddening the air, a huge crescent of fire, slowly climbing, like a column of attack, up towards the invisible crest.

"What does it mean?" she said to herself. "Why do they make such a bonfire—with nobody but themselves to enjoy it? What strange men—out by themselves in the dark night, on the cold hill! What can they be doing it for? I hope they have something to eat. I should like to hear them talk! I wonder what they are saying about us! I am certain we bored them!"

The brothers did speak of them, and readily agreed in some notion of their characters; but they soon turned to other things—and there passed a good deal that Mercy could not have followed. What would she, for instance, have made of Alister's challenge to his brother to explain the metaphysical necessity for the sine, tangent, and secant of an angle belonging to its supplement as well?

When the ladies overtook them in the morning, Alister was reading from an old manuscript volume of his brother's, which he had found in a chest—a certain very early attempt at humor, and now they disputed concerning it as they watched the fire. It had abundance of faults, and in especial lacked suture, but will serve to show something of Ian's youthful ingenium.

TO A VAGRANT.

Gentle vagrant, stumping over
Several verdant fields of clover!
Subject of unnumbered knockings,
Tattered coat and ragged stockings,
Slouching hat and roving eye,
Tell of settled vagrancy!

Wretched wanderer, can it be
The poor laws have leagued thee?
Hear'st thou, in thy thorny den,
Tramp of rural policemen,
Only fancying, in thy rear,
Coats of blue and buttons clear,
While to meet thee, in the van
Stalks some vengeful alderman!—

Each separate sense bringing a notion
Of forms that teach thee locomotion!

Beat and battered altogether;
By fellow-men, by wind and weather;
Hounded on through fens and bogs,
Chased by men and bit by dogs;
And, in thy weakly way of judging,
So kindly taught the art of trading;
Or, with a non-nati's happier lot,
Pitied, pensioned, and forgot—
Catty-pity thy regium donum;
Poverty thy assumam bonum;
Thy frigid couch a sandstone stratum.
A colder grave thy ultimatum;
Circumventing, circumvented;
In short, excessively tormented.
Everything combines to scare
Charity's dear pensioner!
—Say, vagrant, can't thou grant to me
A slice of thy philosophy?

Happily, in thy many trudgings,
Having found unchallenged lodgings,
Thy thoughts, unused to saddle-crudd,
Audiing no farther than thy supper-
Thou, by the light of heaven-lit taper,
Mendest thy prospective paper!
Then, jolly pauper, stitch till day:
Let not thy roses drop away,
Lest, begripped with muddy matter,
Thy body peer from every tatter,
And men—a charitable dose—
Should physic thee with food and cloth!
Nursing of adversity!
Tis thy glory thus to be Sinking fund of raggery!
Thus to scrape a nation's dishes,
And fatten on a few good wishes!
Or, on some venial treason bent,
Frame thyself a government,
For thy crest a brimless hat,
Poverty's aristocrat!

Nonne habeam te tristem,
Planet of the human system!
Comet lank and melancholic—
—Or bit shocking parabolic—
Seen for a little in the sky
Of the world of sympathy—
Seldom failing when predicted,
Coming most when most restricted,
Dragging a nebulous tail with thee
Of hypothetic vagrancy—
Of vagrants large, and vagrants small.
Vagrants scarce visible at all!

Matchless oracle of woe!
Anarchy in embryo!
Strange antipodes of bias!
Parody on happiness!
Raghouse of the great creation!
Subject meet for strangulation,
By practice tutored to condense
The cautious inquiry for pence,
And skilful, with averted eyes,
To hide thy latent roguery—
Lo, on thy hopes I clap a stopper!
Vagrant, thou shalt have no copper!
Gather thy stumps, and get thee hence,
Unwise solicitor of pence!

Alister, who all but worshipped Ian, and cherished every scrap from his pen, had not until quite lately seen this foolish production, as Ian contended it, and was delighted with it, as he would have been had it been much worse. Ian was vexed that he should like it, and now spent the greater part of an hour trying to show him how very bad in parts, even senseless it was. Profusion of epithets without applicability, want of continuity, purposelessness, silliness, heartlessness—were but a few of his denunciations Alister argued it was but a bit of Ian, and that anybody that knew Ian knew perfectly he would never assume himself with a fellow without giving him something; but it was in vain; Ian was bent on showing it altogether unworthy. So, not to waste the night, they dropped the dispute, and by the light of the blazing hearth, turned to a chapter of Boethius.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Wolves.

My readers may remember that Ian was on the point of acquainting his mother with an important event in his spiritual history, when they were interrupted by the involuntary call of the girls from the New House. The mother, as will readily be believed, remained desirous of listening to her son's story, though dreading it would not be of a kind to give her much satisfaction; but partly from preventions—favored, it must be confessed, by Ian, and yet more from direct avoidance on his part, the days passed without her hearing anything more of it. Ian had in truth almost repeated his offer of the narrative: a certain vague assurance that it would not be satisfactory to her, had grown upon him until he felt it unkind to lay before her an experience whose narration would seem to ask a sympathy she could not give. But the mother was unable to let the thing rest. More than by interest she was urged by anxiety. In spite of her ungodlike theories of God, it was impossible that she should be in despair about her noble Ian; still, her hope was at best founded on the uncovenanted mercies of God, not on the security of His bond! She did not believe that God was doing and would do His best for every man; therefore she had no assurance that He would bring down the pride of Ian, and compel his acceptance of terms worthy of an old Roman father, half-convening lawyer, half heartless tyrant. But her longing to hear what her son had proposed telling her, was chiefly inspired by the hope of getting nearer to him, of closer sympathy becoming possible between them through her learning more clearly what his views were. She constantly felt as if walking along the side of a thick hedge, with occasional thinnesses through which now and then she gained a ghostly glimpse of her heart's treasure gliding along the other side—close to her, yet so far that, when they spoke, they seemed calling across a gulf of dividing darkness. Therefore, the night after that spent by her sons on the hill, all having retired some two hours before, the mother, finding herself unable to sleep, rose as she had often done ere now, and stole to the door of the little room under the thatch where Ian lay. Listening, and judging him awake, she went softly in, and sat down by his bedside.

There had been such occasions on which, though son as well as mother was wide awake, neither spoke a word; but this time the mother could not be silent.

"You never told me, Ian, the story you began about something that made you pray?"

Ian saw he could not now draw back without causing her more trouble than would the narration.

"Are you sure you will not take cold, mother dear?" he said.

"I am warmly clad, my son; and my heart, more than I can tell you, is longing to hear all about it."

"I am afraid you will not find my story so interesting as you expect, mother!"

"What concerns you is more interesting to me than anything else in the whole world, Ian."

"Not more than God, mother,?" said Ian. The mother was silent. She was as honest as her sons. The question, dim-lucent, showed her, if but in shadow, something of the truth concerning herself—not so that she could grasp it, for she saw it as in a glimmer, a fluctuating, vanishing flash—namely, that she cared more about salvation than about God—that, if she could but keep her boy out of hell, she would be content to live on without any nearer approach to Him in whom she had her being! God was to her an awe, not a ceaseless, growing delight.

There are centuries of paganism yet in many lovely Christian souls—paganism so deep, therefore so little recognized, that their earnest endeavor is to plant that paganism ineradicably in the hearts of those dearest to them.

As she did not answer, Ian was afraid she was hurt, and thought it better to begin his story at once.

"It was one night in the middle of winter—last winter, near Moscow," he began, "and the frost was very bitter—the worst night for cold I have ever known. I had gone with a companion into the depth of a great pine forest. On our way, the cold grew so intense, that we took refuge at a little public-house, frequented by peasants and persons of the lowest ranks. On entering I saw a scene which surpassed all for interest I had ever before witnessed. The little lonely house was crammed with Russian soldiers, fierce-looking fellows, and I dare say their number formed our protection from violence. Many of them were among the finest-looking fellows I have ever seen. They were half drunk, and were dancing and singing with the wildest gesticulations and grimaces; but such singing for strange wildness and harmony combined I have never before listened to. One would keep up a solo for some minutes, when the whole company would join in a sort of chorus, dancing frantically about, but with the most perfect regularity of movement. One of them came up to me and with a low bow begged me in the name of the rest to give them some money. I accordingly gave them a silver ruble, upon which the whole party set up a shout, surrounded me, and in a moment a score of brawny fellows had lifted me in the air, where I was borne along in triumph. I took off my cap and gave three hip-hip-urrahs as loud as my lungs could bawl, whereupon, with the profoundest expressions of gratitude, I was lowered from my elevation. One of them then who seemed to be spokesman of the rest, seized me in his arms and gave me a hearty kiss on the cheek, on which I took my departure amid universal acclamation. But all that's not worth telling you about; it was not for that I began—only the scene came up so clear before me that it drew me aside."

"I don't need to tell you, Ian," said his mother, "that if it were only what you had to eat on the most ordinary day of your life, it would be interesting to me!"

"Thank you, mother dear; I seem to know that without being told; but I could never talk to you about anything that was not interesting to myself."

Here he paused. He would rather have stopped.

"Go on, go on, Ian. I am longing to hear."

"Well—where was I? We left at the inn our carriage and horses, and went with our guns far into the forest—all of straight, tall pines, up and up; and the little island-like tops of them, which, if there be a breath of wind, are sure to be swaying about like the motion of a dream, were as still as the few frosty stars in the deep blue overhead."

"What did you want in such a lonely place at that time of the night?" asked the mother.

She sat with firm-closed lips, and wide, night-filled eyes looking at her son, the fear of love in her beautiful face—a face more beautiful than any other that son had yet seen, fit window for a heart so full of refuge to look out of; and he knew how she looked though the darkness was between them.

"Wolves, mother," he answered.

She shuddered. She was a great reader in the long winter nights, and had read terrible stories of wolves—the last of which in Scotland had been killed not far from where they sat.

"What did you want with the wolves, Ian?" she faltered.

"To kill them, mother. I never liked killing animals any more than Alistair; but even he destroys the hooded crow; and the wolves are yet fairer game. They are the out-of-door devil of that country, and I fancy devils do go into them sometimes, as they did once into the poor swine; they are the terror of all who live near the forests."

There was no moon—only starlight; but whenever we came to any open space, there was light enough from the snow to see all about; there was light indeed from the snow all through the forest, but the trees were thick and dark. Far away, somewhere in the mystery of the black wood, we could now and then hear a faint howling; it came from the red throats of the wolves."

"You are frightening me, Ian!" said the mother, as if they had been two children telling each other tales.

"Indeed, mother, they are very horrible when they hunt in droves, ravenous with hunger. To kill one of them, if it be but one, is to do something for your kind. And just at that time I was oppressed with the feeling that I had done and was doing nothing for my people—my own humans; and not knowing anything else I could at the moment attempt, I resolved to go and kill a wolf or two. They had killed a poor woman only two nights before."

"As soon as we could after hearing the noise of them, we got up into two trees. It took us some time to discover two that were fit for our purpose, and we did not get them so near each other as we should have liked. It was rather anxious work too until we found them, for if we encountered on foot a pack of those demons, we could but be a moment or two alive; killing one, ten would be upon us, and a hundred more on the backs of those. But we hoped they would smell us up in the trees, and search for us, when we should be able to give account of a few of them at least; we had double-barreled guns, and plenty of powder and ball."

"But how could you endure the cold—at night—and without food?"

"No, mother; we did not try that! We had plenty to eat in our pockets. My companion had a bottle of vodka, and—"

"What is that?" asked the mother with suspicion.

"A sort of raw spirit—horrible stuff—more like spirits of wine. They say it does not hurt in such cold."

"But, Ian!" cried the mother, and seemed unable to say more.

"Don't be frightened, mother!" said Ian, with a merry laugh. "Surely you do not imagine I would drink such stuff! True, I had my bottle, but it was full of tea. The Russians drink enormous quantities of tea—though not so strong as you make it."

"Go on, then, Ian; go on."

"We sat a long time, and there was no sign of the wolves coming near us. It was very cold, but our furs kept in our warmth. By and by I fell asleep—which was not dangerous so long as I kept warm, and I thought the cold must wake me before it began to numb me. As I slept I dreamed; but my dream did not change the place; the forest, the tree I was in, all my surroundings were the same. I even dreamed that I came awake, and saw everything about me just as it was. I seemed to open my eyes, and look about me on the dazzling snow from my perch; I was in a small tree on the border of a little clearing.

"Suddenly, out of the wood to my left, issued something, running fast, but with soundless feet, over the snow. I doubted in my dream, whether the object were a live thing or only a shadow. It came nearer, and I saw it was a child, a little girl, running as if for her life. She came straight to the tree I sat in, and when close to it, but without a moment's halt, looked up, and I saw a sweet little face, white with terror—which somehow seemed, however, not for herself, but for me. I called out after her to stop, and I would take her into the tree beside me, where the wolves could not reach her; but she only shook her head, and ran on over the clearing into the forest. Among the boles I watched the fleeting shape appear and disappear and appear again, until I saw it no more. Then first I heard another howl from the wolves—that of pursuit. It strengthened and swelled, growing nearer and nearer, till at last, through the stillness of the night and the moveless forest and the dead snow, came to my ear a kind of soft rushing sound. I don't know how to describe it. The rustle of dry leaves is too sharp; it was like a very soft heavy rain on a window—a small dull padding padding; it was the feet of the wolves. They came nearer and grew louder and louder, but the noise was still muffled and soft. Their howling, however, was now loud and horrid. I suppose they cannot help howling; if they could they would have too much power over poor creatures, coming upon them altogether at unawares; but as it is, they tell, whether they will or no, that they are upon the way. At length, dark as a torrent of pitch, out of the forest flowed a multitude of obscure things—silent as shadows—and streamed away, black over the snow, in the direction the child had taken. They passed close to the foot of my tree, but did not even look up, flitting by like a shadow whose substance was unseen. Where the child had vanished they also disappeared; plainly they were after her!

"It was only a dream, mother! I don't be so frightened," interrupted Ian, for his mother gave a little cry, almost forgetting what the narration was.

"Then first," he went on, "I seemed to recover my self-possession. I saw that, though I must certainly be devoured by the wolves, and the child could not escape, I had no choice but go down and follow, do what I could, and die with her. Down I was the same instant, running as I had never run before even in a dream, along the track of the wolves. As I ran, I heard their howling, but it seemed so far off that I could not hope to be in time to kill one of them ere they were upon her. Still, by their howling, it did not appear they had reached her, and I ran on. Their noise grew louder and louder, but I seemed to run miles and miles, wondering what spell was upon me that I could not come up with them. All at once the clamor grew hideous, and I saw them. They were gathered round a tree, in a clearing just like that I had left, and were madly leaping against it, but ever falling back baffled. I looked up; in the top of the tree sat the little girl, her white face looking down upon them with a smile. All the terror had vanished from it. It was still white as the snow, but like the snow was radiating a white light through the dark foliage of the fir. I see it often, mother, so clear that I could point it. I was enchanted at the sight. But she was not in safety yet, and I rushed into the heap of wolves, striking and stabbing with my hunting-knife. I got to the tree, and was by her in a moment. But as I took the child in my arms I woke, and knew that it was a dream. I sat in my own tree, and up against the stem of it broke a howling, surging black wave of wolves. They leaped at the tree-hole, as a rock-checked billow would leap. My gun was to my shoulder in a moment, and blazed among them. Howls of death arose. Their companions fell upon the wounded, and ate them up. The tearing and yelling at the foot of the tree was like the tumult of devils full of hate and malice and greed. Then for the first time, I thought whether such creatures might not be the open haunts of demons. I do not imagine that, when those our Lord drove out of the man asked permission to go into the swine, they desired anything unheard of before in the demon-world. I think they were not in the way of going into tame animals; but, as they must go out of the man, as they greatly dreaded the abyss of the disembodied, and as no ferocious animals fit to harbor them were near, they begged leave to go into such as were accessible, though unsuitable; whereupon the natural consequence followed: their presence made the poor swine miserable even to madness, and with the instinct of so many maniacs that in death alone lies deliverance, they rushed straight into the loch."

"It may be so, Ian! But I want to hear how you got away from the wolves."

"I fired and fired; and still they kept rushing on the tree-hole, heaping themselves against it, those behind struggling up on the backs of those next to it, in a storm of rage and hunger and jealousy. Not a few who had just helped to eat some of their fellows, were themselves eaten in turn, and not a scrap of them left; but it was a large pack, and it would have taken a long time to kill enough to satisfy those that remained. I killed and killed until my ammunition was gone, and then there was nothing for it but await the light. When the morning began to dawn, they answered its light with silence, and turning away swept like a shadow back into the wood. But even now sometimes, as I lie awake at night, I grow almost doubtful whether the whole was not a hideous dream.—Strange to tell, I heard afterwards that a child had been killed by them in the earlier part of that same night.

"Not the less for that was what I went through between the time my powder came to an end and the dawn of the morning, a real spiritual fact.

"In the midst of the howling I grew so sleepy that the horrible noise itself seemed to lull me while it kept me awake, and I fell into a kind of reverie with which my dream came back and mingled. I seemed to be sitting in the tree with the little shining girl, and she was my own soul; and all the wrong things I had in me, and all the wrong things I had done, with all the weaknesses and evil tendencies of my nature, whether mine by fault or by inheritance, had taken shape, and, in the persons of the howling wolves below, were besieging me, to get at me, and devour me. Suddenly my soul was gone. Above were the still bright stars, shining unmoved; beneath was the cold, careless snow, and while betraying the howling wolves: away through the forest was fleeting, ever fleeting, my poor soul, in the likeness of a white-faced child! All at once came a great stillness, as of a desert place, where breathed no life of man nor life of beast. I was alone, frightfully alone—alone as I had never been before. The creatures at the foot of the tree were still howling, but their cry sounded far away and small; they were in some story I had been reading, not any where in my life! I was left and lost—left by whom?—lost by whom?—in the waste of my own being, without stay or comfort. I looked up to the sky; it was infinite—yet only a part of myself, and much too near to afford me any refuge from the desert of my lost self. It came down nearer; the limitless space came down, and clasped me, and held me. It came close to me—as if I had been a shape off which all nature was taking a mould. I was at once everything and nothing. I cannot tell you how frightful it was! In agony I cried to God, with a cry of utter despair. I cannot say whether I may believe that He answered me; I know this, that a great quiet fell upon me—but a quiet as of utter defeat and helplessness. Then again, I cannot tell how, the quiet and the helplessness melted away into a sense of God—a feeling as if great space all about me was God and not emptiness! Wolf nor sin could touch me! I was a wide peace—my very being peace! And in my mind—whether an echo from the Bible, I do not know—were the words: 'I, even I am He that comforteth thee: I am God, thy Saviour!' Whereas I had seemed all alone, I was with God, the only withness man can really share! I lifted my eyes; morning was in the east, and the wolves were slinking away over the snow."

How to receive the strange experience the mother did not know. She sought to say something, for she sorely questioned it! Not a word had he spoken belonging to the religion in which she had brought him up, except two—sin and God! There was nothing in it about the Atonement! She did not see that it was a dream, say rather a vision, of the Atonement itself. To Ian her interpretation of the Atonement seemed an everlasting and hopeless severance. The patience of God must surely be far more tried by those who would interpret him, than by those who deny him; the latter speak lies against him, the former speak lies for him! Yet all the time the mother felt as in the presence of some creature of a higher world—one above the ordinary race of men—whom the powers of evil had indeed misled, but perhaps not finally snared. She little thought how near she was to imagining that good may come out of evil—that there is good which is not of God! She did not yet understand that salvation lies in being one with Christ, even as the branch is one with the vine; that any salvation short of God is no salvation at all. What moment a man feels that he belongs to God utterly, the Atonement is there, the Son of God is reaping His harvest.

The good mother was not, however, one of those conceited, stiff-necked, power-loving souls who have been the curse and ruin of the Church in all ages; she was but one of those in whom reverence for its passing form dulls the perception of unchangeable truth. They shut up God's precious light in the horn-lantern of human theory, and the lantern casts such shadows on the path to the kingdom as seem to dim eyes insurmountable obstructions. For the sake of what they count revealed, they refuse all further revelation, and what satisfies them is merest fennine to the next generation of the children of the kingdom. Instead of God's truth they offer man's theory, and accuse of rebellion against God such as cannot live on the husks they call food. But ah, home-hungry soul! thy God is not the elder brother of the parable, but the father with the best robe and the ring—a God high above all thy longing even as the heavens are above the earth.

THE ADVENT MISSION

IN ITS PROBABLE EFFECT UPON THE FUTURE OBSERVANCE OF THE ADVENT SEASON.

In one of his evening sermons at the Mission at the Church of St. John the Evangelist, the missioner (the Rev. Dr. Bunn of Brooklyn) expressed the opinion that this movement would have the effect of calling attention to the special character and value of the Advent season. The services for other parts of the Church year seem to take for granted that those participating in them are Christians, and the object of the services is therefore, as it should be, to strengthen and develop Christian character. The Lenten season, also, pre-supposes that those following it are Christians. It is the penitential period, and its sentiment is that of the prodigal son. "I will arise and go to my Father." Advent is, however, the revival season, and the word revival is not to be feared, because it is sometimes associated with a hurtful emotionalism. Advent speaks to the sluggards, the unconverted, those living without hope and without God in the world, and its trumpet cry is, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

Within the present generation Lent has come to be so observed as to bring out its full and penitential benefits. The time is ripe for a similar development of the uses of Advent.

In continuing our offer to bring the work of the Church and her clergy more fully before the mind of the public, we present our readers to-day with a view of the interior of Trinity church and with portraits of its rector and some of his associated clergy.

It is certainly to be viewed as a happy providence for the city of New York that Trinity church became possessed of the valuable estate from which its revenues are largely derived. Among the many good results is the supply of religious privileges in extensive sections of the city where people having means to support Christian services no longer reside. Trinity Parish contains seven churches—Trinity church and six chapels: St. Paul's, St. John's, Trinity, St. Chrysostom's, St. Augustine's, and St. Cornelius's. The last three named are entirely free. St. Paul's and St. John's are almost entirely free, a few pews in these being still owned by individuals, and the vestry are contentedly acquiring the ownership of those which are thus held, by purchase from the descendants of the original possessors. The church and all its chapels, with the single exception of Trinity chapel, are situated in districts which, by the changes of metropolitan life, have no longer any wealthy residents; so that the ground occupied by the church is a missionary one, and its work an evangelization of masses that without its labors would be spiritually destitute and uncared for. Almost the entire maintenance of these seven churches is met by the income from its property, for the few pews, when paid, do not yield one-twentieth of the sum expended in the support of these churches. At the head of this great corporation is the rector, the Rev. Morgan Dix, S.T.D., and under him are eighteen clergymen. The whole parish requires also the labors of seven organists, one hundred chorists, and twelve sextons and assistant sextons.

In addition twenty other churches outside the parish receive aid from the funds of Trinity, of which one receives $10,000 annually, another $6,000, and the rest smaller sums according to their needs. About $40,000 a year is thus expended, with the result of keeping these twenty churches alive and flourishing in sections of the city where they are doing mission work among the poor. This liberality in rendering sisterly help has been characteristic of Trinity from an early day, many grants of money having been made through a long period to churches in and out of the city, and all over the country. The number of churches that were thus aided was, up to 1847, over two hundred, and some of them were assisted by repeated and large grants. The full list can be seen in Dr. Berrian's "History of Trinity Church," which was published in 1847.

Besides the aid which is given now annually to twenty churches, as above stated, aid is also extended to societies and institutions other than churches, among which are: The Seamen's Mission in the Port of New York, the City Mission Society, the support of a chaplain at St. Barnabas's House, the Italian Mission in New York, the Church German Society, and Hobart College at Geneva, N. Y. The grants and allowances thus made amount to between $40,000 and $50,000 annually.

The evident desire to promote the missionary activities of the Church in the city and even in other dioceses, which the facts above cited clearly show, has been true of this parish from the beginning of its history. In the earliest days, of course, the poverty and vice and ignorance which now exist had hardly a bare participation in the life of New York, then a prosperous colonial town of small population. But early in the eighteenth century a school for the instruction of Indians and slaves was maintained in connection with Trinity church. This was the first school ever opened for colored children in New York. In this undertaking Mr. Elias Neau, a Frenchman, but of the Church, was the leader under the rector, the Rev. Mr. Vesey, who catechised the children regularly and otherwise directed the labors of instruction. Mr. Neau was deservedly held in high regard for his philanthropy and his many excellent qualities of character, and after his death the work went on, the negroes being taught every Sunday in the steeple of Trinity church.

From that early day to the present instruction of the poor under churchly influences has been an important feature of Trinity's work. The benevolence of the parish now includes the maintenance of a system of daily parish schools of which there are six, all free. Eighteen teachers are provided for these schools, also buildings, desks, fuel and all the supplies which are requisite for nearly one thousand scholars. These are schools for training in the ordinary branches of learning, furnishing an excellent education to those who enjoy these privileges, and at the same time cultivating in them religious affections and healthful moral principles. This alone is a very great and beneficent work.

Sunday-schools and industrial schools are also of course attached to the parish church and each chapel. The aggregate number of teachers and pupils in the Sunday schools is 4,660, and in the industrial schools 1,879.

Trinity maintains also, at No. 50 Varick Street, an infirmary having fifty beds, and a supports five beds at St. Luke's Hospital; this care for the sick poor costing $10,000 a year. Medicine is in addition supplied at a dispensary connected with the infirmary, and provision is made for the burial of those of the parish who die in destitute circumstances.

A large part of the expenses connected with holding the annual diocesan convention falls on Trinity, and about $63,000 annually are paid in taxes on the property of the parish, all that portion which is used for secular purposes being subjected to taxation. The income of the corporation is less than $500,000 per annum, falling short of that which many private individuals enjoy, and a much smaller revenue than many secular corporations manage. And if the work accomplished, part of which is outlined above, is kept in mind, it will be seen that probably no trust anywhere is administered more faithfully or more for public advantage than this fund which this ancient parish has inherited from colonial times.

Three churches have occupied the site on which the present parish church stands. The first edifice was begun in 1696, enlarged in 1737 and destroyed by fire in 1776. The second building was erected in 1788 and removed in 1839 to make place for the present structure, which was completed and consecrated Ascension Day, 1846. St. Paul's chapel was begun in 1764 and completed two years later. St. John's chapel was begun in 1803 and completed in 1807, and has been three times altered and enlarged. Trinity chapel was commenced in 1851 and completed in 1856. The cornerstone of St. Chrysostom's chapel, to be a free mission church, was laid in 1868, and the first service was held the following year. St. Augustine's, another free chapel, was consecrated in 1877. St. Cornelius's chapel, on Governor's Island, became a dependence of Trinity in 1868.

Trinity parish church has the Rev. Morgan Dix, S.T.D., rector, under whose care are the seven churches with their eighteen clergymen. His parochial assistant is the Rev. George William Douglas, D.D., who has general supervision of the various branches of work. The other assistants are: the Rev. Louis A. Arthur, the Rev. Joseph W. Hill, the Rev. Martin Albert, Geroan Missionary, and the Rev. G. H. Sterling, head master of the day school and night are a Sunday-school, an industrial school, a daily parish school for boys, free, and taught by the Rev. G. H. Sterling and four assistants; a night school, an admirable and successful undertaking, giving instruction to women and girls on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and to men and boys the alternate nights. Mr. Sterling and three assistants doing the work; the ladies' employment society, whose president is Mrs. S. V. R. Cruger, and object is to give sewing to poor women of the parish and pay them a fair price for their work; the Altar trations through a physician and dispensary, a kindergarten, a relief bureau, relieving last year 4,386 persons, a home school or kitchen garden, instructing little girls in the details of housekeeping, and lastly a seaside home near Islip, L. I., giving a month's stay each to two hundred and twenty-five women and children.

St. Paul's chapel, under charge of the Rev. James Mulchahey, D.D., assisted by the Rev. A. J. Thompson, has a Sunday-school, industrial school, daily parish school for girls, Dorcas society, Altar society, St. Margaret's Guild, Workmen's Club, Chapel Guild, Boys' Association, Boys' Baptismal League, Girls' Baptismal League, Girls' Friendly Society, Mothers' Meeting, and a Free Training School for Church Singers.

St. Paul's has historic interest, the present house of worship having been erected in colonial times. Its ancient church-yard, like that of Trinity, contains the remains of many distinguished citizens, and the monument to General Montgomery, who fell at Quebec, is a conspicuous feature of the east end of the edifice.

There are 1,117 communicants, and many of these are older pupils in the schools. The industrial school is a very useful charity, and has done so much for the elevation of the neighborhood as to have been repeatedly spoken of in terms of commendation by judges of the courts. dr-en's Evensong, in place of a session of the Sunday-school, accustoms the children to worship in the use of the Liturgy of the Church, and with music rendered by themselves. Other guilds and societies, similar to those already named, are found in successful operation here.

Trinity chapel, which is in the charge of the Rev. C. E. Swope, D.D., with the Rev. S. Borden Smith, assistant, is situated on Twenty-fifth Street, near Fifth Avenue, in the vicinity of the leading hotels, and in the midst of a very populous section of the city. Adjoining its beautiful house of worship is a large and finely-equipped parish house, which affords accommodation for its parish school and other charitable organizations. Among these, particular mention should be made of its employment society, which has now completed twenty years of benevolent activity. Its method of operation is to give sewing to poor women, who are paid a fair price for their work. Material is bought, garments are cut, and then given out to be made by women at their homes; this work, suitably paid for, being often a means of relief from destitution. Last year $2,566 garments were made, and $2,015.16 expended.

St. Chrysostom's chapel is in charge of the Rev. Thomas H. Sill, assisted by the Rev. J. R. L. Nisbett. It is on the corner of Seventh Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street, and is doing a magnificent work in a populous quarter. Its dispensary treated over a thousand cases last year. Its various guilds and societies number more than three hundred active members; and of these, two hundred have met the assistant-bishop of the diocese, at one time, at a special service.

Of St. Augustine's Chapel and Mission House the Rev. Arthur C. Kimber is in charge, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. William B. Hooper and Olin Hallock. An illustrated description of this chapel was given in THE CHURCHMAN as a supplement to the number for December 22, 1877, comprising a full-page engraving, five diagrams, and a view of the chancel window and font. Its organizations are similar to those of the other chapels, and through them it is reaching a multitude of people of the middle class on the east side of town. Its schools, Sunday, industrial, parish, day, and night, and house-school are crowded with pupils, and conducted with the utmost efficiency.

St. Cornelius's chapel on Governor's Island has for chaplain the Rev. E. H. C. Goodwin, who ministers most acceptably to the United States garrison at Fort Columbus.

It is thus seen that Trinity parish, which numbers 5,252 communicants, and covers with its zealous ministrations all the lower and densely populated portion of the city, is a centre and source of Christian influence that could not be spared from the metropolis. Its history, to mark the completion of two centuries of life, is already in preparation, and, when written, it will embrace largely the history of the moral and social advance of the city. The first volume will bring events down to the Revolution, and the whole will fitly preserve a record of the piety, learning, and beneficent labors of some of the most distinguished citizens of the Republic.

THE REV. MORGAN DIX, S.T.D., rector of Trinity church, New York, comes of a widely known and honored ancestral line. His father, the distinguished Major-General

John A. Dix, was of English stock, embracing in this country some eminent names among the Puritan settlers and early inhabitants of New England; his mother was of Welsh extraction, the daughter of John Jordan Morgan, a gentleman of education and wealth, a native of New York City, and in the early part of the present century one of its leading citizens.

Dr. Dix was born in New York November 1, 1827. The following year his father, who held the rank of major in the regular army, resigned his commission and removed with the family to Cooperstown, N. Y., where they remained two years, going thence to Albany. From 1830 to 1842 the home of the family continued to be at the State capital, his father filling during that period the important positions of Adjutant-General, Secretary of State, member of Assembly, and Superintendent of Public Instruction.

In 1842, on account of his mother's health, the family left Albany and spent a winter in Madeira, travelling afterwards through Spain and Italy and coming back to New York in 1844. On his return from this European tour preparation for college, already begun, was completed in the schools of New York, and young Dix entered the sophomore class of Columbia College in 1845, graduating in 1848. He at once entered upon the study of the law at Washington, D. C., with his father, who was in the Senate of the United States, but his plans for life changing soon after, he became a student in the General Theological Seminary, where he took the regular course and was graduated in 1852.

In September of the same year he was ordained deacon in St. John's Chapel, N. Y., by the Bishop of New Hampshire, and was admitted to the priesthood in 1854 by Bishop Alonzo Potter in St. Mark's church, Philadelphia. He became assistant in the last named church to its rector, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Wilmer, afterward Bishop of Louisiana. Resigning these duties, he went to Europe, spending a year and a half in travel and study there, and returning in 1855, was elected assistant minister of Trinity Parish, New York. An election to this position had been tendered him before, but had been declined. In the duties now assumed he succeeded the Rev. Dr. William Berrian, who had been advanced to the rectorship. In 1859 he was made assistant rector, and in 1862, on the death of the Rev. Dr. Berrian, he was elected rector of the parish.

The ministry of Dr. Dix has been stamped by many marks of originality and power. He has been prominently identified with a certain school of thought in the Church, and while a leader in this line of discussion and action, he has been a target for attack and even abuse. He has been active in promoting sisterhoods, and in the beginning of the history of the Sisterhood of St. Mary he was pastor of it, when the order numbered only five or six members. His interest and influence in raising the music of the Church to a higher and more distinctive character have been very efficient. He was a member of the first Choral Society under Dr. Hodges, and took part in the first choral service ever held in New York, and under his charge the music at Trinity church has become celebrated, and especially at certain festivals now attracts overflowing congregations.

The responsibility of the rector of Trinity Parish is a great and unusual one. He has under him seven churches and eighteen clergymen. The position involves larger duties than many bishoprics. He is virtually a dean of a large ecclesiastical establishment, and his clergy may be considered his canons. Still, with this oversight of so large a field, Dr. Dix finds time to fill many other posts and do much other work. He was a delegate to the last three General Conventions and a member of the Committee on Canons. He is, and has been for many years, President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese. He is also a Trustee of Columbia College, ex-officio Trustee of the Sailors' Snug Harbor, ex-officio Trustee of Leake and Watts' Orphan Asylum, a Trustee of the General Theological Seminary and Chairman of its Standing Committee, a Trustee of the House of Mercy, a Trustee of the Society for Promoting Religion and Learning, a Trustee of the Church Orphan Home, Vice-President of the N. Y. Vice-President Episcopal Public School, and Vice-President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

The list of works due to the fertility of his mind is also long and interesting, and, as will be seen, many of the writings published by him have met with a great demand, going through numerous editions. These publications embrace: 1. "Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans," 1864; 2. "Commentary on the Epistles to the Galatians and Colossians," 1865; 3. "Lectures on Pantheism," 1865; 4. "Lectures on the Two Estates, the Wedded in the Lord, and the Single for the Kingdom of Heaven's Sake," 1872, and a new edition in 1884; 5. "Sermons, Doctrinal and Practical," 1878, two American and two English editions; 6. "Lectures on First Prayer Book of Edward VI.," 1881, a fourth edition in 1885; 7. "Lectures on the Calling of a Christian Woman," 1883, six editions of this work have been published in America, and it has been reprinted in England; 8. "Memoirs of John A. Dix," 2 vols., 8vo, illustrated, 1883. The following devotional works and books of instruction have also been prepared and published by him: "Book of Hours;" "Manual of Christian Life," sixteenth thousand in 1884; "Manual for Candidates for Adult Baptism;" "Manual for Confirmation Classes," eighteenth thousand in 1885. This list would be much more extended if it were made to include occasional sermons, reviews, and magazine articles, which have been printed and very widely circulated. His clearness of statement and vigor of thought, with pronounced and independent views, have combined to create for all that he has put forth the very large demand which is indicated by the many editions which have been called for.

In person Dr. Dix is tall and well proportioned, and his features show in a remarkable manner his characteristics of mind and heart. As his father was deservedly and widely popular in public and private life, so the rector of Trinity is one who disarms prejudice by his courtesy, and wins affection by his manifest sincerity and goodness.

The two volumes which give the biography of his illustrious father, are a very valuable contribution to the social, political, intellectual, and moral life of the nation during a very important part of our history. Written with much modesty and good judgment, they not only form history but contain the sources of history, interesting the student by their fulness of detail and the general reader by the charm of narration.

THE REV. SULLIVAN H. WESTON, D.D., assistant minister of Trinity Parish, officiating at St. John's chapel, New York, was born in Bristol, Maine, October 7, 1816. His collegiate studies were taken at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., and by that institution he was graduated in 1842. Pursuing a theological course privately, he was ordained a deacon in Trinity church, New York, in 1847, and was admitted to the priesthood in 1852. His connection with Trinity Parish began with his diaconate, and the whole of his clerical life has been passed in relation with that parish. In the year 1852 he was placed in charge of St. John's chapel. Six years later he was elected Bishop of Texas, but declined. As chaplain of the Seventh Regiment, National Guard of the State of New York, he served two campaigns with that regiment in the early part of the war for the Union. On April 28, 1861, the Sunday after the arrival of the regiment in Washington, he preached in the House of Representatives, and the sermon then delivered was afterward published. Later he delivered in St. John's chapel a discourse entitled, "The March of the Seventh Regiment," in which he sketched the indications of Divine Providence in protecting the capital through the heroic advance of this celebrated regiment. This sermon was also published. Still another which awakened great interest and was put in print was on the "Sanctity of the Grave," its very forcible views contributing largely to save Trinity churchyard from desecration by the proposed opening of Pine street through it.

Within recent years Dr. Weston has been actively occupied in earnest Gospel labors in that part of the parish which is under his especial care. The quarter in which St. John's chapel is situated having greatly changed in the character of its residents, his work lies mostly among the poor, and into these ministrations he enters with delightful zeal. The schools connected with the chapel number nearly two thousand children, many of them from abodes of misery and vice. His devotion to these interests shows a truly missionary spirit.

The development of Church music has also been a prominent aim with him, and this important department of worship has been greatly promoted by his persevering efforts.

Dr. Weston has a commanding figure. He is in excellent physical vigor, and his mind is keen and active. He is extremely nervous, and his manner borders on the eccentric, but his freedom from reserve and warm-hearted interest in all who approach him gains him the affection of young and old.

THE REV. JAMES MULCHAHEY, S.T.D., assistant minister in the parish of Trinity church, New York, having pastoral charge of St. Paul's chapel, was born in Newark, N. J., October 21, 1822. His academic preparation was made in Rhode Island, and he was graduated in 1842 by Trinity College, Hartford, then known as Washington College. After taking a full course of theological study at the Seminary of Virginia, at Alexandria, he was ordained deacon by Bishop Henshaw, of Rhode Island, in St. Mark's church, Warren, R. I., in 1845, and priest in Grace church, Providence, R. I., in 1846.

His first ministry was in Rhode Island. Then for some four or five years he was rector of St. Stephen's, Middlebury, Vt. His other charges were Christ church, Troy, N. Y., seven years; Grace church, New Bedford, seven or eight years; Trinity church, Toledo, six years, at the expiration of which period he was elected to his present charge, the duties of which he entered upon in December, 1873.

At his examination for the diaconate Dr. Mulchahey was asked to state the relation of baptism to justification. His churchly reply that baptism secures the remission of sins awakened the strenuous opposition of the examiner, who entered into a heated argument. The bishop, however, took the candidate's view. The examiner published a pamphlet, which, at the bishop's request, the young deacon answered by a similar publication. The fact that an issue was raised on such a point shows the advance that has been made from that day when the Oxford movement had only begun its happy work.

Other publications of Dr. Mulchahey have been, "Holy Scripture the Rule, Holy Church the Keeper," published by the American Tract Society; "The Sacramental Significance of Confirmation," published by James Pott; and a recent volume on "The Witness of the Church to Christian Faith."

Columbia College in 1865 conferred upon the subject of this sketch the degree of S.T.D. In the General Convention of 1868 he served as a clerical deputy from the diocese of Massachusetts. Dr. Mulchahey is of vigorous and active frame and of very genial temperament, winning friends as well by his qualities of heart as of mind, and in pastoral life proving an excellent adviser and guide.

THE REV. GEO. WILLIAM DOUGLAS, S.T.D., assistant minister of Trinity church, is the son of Mr. W. B. Douglas, who was president of the First National Bank, of New York City. His grandfather, of Lansingburgh, N. Y., was the founder of the bank referred to. Dr. Douglas was born in New York in 1850; but his father retiring from business shortly after, the family removed to Geneva, N. Y., where his early boyhood was passed. From 1862-3 he was a student under Dr. Colt, in the well-known school at Concord, N. H. He entered Trinity College in 1868, and was graduated in 1871.

He immediately entered the General Theological Seminary, taking the usual course in divinity, being graduated in 1874, in which year he was admitted a deacon in the diocese of New York by Bishop Potter. From the summer of 1874 to the autumn of 1876 he was abroad, studying at the University of Bonn, and in Paris, and at Oxford. Returning, he filled the position of tutor in Greek at the General Theological Seminary during the winter of 1877; and from the autumn of that year until Jan. 1, 1879, he was assistant to the late Rev. Dr. E. A. Washburn, rector of Calvary church, New York. At the conclusion of this service, Dr. Douglas entered at once on his duties as assistant minister of Trinity church, to which he had been elected in November, 1878. This position, which he still holds, gives him ministerial charge of the parish church. In 1885 he received the degree of S.T.D. from Hobart College. Being in the vigor of youth, and of active temperament, he is well fitted also by his intellectual training and affability of disposition, for the responsible and multiplied duties which are upon him.

AN ADVENT VISION.

The Lord has come, my heart exulting cries,
Then lies in low abasement at His feet,
For how dare I look up His glance to meet,
When broken vows like mists before me rise!

Then like the sound of many waters sweet
The voice of Jesus falls upon my ear
And bids me lift my head—"Be of good cheer,"
He saith, "thy swift repentance doth My Ad-vent greet."

Again I bowed my head in silent grief
Before the Lord, for doubts and fears
Had filled my heart and life through many years;
That He could love me still was past belief.

When quickly stooping down he laid His hand
Upon my head, and blessed me lying there,
And said in accents mild, "Oh, child most dear,
A second Thomas thou; believe and stand."

So, standing, as He bid, but bending low
My head, I prayed that He would let me still Fulfill my vows, work for Him with fresh will,
And cast away the doubts that grieved me so.
Then, filling all my life and soul, there came
The peace of God, and grace divine,
Strengthening this feeble will of mine
Until I stood erect, God's child again.

AN UNDISTINGUISHED MASS.

It has been noticed that certain occupations exercise upon the human frame a deleterious influence. They injure or mar the action or the beauty of this part or that. In history, men have done much the same; they have exerted, in one direction, a beneficial, in some other, an injurious influence. "The power," says a writer, "which, under God, is continually bringing the world back to its orbit, or keeping it within it, is the quiet working of that undistinguished mass, which, after all, accomplishes the only enduring work, and leaves the true and real mark." It must be a source of solace to the "undistinguished mass" of clergy, that this is forcibly true of them. Uneventful, as the world counts eventfulness, may their lives be, but they are factors in work which will not need continual correcting, and are moving the world in those directions from which it will not need to be brought "back to its orbit."

THE interminable deserts and arid mountains fill the heart with far different thoughts than civilized lands would do. It is for this that the Israelites were led through them. The quiet of the desert is something wonderful—you never hear a sound. So one goes stalking along—the camel's cushioned foot makes no noise, and you learn yourself.—General Gordon in the Sudan.

THE CHRISTMAS LETTER MISSION.

"Who thought of me?" said a friendless man in a home, who had been sullenly silent for days, as he opened his Christmas letter.

The same question was echoed in many hearts on Christmas morning. Some answered, "the angels;" but the children thought, "the fairies."

As this joyous season approaches, we again wish to draw your attention to the work of the "Christmas Letter Mission," which carries with it so much cheer and comfort.

Printed letters are given to each one, on the morning of Christmas Day, being placed either under the pillows of the sick, or the cell doors of prisoners; or beside the breakfast-plates at the asylums and homes. They contain interesting little stories and anecdotes, besides encouraging words for those who need them. Each letter, with a bright card is enclosed in a colored envelope, on which is printed "A Christmas Letter for You."

Last year there were 34,534 letters distributed; and, with more helpers and money, think of the thousands of disheartened and lonely ones, whose Christmas could indeed be made one of peace and goodwill.

Pause a moment and think! Can you not lend yourself for a season; or give your nite, that few may feel forgotten and dreary during the coming Christmastide?

These letters are printed in eight languages, including Chinese, and can be bought for from three to five cents apiece.

The children's "Letters" and cards are especially pretty and attractive.

Contributions will be gratefully received, and all requests for information promptly answered, by the central secretary and treasurer, Miss Cox, Newtown, Queen's county, N. Y.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE NEW BOY.

BY MRS. M. C. HUNGERFORD.

"There's a new fellow come," said Rob Taylor, the bully of the school, "and we'll have some fun giving him a big scare to-night."

"But the poor fellow's lame," said a smaller boy, rather timidly, "and the professor said he wouldn't have any more hazing."

"Shut up, Jones," said Taylor, quietly; "here's Mr. Saunders, and there goes the warning bell."

All the scholars began to put away the books in which they had been studying the next day's lessons, and prepared for the summons to bed, which would sound from the bell in ten minutes.

Frank, the new boy, was lonely and homesick, and so anxious to escape from the curious eyes which seemed to look slightly at his clumsy boots and homemade clothes, that he was thankful when bedtime came, and he joyfully followed the boys upstairs to the dormitories, which were two long rooms or halls, with a row of single beds on each side. Ten minutes were given for the boys to undress, and then a teacher came in and turned out the lights, first looking at the beds to see if each boy was in his place, and giving a general order for quiet; which order was obeyed just so long as the teacher was within hearing.

Then arose a mighty hubbub which seemed to Frank, lying in the little bed that had been assigned to him, like an uproar without any meaning. It was not long, however, before he began to perceive that his part in the performance was to be a prominent one. A number of the boys surrounded his bed, and proceeded to dance around it in a circle for a moment or two; and then stopping, two or three seized the head and foot of the bed, rocking it violently, nearly shaking Frank out. It was very light from the moon; whose rays streamed in at the windows; but the faces were so unfamiliar to him that he could not recognize any of them. Several boys with handkerchiefs tied over their faces came to his side, and, ordering the little fellows who were rocking the bed to be quiet, commanded Frank to sit up and answer their questions.

He sat up, as requested, not very much frightened, but feeling a little as if he had fallen among thieves, while the largest boy, assuming a very gruff voice, said:

"Miserable child, take your choice, decide at once; how will you end your days?"

"With nights, I suppose," faltered Frank, not intending to joke, but really not knowing what the question meant.

"Wretched being, do you dare to joke upon the brink of a yawning tomb?" said the big boy, with a stamp of his foot and a dismal groan, which was echoed by the other boys in various keys. "Again I ask you, how will you die?"

"I'm sure I don't know," said Frank, wondering if they really were going to kill him, and wishing with all his might that he had never come to school.

"He doesn't know," repeated the big boy with scornful fierceness, and all the other boys groaned again.

"Make your choice while you have a chance, for soon it will be too late. How will you perish, by fire, water, rope or axe? Answer, miscreant, shall it be by fire?"

"No, I thank you," answered Frank, not half so much frightened by such highflown language as his persecutor intended him to be. "I have tried that once, and I've had enough of it."

"Then shall it be water?" questioned the big boy, in a sepulchral voice; but before an answer could be given a boy who had been stationed at the door as sentinel gave a sudden word of alarm, and quicker than a flash each vacant bed was filled by a boy who appeared to be lost in the deepest slumber, and quite unconscious of the fact that the door opened and two teachers entered, each carrying a lamp.

"Everything seems quiet enough here," said one, as they walked down the room between the two rows of beds, glancing sharply at their occupants, some of whom were now breathing heavily and even snoring.

"Yes, it's quiet now, but I think the noise came from this dormitory," said the other. "There is a new boy in here to-night, and it is safe to say there is something wrong going on. I will stop this hazing business if I have to hire a policeman to protect every new scholar that comes into the school. It became a disgrace to the institution last term."

"I wish we could ascertain who is the ringleader," said the younger teacher, lowering his voice.

"I think I know who is at the bottom of the cowardly business," said the other gentleman, going up to the bed where Rob Taylor was counterfeiting a sleep so profound that even the not very gentle shake the master gave his shoulder failed to arouse him, till it was repeated with increased vigor, when, thinking it would not do to pretend any longer, he opened his eyes in sleepy astonishment, and asked what was the matter.

"I have come to tell you, Taylor," said the teacher sternly, "that I hold you responsible for any hazing that goes on after this. There is a new boy in here to-night; if he has any complaint to make to-morrow you shall be expelled. Do you understand me, sir?"

"Yes, sir," said Taylor, so meekly that, although Frank felt sure he was the boy who had asked him such ferocious questions, he never would have recognized the voice.

"Then remember what I have said," said the master, loosening the uncomfortably tight grasp he had kept of the boy's shoulder.

With the light still in his hand the master walked up to the little bed where Frank lay watching them, without any pretence of sleep, although the boy in the next bed had signalled him to shut his eyes when the teachers first entered the hall.

"Ah," said the teacher, looking down kindly into the bright eyes lifted up to his, "you are awake, my boy, and yet not crying with homesickness."

"No, sir," said Frank, finding it very hard to keep back the tears then, for there was something in the kind voice and look that made them start.

"Did you hear what I said to Taylor?" said the master, wisely taking no notice of his emotion and brave effort to control it.

"Yes, sir," replied Frank. "I couldn't help hearing."

"That's all right," said the teacher, "and as you have heard, I will ask you now if you have any complaint to make of rough or ungentlemanly treatment from Taylor or any of the boys?"

"No, sir," said Frank promptly. "I have no complaint to make of any one."

"Very well, then," said the master. "I hope I leave you in no danger of molestation; but if any of the young gentlemen venture to disobey my commands and trouble you, come to the door of the dormitory and pull the bell; it rings in Mr. Saunders's room, and he will know what it means."

"Yes," said the younger teacher, "if you want help ring the bell and I will be with you in a moment."

They left the room, and as the sound of their retreating steps died away in the distance, one after another of the sleepers sprang to a sitting position in bed. No one ventured to speak for a moment till there was no danger of the teacher's overhearing them; then one of the larger boys, clearing his throat as if about to make a speech, began:

"Romans, countrymen, and lovers, I say it is a burning shame that we—"

"Yes, Dana, you are right," interrupted Taylor. "It is a brutal shame to try to cheat us out of our fun, but there's more ways than one to kill a cat, and we'll have a lark yet."

"Hold your tongue, Taylor," said the other boy, a quiet sort of fellow, who did not seem in the least afraid of the bully. "let me finish, if you please. I was going to say that we ought to be ashamed of ourselves to have attempted any more hazing. I have never been quite comfortable since that last new fellow, poor little Selwyn, went home with a broken arm. Of course we didn't mean to damage him, but it ought to have been a lesson to us. This little fellow seems gamey, but I suppose we should have tormented him all the worse."

"He was plucky not to tell," said a small approving voice from the end of the room.

"He was that," assented Dana, getting out of bed and walking over to Frank's side. "Give us your hand, young fellow; you're a regular brick. Come along, boys, give him the hand of welcome all around."

Then from the fourteen beds marched fourteen night-gowned boys of assorted sizes and extended their hands to Frank with much ceremony, and a grand hand-shaking ensued. Taylor resisted at first, but a few sharp words from Dana brought him to the bedside, and he sulkily offered his hand like the others.

Frank sat up in bed to receive the boys' civilities, feeling rather shy, but very glad that they were friendly. Some of them perched on his bed like a lot of sociable ghosts, and sought to cement their friendship by affable offers to share marbles, tops, puzzles, and other instruments dear to youthful hearts, with him on the morrow. The whispered conversation became quite animated when it was interrupted by Dana, who had gone back to bed, suddenly asking Frank why he had answered as he did when Taylor asked him if he would choose death by fire.

Frank grew very shy then and protested that he would much rather say no more about it, but the more averse he seemed to explaining, the stronger grew all the boys' curiosity, and they began to cross-question him in a way that left him no escape, and he could not, without seeming sullen, avoid answering them in some way.

"I was in a house once that took fire," he said, at last, "and I got hurt, and that's what makes me go lame, but Dr. Dana says I'll outgrow my limp, he thinks."

"Dr. Dana! I thought so," exclaimed young Dana, jumping out of bed again. "Now, just hold up, young friend and I'll take up the thread of narrative and see if I can't serve up that story in rather better style than you do."

The boys gathered around in astonishment to hear what one of their number could have to say about a matter which concerned a new boy, and Dana began his story to a deeply interested audience.

"You remember hearing about a year ago," he said, "that my father's house was burned up, but I don't think you heard all the circumstances; in fact, I didn't hear them myself till I went home last vacation. Nobody knew just how the fire began, for there was no one in the house but children and servants. My father had been sent for low showed himself at a window with both hands stretched out, and calling, 'Papa, papa' in the most pitiful way. It looked to be an impossible thing to save him, though some of the men rushed for a ladder, which, by-the-by, was too short to reach the window. But there was a boy in the crowd who didn't wait for the ladder. He flew around to the back, climbed up the cornice of the piazza, the other end of which was beginning to burn. The smoke was coming thick out of the windows, but the fellow climbed in and in a few minutes (the folks below said it seemed like an hour) he was up in the room above by Johnnie's side at the front window. But he couldn't get down to the next floor again—the wonder was how he ever got up. They tried the ladder but it didn't come much above the second-story.

"Then the boy called out to one of the men to come up as far as he could on the ladder. Martin, our man, ran up and told him to drop Johnnie into his arms if he could. How he ever did it I don't know, but he did lift that heavy child and lower him by his dress as far as he could and then let him drop right into Martin's arms. Another man had followed him up the ladder and was holding him steady so he could hold his arms up, and stand the shock. The very minute that he dropped the child into Martin's arm the fire caught the frame of the window, and the smoke and flames drove the poor fellow back into the room. The people out below thought for sure he was lost and so anybody else would have been, but in a minute they saw him again with a wet towel over his face and head. There was no other chance, so the men roared out for him to jump, and he lifted the towel an instant, took one look down, and sprang out of the burning window."

"Oh?" said the boys, breathlessly, "did it kill him?"

"No, but it came near enough to it," resumed Dana. "My father drove up just as they picked the poor fellow up, and you had better believe he did his best for him. His arms were burnt, his collar-bone fractured, and he lay broken in two places. It took months to patch him up, and there was a time when it seemed as if he must lose a leg. But look here, boys, I haven't told you the fellow's name yet; it is Lindley. Now you fellows just ask the new boy what letters he uses to spell his latter name, and see what you make of it?"

Frank could not refuse to tell his name, and when the boys learned that it was Lindley, and found that he was really the hero of Dana's story, their enthusiasm became intense, and nothing but the fear of consequences kept them from giving a hearty and uproarious three times three for the new boy.

AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER-STONE OF THE NEW BUILDING FOR THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

BY MAIDA EUCON.

Look, Lord, with gracious favor
Upon our work to-day,
And bless for us this building,
Whose corner-stone we lay.
We rear it for Thy service,
For labor in Thy name;
For deeds of love and mercy,
That shall Thy love proclaim.
Oh! let these walls be founded Upon salvation's Rock,
That in them may be gathered
The wanderers of Thy flock.
Here homeless hearts be sheltered;
Here hopeless ones upheld,
Until in floods of love-light
All sadness be dispelled.

We seek Thy steps to follow;
To bind the broken reed;
To aid the weak and weary,
To minister to need.
Oh! grant us grace and wisdom,
True comfort to supply;
And bring us daily nearer
The better land on high.
Oh! give to us the honor
To lead some souls to Thee;
That in our crowns of glory
Fair jewels they may be;
So in that land delightful
Together we may sing
In praise and joyous homage Before Thee, Saviour—King!

At a recent exhibition in Aberdeen the Book of Hours, which belonged to Mary Queen of Scots, was shown, and also a vellum prayer book that was once the property of Catherine de Medicis. There were many other rare curiosities in the exhibition, which was held on occasion of the visit of the British Association to Aberdeen. Among them was an autograph of Oliver Cromwell, being his signature to a regimental order.

The wool industries of the country in 1890 employed 130,000 persons, and now they employ 340,000, and the value of this annual product has trebled. In the woven industries the 60,000 persons then employed have become 100,000, and the annual production of our home mills has increased from $80,000,000 to $270,000,000. The 900,000 tons of iron ore then produced have become 8,000,000 tons yearly. The employes in the silk industry have increased from 5,000 to 35,000 in number.

A HUNDRED tons of air-dried seaweed, besides its salts, will yield twenty tons of algin and fifteen tons of cellulose. The algin is a glutinous substance, with fourteen times the viscosity of starch, or thirty-seven times that of gum arabic. It is good for sizing, or as a mordant in dyeing, or can be used in cookery and in making confectionery. It prevents incrustation in steam boilers, and can be made into paper, and to serve many other uses. Worthless as a weed does not apply to seaweed.

DANIELS' Lehrbuch der Geographie for the present year gives the population of the world at 1,435,000,000, speaking 8,064 languages and dialects. There are, it says, 1,100 forms of religious belief. Christendom includes 432,000,000, divided between 308,000,000 Roman Catholics, 123,000,000 Protestants, 83,000,000 Greeks or Orthodox, and 8,000,000 in one hundred various sects. The Jews number 8,000,000, the Mohammedans 120,000,000, and the followers of Brahma 138,000,000. The Pagans proper are estimated at 234,000,000, and the Buddhists at 503,000,000.

A PROFESSOR at Lausanne, M. Louis Nicole, has recently discovered a genuine work of Raphael, as proved by the date and signature of the artist. The subject is a Madonna seated on some rising ground, and feeding the Child Jesus at her breast. He being stretched at full length across her lap. To the left is a St. John holding a staff shaped like a cross. In the background is a rock on the left, and on the right a distant landscape. The picture was engraved by Mark Antony in Raphael's own day, but has been lost until now.

ART IN JEWELRY.

Any cultivated person who will spend an hour this holiday season in examining the carefully selected and extensive stock in the great Fifth Avenue jewelry establishment of Mr. Theodore B. Starr, on Madison Square, will not fail to enjoy and appreciate the artistic skill with which every object of use or ornament has been treated. Years of study and selection have been given to the expression of the highest sense of art in the wide range of articles of luxury and taste, embracing the finest diamonds and other precious stones, pearls, jewelry, watches, clocks, sterling silver-ware, bronzes, decorative porcelain, cameos, glass vases, etc., which fill the floors of this unique establishment. The existence of such a house is evidence of the fact that there are enough rich people of taste and refinement in this country to warrant the investment of so large an amount of capital in articles of personal and household decoration.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1885.

ALLELUIA!

That sons of men might become sons of God!

Let us plead at this Christmas season that they who have this world's goods in abundance shall not forget those among their own acquaintances and friends who, once well to do, are struggling now with straitened circumstances, and living in secret distress. Life is full of changes, and in every circle of acquaintances, almost, are to be found those who need thus to be lifted out of a pit. We need not say that they suffer the more keenly because of their refinement and their former prosperity.

It is not a part of righteousness for one to live carelessly of his neighbours. The love of God dwelleth not in him.

It is safe to say that the Feast of the Nativity is kept this year with characteristic gladness in all our churches, and with more than usual joy in all the Christian homes of the land. Continued tranquillity, increasing prosperity, and a general feeling of hopefulness are among the causes which contribute to the making of a merry Christmas throughout all our borders. Nor is there lack of the awakened zeal and conspicuous activity of the Church in her "works and labor that proceedeth of love." It is not to be doubted that the message of peace and good-will among men is being commended in Christian charity to many a rejoicing household that would not be glad but for this blessed Christmas time. Of the many blessings which this annual festival brings to all, the recognition of the sacredness of the home and the blessedness of neighborliness, are not the least important. The Incarnation sanctified the natural ties of the family; so its annual commemoration serves to guard and preserve them. The Nativity of Bethlehem has forever hallowed the claims of outcast destitution; the yearly remembrance of the manger-birth of the Saviour moves the Christian heart to a renewed life of benevolence and hospitality. Apart from all the teaching that is now being given from the Church's pulpits, this holy Christmas-tide is teaching its own lessons in many homes and to many hearts. Who can estimate the loss which Puritanism would have inflicted on this land if it had succeeded in abolishing Christmas! and who can estimate the beneficence of the Church in so completely restoring Christmas to the American people!

In the American necrology of the year that is about to close, there are the names of three famous men, each one of whom has been distinguished for domestic virtue. In all other respects they differed widely from each other. One was a great captain; the other two never "set a squadron in the field." One was a jurist and statesman; the other two did not claim to have any tincture of professional learning. One was the possessor of a vast fortune; the other two were comparatively poor. Yet the three have been sincerely mourned, and all are held in high personal honor because distinguished for the purity of their family and domestic life. The three may be taken as representative men of our civilization: and it is something, surely, to be thankful for, that their names may be mentioned with honor around Christmas firesides as the names of men who were best beloved in their own homes, and whose virtues shone nowhere so brightly as they did in the family circle. Certainly it augurs well for our country when we can say, as we now can, of our greatest, most illustrious, and most successful men, that they were worthy of all emulation and praise, in social and domestic life, as faithful husbands, loving fathers, loyal friends.

The last English papers bring the text of an address to the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England on the subject of Church reform, which has been numerously signed by the resident members of the Senate of Cambridge University and by other leading members of the university. This important paper expresses the earnest desire of the memorialists that "advantage may be taken of the revival of public interest in ecclesiastical questions for the authoritative consideration of temperate measures of Church reform, in order that they may be carried into effect with the least possible delay." After specifying some definite evils that appear to need prompt correction, the great reform which they urge as that which is most needed, is "a more complete development of the constitution and government of the Church, central, diocesan, and parochial, and especially the admission of laymen of all classes, who are bona fide Churchmen, to a substantial share in the control of Church affairs."

It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this movement among Cambridge men. Representing, as that university has done for the last two decades, at least, the most progressive and influential thought as well as the soundest opinion of the English Church, this memorial may well be regarded as a most hopeful indication that the Church is ready and able, if it only be allowed, to adjust itself to all the conditions by which it is surrounded. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of their opinion that such a reform as they propose would be most welcome "to the clergymen and laymen of all schools of theology in the Church of England and to the nation at large." Certainly the signs of the times augur well for the abundant success of such a movement as is here recommended.

The Liberal members of the same university senate have issued a "declaration on disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England," which, for calm and temperate statement and forcible reasoning must take a high place in the controversial literature of the day. There is not space here even to summarize the contents of this admirable paper. The conclusion of the declaration, however, is so suggestive of the Church's true function everywhere that it deserves special mention. The contention of the Cambridge Liberals is that connection with the State exercises a most salutary influence on the Church in providing "a powerful antidote to the inclination to confine religion within the limits of individual emotion or belief, and in keeping up a sense of the intimate relations between the Christian faith and character on the one hand and all human interests and social duties on the other. If it were removed the ideals of religion prevalent in England would assuredly be lowered and impoverished, not in the Church only, but in other communities likewise." The argument that is here advanced in favor of a union between Church and State is undoubtedly one of the most powerful that can be offered. It has been the glory of the English Church that under its influence religion has been carried into all the relations of life, and that it has practically refused to recognize the false distinctions which dissenting Protestantism has always attempted to set up between things sacred and things called secular. Nevertheless, it is altogether possible for the Church to do this without being connected with the State.

In this country, for instance, the Church's teaching and influence are being more and more distinguished from the teaching and influence of the so-called dissenting religious bodies by this very characteristic. No doubt there are certain Puritan and other sectarian influences within and about the Church in this country, which continually tend to set up a barrier between the religious and the secular spheres in human life and duty, which distinction is further emphasized by the monkish or ascetic influence which reaches the Church from another quarter; but in spite of the perturbations caused by a factitious monkishness on the one hand, and Puritanism on the other, the characteristic influence of the Church in this country has been, and continues in increasing measure to be, precisely that which the Cambridge men desire. It is the distinction of the Protestant Episcopal Church that while it has held itself more entirely aloof from political and partisan controversy than any other religious body, it has, nevertheless, done more than any other to carry religion into every sphere of public and private life, and to hallow all the relations that bind men together.

In a recent number of the London Pall Mall Gazette, there is a letter describing the home of the poet Whittier which would be read with some amusement by those who know with what complacency New England scenery, New England character, and, above all, New England culture, are regarded by those favored people who are privileged to live there. The English letter-writer, who, by the way, must have been an exceedingly recent arrival, goes on to speak in terms of such flippant disrespect and mendacity of the soil and productions of Massachusetts that they are excluded from these columns. Then he describes the exterior and interior of the poet's home at Amesbury, and, after speaking of the quaint and friendly greeting which his host extended to him, says that it recalls "the fact that he is not only a New Englander, which means simple living from necessity, but also a Quaker, which means simple living from choice." "Simple living from necessity,"

In New England, is an anachronism now, as anybody knows who knows the New England of to-day. Though there is, no doubt, a good deal of the "plain living" which goes with "high thinking," yet, on the other hand, there is a good deal of high living and plain thinking—living quite as high, and thinking quite as plain as any in Old England itself. Indeed there are few great homes in England that excel many scores of the New England homes that one may see and get admittance to also under proper conditions. But, perhaps, the most grotesque and inexcusable blunder of all is that which goes the length of discrediting the literary "faculty" and even the pronunciation of the denizens of that favored portion of our country. "Mr. Whittier speaks," he says, "as he does everything else, in the New England fashion, familiarly, even carelessly, with a fine democratic indifference to elegance of pronunciation and finished periods." When one remembers the cold, calm height from which Boston and all New England surveys the rest of the world, and the true Hellenic indifference with which all "outer barbarians" are regarded there, one wishes that the foolish chronicler who wrote the above words, might sojourn in Massachusetts long enough to learn how exceedingly ridiculous he has made himself. It is safe to say that if he did not learn it thoroughly in a little while, or escape to some less favored country, he would share the fate of the young man who bore the banner with a strange device, and—be frozen to death.

The attempt that is being made by a certain socialistic labor organization of New York City to "boycott" one of the leading hotels deserves attention. It seems that the proprietors of the hotel, in the exercise of what has hitherto been considered one of the "inalienable rights" of American freemen, employed some other American freemen to do some work about their premises. These workmen did not belong to the "Painter's Labor Union." The consequence was that a quarrel arose between the said proprietors and the said Painters' Labor Union; and an order was issued to boycott the hotel and everyone who stopped there. Public men, and men of business prominence, who stop at the hotel are notified by a letter that they must leave at once, and cease to give the hotel their patronage. If they wish to save their business and political future, in case of a refusal to obey, it is claimed that the Labor Union and its affiliations are sufficiently powerful to inflict social, commercial, or political ruin on those who are recalcitrant. It is not necessary to discuss the truth of this claim. No doubt, as things now are, an organized and dangerous effort could be made to defeat, to injure, or to annoy anyone who should become obnoxious to the ill will of this labor organization; and the arrogant attempt to enforce their will by such means brings clearly to view the intolerable tyranny which such bodies intend to exercise, if they are allowed to have their way. The grave danger to which our civilization is exposed by such savagery has already been pointed out in these columns. If it be true that a man may not stop at any licensed place of entertainment that he may choose in this free land, without being imperilled by a secret organization that, for some reason with which he has nothing to do, forbids him, then this is a free land no longer. To say nothing of the original dispute with the painters, this attempt to boycott the travelling public is simply a monstrous assumption of arrogant tyranny; and, in so far as it operates to curtail the liberty, or to injure the property or happiness of any individual, being done as it is, not only without due process of law, but in defiance of the whole spirit of the law, it amounts to a despotism more odious than any that our people have ever denounced or resisted. It is pleasant to be assured that, as a rule, the guests of the hotel in question have refused to be intimidated by such means. This, however, is not enough. The public must be aroused to put down such attempts at intimidation. There is no sort of difference, morally, between "dynamitism" and this kind of boycotting. The one is just as savage, ruthless, barbarous as the other. The one assails life. The other assails liberty, which is as dear as life. One of the most disheartening things about the whole matter is the timorous way in which the daily press treats it. Let a free and independent press not be afraid to speak out and help to secure additional legislation which shall make an attempt to boycott a statutory offense, to be severely punished. Unless it can be repressed, public liberties will be overturned and private liberties placed at the mercy of a proletarian despotism as ruthless as it is barbarous and reactionary.

It now seems that Lord Salisbury has resolved to keep the existing ministry together for the present, to face the new House of Commons, and offer to carry on the government. Whether he hopes to do this with the help of the Parnellites, or by means of a coalition with the more moderate and conservative members of the Liberal party, cannot now be said, though there is, no doubt, a strong disposition among the Tories to effect the latter arrangement. At a cabinet meeting of the other day, it is said that the draft of a scheme for local government in all sections of the kingdom alike, was discussed, the object being to grant nothing to Ireland that shall not be balanced by like concessions to England and Scotland. In this way it is hoped that the homogeneity of the United Kingdom may be enhanced, and the union preserved. On the other hand, there are not wanting evidences of a disposition among the Parnellites to look rather to Mr. Gladstone than to Lord Salisbury for the realization of their hopes and purposes. To overtures from such a quarter it is supposed that the Liberal leader would not be indifferent, since he has evinced a rather unexpected desire to return to power. It is quite likely that the question will turn mostly on the ability or inability of Mr. Gladstone to carry a sufficient number of the Liberal party into an alliance with the Home Rulers. It is at least possible that an attempt to do this as things now are would precipitate just such a coalition with the moderate Liberals as Lord Salisbury is supposed to desire, with the immense advantage that Mr. Gladstone would be out of the case.

Lord Tennyson has come out in a new role—as the defender of the Established Church. Whether making him a peer of the realm has heightened his love for "Church and King," or the growing wisdom of advancing years has given him a more devout and conservative temper, certain it is that his attitude in such matters is rather different from what it was when he stood bravely by Frederick Denison Maurice in the days when so to do meant something like both heresy and nonconformity. Now, however, the Poet Laureate is reported to have written a letter, in which he says that "disestablishment and disendowment would be a prelude to the downfall of much that is greatest and best in England. There are, doubtless, abuses in the Church, but they can be remedied." Then the laureate goes on to point out that even the American Constitution is more conservative in its provisions against organic changes than some of the plans which English politicians are now proposing. It must be confessed that there is force in his reference to the fifth article of our constitution, though it proves too much for his purpose. Here no change can be made in the organic law of the land without the consent of three-fourths of the States of the Union. In England there are no constituent States or local governments to ask for or ratify any change; and in the case in question the object of the Home Rulers and others is to secure such local governments. It is obvious that the erection of constituent States or local governments must first be done by Parliament, if the system of "checks and balances," which Lord Tennyson admires in our government, is to be imitated at all; and it is against the decentralization that he is protesting. Given a local government in Ireland, Scotland, England, Wales, and no doubt the Irish would quite agree with the laureate in all that he says of the need of a "conservative restrictive provision" like ours, as "a safeguard against ignorant and reckless theories."

A problem in the administration of the forces that are at work in Christian development, is to secure an equal distribution of them all. In certain quarters the Church is simply a lecture platform for the delivery of sermons. A weekly hearing of Christian discussion is about the extent of the influence. There is no work done; the activities and sympathies are not called out. This is one extreme, and the other is often seen in some of our most earnest parishes, where an excess of benevolent labor allows no leisure for mental or spiritual growth. Family devotion is too often out of the question, even private prayer is hurried and broken in upon by the distraction which the burden of an excessive Church work brings into the mind. A great error this, to avoid the dreaminess of the mystic by running into the rush of a life that resembles the hurry of the railroad and the market. Those who have led in the labors of the past have been persons who claimed for themselves time in which to refresh their souls in the presence of God. Even He who was intensely active, even to physical weariness in His efforts to reach and save all classes, retired at times into mountain retreats where He was in prayer alone. The spiritual life needs this quickening from above. We cannot sustain the labors of an aggressive Christianity without the direct and life-giving power of the blessed spirit, exerted in a season of holy quiet upon the soul as it waits devoutly on God.

THE MISSION IN NEW YORK.

In our Church life and work in New York, the Mission just ended has been a noteworthy event. I have been asked to speak of its results; but, except in a very limited way, this is not easy to do. A Mission aims supremely at spiritual results, and these cannot be tabulated and set down in figures. Such a work sets in motion forces destined to act through long reaches of time, and to issue in effects which may be remote and which must be largely unseen. To attempt to gather up the results of the Mission, and to write the story of its influence would, now, at any rate, be premature, if it would not at any time be presumptuous.

But while this is true, there is much remaining of which one may safely speak—safely and helpfully. For undoubtedly the introduction of an agency so unfamiliar, and of methods so distrusted, if not widely disapproved, has awakened apprehension in many earnest and honest minds, and in others something more. Is the Mission a confession of failure, so far as the past of the Church is concerned? Are its distinctive features only those weapons of other Christian bodies, which, having long disclaimed or denounced them, we are now compelled to borrow? This is courteously but explicitly intimated in some quarters, and reluctantly intimated in others.

I. It is not true, however; and it needs that some one should distinctly say so. The features in a Mission, that differentiate it from the ordinary methods of that which is most widely known as Revivalism, are conspicuous and fundamental. Let me name some of them:

(a). The Mission is simply an enlargement or expansion of ideas that are inherent in the Christian year. Ours in New York, like many others, was held in Advent season. The key-note of that season is struck in the words of St. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, appointed as the Epistle for the First Sunday in Advent, "Knowing the time that it is high time to awake out of sleep." Advent is the time when, with us, men are bidden to bestir themselves, to shake off the lethargy of indifference, and to remember that Christ is coming to judgment. "All that is included in a Mission—preaching, personal urgency, confession of sin, communion with God in the blessed sacrament of His son—all these are included in the idea of Advent season, and it is the office of a Mission to take that outline which we have in the Advent Collects and Hymns and Scriptures, and to fill it out and fill it up. Nobody says "Go to! let us have a revival;" but the order of our Church life brings to us the call, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light!" and that cry the missionary simply takes up and repeats, and presses home with strenuous urgency and plainness.

Plainly enough, all this is impossible where there is no Church year. Christmas trees and Easter flowers do not make a Church year, any more than a "protracted meeting" makes a Mission. The one obeys an order which goes above individual taste, and inclination, and impulse; the other does not.

(b). Again, it is the characteristic of a Mission that it knows nothing of a divorce of the Word and Sacraments. From first to last, the Breaking of Bread and prayer, the sermon and the Eucharist, the Table of the Lord and the teaching and guidance of the pulpit and the closet, go together. If the frequent celebrations had vanished out of our Mission services, I do not hesitate to say that to numbers least liable to the charge of exaggeration, their chief blessedness would have been absent. And in dealing with individuals, the first question that is asked is not, "how do you feel?" but "to what are you pledged? Have you been signed in baptism with the sign that seals you to the service of God? Whose are you, even though you have forgotten it, and to whom do you owe allegiance? Have you confessed Christ in the sacrament, which He has appointed to that end, for if not, then 'arise and be baptized, calling on the name of the Lord.'" Let it be observed that I am not now undertaking to say whether this way is better than any other way; I am simply stating that which has been distinctive of our way. Nobody will pretend that it is the way of those Christians who bear other names and for whom I hope I need not say I have the heartiest respect) who conduct what are called "Revolutions."

(c) Yet again,—and here I am constrained to speak plainly, there has been in our Mission no faintest approach to the grave error which has stained the whole so-called revival system through and through, and which teaches, or implies, that when a man has experienced a spasm of feeling, he has "got religion." God forbid that I should seem to disparage deep feeling, or deny its place in the tremendous struggle through which, sometimes, one turns from darkness to light. If I did so, I should forget lessons and memories which are at the very foundation of my own spiritual history. But it can never be forgotten that the evils of mistaking quickened emotions for the deliberate action of the conscience and the will, are to be seen in lives that are like extinct volcanic craters, all over the land. The art—my brethren of other communions must forgive me if, in imputing it, I seem to any one to say that which strains the law of charity, but I know, not from hearsay, but of personal knowledge, whereof I affirm—the art which, in cold blood, with simulated fervor and by carefully concerted means, stirs the sluggish pulses, fills the air with the subtle current of emotional excitement, and on the flood-tide of a contagious enthusiasm sweeps a motley throng into the Christian fellowship to be hailed as having attained the end of religion in a "change of heart" when they have scarcely made a beginning at the alphabet of Christian discipleship, of all this I am thankful to say the Mission has known nothing.

There are other differences which those who have seen a Mission will readily recall, and I need not rehearse them. But those which I have enumerated are sufficient to indicate that, whatever a mission may be, it is not a tardy adoption of weapons which others have used, and which some of them have learned to distrust.

II. On the other hand, while the results of the Mission are not easily ascertained, its leading features are readily recognizable, and are of abundant significance.

1. And as the first of these I would say that, though few people know it, the Mission began a year ago. At that time a small band of clergymen resolved to meet together once a month, or oftener, for a celebration of the Holy Communion at an early hour, an informal devotional meeting, and a subsequent business meeting. That resolution has, with a brief interval in the summer, been faithfully adhered to. At the start it was recognized that no great spiritual blessing could be expected without earnest effort to open the way for its coming. There have been constant prayer—and work, the two going together and extending to the minutest details. As I have had little or no part in them, I may speak of this painstaking forethought and preparation as one of the remarkable features of the Mission. The matter of missionaries, of letters of invitation, of provision for the musical services, of advertisements, of personal visitation beforehand, from house to house, of services for classes, men, women, children, working people, students, those who have drifted away from church-going habits, and details of a similar character manifold in kind and aim, have in each case been committed to a special sub-committee reporting regularly and availing itself of every practicable aid. And, side by side with these, have gone devotional meetings which, it is not too much to say, have left their indelible mark on those who have been privileged to share in them. If credit for what has been accomplished by the Mission is anywhere especially due it is, under God, first to the committee which prepared the way for it.

2. Next to this, a conspicuous feature of the Mission has been its absence of excitement. "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength." It was written long ago; and it has proved so. There has been no attempt to reach results by mere furore, and some of the most remarkable results have been those in which there has been the most noticeable absence of oratorical or emotional fervor or strenuous appeal. But there has been clear and faithful teaching, a remarkable degree of plain speaking about things that are usually lightly touched upon or left unnoticed, and a calm, deliberate, and determined endeavor to press home the truth upon the personal conscience. The facts of life as they are, the sins of to-day, the indifference and unbelief of to-day, these have been frankly and unreservedly dealt with. In a word, there has been great and unwonted fidelity of teaching, warning, and reproof, with all long-suffering, (patiently) and (with) doctrine, there being a constant reference to the mind of the Spirit as revealed in Holy Scripture. And this has been done, without noise or clamor.

3. Another feature of the mission has been its informal and personal approach to individuals. The after-meetings have been distinct from the services for the general congregation, and the personal counsels and interviews which have followed these have enabled many, who under ordinary circumstances, would never have done so, to open their griefs and shames to God's minister, for his needed word to each separate enquirer or penitent. Of the benefits of this, the testimonies are singularly and unexpectedly abundant and gratifying.

4. Still another feature of the Mission has been its success in reaching the "lapsed,"—the baptized and confirmed who had drifted away from all habits of religious living. In this connection, perhaps, more than in any other, its fruits have surprised those concerned in it. Instances of every variety, and of most affecting character, have been brought by the clergy to my own notice, of those who, after long years of neglect of prayer, and of every religious privilege, issuing in an utterly godless and often grievously sinful life, have been awakened and recalled. There is no work harder or more rarely successful than this. Ordinary means fail to reach such cases, and those who know most of the subject will own that they have been tried in vain. What ordinary means have failed to do, the Mission has accomplished in a signal degree and with blessed results.

5. Again: The Mission has illustrated the value of informal methods, and has gone far to win for them a recognized place. The importance of this can hardly be overestimated. Almost everybody was ready to admit that the ordinary Prayer Book services did not meet the need of exigencies, nor suffice to grapple with individuals in a direct and efficient way. Liturgical services imply a previous education, often wanting, and oftener inadequate. Between the masses, careless, irreligious, without devout habits or churchly training, and the orlerly worship of the Church as set forth for use in organized parishes, something was needed to mediate. The Mission has shown what that is. It has not disesteemed the various offices of the Prayer Book, it has at once supplemented them, and led up to them. Greater freedom in prayers, hymns and other details, has brought home to many what something more formal would have failed to impress upon them. There has been nothing to cause alarm, nothing of the nature of reckless license; but much that was simple, personal and direct. And this larger liberty has, I am thankful to believe, come to stay.

6. Once more the Mission has demonstrated two things: the power of the Church to reach men, and the value of trained missionaries as preachers. No such spectacle as has been presented in Trinity church for the last three weeks has been seen since the diocese came into existence. No such congregations have been gathered, whether here or elsewhere under any such circumstances in all the past history of the Church in this land. If the Mission had done nothing else, it has in this done enough to vindicate its right to be trusted and prized by all those who desire to see the religion of Jesus Christ a living power in this age.

7. Finally, the Mission has deepened the faith of all who have had to do with it in the Mission and power of God the Holy Ghost. We have seen the tokens of His presence, and we have gained a new conviction of the reality of His influence and work. Out of vagueness, and doubt, and coldness, there have come a definite understanding of His office, a clear perception of His operations, and a glowing sense of His gifts. And this, surely, is the best result of all. We have waited for the promise, and it has been fulfilled to us.

I have no prophecies for the future; but the past, at least, is secure. This much, however, I may repeat, the Mission has come to stay. The committee of thirty has organized itself, within the past few days, into a "Parochial Missions Society." We recognize the duty, growing out of our experience, to our brethren in other cities, and we shall endeavor as we are enabled, to discharge it. Our gains are far from being all that we could have wished, or all that some of us hoped. We have not been as greatly successful in reaching those outside of all ordinary religious influences as some had hoped. But we have taken the first step toward going forth to them with larger success, in kindling the hearts of our own people. Never before had the Church in New York so many of her sons and daughters of all ranks and classes ready to spend themselves in the Master's service. Be it true, that we have only "the five loaves and two small fishes," and that faithfulness still demands, "What are they among so many?" The miracles of God are not ended. He will bless and dispense our store, and the willing gift of themselves by His people will prove, we believe, in His hands the sufficiency which shall gather and feed the multitude.

HENRY C. POTTER.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.—The Bishop of Winchester (Dr. Harold Browne), owing to an attack, has been ordered by his physician to abstain from all work requiring any thought, for three months. In most respects the bishop's health is good, but a severe hemorrhage which the physician said was due entirely to overpressure of brain work, caused the order to be issued.

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER ON THE CHURCH'S ESCAPE.—Addressing a meeting at Rochester, on Tuesday, December 1, Bishop Thorold said the Church had been in a little trouble, but had got out of it again as most people who knew anything about the Church were convinced that she would do. At the present time she had a great deal to be thankful for to those who had not been showing themselves as friendly to her of late as they might have been, either to her privileges or endowments. He believed that many people who had determined that she should be destroyed (and there were many people who were willing to lay hands on her if she was not able to take care of herself), would now be glad to take their hands away, and it would be some time before they laid them on again.

DEATH OF DEAN HOWSON.—The death is reported from London, on December 15, of the Very Rev. John Saul Howson, D.D., Dean of Chester.

Dean Howson was born in 1816, and was graduated with the highest honors from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1837. He was ordained deacon in 1845 and priest in 1846. He was Principal of the Liverpool College for sixteen years, and then became Vicar of Wisbeach and examining chaplain to the Bishop of Ely. In 1867 he was appointed Dean of Chester.

Dean Howson is well known by his writings, but the work by which he is best known in this country is "The Life and Epistles of St. Paul," which he wrote in conjunction with the late Dr. W. J. Conybeare. Dr. Howson was, however, the real author. Dr. Conybeare furnishing the translations.

SCOTLAND.

EPISCOPALIANS IN SCOTLAND.—The Bishop of St. Andrews (Dr. Charles Wordsworth), writing to the Edinburgh Courant in reply to the statement in a pamphlet on "The Scottish Church Question," that the Episcopalians are chiefly not of Scotch birth or descent, states that he wrote to all his clergy for information on the subject, and received returns from them which he gives. These are too lengthy to quote, but in only one place, Glamis, is the number of Scottish and non-Scottish Churchmen equal. In all the other places in the diocese the preponderance of Churchmen of Scottish birth and descent is overwhelming—in some places fifty to one, in some thirty to one—in some all are Scotch. In the northern dioceses the bishop says the preponderance is still greater. In the southern dioceses, it may be, he says, the other way. But the general result will show that the great majority of Episcopalians in Scotland are not only of Scottish birth, but also of Scottish descent.

IRELAND.

HEALTH OF THE PRIMATE.—There have been disquieting rumors as to the health of the Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of All Ireland. He has been reported as seriously ill, but the last issue of the Irish Ecclesiastical Gazette that reaches us says that on December 5 he was much better. Archbishop Beresford was consecrated in 1854 and except Bishop Knox of Down, Connor and Dromore (who was consecrated in 1849), is the oldest of the Irish bishops. He is advanced in years, also, and as at his age any serious illness is dangerous, his condition excites apprehension.

FRANCE.

THE AUTHORITIES AND THE CLERGY.—M. Goblet, the Minister of Public Worship, has addressed a letter to the Bishop of Pamiers, in which he tells him that the clergy of his diocese had exceeded all bounds in their advocacy of candidates hostile to Republican institutions during the recent elections. The minister makes the bishop and his advisers responsible for the mot d'ordres, which he attributes to them as the cause of such conduct, though he admits it may have been carried further than they intended. But such acts, he says, call for immediate repression, to be proportioned and continued according to the gravity of the offence and the repentance exhibited. Consequently he informs the bishop that, from December 1, the salaries or pensions of all the priests of his diocese who have so compromised themselves, will be stopped.

The bishop, in reply, tells the minister that his clergy have, in fact, not been able to look on with indifference, as citizens, at the elections; but that they have in no respect interfered in them in their sacerdotal character. In a letter to his clergy, also communicated to the minister, and to be read from the pulpits without comment, the bishop informs them of the measure taken by the Government, and invites their congregations to supply, if able, the salaries which are suppressed. But if a cure finds he cannot live in his parish, he is authorized to withdraw either into a neighboring parish which may be willing to maintain him, or into an asylum, or any other place where he may be able to procure for himself an honorable subsistence.

The pope has sent a formal protest against this action of M. Goblet, but the minister has been sustained by the national assembly.

CHINA.

CONVERSION OF A PRINCESS.—The Rock says: "It is reported that a Chinese princess has been converted to Christianity. The lady's name is the Princess Kung, and she has burned her Buddhist books."

TURKEY.

AN ANCIENT CHURCH.—A "Church in the Catacombs," a church, that is, of very early date, hitherto unknown, has been discovered at Constantinople beneath a mosque. The walls still show religious designs, among them pictures of our Lord, His Mother, and the Baptist.—Church Bells.

MAINE.

NORTH EAST HARBOR—St. Mary's Chapel.—Work upon St. Mary's chapel is now finished, except the making of the seats, which will be done at leisure during the winter. The new part is shut off from the old by a partition, which will be taken down in the spring. The addition is harmonious with the rest of the building. The services are hearty and well attended, and the people show great interest.—The North East.

RHODE ISLAND.

APRONAGO—St. Barnabas's Church.—This church (the Rev. Percy Barnes, rector) for a better life is freed in oils, giving it a truly churchly appearance. A new dossal has been placed behind the altar, and a large brass lamp, surmounted with nine candles, in groups of three, hung in the chancel arch. During the past year, these improvements, as well as painting the exterior, and placing a bell in the tower, have proved that the hard times, from which this village has suffered greatly, have not diminished or restrained the zeal of the workers in the parish.

CONNECTICUT.

NEW HAVEN—Church Choral Association.—A Church Choral Association has been organized in this city with the following officers: The Rev. E. W. Babcock, president; the Rev. Elliot Morse, treasurer; Mr. J. J. Matthews, secretary. The directors are the Rev. E. W. Babcock, Dr. W. D. Anderson, and Messrs. A. H. Robertson and N. G. Osborn. Until a leader is chosen the association will rehearse under the direction of Mr. Hedden, organist of Trinity church. Seventy five persons are expected to participate in the first rehearsal. The rehearsals will be in the parish building of Trinity church.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Close of Mid-day Services at Trinity.—The series of mid-day services that have been conducted in Trinity church since November 28 by the Rev. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, were closed on Friday, December 18. Every day, whatever the weather may have been, the church has been filled with business men from the neighborhood, and the doors have been closed as the clock chimed the first quarter after noon, on a congregation that filled not only the pews, but also the choir and the aisles. Every one on the last day seemed deeply to regret that these mission services had come to a close. They were extended for a week beyond the prescribed time, at the unanimous request of those attending.

Before his closing address Mr. Aitken read portions of a letter that he had received from a man who had been attending the mission services. The writer said that he had sent the communication in hope that the missioner would appeal to the merchants of New York to desist from spreading pitfalls at the feet of young men in their employ. The letter gave an account of some of these, that were part of the regular duty of some of the most promising of the employes of mercantile houses, and lay in the style of entertainment those young men were expected to give to customers from other places visiting New York.

The missioner with tears besought the business men before him to remove all temptation from the young. The large congregation of mercantile men was visibly affected. He implored them not to let the lessons of social and business purity he had endeavored to inculcate in his course of sermons pass away from them. He spoke with pleasure of the cordial treatment he has received from numbers of business men during the meetings. He had scarcely seen anything like it in the course of a long ministerial experience. He very much regretted that the time had come to separate, but he should go away with a heavy heart if he thought that his efforts were not going to have some effect in bettering the business life of New York. It had been very gratifying to him that so many hundred busy men made time in the middle of the day to drop mercantile affairs, and pay some attention to the claims of a higher life. In conclusion he impressed upon his hearers the futility of the mere unaided will of man in striving for a better life.

The assistant-bishop spoke of the great blessing that Mr. Aitken's noon-day services had been to the business men of New York, and of his personal regret that the time had come to discontinue them. As a mark of esteem for his conduct and of sympathy with the Church of England Parochial Mission Society, with which he was connected, the assistant-bishop suggested that all present contribute liberally to a collection which was then made for that society's benefit. A large offering was the result, the bishop saying that any who wished to contribute further might send contributions to Mr. R. Fulton Cutting, at the Mutual Life Building, in Nassau street.

The assistant-bishop then closed the mid-day services, and the series of mission services with the benediction.

NEW YORK—City Mission.—The New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission held its anniversary service in St. Thomas's church (the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan, rector) on the evening of Sunday, December 20. The assistant-bishop presided and the services were conducted by the rector and the Rev. Alexander Mackay Smith. A large congregation was present. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. W. Ward from Joshua vi. 3. It was a strong and earnest setting forth of the work of the City Mission, and appeal for its support. The preacher said that as there is no other city like New York, so there is no other mission exactly like its City Mission. Its field is practically unlimited, its responsibilities greater. Greater still are the responsibilities of Christians who find here in this vast city exceptional advantages for obeying the Master's injunction: "Go ye all into the world and preach the Gospel." New York, from its exceptional situation, needs far more thorough mission work than any other great city. It is the great toll-gatherer of the nation. It is also the heart of the nation sending out the life-blood to the rest of the country as well as receiving it. As has often been proved, it sends out liberally. While remembering the rest of the world it should remember itself and its sufferers, and prevent the great heart of the nation from hardening, by effective and persistent mission work. New York, too, is the great scree against which is thrown the vast masses of immigrants from Europe and the rest of the world. As is the case of all screens, the best passes through the meshes, and the coarsest remains here. Its criminal classes are the coarsest screenings of the earth. These form a class as dangerous as a mass of dynamite, and this class society can not afford to ignore. Christianity alone can save and rule and control this class and convert them into good citizens. For this, if for no other reason, the City Mission should have efficient and continued aid, and all good men should unite to hold up the hands of its workers, and assist them in every way.

The offerings, which were liberal, were appropriated to the work of the City Mission.

MATTEWAN—The Highland Clericus.—At a meeting of several clergy, at the rectory of St. Luke's church, Matteawan, a clericus with this name was organized. It will meet once in six weeks, and the rector of the parish in which the meeting is held will always preside. The object of the association is to call the clergy together for intellectual and spiritual improvement. A committee, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. H. L. Ziegenfuss and Isaac Van Winkle, was appointed, to serve for one year, to prepare a programme for each meeting.

LONG ISLAND.

HUNTINGTON—St. John's Church.—The Rev. Theodore M. Peck was instituted as rector of this parish on Friday, December 11. The Rev. Dr. John C. Middleton acted as institutor, by appointment of the bishop, and the late rector, the Rev. N. Barrows, preached the sermon. The topic of the discourse was the functions of a rector as prophet, priest, and king, in his own parish, and the text was St. Luke xii. 42-48. The offerings were devoted to the creation of a fund for the endowment of the parish. The choir was augmented by choristers from St. Johnland, while the two front seats were filled with crippled girls from the same place, whose sweet voices added greatly to the hymns. There were eight clergy from abroad present. After the service the clergy and the congregation were entertained by the ladies of the parish. Visitors were impressed with the kindness and activity of the people, and the comfort and convenience of the rectory, which has been repaired and beautifully furnished.

The rector has been holding Wednesday evening services during Advent among the Harbor people.

PARKVILLE—St. John's Church.—A considerable improvement of the property of this parish (the Rev. R. B. Snowden, rector) has been made by the erection of a new guild room, sixteen feet by twenty-eight, which has lately been completed, with the church building on the east side. It is intended for the use of the guild and for Sunday-school purposes. The plan is to transfer the seats of the church to this new room, and reseat the church in a uniform and attractive manner. The congregations now so entirely fill the little house of worship that this will be necessary, and further enlargement will be soon demanded. The cost of the guild room has been met in large measure by the liberality of a parishioner, Mrs. Mary A. Tunison.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

SYRACUSE—St. Paul's Cathedral.—At the opening of this church, on Sunday, December 13, the rector, the Rev. H. R. Lockwood, immediately before the sermon, read the following resolutions which the vestry had unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, We believe it to be the desire of the bishop, as it is accordant with our own sense of propriety, that there should be always at his disposal a suitable church edifice in which he may hold at his discretion such services as pertain to his episcopal office; therefore,

"Resolved, That we, the rector, wardens, and vestrymen of St. Paul's Church, Syracuse, do hereby respectfully and cordially tender to the bishop of the diocese the use of St. Paul's church, for all services of an episcopal or otherwise special character which he may desire to hold therein; and that he be asked to consider the propriety of allowing the church to be known as the Cathedral, or the Bishop's Church.

"Resolved, That it is our desire and intention, so soon and so far as it may be practicable, to bring the worship and parochial work of the Church into consonance with the bishop's expressed views and wishes.

"Resolved That he be invited to occupy the pulpit of St. Paul's church whenever it may be convenient to do so, and that pew No. 49 be hereby set apart for the use of his family on all occasions of public worship."

WESTERN NEW YORK.

SCOTTVILLE — Grace Church.—The first church services were held in this place in the winter of 1841-2, by the Rev. Dr. Nathaniel F. Bruce, then employed as a missionary in this part of Western New York. He sowed good seed with a liberal hand, but was called to other fields of labor, and it remained for another generation to revive the work. A number of years later the Rev. Fortune C. Brown occasionally held service at Scottville. During 1873, 1874 and 1875, the Rev. Francis A. Gilliat officiated on Sunday afternoons. The bishop of the diocese held one service in 1874, and for four weeks during that summer some of the clergy held Sunday evening services. Since November 23, 1884, regular services have been maintained in a hall in the village, and the corporation of Grace Church was duly organized on January 18, 1885, the Rev. J. Dudley Ferguson having accepted charge of the work at the beginning of the previous December. It was at once resolved to erect a stone church, complete in every detail. Plans were made by Ellis Brothers of Rochester, and under the personal supervision of Mr. D. S. Brown, chairman of the building committee, the church has been pushed to completion with remarkable rapidity. The local paper in describing it calls it "an architectural gem—a novel and beautiful suburban structure—an example for city churches to follow."

NEW JERSEY.

ELIZABETH—Christ Church.—The bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. H. H. Oberly, rector) on Sunday, December 30. There was an early celebration of the Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M., and Morning Prayer was said at 9. At 10:30 the bishop advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. Thomas F. Milby and Robert G. Osborn. The sermon was preached by the rector; the Rev. Mr. Milby was presented by the Rev. L. H. McKim, and the Rev. Mr. Osborn by the Rev. C. M. Pyle, all of whom joined in the imposition of hands. At the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the bishop was assisted by the rector and the Rev. Mr. Pyle, his assistant. Mr. Milby is doing missionary duty at Flemington, and Mr. Osborn continues as assistant in Christ church, Elizabeth.

At 3 P. M. the bishop, accompanied by the rector, visited St. Paul's chapel, which has been erected within the past three months for the mission school, which had outgrown its hired room, and is rapidly outgrowing its new accommodations. The bishop addressed the school and expressed his gratification at meeting them in their own chapel, which, though small, would be, he hoped, the beginning of a vigorous and independent parish. In the evening the bishop preached, and confirmed twenty-six persons.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Chrysostom's Church.—On Sunday, December 13, this church (the Rev. C. S. Daniel, minister in charge), was reopened, after being closed two weeks for renovation. The walls have been frescoed, the pews painted and re-upholstered, the new windows completed, and the new organ in place. All the repairs were necessary, and did not cost much, the church being small, and St. Chrysostom's is now one of the prettiest churches in the city. The church is supported, month by month, by voluntary contributions. There are no pledges, and the congregation is entirely uncertain where one dollar of the support is to come from. The church ministers to the poor, who bring about $8 per month as offerings. The rest of the support must come from the outside. The outside receipts for November were $109.77.

To give some idea of the work this mission has to do, the following glimpse at the state of the field will not be uninteresting. It is rarely the case that an adult from the community around is seen in the church, the congregation being composed of the youth. A teacher visited a house after Sunday-school and inquired about an absent scholar. She met the father, intoxicated, on the floor, and the mother, in a like condition, almost unable to explain the child's absence. Not long ago, while the minister was administering baptism in a private house, the father stumbled in upon the service, heavily drunk. The next day another father told the minister he had not been to church for seventeen years, except to do work about the building. The children of such families are in the Sunday-school, and all these were unbaptized when the work first began. Two hundred children have been gathered from such homes and taught the Christian religion within five years. Services are held daily at 9 A. M., and on Sundays at 10:30 A. M. and 3 P. M.

The minister lives in a rented house, which is not convenient, is uncomfortable, and cheerless—moreover, he is only suffered to remain because he cannot conveniently go elsewhere; but new quarters must soon be sought. One of the secrets of his success has been the fact that he has been among the people, ready at all hours to go to them. One of his rooms is used exclusively for the storage of goods to be distributed among the poor. An attempt is to be made to build a rectory on the lot owned by the mission next to the church.

A work like this deserves support.

PHILADELPHIA—Charitable Bequests.—The will of the late Mrs. Mary Key Helmuth, which was admitted to probate on December 14, contains, among others, the following bequests: To Nashoth Theological Seminary, $1,000; to the same, to endow "The Dr. William Sheaff Helmuth Professorship," $25,000, and the trustees are instructed to select one of the existing unendowed professorships for this purpose; Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society for the fund for the support of Domestic Missionary Bishops, $1,000; Church Home and Infirmary, Baltimore, Md., $2,000; Church Home for Children, Angola, Pa., $1,000; Mount Calvary church, Baltimore, Md., for the use of the chapel of St. Mary the Virgin, $1,000.

PHILADELPHIA—Gloria Dei Church.—On Sunday morning, December 13, a large congregation was assembled in the Old Swedes' church, the occasion being the seventeenth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. Snyder B. Sines. The text of his anniversary sermon was: "We took sweet counsel together and walked in the house of God as friends." Psalm Iv: 14.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Clement's Church.—Somewhat of a sensation has been created in Church circles in this city by the announcement that the Rev. B. W. Maturin, rector of St. Clement's, and his assistants, belonging to the Society of St. John the Evangelist, had resigned their connection with the parish. It is understood that while the relations between the clergy and people of that parish are of the most cordial character, Father Maturin and the other members of the community think that they have been connected with one parish long enough. The Society of St. John the Evangelist, an English order originally, was formed for mission work, and these priests felt bound to go where their work is more decidedly of that character. People of all shades of Church views regret deeply Father Maturin's decision, and efforts are earnestly made to persuade him to reconsider it.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Paul's Church.—A burnished brass corona has been given to this parish (the Rev. W. M. Barker, rector,) which is both useful and ornamental. The "West-End Club" has greatly increased its usefulness, and the attendance has nearly doubled. The room vacated by the club has been appropriated for the Sewing School for girls.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Andrew's Church.—This parish was organized in 1857 or 1858, the Hon. Caleb Cushing, then Attorney-General, giving a lot for the erection of a church. The project was, however, abandoned afterward, the lot was sold, and the equivalent of the gift bestowed on another parish. The Rev. W. A. Harris for several years acted as missionary and then was made rector. In 1879 a large number of families simultaneously joined the parish giving it new life and energy. Since that the growth of the parish has been remarkable. Lots were at once obtained, and a chapel, costing $9,000, was erected. The Rev. J. B. Perry was elected rector, and the Rev. Mr. Harris, at an advanced age, became rector emeritus.

Since 1879 an addition has been made to the chapel, costing $8,000, and the seating capacity increased to 640. The one hundred communicants of 1879 has increased to nearly four hundred. On one Easter, the offerings amounted to $4,400.

BALTIMORE—Grace Church.—This parish (the Rev. C. B. Brewster, rector,) one of the strongest in this city, raises annually from $12,000 to $15,000, and is thoroughly equipped. The situation is central, and its church property worth fully $180,000, well insured. The parish contributes to missions between $2,000 and $3,000, annually. The Communion alone alone are over $1,000.

BALTIMORE—St. Mark's Church.—As Easter Day and St. Mark's Day will coincide this year, it has been suggested that the parishes in this city shall make the day one for special effort to aid this parish (the Rev. G. F. Plummer, rector,) in its present attempt to secure sufficient funds for a rectory. The parish is poor, being situated in an unfashionable quarter of the city, and had the rector a proper and conveniently situated residence, one of the greatest drawbacks to the growth and prosperity of the parish would be removed.

St. Mark's Guild, now numbering forty male members, is to have a series of free lectures by clergymen and laymen of this city, during the winter. The rector has been holding special services, and giving special sermons on the Evidences of the Faith, during Advent. The Sunday-school is one of the largest in the city, having five hundred pupils. The contributions last year amounted to $3,000.

ROCK CREEK PARISH—Church of the Hallowed Name.—Owing to the recent growth of the city of Washington in the direction of old Rock Creek parish, situated north of the city, it has been for some time evident that provision, beyond the ability of the parish, should be made for present wants, and to enable the parish to improve the opportunities and meet the responsibilities this growth of the city will bring with it. Recently by the help of friends a beautiful and substantial stone chapel has been built at Mount Pleasant, and called the Church of the Hallowed Name. It has been furnished, excepting the chancel, by the people. The chancel is being carefully and richly furnished by a parishioner of the Church of the Epiphany, who has also given a fine silver communion service, and a handsome stone font. The vestry of the parish has assumed the interest on the debt ($190), and appropriated one-half of the salary of the assistant who is to have charge of the work at this place. The congregation has assumed the payment of the balance. The Rev. John B. Gray, of St. Mary's, St. Mary's County, has been invited to become the assistant in charge, and is expected to enter upon his duties on Christmas Day.

The rector (the Rev. James A. Buck) and the vestry have asked the assistance of the wealthier city parishes in developing the work of the parish. In response to this request a committee was appointed at a meeting of the district clergy, as has already been mentioned. There are at least three places that should receive attention, and it is hoped they will receive it at an early day. At one of these a desirable piece of ground has been offered for the erection of a chapel.

This is the oldest parish in the District of Columbia, having been organized about one hundred and fifty years. The old church, built of English brick imported before the Revolution, is one of the old landmarks of this region.

HAGERSTOWN—St. John's Parish.—This parish (the Rev. W. A. Mitchell, rector) has raised for several years past, about $3,000 annually, instead of the smaller amount recently mentioned, and some years has exceeded even this sum. The parish has no wealthy families, and with but five hundred individuals this showing is an encouraging one.

EASTON.

CAMBRIDGE—Adjourned Convention.—The adjourned special convention of the diocese, to elect a successor to the late Bishop Lay, met in Cambridge on Wednesday, December 16, under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. T. P. Barber. Seven ballots were taken for bishop, resulting in the choice of the Rev. C. C. Williams, rector of St. Paul's parish, Augusta, Ga.

WEST VIRGINIA.

WHEELING—St. Luke's Church.—An Advent mission was held in St. Luke's church, Wheeling, (the Rev. J. Gibson Gantt, rector), December 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. Bishop Peterkin and the Rev. Messrs. W. W. Walker, Robert A. Gibson, C. J. Hammond, R. G. Noland and R. E. Swope were in attendance. The services and addresses were hearty and earnest, the congregations excellent and profoundly impressed.

The rector at the Thursday evening services had his Sunday-school out in full force. After a few words of instruction, they listened attentively to a most happy address by the bishop.

The clergy in attendance, with the bishop as chairman, and the Rev. Mr. Hammond as secretary, decided to have monthly meetings hereafter of a like character, the first of these meetings to be held at Wellburg January 7 and 8. This is an important move. It brings the clergy in this extreme end of the diocese together for frequent consultation. The services publicly to be held being of a missionary character, with addresses accordingly, will serve the double purpose of strengthening this portion of the diocese, and, by larger offerings, upholding the hands of the bishop in the general work of the diocese. From the interest manifested much good is anticipated.—South-ern Churchman.

EAST CAROLINA.

WILMINGTON—St. James's Church.—This church (the Rev. W. H. Lewis, rector) was reopened, after extensive repairs, on All Saints' Day. The service of consecration was said by the bishop of the diocese at 7 a. m. and at 11 a. m., when the bishop preached, the vested choir of forty men and boys sang for the first time.

A recess chancel has been added to the church, and handsomely furnished; the organ being on the right, and choir stalls on each side. A transept gives about one hundred and fifty additional sittings, the church now seating nine hundred. The grounds around the church have also been much improved.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

CINCINNATI—St. Paul's Church.—The Bishop of Indiana is filling a few appointments in Southern Ohio, in the absence of the bishop of the diocese. On Wednesday evening, December 9, he visited this parish (the Rev. Dr. Samuel Benedict, rector), and held a confirmation. Three of the candidates were deaf mutes, baptized by the Rev. A. W. Mann, who was present and interpreted the service.

INDIANA.

INDIANAPOLIS—Deaf Mute Services.—The Rev. A. W. Mann held services on Sunday, December 6, two at the State school, and one at Christ church. At the latter service, Mr. Mann baptized an adult deaf mute.

MINNESOTA.

FARIBAULT—Cathedral.—The Cathedral of Our Merciful Saviour has just been presented with an oaken Litany-desk, beautifully inlaid with Spanish cedar. It is a memorial of C. M. Millsbaugh, who was for thirteen years a vestryman. It was given by his son in Omaha, Neb., who was confirmed, ordered deacon, and ordained priest, by the Bishop of Minnesota.

CALIFORNIA.

SAN DIEGO—St. Paul's Mission.—The name of this mission was changed by the last Diocesan Convention from Holy Trinity to St. Paul's. This place is becoming more and more a resort and home for invalids, especially for those suffering from pulmonary troubles. Instead of the small building now used for worship, a new church is badly needed to accommodate the growing congregations. The president of the Women's Guild has sent out an appeal to her sisters in the Church asking for gifts of articles to be sold at a bazaar to be held in February next. Since some have expressed themselves unable to send anything so soon after the holidays, the date of the bazaar has been changed to the end of that month.

NEWS IN BRIEF.

OUR Mission Work of the Diocese of Albany, the monthly paper, is filled with news and facts.

A VERY fine building, the Orphan's Home, has been dedicated in Albany for St. Peter's church, the Rev. Dr. Battershall, rector.

BISHOP DOANE, during the last nine months, has confirmed 1,135 persons, laid one cornerstone, consecrated four churches, and ordained four priests and four deacons.

IN the Art Interchange of Christmas 17, the Rev. Dr. Satterlee has a Christmas card, "Sleep Holy Babe," and it is prettily illustrated by Mr. Walter Satterlee.

BROOKLYN has a smaller proportion of churches than any city in the United States, and yet its sobriquet is "The City of Churches." Its good name outlives its deserts.

A CRIME of bells as a memorial of the parish to the late Hon. E. R. Mudge is to be procured for St. Stephen's Memorial church, Lynn, Mass., (Rev. Dr. Norton, rector). They will cost $5,250.

IN a parish guild we note that of the eight committees seven are presided over by women, and one by a man. Very much the same proportion was seen at the foot of the Cross and the open grave.

GRACE CHURCH, Decorah, Ia., has received a valuable altar cloth from Miss Lowe, of England, and a cross in brass, in memorial of the late G. B. Holton, presented by Mrs. Holton. The church has also been painted and otherwise improved.

A COMMISSION consisting of the Rev. Drs. Harrison and Tucker, and the Rev. Messrs. Fulcher, Houghton, and Whittemore, has been appointed in the Diocese of Albany to prepare a supplemental Hymnal, and to urge the General Convention to authorize its use.

IN St. George's Parish, Schenectady, the Rev. J. P. B. Pendleton, rector, two guilds have been formed, St. Mary's for the women of the parish and St. Agnes for the girls from twelve to eighteen. St. Mary's has a membership of eighty and St. Agnes of about twenty.

THE foundations of a stone rectory and parish house has been begun at Warrensburgh, Diocese of Albany. The Rev. C. T. Blanchet is about to take charge of the village academy, in connection with missionary work at Bolton. Mr. Blanchet was formerly a missionary at Japan.

OVER the altar in St. Luke's church, Greenbush, the Rev. E. T. Chapman, rector, hangs "Ruben's Entombment," a copy we presume, the gift of a former parishioner. The church has been improved by a slate roof. The parish has sustained a severe loss in the death of its Senior Warden, J. C. Gould.

L'AVENIR, the French Church paper of Philadelphia, edited by Rev. C. Miel, D.D., tells us that in England the proportion of marriages among the Romanists being in 1882 4.5 per cent., shows a decrease in the numbers of that community, while those in the Anglican Church, 83.4 per cent., show a large increase.

BISHOP WHIFFLE is out in an earnest appeal in behalf of the Chippeway Indians against the attempt on the part of white people to steal their lands. He says, "All the talk about the danger from Indian massacre by pine rings is dust to blind the eyes of Christian men to robbery."

THE Advocate is the name of a monthly paper published by the Guild of the Church of the Reformation, Brooklyn (Rev. Jolu G. Bacchus, rector). The parish is now nineteen years old, and Mr. James S. Starns, the efficient superintendent of the Sunday-School, is the only member who represents the original vestry.

It is probable that at the next convention of the Diocese of Long Island a dean will be appointed for Garden City Cathedral, who will be the first dean, the Rev. Dr. Drown having been dean only by courtesy. It ought to be known as a matter of justice that Judge Hillton has never nominated a dean, nor intimated any desire to do so.

The fifth annual report of the treasurer of the Western New York branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, to the Board of Missions, shows receipts of $623.35. Delegates from all the parishes meet annually. The money report acknowledges $3,104.69, and the valuation of the boxes represent $5,083.00, making as the year's work a total of $8,187.69.

THE Rev. Dr. Leighton Parks of Emmanuel church, Boston, recently delivered a strong sermon on "The Pew System" which was largely reported in the secular papers, the Rev. W. C. Winslow, Secretary of the Free Church Association, sent to the same source an answer to the sermon. That is what is needed—quiet, thorough discussion and facts. The truth need never fear.

THE "Presentation in the Temple," is the subject of a memorial window placed in St. Paul's church, Evansville, Ind., Rev. Charles Morris, rector, by Miss C. S. Rathbone, as a memorial to her father and mother. It is executed by Charles Booth, of this city. The canopy and base are treated in the floriated gothic style, and the window is an unusually fine specimen of stained glass work.

THE Missionary Society for Seaman, of this city, has begun work in Brooklyn, which is really in this regard but a part of the port of New York. Funds will be needed for this aggressive work, and Bishop Littlejohn has made a strong appeal to his diocese for aid to the society. It is really general work, and should be supported by general contributions of the two cities.

ST. JAMES'S church, Cambridge, Mass., has purchased "the corner lot" adjacent to the church and parish house. Some day it hopes to see a new church upon it, but at present its aim is to lift the $3,000 mortgage which its necessities compelled it to give. In the mean time the chapel belonging to the parish has acquired a new and eligible lot, and it is none the worse because now there is no annex of a mortgage to it.

THE president of Trinity College has taken possession of the new President's House, and he and Mrs. Smith gave a large reception on the occasion. The house was filled with the elite of Hartford. It was the more enjoyable from the consciousness of the fact that for the sake of the college Dr. Smith had just declined a bishopric, and there was an entente cordiale among all citizens, ladies and gentlemen, students and clergy, to do him honor.

THE (Roman) Catholic Review, of this city, claims increased representation in the Board of Trustees of the House of Refuge on the ground that "more than one-half the children in the House of Refuge are (Roman) Catholic." That Church, instead of caring for its own poor, puts them upon the public for support, and then, contrary to the maxim of the law, takes advantage of its own wrong-doing. Heretofore it has quite bristled up when the truth has been told that the majority of those found in our charitable and criminal institutions belonged to its communion.

REV. DR. JOHN HALL (Presbyterian) of this city, puts the date of the Apostles' Creed some where about four centuries after the faith of the Church was definitely settled in the Nicene symbol, and dates the existence of the Athanasian Creed after the year 1000. Dr. Schaff says the earlier form of the Apostles' Creed goes back to the third, and possibly to the second century. The descent into Hell he places not later than 300, and the Athanasian Creed as early as 570. Dr. Schaff had studied the subject and Dr. Hall clearly had not. He is an admirable preacher, but no historian.

A VENERABLE lady in the Diocese of Maryland, far past her three-score-years-and-ten, writes an urgent and pathetic appeal for those widows, often with children, who are suddenly deprived by the death of husbands of the means of support. They have been often delicately nurtured and are the more helpless and appalled at the burden unexpectedly thrown upon them. Why, she asks, could not some society be organized in their behalf who could assist them with needed advice or could give or loan them funds that would save them from anguish and suffering? The Hindus burned their widows upon the funeral pyre. Was that death more cruel than the starvation which our civilization metes out to them? We wish men of wealth might think of it.

DEBTS are invisible, like sewer-gas, but none the less destructive. The first thing to do with an invisible foe is to make him reveal himself and stand in open sight. Then it is a pleasure to attack him. St. James's church, Cambridge, Mass., has devised a new way of making a debt apparent. A chart hangs upon the walls of the parish house, on which the lot recently purchased, about 13,000 square feet, is represented divided into 7,000 blocks, corresponding to the cost of the property, $7,000. Of these blocks 4,000 had been crossed off because paid for, and just now 103 more blocks had just been crossed off by means of a ladies entertainment. Everybody at a glance can see the progress that is making, and anyone is at liberty to take one or more blocks under their special protection. The chart is a constant appeal.

ST. PAUL'S church, Syracuse, has been enriched with a unique pulpit and chancel rail. The pulpit is upon a novel plan, being the intersection of a circle upon a square base. The former portion is of panelled brass work, with five mosaic panels holding symbols of the Evangelist, the centre panel being a jewelled cross. The whole pulpit is a very elaborate work, executed by J. & R. Lamb, of this city, and is inscribed, "In Memory of the Old St. Paul's Church, its early Congregation and Choir, Presented by Mrs. C. Tyler Longstreet." The chancel rail, in clustered standards of scrolls of passion flowers entwining a cherub's head in each panel, is the gift also of Mrs. Longstreet. An eagle lectern has been placed in the church by Mrs. Judge Andrews, in memory of some relatives, and a gentleman has given an unusually large altar cross. These fittings are from special designs made by Chas. R. Lamb.

SINCE the establishment of crochets in London the mortality among children has been lessened by one-half. The Way-Side Nursery, of this city, 216 East Twentieth Street, is a croche, and deservedly appeals to the liberality of our people. It is managed by some of the most intelligent and devoted ladies of the city, and it should be not only sustained with liberality, but its means of usefulness should be greatly enlarged. Last year it had the names of ninety children on its books—the number of applications was one hundred and forty. It is institutions like these, more than the profession of faith, that is the proof of our Christianity, for without them faith is dead. The nursery depends on subscriptions and donations, and its treasury should be always overflowing full. It gives as freely as it receives. We notice among the patronesses the names of Mrs. Astor, Mrs. Pierpont Morgan, Mrs. Dickey, Mrs. Frank K. Stargis, Mrs. Chas. A. Peabody, Miss Kean, and others, and on the Executive Committee, Mrs. N. A. Prentiss, Mrs. J. Blake White, Mrs. Pierpont Edwards, Mrs. Adrian Iselin, Jr., Mrs. Hamilton Fish, Jr., Mrs. Geo. Wm. Douglas, and others with equally honored names. The matron is Mrs. Walcot, and Dr. Charles D. Scudder is the consulting physician.

AHT.

THE Corcoran gallery receives a collection of ancient marbles, whole and fragmentary, purchased in Rome by the sculptor Ezekiel.

THE recumbent statue of Ezra Cornell, by Story, has reached Ithaca. It is to be placed in the memorial chapel, beneath which is to be the final resting place of Mr. Cornell.

MISS WHITNEY'S ideal figure, representing the first Norse discoverer of "Vineland," will stand on Commonwealth Avenue, Boston. One hand shades the brow and the other is raised above the head. It is of heroic size.

UNWONTED pressure has delayed over-long a review of the late Festival Service of the Trinity Parish Church, which took place in Trinity chapel. Having in mind the cumulative influence of such occasions, it is better worth mentioning that this was the thirteenth annual gathering. The choirs of Trinity, Trinity chapel, St. Paul's, St. John's, and St. Chrysostom's chapel were in attendance—in all nearly one hundred and fifty voices. The programme and musical direction were in the hands of Mr. Walter B. Gilbert, m.a., who has filled his present position for about seven years. Mr. Messiter held the baton. The Processional was Mr. Messiter's stirring setting of the hymn, "Rejoice, ye Pure in Heart." The Tallis Plain Song, with the choral responses, reinforced by the crowded congregation, seemed more devout and exhilarating than ever. Psalm lviii., Exultate Deus, was sung antiphonally to a single Anglican chant. After the Lesson Magnificat was sung to a most impressive anthem-chant arrangement, built upon an ancient tone, which Mr. Gilbert discovered many years ago, while pursuing his favorite antiquarian researches among the manuscripts in the British Museum. It is named "Exon tune," and is dated 1516. The melody is singularly persuasive and touching, and its composer has, with its help, produced the most effective and edifying musical expression of the greenish canticle yet placed within our reach. The Verse Dimittis also shares the arrangement, although it was not sung at the services.

There is a splendid reserve, almost tranquility, in these settings, which, while never tantamount to common-places or mediocrity of sentiment, brings the worshipper face to face with the text, which is of itself more musical than any uninspired strain, and stands out in more wonderful beauty when least adorned with florid and over-wrought musical forms.

The Nicene Creed was sung to Mr. Gilbert's Gregorian setting. After the collects and the hymn, "Love Divine All Love Excelling," to M. Le Jeune's well-known tune, and without any address, the sequence of seven important anthems and motets was delivered by the great choir. The execution was generally exact, in perfect keeping with the school illustrated, and penetrated with an essential religiousness, which by itself differentiates sacred from secular music, places and occasions. The fine trebles were a little subdued by the massing of basses and tenors at the opening angles of the chancel; but the ensemble was admirable, and admirably sustained until the close of Mr. Gilbert's composition, the last of the series.

The selections ranged between the dates 1550-1885, by something approaching centennial stages.

There was first Giovanni Croce, of the polyphonic school of Palestrina, with its divine cadences and mystic interlacing of rapturous phrases and echoes—above all others unworlily and heavenly. Then a vigorous example of the well-matured, Early English by Vaughan Richardson, followed by a grand motet by J. S. Bach, with its pair of searching corales—these latter filling the line of historic illustration. With fine contrast an example from Father Haydn brought us in relation with the Italo-Viennese school; and this gracefully made ready for one of Mendelssohn's inimitable psalm-motets, sung without accompaniment as was the first, and the legitimacy of the descent from this early pure spring of devout inspiration was delightfully plain to the student. After a brilliantly elaborated anthem by Spohr, followed Mr. Gilbert's composition for the occasion, with its text selected from the seventh chapter of the Book of Revelations. Such words, which, by themselves, are like the far-off strains of the Heavenly City, would bring out the highest aspiration of any composer. It is not too much to say that Mr. Gilbert's anthem was neither dwarfed nor minimized in this searching ordeal of non-secular aesthetic judgment. Traits of permanent beauty and types of tonal expression were developed in his bold, masterly and thoroughly devout interpretations of his text that will hold their place securely in the growing repertory of the Church's liturgic worship.

It is exceeding rich in harmonic color, and abounds with lovely strains of voice writing, while the accompaniment is wrought up with the originality and scholarly elaboration of a first-rate organ sonata. It is, fortunately, in print, and will eloquently speak for itself.

Such a programme measures the man severely, not only his quality and culture as an artist, but his religious sensibilities as a Churchman; and in its light Mr. Gilbert stands out as a robust, thorough-going intelligence, broad and catholic in his artistic sympathies, rich in professional learning, while a devout interpreter of the Church's liturgic worship. The visible interest of the great congregation was held firmly to the Recessional, which was the old Greek hymn "The Day is Past and Over," to Dr. Dyke's tune.

It is not far from thirty years ago since Dr. Dix took part in the first Choral Service held in this city or country; at the time a half-surreptitious proceeding, which all "sound conservative Churchmanship" felt bound to repudiate. Prophet though he may be, the future rector of Trinity, then little thought what sounds he should hear and what solemn assemblies his own eyes should one day behold, even before the climacteric of his priestly career.

For below the Harlem River there are to-day twenty-two surprised choirs, five of which are in Trinity Parish.

NEW BOOKS.

BRYANT AND HIS FRIENDS. Some Reminiscences of the Knickerbocker Writers. By James Grant Wilson, author of "Poets and Poetry of Scotland," "Life and Letters of Fitz-Green Halleck," etc. [New York: Fords Howard & Hultbert, 1896.]

IF A MAN is to be known by the company he keeps, the author of this book must be set down as a most entertaining person. What is pleasanter than the conversation of one who has been on a friendly and familiar terms with eminent people, and whose mind is stored with memories of words expressive of their happy thoughts, and of actions suggestive of their interesting characteristics!

The pleasure which we derive from such conversation is indeed apt to be impaired by the fact that there is too much of it, or that the individuality of the narrator is somewhat too prominent. The entertainment furnished by the present writer, however, is not subject to either of these drawbacks: for he is neither garrulous nor egotistical. He says much; but he knows when to stop. He relates what he knows; but rather for the sake of what he knows, than because he happens to be the man who knows it. It has been his experience, and apparently his happiness also, to have been on friendly and familiar terms with some of the most distinguished literary men whom this country has produced; and in frank and friendly manner he shares his experience and his happiness with his readers. That reader must be either dull in general, or in the particular of appreciation of the charm of literary converse, who does not thankfully appreciate his confidences.

As the title of the book indicates, the author's effort is to present us to some degree of personal acquaintance with the poet Bryant and his friends; and the selection of those friends is made from the point of common association with literature. There is a good deal of information in regard to biographical and historical matters, but the line of literary interest in the lives sketched is, throughout, remarkably sustained, to the exclusion of mere personal gossip and of dry recital of ordinary occurrences.

The memoir of Bryant, occupying perhaps a fourth of the space in the book, is followed by memoirs somewhat less full, of James K. Paulding, Washington Irving, Richard Henry Dana, James Fenimore Cooper, Fitz Green Halleck, Joseph Rodman Drake, N. P. Willis, Edgar A. Poe and Bayard Taylor; and, having given a view of the lives of these chief ornaments of the school of writers, who produced what is sometimes referred to as the Knickerbocker literature, the author devotes the remainder of his book to the most notable of those who were their somewhat less prominent associates in the same school. There are twenty-three names forming the headings of as many interesting notices; among which are those of Julian C. Verplanck, one of the few whose devotion to literature did not mar either his excellence or his eminence as a lawyer; James Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home"; Samuel Woodworth, the author of "The Old Oaken Bucket"; William Alfred Jones, of the Queens County family of lawyers and statesmen of that name, but now of Norwich, Connecticut, who received from Mr. Bryant the interesting title of the "Accomplished Essayist," and Richard Grant White, a copious and entertaining writer. Of all this brilliant company, with each of whom, except Drake, the author was on terms of friendship more or less intimate, Mr. Jones enjoys the distinction of being now the only survivor, while the distinction of sharing the sex as well as the service of the muses belongs alone of all the company to Mrs. Caroline Matilda Kirkland.

W. LLOYD GARRISON: 1830-1859. The Story of His Life Told by His Children. Vol. I., 1830-1855; Vol. II., 1855-1861. [New York: The Century Co.,] pp. 521, 490.

IT will be seen that these two volumes only cover the first half of Mr. Garrison's life, and as the second takes in a period of only five years, the prospect ahead is rather startling. It may be desirable to preserve much of the material here collected, but it seems to us that the time is hardly yet reached when an impartial life of Garrison can be written. Probably no name in this country was ever held in greater opprobrium. That he survived it, and came in his old age to be lovingly and kindly regarded by many of the men to whom he had been the especial anathema of their earlier years, was due to the great change in public sentiment which followed the war for the Union. But the time has not yet come when the history of the anti-slavery agitation can be chronicled. There was too much of personal bitterness, of unmeasured denunciation, of reckless passion in the leaders of that movement for any one of this present age to view them aright. They are visible only by the light of partisan attachment, or through the lurid haze of an intense antipathy. There was a sera indignatio which fell not only upon their adversaries but every one who did not keep step with them in their advanced position. It is impossible to read with equanimity even now the vehement utterances with which these volumes are filled. Some day they will be part of history, now they have a root of bitterness in the yet surviving present. They belong to a type of man which requires not to be seen too closely. Their greatness and their faults alike require perspective. They can be better judged of now than thirty years ago, but thirty years hence they will be more fairly and more kindly estimated than is yet possible.

MISS HERNDON'S INCOME. A novel by Helen Campbell, author of the "What to do Club." [Boston: Roberts Brothers,] pp. 354. Price 15c.

IF the "What to do Club" was clever, this is decidedly more so. We have noted lately a strong leaning to the dealing with social questions in American fiction, but as a usual thing the intention has been better than the treatment. "Miss Herndon's Income" is the exception. It is a powerful story, and is evidently written in some degree, we cannot quite say how great a degree, from fact. But we wish to bear witness to its strong good sense in dealing with economical questions, as well as for its excellent spirit. Not a few of its characters are portraits, some avowedly, others with a very slight nominal disguise. Jerry McAnley and his mission are introduced, and, we think, without embellishment or exaggeration. The personages of the story are very well drawn, indeed "Amanda Briggs" is as good as anything American fiction has produced. We fancy we could pencil on the margin the real names of at least half the characters. What is the best thing in the book is the strong common sense with which the misery of the poor in a great metropolis is dealt with. It is a book for the wealthy to read that they may know something of what is required of them, because it does not ignore the difficulties in their way, and especially does not overlook the differences which social standing puts between class and class. Its fairness and freedom from cant and prejudice impress us. Beside this it is a deeply interesting story considered as mere fiction, one of the best which has lately appeared. We hope the authoress will go on in a path where she has shown herself so capable.

THE DYEING OF TEXTILE FABRICS. By J. J. Hummel, [London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne: Cassell & Co. 1885.] 12mo, pp. xli., 384.

The author of this manual, who is Professor and Director of the Dyeing Department of the Yorkshire College, Leeds, has provided the teacher and student of dyeing with a very useful text-book, giving accurate scientific information, together with practical details. The book contains twenty-six chapters, grouped under the following heads: Fibres, Operations Preliminary to Dyeing, Water in its Applications to Dyeing, Theories of Dyeing, Use of Mordants, Methods and Machinery Used in Dyeing, Application of the Natural Coloring Matters, Application of the Artificial Coloring Matters, Application of the Mineral Coloring Matters, the Dyeing of Mixed Fabrics, Experimental Dyeing. Useful tables follow these sections. The work is illustrated with ninety-seven diagrams, and is laced throughout with chemical equations and formulae. The author has a simple, direct style: he has taken great care in arranging the subject matter, and is obviously abreast of the times in all that relates to dyeing. In the chapter on aniline coloring-matters the exact chemical formulae is connected with the trade name of each, a point not often suggested in practical works, yet important to identify the substances named by manufacturers sometimes after a mere whim. The metric system of weights and measures is employed throughout, and the author has succeeded in producing a valuable manual on dyeing in all respects.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS. From the point of view of Christian Theology, by Lewis J. Edwards, D.D., Rector of Christ Church, St. Marybone, [London: Macmillan & Co.] pp. 280. Price 2s. 6d.

We should like to give a far more extended notice than time will permit of these admirable sermons and papers.

Most of them are sermons; but the readers read before Church congresses, etc. But all of them treat in a very calm and common-sense way the topics they concern. There is a breadth and balance which greatly commends them. They are not brilliant in the way in which sermons are called brilliant, but they go at once to the points at issue, and they are so clear and connected as to be very forcible. They are not abstract, but deal with the conditions of the day, especially in their powerful answer to popular agnosticism. The sermons "What is Morality?" "The Aim of Christian Morality," and "Justice and Faith," are particularly comfortable discourses, in the highest sense of those words. In all of these pages there is a pervading common sense, which is just what is needed. The floating theories of the age are fairly weighed, and shown to be wanting. For a young clergyman, especially, perplexed by encumbering forms of unbelief and error for which his divinity school studies have provided no sufficient answer, we think this book would be a God-send. It shows how to meet difficulties without polemical bitterness, and by settling the believer's own mind more firmly, helps him to settle the minds of others.

On the topics which it covers, we regard this as one of the best books we have lately met with. It is fully abreast with the times.

THE BLOT UPON THE BRAIN. Studies in History and Psychology, by William W. Ireland, M. D., Edin. Formerly of the M. Indian Army; corresponding member of the Paralytic of St. Petersburg and of the New York Medical Society; Member of the Medical-Psychological Association. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons] pp. 324.

Dr. Ireland has attempted something which is probably new to literature. At base this is a medical treatise on the causes and character of Insanity, but the subject is carried into regions interesting to the non-medical reader, viz.: the historical events and personages where the question of Insanity was an open one. Thus Joan of Arc is quite elaborately discussed, and the question of her visions taken up in a very able style. While this is a book for the writer's own profession, and to be judged by them, others will find it well worth their attention. As a book bearing also upon the important subject of medical jurisprudence it deserves to be read. Hardly any man but may be called to serve on a jury in a case where the question of sanity may play a chief part, and it is well to be intelligently informed upon the general truths which enter into such cases, especially where life is involved.

THEORY AND PRACTICE OF TEACHING. By the Rev. Edward Thring, M. A., Head Master of Eton School, late fellow of King's College, Cambridge, [Cambridge: Macmillan: at the University Press.] pp. 302. Price 1s. 6d.

Having taken up this volume we were unable to lay it down till we had devoured the very last page. Instead of a dull, painstaking and tolerably correct treatise, we found every page bristling with point and full of wise and valuable suggestions. We have seen nothing on the subject of teaching which comes near to it for sharp, incisive putting of common sense truths. It ought to go into the hands of every one who undertakes the office and work of a teacher. In the first place it takes full account of the necessary mental and moral characteristics of childhood and youth. It accepts the facts that thoroughness and logic are not to be expected in early days, and that memory is the child's great power and is therefore not to be overworked, and that education and instruction are totally opposite acts. Moreover it contains the most effective and convincing defence of the study of languages, especially of Greek and Latin, which we have yet seen.

AFTERNOON SONG. By Julia C. R. Dorr. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] pp. 124. Price 1s. 5c.

Mrs. Dorr's reputation as a poetess is too well established for it to be useful to say much concerning this little volume. Some of the poems—"The Fallow Field," "The Doves at Mendon," "The Parson's Daughter"—are especially good. One rather unusual gift Mrs. Dorr possesses, that she knows when to stop. In these days, when the power of versification is the accomplishment of many cultivated people and a great deal is given to the public, the temptation most easily besets the facile writer to elaborate half-thoughts and to fancy them successful because the measure and the rhyme are true. There is a great deal of workmanship which for its art is above all criticism, but it is utterly wasted upon material of little worth. Mrs. Dorr rarely gives a poem without it contains a justifying thought, and she limits herself to a clear expression of that thought. This neat little volume will make a holiday gift, such as one delights to send to an appreciating receiver.

FROM DEATH TO RESURRECTION, or Scripture Testimony Concerning the Sainted Dead. By R. H. Kellogg, D. D., Professor in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., author of "The Jews," "The Light of Asia, and the Light of the World," etc. [New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Company.] pp. 62. Price 50 cents.

If "a big book is a great evil," a small book may yet be a great good. Into his few pages Dr. Kellogg has packed a comprehensive and effective statement of Scripture truth concerning the resurrection, the judgment, and the intermediate state. It is admirably put, and with no useless matter, clear point, and sound. Any one in an hour or two can read this book, and a person must be very dull or very prejudiced who will not be the wiser for the reading. The book is just what is wanted at this time, and ought to do much toward the correction of the wide-spread popular errors on the subject.

A CAPTIVE OF LOVE. Founded upon Bakin's Japanese Romance "Kumono Teyama Ama Yo No Taki." By Edward Grey, translator of "The Loyal Ronin." Twenty-six illustrations from the original work. [Boston: Lee & Shepherd.] pp. 280. Price 4s. 5d.

One can hardly gain a better idea of old Japanese life and thought before European civilization invaded them, than in this amusing and lively book. There is a great deal which throws a strong light upon the days when the feudal system prevailed in the mikado's empire, and, as a romance, it is certainly very unlike anything known to the western world in which the American reader lives and moves.

THE NEW AGRICULTURE. of the Watson Led Lecture. By A. N. Collins. [New York: The Angiers Publishing Company, 1885.] 8vo, cloth, pp. 23. Price, 4s.

The author describes the method of agriculture which he has discovered and applied at his "Home on the Hillside," in Allegheny County, N. Y. It is a system of sub-surface drainage and irrigation, for which he claims marvellous results in the development of the soil and the perfection of fruits. If like results can be produced everywhere where the method will be of very great service.

THE DAY SPRING, A First Bible Book for Children. By Mrs. Valentine, The New Testament. [New York: Frederick Warne & Co.] pp. 320.

We have but one criticism for this little book. It is a good book for children's Bible study. Well arranged and designed. Only it would have been better had the adjectives been omitted, as a rule. They are additions to the Scripture itself, and they weaken instead of strengthening the impression in the child's mind. Otherwise we like this little book exceedingly.

MOUNTAIN ADVENTURES IN VARIOUS PARTS OF THE WORLD. Selected from the Narratives of Celebrated Travellers. With an Introduction and Additions by J. T. Headley. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1885.] 12mo, cloth, pp. 356. Price, 4s.

This is a new edition of an interesting volume of the series of books published under the general title of "Wonders of Man and Nature." It contains more than thirty selections from various sources, with illustrations. THE WORLD'S LARGEST ROOM. A Gossip About Some of Its Contents. By Selma Gay. With Fifty-seven Illustrations. [New York: Cassell & Company, Limited.]

Here is given a great deal of useful information upon many topics of natural history, geology and the like. The book is just what a bright inquiring young mind would find the best to satisfy and stimulate its cravings for knowledge.

SHORT STUDIES FROM NATURE. By Various Authors. London, Paris, New York, and Melbourne: Cassell & Co., 12mo, cloth, pp. 206.

This volume contains ten articles by different writers on such diverse topics as Bats, Birds of Passage, Oak-Apples, Comets, Caves, and Glow-Worms. They are interesting and instructive.

LITERATURE.

W. E. BENJAMIN, of this city, has issued a useful catalogue of rare books, autograph letters and portraits for illustrating.

The Racine College Mercury comes promptly to hand with the new term, and is interesting reading to both "outs" and "ins."

The Evangelical Education Society, Philadelphia, has published a portion of their eighth annual report for general circulation.

The November Church Scholastic, Nashotah, gives a very interesting account of Dr. Cole's last illness, death and burial, with a portrait.

HINTS from History as to the meaning of Christian Education, Rev. Dr. C. H. Hall's Baccalaureate Sermon at Trinity College, is published in pamphlet form and is very readable.

In January James Pott & Co., will have ready a low priced manual of Preparation for Confirmation and First Communion, by Ridley. They have already issued Bishop Gretn's Memoir of Bishop Otley, in a well printed octavo.

The December Pulpit Treasury has among its papers "The Twelfth, an Amethyst," by Canon Wilberforce, "Personal Holiness Paramount," by Bishop W. W. Howe, and "The Will of Sennacherib," by Bishop Walsh.

PERSONALS.

Bishop Elliott's address is San Antonio, Texas.

The Rev. E. Spruille Burford has accepted the rectoryship of St. Timothy's church, Troy, N. Y., and will enter upon his duties on the Third Sunday after Epiphany.

The Rev. Wm. Page Case has resigned the rectoryship of Grace church, Memphis, Address for the present 235 Beale Street, Memphis, Tenn.

The Rev. T. S. Cartwright has been elected a member of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy.

The Rev. Hiss B. Cooke, at the invitation of the Bishop of Kentucky, will undertake, in Louisville, for the colored people similar to that carried on by him in Petersburg, Va. Address care of Bishop Dudley, Louisville.

The Rev. Joshua Kimber, Assistant Secretary of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionsary Society, has entered upon his duties, Address No. 22 Bible House, New York.

The Rev. Er. Langford desires to say that the open letter addressed to him, as a basis for an appeal for money by the Rev. E. De Wolfe, which he understands has a large circulation, has not received his endorsement, nor was he consulted with regard to this use of his name.

The Rev. Dr. K. W. Maxey has been elected rector of his former church, Christ church, New York, and will enter upon his duties on the 1st of January.

The Rev. F. W. Raltes has resigned St. John's church, Dunkirk, N. Y., and will re-ct on the rectoryship of Emmanuel church, Corry, Pa., on February 1.

The Rev. Dr. J. E. C. Smedes's address is Paris, Ill.

In New London, November 25, Mrs. SARAH S. WHITLOCK, widow of John H. Whitlock of Troy, N. Y.

THE HON. WILLIAM C. PIERREPONT.

MA. PIERREPONT, PIERREPONT MANOR, Jefferson County, New York, was eldest son of Ezekiah B. Pierrepont and Anna M. Constable, and was born in the City of New York, at which place his parents removed, from their residence, 12 Greenwich Street, in the previous of the yellow fever last summer. The next year he was taken by his parents to New Brighton, where they afterward continued to reside.

Mr. Pierrepont was placed at an early age at the boarding-school of Countess Bacon, in France, where his education, limited to sixty scholars, occupied five connected houses in Provost, now Franklin Street, in the city of Paris. He afterwards completed his studies at the school of George P. McCulloch, at Morris-town, N. J.

His vacations were spent travelling with his father, visiting the agencies of his extensive tracts of land, in the northern part of the State, known as Macomb's purchase, and having in the year 1826, in the year 1827, the half of which had been owned by his maternal grandfather, William Constable, the partner of Alexander Macomb. The purchase, which was made in the name of Macomb, comprised the present counties of Franklin, St. Lawrence, Lewis, and Orleans.

Mr. Pierrepont opened a land office in 1830 in Jefferson County, and subsequently built his residence at Pierrepont Manor, the oldest place so called Pierrepont Manor. There he continued to superintend and direct his father's land agents in the management of his extensive tracts, embracing about one million of acres. On the death of his father in 1836, he was under his will put in charge of the whole estate in Jefferson and Lawrence Counties. The lands in the other counties and in Brookville were put in the charge of his co-executor, namely Henry Deane.

He married in 1836 Cornelia A., daughter of Dr. George H. Whittlesey, of New York, who resided in 1825 to his landed estate at Oxford, Orange County.

He had two sons, both of whom died early. Of his five daughters, one is the widow of Mr. W. H. Hill of Pulaski. A second daughter is the widow of Samuel G. Wolcott of Utica. A third married, G. H. Van Wageningen of Brookville. A fourth married Mr. Wm. M. White of Livingston County and Utica. His only daughter who survives is the unmarried daughter, Miss Mary Devereux, continued to reside with her father until his death.

After the decease of his father, the estate Mr. Pierrepont devoted himself to the improvement of the large tract he inherited.

After the decease of his father, the estate Mr. Pierrepont devoted himself to the improvement of the large tract he inherited. He was fully recognized; his mass, even at the age of sixtynix, were marvels of accuracy and exquisite beauty. He took the correct time by the aid of his study of the Great Pyramid; and the value of his calculations was acknowledged by Prof. Francis Smith, the Astronomer Royal, with whom he corresponded.

Mr. Pierrepont discovered at an early day an invention in the question of the water power of New York. This discovery was subsequently confirmed by the survey of Lake Ontario made by the officers of the Great Survey. He took the correct time by instrumental observation, which he gave to the officers of the Home, Watertown, and Ogdensburgh Rail Road, and was the constant and faithful railroad agent for many years his President, for which he was highly valued.

Mr. Pierrepont, while attentive to his duties as a citizen, and deeply interested in the welfare of his country, was active in political contests. In 1845, during his absence from home, his fellow citizens nominated and elected him a member of the Legislature. He consented to serve for one term, during which he was instrumental in locating the State Asylum at Utica; ever afterward he declined any public office.

Mr. Pierrepont was distinguished for energy and decision of character and a contempt for every thing that was unworthy of his station. He was an ardent and unswerving supporter of the Union. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character.

He was a Christian and devoted Churchman, active in parish work and in the councils of the diocese. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character.

Mr. Pierrepont during his life acted as his own agent, and was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character. He was a man of great energy and decision of character, and a man of great energy and decision of character.

EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

Resolutions adopted at a Faculty meeting held Dec. 15, 1885.

It has pleased Almighty God, in His inscrutable wisdom to take from us, in the full vigor of his intellectual powers, our beloved associate and fellow teacher, the Rev. LISA M. MANNING.

Resolved, That we place upon our records an expression of our profound admiration of his character, life and work. His varied training was only surpassed by his powers of original thought; his conversation was singularly free, genial, and stimulating; his life exemplified the most engaging union of robust manliness with Christian gentleness; his labors for the good of his alma mater and pray that his influence may long survive his departure.

Resolved, That we assure the family of our deceased colleague of our tender sympathy with them in their great affliction, and commend them to his care, who do not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men.

Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent by secretary to Mrs. Mulford, and that another be sent for publication in THE CHURCHMAN.

A. V. G. ALLEN,

Secretary of the Faculty.

INCREASE.

SOCIETY FOR THE INCREASE OF THE MINISTRY.

PERMANENT FUNDS.

THE NEW COLUMN OF THE CHURCHMAN last week noticed two important contributions: a legacy of $10,000 by the will of the late Mrs. Phoebe Warren Taylor, and a special donation of $5,000, from "A Friend in New York," for investment. Each represents a class of gifts which have of late years strengthened the position of the Society and given new interest and importance to its work. They are alike memorials of devotion to a sacred cause, which seeks thus to perpetuate itself in the sources of the Church's life—its living ministry—when the benefactors "rest from their labors."

Such provision for the work which, in the providence of God has been committed to the Society for the Increase of the Ministry, seems most desirable and necessary. The cost of thorough education for the ministry has increased so greatly in twenty-five years, as to put it beyond the reach of the majority of those who are manifestly called to the sacred service. Moreover, the men who require assistance are of very best material for a learned, serious, and effective ministry.

These conditions are likely to remain the same for an indefinite future period. There will always be a place and urgent need for the work of this Society. A good beginning has already been made for it. Its investments aggregate $73,814.

Its current receipts from offerings in churches are insufficient to meet the demands. The increased claims of parochial enterprises, together with the multiplication of missionary and charitable appeals, public and private, have tended to give the Society less prominence than formerly in the devotions of Church people. It should also be noticed that serious reductions in the income of ordinary givers and of the special friends of the Society have left less for us in ordinary receipts, and so this branch of the Church's service must suffer, unless new foundations are laid in the way of permanent funds.

Earnest appeal is therefore made to all who are considering what dispositions they ought to make of that which they have received and enjoyed from the Lord in providing for the service of His house, when they shall be no longer among the living on earth, and also to such as have been greatly prospered, and are in a worldly condition, to set aside something for this necessary service—the fruit of which they may rejoice in on earth, and taste the blessed rewards of when their earthly stewardship is ended.

THE HOME FOR OLD MEN and AGED COUPLES earnestly appeals for contributions to the "Home for Old Men and Aged Couples" which has already been purchased, plans prepared, and one half the amount required to erect the first section of the building is now secured. The remaining amount ($20,000 more) has been secured. The Home has entirely outgrown its present location, and it is necessary to erect a new building. Many cases to persons in every way deserving of its shelter. Donations, large or small, sent to the Treasurer, H. H. TAYLOR, No. 4 Pine Street, will be promptly acknowledged.

CHRISTMAS.

BY HARRIET PINCKNEY HUSE.

"Christ's Mass," they called it in the days
 When they who loved Him sang His praise
 With voices hushed and low; nor bell
 Nor chime the Gospel tale might tell.

In "secret places" underground
 Those saints of old a refuge found,
 And where the dust of martyrs slept,
 Their loving hearts the "Christ Mass" kept.

And still the "Mass" is said and sung
 In every land, in every tongue;
 But now the tones ring full and clear.
 The joyous song thrills every ear!

And still it comes, and comes again,
 Forever new, yet still the same;
 Cold hearts grow warm, and old ones gay;
 Now, thanks to God for Christmas Day!

WHAT'S MINE'S MINE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

CHAPTER XV.

The Clan Christmas.

By slow degrees, with infinite subdivisions and apparent reversals of change, the autumn had passed into winter indeed. Cloud above, mire below, mist and rain all between, made up many days; only, like the dreariest life, they were broken through and parted, lest they should seem the universe itself, by such heavenly manifestations, such gleams and glimpses of better, as come into all lives, all winters, all evil weathers. What is loosed on earth is loosed first in heaven; we have often shared of heaven, when we thought it but a softening of earth's hardness. Every relief is a promise, a pledge as well as a passing meal. The frost at length had brought with it brightness and persuasion and rousing. In the fields it was swelling and breaking the clods; and for the heart of man, it did something to break up that clod too. A sense of friendly pleasure filled all the human creatures. The children ran about like wild things; the air seemed to intoxicate them. The mother went out walking with the girls, and they talked of their father and Christian and Mr. Sercombe, who were all coming together. For some time they saw nothing more of their next neighbors.

They had made some attempts at acquaintance with the people of the glen, but unhappily were nowise courteous enough for their ideas of good breeding, and offended both their pride and their sense of propriety. The manners and address of these northern peasants were blameless—nearly perfect indeed, like those of the Irish, and in their own houses beyond criticism; those of the ladies conventional where not rudely condescending. If Mistress Conal was an exception to the rest of the clan, even she would be more civil to a stranger than to her chief whom she loved—until the stranger gave her offence. And if then she passed to imprecation, she would not curse like an ordinary woman, but like a poetess, gaining rather than losing dignity. She would rise to the evil occasion, no hag, but a largely-offended sibyl, whom nothing thereafter should ever appease. To forgive was a virtue unknown to Mistress Conal. Its more than ordinary difficulty in forgiving is indeed a special fault of the Celtic character. This must not, however, be confounded with a desire for revenge. The latter is by no means a specially Celtic characteristic. Resentment and vengeance are far from inseparable. The heart that surmounts courtesy, except indeed that courtesy be rooted in love divine, must, when treated with discourtesy, experience the worse revulsion, feel the bitter indignation. But many a Celt would forgive, and forgive thoroughly and heartily, with his enemy in his power, who, so long as he remained beyond his reach, could not even imagine circumstances in which they might be reconciled. To a Celt the summit of wrong is a slight, but apology is correspondingly potent with him. Mistress Conal, however, had not the excuse of a specially courteous nature.

Christina and Mercy, calling upon her one morning, were not ungraciously received, but had the misfortune to remark, trusting to her supposed ignorance of English, upon the dirtiness of her floor, they themselves having imported not a little of the moisture that had turned its surface into a muddy paste. She said nothing, but, to the general grudge she bore the possessors of property once belonging to her clan, she now added a personal one; the offence lay cherished and smouldering. Had the chief offended her, she would have found a score of ways to prove to herself that he meant nothing; but she desired no mitigation of the trespass of strangers.

The people at the New House did not get on very well with any of the clan. In the first place, they were regarded not merely as interlopers, but almost as thieves of the property—though in truth it had passed to them first through other hands. In the second place, rumor had got about that they did not behave with sufficient respect to the chief's family, in the point of whose honor the clan was the more exacting because of their common poverty. Hence the inhabitants of the glen, though they were of course polite, showed but little friendliness.

But the main obstacle to their reception was in themselves: the human was not much developed in them, they understood nothing of their own beings; they had never any difficulty with themselves;—how could they understand others, especially in circumstances and with histories so different from their own! They had not a notion how poor people feel, still less poor people poorer than before—or how they regard the rich who have what they have lost. They did not understand any human feeling—not even the silliness they called love—a godless, mindless affair, fit only for the doll-histories invented by children: they had a feeling, or a feeling had them, till another feeling came and took its place. When a feeling was there, they felt as if it would never go; when it was gone, they felt as if it had never gone. They seldom came so near anything as to think about it, never put a question to themselves as to how a thing affected them, or concerning the phenomena of its passage through their consciousness. There is a child-ternity of soul that needs to ask nothing, because it understands everything: the ways of the spirit are open to it; but where a soul does not understand, and has to learn, how is it to do so without thinking? They knew nothing of labor, nothing of danger, nothing of hunger, nothing of cold, nothing of sickness, nothing of loneliness. The realities of life, in their lowest forms as in their highest, were far from them. If they had nearly gone through life instead of having but entered upon it, they would have had some ground for thinking themselves unfairly dealt with; for to be made, and then left to be worthless, unfit even for damnation, might be suspected for hard lines; but there is One, who takes a perfect interest in his lowliest creatures, and will not so spare it. They were girls notwithstanding who could make themselves agreeable, and passed for clever—Christina because she could give a sharp answer, and sing a drawing-room song, Mercy because as yet she mostly held her tongue. That there was at the same time in each of them the possibility of being developed into something of inestimable value, is merely to say that they were human.

The days passed, and Christmas drew near. The gentlemen arrived. There was family delight and a bustling reception. It is amazing—it shows indeed how deep and divine, how much beyond the individual self are the family affections—that such gladness breaks forth in the meeting of persons who, within an hour or so of the joyous welcome, self getting the better of the divine, will begin to feel bored, and will each lay the blame of the disappointment on the other.

Coats were pulled off; mufflers were unwound; pretty hands were helping; strong hands were lifting and carrying; every room was bright with a great fire; tea was refused, and dinner welcomed. After dinner came the unpacking of great boxes; and in the midst of the resultant pleasure, the proposal came to be made—none but Christina knew how—that the inhabitants of the cottage should be invited to dinner on Christmas-eve. It was carried at once, and the next afternoon a formal invitation was sent.

At the cottage it caused conference, no discussion. The lady of the New House had not called with her girls, it was true; but then neither had the lady of the castle—for that was the clan's people's name for the whole ridge on which the cottage stood—called on the new-comers! If there was offence, it was mutual! The unceremonious invitation might indicate that it was not thought necessary to treat them as persons who knew the ways of society; or on the other hand, if it meant that they were ready to throw aside formalities and behave heartily, it would be wrong not to meet them halfway! They resolved therefore to make a counter-proposal; and if the invitation came of neighborliness, and not of imagined patronage, they would certainly meet it in a friendly spirit! Answer was returned, sealed with no mere crest, but with a coat of arms, to the effect that it had been the custom since time forgotten for the chief to welcome his people and friends without distinction on Christmas eve, and the custom could not be broken; but if the ladies and gentlemen of the New House would favor them with their company on the occasion, to dine and dance, the chief and his family would gratefully accept any later offer of hospitality Mr. and Mrs. Peregrine Palmer might do them the honor to send.

This reply gave occasion to a good deal of talk at the New House, not entirely of a sort which the friends of the chief would have enjoyed hearing. Frequent were the bursts of laughter from the men at the assumption of the title of chief by a man with no more land than he could just manage to live upon. The village they said, and said truly, in which the greater number of his people lived, was not his at all—not a foot of the ground on which it stood, not a stone or sod of which it was built—but belonged to a certain Canadian, who was about to turn all his territory around and adjacent into a deer forest! They could not see that, if there had ever been anything genuine in the patriarchal relation, the mere loss of the clan-property could no more cause the chieftainship to cease, than could the loss of the silver-hilted Andrew Ferrara, descended from father to son for so many generations.

There are dull people, and just as many clever people, who look upon customs of society as on laws of nature, and judge the worth of others by their knowledge or ignorance of the same. So doing they disable themselves from understanding the essential, which is, like love, the fulfilling of the law. A certain Englishman gave great offence in an Arab tent by striding across the food placed for the company on the ground: would any Celt, Irish or Welsh, have been guilty of such a blunder? But there was not any overt offence on the present occasion. They called it indeed a cool proposal that they should put off their Christmas-party for that of a ploughman in shabby kilt and hob-nailed shoes; but on their amused indignation supervened the thought that they were in a wild part of the country, where it would be absurd to expect the savoir vivre of the south, and it would be amusing to see the customs of the land: by suggestion and seeming response the clever Christina, unsuspected even of Mercy, was the motive power to bring about the acceptance of the chief's invitation.

A friendly answer was sent: they would not go to dinner, they said, as it was their custom also to dine at home on Christmas-eve; but they would dine early, and spend the evening with them.

To the laird the presence of the lowland girls promised a great addition to the merry-making. During the last generation all the gentlemen-farmers of the clan, and most of the humbler tacksmen as well had vanished, and there was a wide intellectual space between those all left and the family of the chief. Often when Ian was away, would Alister, notwithstanding his love for his people, and their entire response, have felt lonely but for labor.

There being in the cottage no room equal to the reception of a large company, and the laird receiving all the members of the clan—"poor," I was going to say, "and rich," but there was no rich—as well as any neighbor or traveller who chose to appear, the father of the present chief had had good regard to the necessities of entertainment in the construction of a new barn: companionship, large feasting, and dancing had been even more considered than the storing and threshing of corn, among its imperative uses.

There are in these days many who will mock; for my part I am proud of a race whose social relations are the last upon which they will retrench, whose pleasure latest yielded is their hospitality. It is a common feeling that only the well-to-do have a right to be hospitable; the ideal flower of hospitality is almost unknown to the rich; it can hardly be grown save in the gardens of the poor; it is one of their beauties.

Means in Glenruadh had been shrinking for many years, but the heart of the chief never shrank. His dwelling dwindled from a castle to a house, from a house to a cottage; but the hospitality did not dwindle. As the money vanished, the show diminished: the place of entertainment from a hall became a kitchen, from a kitchen changed to a barn; but the heart of the chief was the same; the entertainment was but little altered, the hospitality not in the least. When things grow hard, the first saving is generally off others; the Macruadh's was of himself. The land was not his save as steward of the grace of God! Let it not be supposed he ran in debt: with his mother at the head, or rather the heart of affairs, that could not be. She was not one to regard as hospitality a readiness to share what you have not!

Little did good Doctor Johnson suspect the shifts to which some of the highland families he visited were driven—not to feed, but to house him; and housing in certain conditions of society is the large half of hospitality. Where he did not find his quarters comfortable, he did not know what crowding had to be devised, what inconveniences endured by the family, that he might have what ease and freedom were possible. Be it in stone hall or thatched cottage, the chief must entertain the stranger as well as befriend his own! This was the fulfilling of his office—none the less, that it had descended upon him in evil times. That seldom if ever had a chief been Christian enough or strong enough to fill to the full the relation of father of his people, was nothing against the ideal fact in the existent relation; it was rather for it: now that the chieftainship had come to a man with a large notion of what it required of him, he was the more, not the less ready to aim at the mark of the idea, he was not the more easily to be turned aside from a true attempt to live up to his calling, that many had yielded and were swept along bound slaves in the triumph of mammon! He looked on his calling as entirely enough to fill full the life that would fulfil the calling. It was ambition enough for him to be the head of his family, with the highest of earthly relations to realize towards its members. As to the vulgar notion of obligation to himself, he had learned to despise it.

"Rubbish" Ian would say. "I owe myself nothing. What has myself ever done for me, but lead me wrong! What but it has come between me and my duty—between me and my very Father in Heaven—between me and my fellow man! The fools of greed would persuade that a man has no right to waste himself in the low contest of making and sharing a humble living; he ought to make money! make a figure in the world, forsooth! be somebody! 'Dwell among the people!' Such would say: 'Bah! let them look after themselves! If they cannot pay their rents, others will; what is it to you if the rents are paid? Send them about their business; turn the land into a deer-forest or a sheep-farm, and clear them out! They have no rights! A man is bound to the children of his body begotten, but the people are nothing to him. A man is not his brother's keeper—except when he has got him in prison! And so on, in the name of the great devil!"

Whether there was enough in Alister to have met and overcome the spirit of the world, had he been brought up at Oxford or Cambridge, I have not to determine; there was that in him at least which would have come to repent bitterly had he yielded; but brought up as he was, he was not only able to entertain the exalted idea presented to him, but to receive and make it his. With joy he recognized the higher dignity of the shepherd of a few poor, lean, wood-torn human sheep, than of the man who stands for himself, however "spacious in the possession of dirt." He who holds dead land a possession, and living souls none of his, needs wake no curse, for he is in the very pit of creation, a live outrage on the human family.

If Alister Macruadh was not in the highest grade of Christianity, he was on his way thither, for he was doing the work that was given him to do, which is the first condition of all advancement. He had much to learn yet, but he was one who, from every point his feet touched, was on the start to go further.

The day of the holy eve rose clear and bright. Snow was on the hills, and frost in the valley. There had been a time when at this season great games were played between neighbor districts or clans; but here there were no games now, because there were so few men, and the more active part fell to the women. Mistress Macruadh was busy all day with her helpers, preparing a dinner of mutton, and beef, and fowls, and red deer bass; and the men soon gave the barn something of the aspect of the old patriarchal hall for which it was no very poor substitute. A long table, covered with the finest linen, was laid for all comers; and when the guests took their places, they needed no arranging; all knew their standing, and seated themselves according to knowledge. Two or three small farmers took modestly the upper places once occupied by immediate relatives of the chief, for of the old gentry of the clan there were none. But all were happy, for their chief was with them still. Their reverence was none the less that they were at home with him. They knew his worth, and the roughness among them would mind what the Macruadh said. They knew that he feared nothing; that he was strong as the red stag after which the clan was named; that, with genuine respect for every man, he would at the least insolence knock the fellow down; that he was the best shot, the best sailor, the best ploughman in the clan: I would have said the best secretman, but that, except Ian, there was no another left to it.

Not many of them, however, understood how much he believed that he had to give an account of his people. He was far from considering such responsibility the clergyman's only. Again and again had he expostulated with some, to save them from the slow gaping hell of drink, and in one case, he had reason to hope, with success.

As they sat at dinner, it seemed to the young fellow who, with his help, had so far been victorious that the chief scarcely took his eyes off him. One might think there was small danger where the hostess allowed nothing beyond water and milk but small ale; the chief, however, was in dread lest he should taste even that, and one moment caught the longing look he threw at the jug as it passed. He rose and went down the table, speaking to this one and that, but stopped behind the lad, and putting his arm round his shoulders, whispered in his ear. He looked up in his face with a solemn smile; had not the chief embraced him before all! He was only a shepherd-lad, but his chief cared for him!

In the afternoon the extemporized tables were cleared away, candles were fixed in rough sconces along the walls, not without precaution against fire, and the floor was rubbed clean—for the barn was floored throughout with pine, in parts polished with use. The walls were already covered with the plaids of the men and women, each kept in place by a stone or two on the top of the wall where the rafters rested. In one end was a great heap of yellow out-straw, which, partly levelled, made a most delightful divan. What with the straw, the plaids, the dresses, the shining of silver ornaments, and the flash of here and there a cairngorm or an amethyst, there was not a little color in the place. Some of the guests were poorly but all were decently attired, and the shabbiest behaved as ladies and gentlemen.

The party from the new house walked through the star-watched air, with the motionless mountains looking down on them, and a silence around, which they never suspected as a presence. The little girls were of the company, and there was much merriment. Foolish compliments were not wanting, offered chiefly on the part of Mr. Sercombe, and accepted on that of Christina. The ladies, under their furs and hoods, were in their best, with all the jewels they could wear at once, for they had heard that highlanders have a passion for color, and that poor people are always best pleased when you go to them in your finery. The souls of these Sasunnachs were full of things. They made a fine show as they emerged from the darkness of their wraps into the light of the numerous candles; nor did the approach of the widowed chieftainess to receive them, on the arm of Alister, with Ian on her other side, fail in dignity. The mother was dressed in a rich, matronly black silk; the chief was in the full dress of his clan—the old-fashioned coat of the French court, with its silver buttons and ruffles of fine lace, the kilt of Macraoibh tartan in which red predominated, the silver-mounted sporran—of the skin and adorned with the head of an otter caught with the bare hands of one of his people, and a silver-mounted dirk of length unusual, famed for the beauty of both hilt and blade: Ian was similarly though less showily clad. When she saw the stately dame advancing between her sons, one at least of her visitors felt a doubt whether their condescension would be fully appreciated.

As soon as their reception was over, the pipers—to the discomfort of Mr. Sercombe's English ears—began his invitation to the dance, and in a moment the floor was in a tumult of reels. The girls, unacquainted with their own country's dances, preferred looking on, and after watching reel and strathspey for some time, altogether declined attempting either. But by and by it was the turn of the clanspeople to look on while the lady of the house and her sons danced a quadrille or two with the visitors; after which the chief and his brother pairing with the two elder girls, the ladies were astonished to find them the best they had waltzed with, although they did not dance quite in the London way. Ian's dancing, Christina said, was French; Mercy said all she knew was that the chief took the work and left her only the motion; she felt as in a dream of flying. Before the evening was over, the young men had so far gained on Christina that Mr. Sercombe looked a little commonplace.

THE FIRE SPIRIT.*

BY FRED. J. HALL.

PART I.

It must have been the extra cup of tea that Tom Skinner drank at his supper, on this 23d day of December, 18— that effected him in such a strange and rather suspicious manner. If he had been an intemperate man, or even in the habit of taking a few drops occasionally, strictly as a medicine, for the benefit of his digestion, or as an appetizer, I should say he said he had been indulging before sitting down to his scanty meal. Such, however, was not the case; water and tea were the only beverages that had passed Tom Skinner's lips for many years, and for that reason I assert it must have been the extra cup of tea that effected him so strangely.

Like most evenings of the 23d of December in this part of the world, the weather was extremely disagreeable to those who did not like the cold. The sky was clear and bright, and the air so keen that when Tom Skinner reached his lodgings, his nose was blue, and his fingers numb, in spite of his warm gloves and heavy muffler.

He was in a particularly bad humor this evening. A beggar woman, who had stopped him on the street to ask for help, started him grumbling, and the cold had by no means tended to improve his temper.

As he stepped to the window to draw together the heavy curtains, he stood for a few moments gazing at the busy crowd below. What a bright, cheering sight it was. Gray haired men and women, feeling young and blithe again in the joy that Christmas time brings, and children, whose faces were radiant with expectation, thronged the streets. Everyone seemed happy and smiling, and scarcely an arm but bore a Christmas gift.

"Fools!" muttered Tom Skinner, closing the curtains quickly, as if anxious to shut out the pleasant sight, "wasting their money. I'm glad I have no wife and noisy children to squander all I earn. Bah! Such an infernal fuss as people make about nothing."

So saying he turned away from the window, and after lighting the lamp, stirred the open fire into a blaze, and drew up a large, easy chair in which he settled himself comfortably to wait for his supper.

Tom Skinner's lodgings were on the second floor of a large brick house, on one of the principal retail business streets of the city. He occupied only two rooms, though he owned the whole building. The basement was leased to a barber, who drove a thriving trade; the ground floor to a restaurant keeper; and the rest of the house was hired by a stout old lady who kept boarders.

Tom Skinner was a bachelor of the most crusty type; every one who had any dealings with him, declared him to be a tight-fisted, hair-splitting old rascal, with no more soul than an anaconda. A glance at his face would easily have confirmed this statement; and it really seemed a physical impossibility for him to speak in other than harsh, snappish tones.

His meals were brought up from the restaurant below, at exactly the same hour, to a minute, each day, and always by the same waiter, a gray-haired old fellow by the name of Peter Snithers. As Peter's time was only engaged during meal hours, Tom hired him for a very small compensation to attend to the fire, keep the lamps trimmed and filled—Tom thought gas too expensive—and, in fact, to act as man of all work.

The little clock upon the mantel was on the eve of striking six, when there came a rap at the door, which was answered by a surly, "come in," and a few moments later Tom Skinner was regaling himself upon the rather meagre repast, of a small piece of roast turkey, a slice of toast and a cup of tea.

Whether it was the spirit of generosity, which Christmas time usually brings, that prompted him, or the pleasing effect of the first cup in driving out the cold, I cannot say; but however that may be, when Peter returned for the dishes, some half hour later, Tom ordered another cup of tea. This he drank very slowly, sipping it leisurely, as if every drop was precious, and he wished to make it last as long as possible.

The fire had now burst into a cheerful blaze warming Tom outwardly, and the tea having performed the same service inwardly, he found himself in a very comfortable condition. What his meditations were as he sat there watching the bright embers fade away and drop in white ashes on the hearth below, I do not know, but if they were of his past life, I am sure they could not have been very pleasant. His conscience, however, if he still had one, did not appear to worry him; for presently his eyes began slowly to close, and his chin to sink down upon his breast; then his body gradually bent forward until it seemed as if he would lose his balance, and tumble head foremost into the fire. Once or twice he straightened up with a start, and heaved a long breath; but each effort to keep awake ended by his falling into a deeper sleep, until at last, he settled down into a uniform snore. How long he slept no one could possibly tell, nor was he aware that he had slept at all, until a sharp voice close at hand exclaimed:

"Hello there! I say, you had better straighten up. You'll have your head in the fire in a moment."

Tom sprang to his feet startled, there was an uncomfortable warmth about the top of his head and face, which showed they must have been very near the burning logs.

"Strange," he muttered, after looking carefully around the room and finding nothing. "I certainly thought I heard some one speak. I suppose I must have been dreaming. Ugh! This weather is enough to give any one the nightmare." He accompanied this exclamation with a shrug of the shoulders, and then drew his chair a little closer to the fire, and settling himself comfortably, was soon dozing off as before.

"So you thought you were dreaming eh, Tom Skinner?" exclaimed the voice again. "Ha! Ha! That is a grand joke. There was no dream about it. I spoke to you, and a precious hard time I've had getting here too. But if I'm going to talk, you have got to stop snoring, or I'll not be able to make myself heard."

Tom straightened up and looked around utterly bewildered. He examined the bookcase, the pictures, the mantel, and even the chair in which he was sitting, but nothing out of the way was to be seen. At last his gaze wandered back to the fire. He started, rubbed his eyes and looked again. Yes, there was no doubt of it; seated there upon a blazing log was a queer looking a little spirit as mortal eyes ever beheld. At times the bright flames winding around him, almost hid him from view. His feet dangled among the embers, which he kicked about as if in sport, and his arms were placed akimbo. He was oddly dressed, in a bright red, tight fitting material, which ended at his head in a high, cone-shaped hat. His clear little eyes shone like diamonds, and diminutive, and oddly formed as he was, he still had a decidedly comfortable and pleasing appearance.

"Well! So you have found me at last have you?" said the spirit, crossing his legs, and throwing his head upon one side in rather a waggish manner. "Did you hear me say I wished to speak to you?"

"Y-e-e-s" stammered Tom, as soon as he could overcome his astonishment, "what is it you wish to say?"

"In the first place I wish to say this," answered the spirit, emphasizing each word with a shake of his tiny finger, "you are a miserly old rascal! Do you understand me? A miserly old rascal!" As the spirit spoke, the jovial expression of his face gave way to a look of sternness and solemnity.

Tom was wide awake now, and quite forgetting his surprise, with a flushed face, he sprang to his feet and reached out for the poker. Like a flash of light the spirit disappeared, though the voice still continued:

"Come! Come! There is no use trying to injure me, I could be miles off in an instant. What I said was the truth, as you very well know. Remember I came here for your own good, so listen."

"A great lot of good you'll do," growled Tom. "I should like to know what you are anyway."

The little spirit returned as quickly as he had vanished, and resuming his seat upon the blazing log answered:

"I am the cheerful Spirit of Fire, and it is very seldom I put myself so much out of the way as to visit a cross-grained, sour fellow like yourself. I love to sit upon a hearth, where all is gay and cheerful, where happy, smiling faces gather around me, and where I can listen to bright jokes and join in a hearty laugh. Whenever you hear a fire roaring merrily, you may be sure that either I, or some of my companions are in it; but I came here to-night for your benefit, Tom Skinner, and it is the only time I ever will come. If you do not listen to me now you will never have another opportunity."

The earnest expression of the spirit face, and the solemnity with which these words were uttered, accorded strangely with his odd shaped figure and its surroundings. He paused for a moment, as if to note the effect of what he had said, and then continued in the same impressive way.

"Do you know what season of the year it is?"

"Christmas-tide, I suppose you mean," was the surly answer.

"Yes, Christmas-tide. As you passed along the crowded streets muffled in your great coat and growling at the cold, did you not see thousands of laughing, happy faces around you? People contented with their lot, though not such an easy one as yours. Did you not see that nearly every hand was laden with a gift. Tell me, what had these people been doing to make them look so happy? Why were their faces full of smiles, while yours wore nothing but a frown?"

"Doing!" muttered Tom, moving uneasily in his chair, "Doing! Throwing away their money on worthless trinkets, which will never be of benefit to themselves, or any one else, and trying to imagine they are happy."

"So this is your idea of Christmas, is it?" answered the spirit. "Well, Tom Skinner, you have a hard heart indeed. Could you be with a happy family on Christmas night, and listen to the merry shouts of laughter. Could you watch chubby fingers trembling with eagerness as they untie the strings, and throw aside the paper that covers some precious gift. Could you steal to the bedside of some little child, and see one of those worthless trinkets clasped in its hand even in sleep, it would not seem so worthless then, nor the money spent upon it wasted. Have you no remembrances of happy Christmas days? Can you not recall the time when you were a joyous hearted child yourself, Tom Skinner."

For an instant there was an expression upon Tom's face it had not known for years. But slowly the old frown stole back, like a black cloud darkening a momentary gleam of sun-light, and he answered:

"That was many years ago, I am getting old now, and do not trouble myself with worthless recollections."

"Ah! Yes, it was long ago. But looking back through all those years, can you recall one deed of kindness or generosity, a single action that has benefited any one but yourself. Tell me, Tom Skinner, how have you improved that time?"

An uneasy frown passed over Tom's face as he answered: "In earning an honest living and not interfering with other peoples' business."

"No!" answered the little spirit firmly, his eyes growing brighter as he spoke, "not in earning an honest living, but in grinding every one you touched, in destroying your better nature, and wringing your own heart of every drop of sympathy and kindness. Now you are wealthy. Yes, do not deny it, (for Tom had made amon as if to speak) but are you happier for it? Is it pleasant to think that the riches you have accumulated by years of patient toil and self-denial, will be lavishly spent and enjoyed by others, in whom you have no interest? Your money will buy you a coffin, nothing more, if I cannot purchase a single tear of regret."

The spirit ceased speaking, as if expecting an answer, but receiving none continued:

"This very day you received a letter from your only sister, Tom Skinner, asking you to help her husband. He is sick and unable to work, and has a large family depending upon him. Besides, since you would do nothing for her support, there has been added to his expenses the care of your mother. Unless he can pay the rent at once, they will all be turned from the house, no matter for the cold, and go, no one knows where. You knew all this, and you knew, too, how bitterly they must have been in need to have appealed to you.

"Think how easily you can fill their hearts with joy; but when the answer you will send them is received, do you think it will add to their Christmas happiness? At such a time as this, when every one is striving to make those around them bright and cheerful, are such thoughts pleasant?"

There was a longer silence than before, Tom's face showing plainly that a struggle was going on within. But the cold, selfish nature was too strong for even this rebuke to have more than a momentary effect.

"I do not see why I should support all my relatives? I have never called upon them for help. It is precious little they have ever done for me. Besides I can't afford it. It is all I can do to pay my own debts."

"You see no reason why you should help them," shouted the little spirit, in an angry voice. "What have they ever done for you?" He stopped suddenly for a moment, and then added more softly: "Do you remember, as a boy, how you would sit by the fire, and in watching the glowing embers, fancy you beheld strange, fantastic scenes, and picture to yourself the stories you had been reading? Watch now."

PART II.

As the spirit ceased speaking he stirred the logs into a blaze, and slowly disappeared; his form growing fainter and fainter, as if melting away in the flames.

The fire burned brightly for a few minutes; then suddenly ceased, and began to send forth a dense cloud of smoke, which rolled out in a heavy black volume, until it completely surrounded the mantle piece and the chair in which Tom sat. After a few moments a faint opening appeared in the distance, like a spot of sunshine. Slowly this became brighter and larger, until Tom seemed to be looking miles off, through a long vista of clouds. For some time he could distinguish nothing, but the dim outline of swaying trees; but as the mist softly faded away into a Summer's haze, it revealed a neatly painted cottage shaded by tall elms and maples. Over the porch was thickly twined a honey-suckle, while in front there was spread a neat grass plot, dotted, here and there, with beds of bright flowers. The cottage was surrounded by a low picket fence, and stood by the side of the road, which could be traced for some distance until it suddenly disappeared at a sharp turn.

Though Tom seemed to be looking upon this scene from a distance, yet everything about it was wonderfully clear and distinct. He could easily see the smallest shadow that the sun cast upon the cottage walls, and could distinguish the size and color of every bird in the trees.

A young man was coming towards the cottage up the dusty road. He walked slowly as if weak, and his face appeared thin and pale. Before he reached the gate a bright faced little girl ran out to meet him. She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him, and then some one else came to welcome him, whose face wore an anxious look, as she bent tenderly over him, for he leaned heavily upon her arm as they walked together into the house.

The little spirit was no where to be seen, but his voice came from out the cloud whispering softly: "Do you understand this picture?"

There was a strong tremor in Tom's voice, as he answered:

"Yes! Yes! I remember it all. I was sick with the fever then, and oh! how I suffered on that journey home."

While he was speaking a thin cloud settled down upon the scene hiding it from sight, when this had cleared away the picture was changed, and a room inside the cottage was brought to view. The sick man lay there upon a bed, and by his side sat the same loving form on whose shoulder his head had rested, when faint and weary he had staggered to the cottage gate. A lamp burns upon the table at the bed-side, and in its dim light her face looks haggard and worn. It is nearly morning by the little clock that ticks upon the mantel, but she does not close her eyes for a moment. Every movement he makes is watched. Now she bathes his brow, and as he flings his arms wildly about, in his delirium, she covers them again, and bends down and kisses his hot lips. How quietly she moves about the room, and how softly she smooths and rearranges the disordered pillows. Only a mother has such a tender hand. Only a mother's love is so constant and untiring.

"This was not for a single night," murmured the spirit, "but for long weeks did she watch beside you, and nurse you slowly back to life. Faint and weary almost beyond endurance, yet her very thoughts were prayers for your welfare. Is this a debt that can be easily paid? Is there no reason here why you should love and cherish her now that she needs it?" There was a touching sadness in the spirit's voice as he uttered these last words, far different from the manner in which he had heretofore spoken.

Tom made no reply. His face was buried in his hands his lips quivered with emotion, and then tears, the first he had shed since a child, began coursing down his cheeks.

It was some time before he again raised his eyes, and when he did so he saw a slight change had taken place. The scene was still the sick room; but the patient was now sitting in a large easy chair, carefully cushioned with pillows and shawls, and drawn near the window were he could look out upon the sunny fields. The fever had gone, but his thin, pale face and listless expression, showed that he was still very weak. Presently the door opened and the rosy checked little girl who had been first to welcome him home, softly enters the room and places a bunch of wild flowers in a glass of water upon a table at his side. He drew her toward him and kissed her, and her face grew radiant with pleasure as she saw that her simple gift had pleased him. Oh, how vividly it all came back to Tom now. He remembered that not a day passed but she brought to his side some token of sisterly tenderness and love. How eager she was to oblige him in every little way. It was strange these things should have passed entirely from his mind. While he mused over them, the picture softly fades away.

No one would have known Tom Skinner as he sat there waiting for that mysterious curtain to rise once more. His head rested on his hand, and his eyes were dreamy and misty. The stern lines had disappeared, and his ten-stained face now wore an expression of thoughtful tenderness. Perhaps he was thinking of the hard earned purse his mother had slipped into his hands when he was again able to leave for the cit; or, possibly, of the gratitude he then felt and the way in which he had since shown it.

It was some time before the veil of clouds was again lifted, disclosing the sitting-room of the cottage. Seated at a table writing is the tender mother, who had watched so patiently by the bedside of her son. Many years must have passed; for her hair is white now, and her forehead is filled with wrinkles. She often pauses to brush away the tears that fall upon the paper. When the letter is finished, with a trembling hand she places it in an envelope and rising from her seat leaves the room. As she disappears the vision is blotted out.

"Do you know the meaning of this?" inquired the spirit.

"Yes! Yes! Too well," answered Tom, his voice choking with sobs.

"You remember how tenderly that letter was worded," continued the spirit. "It told you that your brother William had been drafted to recruit the wasted army of the North. You know that your mother and sister are dependent upon him, and that without his aid they must part with the old farm and all its dear, familiar scenes. You know, too, that he is not a coward, and would long ago have taken his place in the ranks, had not a stronger duty kept him home. There is but one help now, and that is for you to purchase his discharge. How lovingly she asks you to do this. You could easily have spared all that was needed. And will you refuse to grant such a request? But wait, this picture tells it all. Nay, do not turn your head away; you must look upon this, for it is the last."

"Seated in the cottage porch are three soldiers wearing the blue uniform of the Union Army. Besides them stands a young man. In one hand he carries a small, neatly folded bundle; the other is held by his mother. Shading her eyes, she turns from him and gazes anxiously down the road where a neighbor is seen coming toward the cottage. He stops and leaves a letter. The mother's face grows brighter as with eager, trembling fingers she tears the envelope open.

"No! No!" groaned Tom, reaching forward as if to take it from her. "I did not mean it, I did not—" His hand clutches nothing but the empty air.

For a moment hope shone from every line upon her face, but as she read this book fades into an expression of the deepest despair. She totters forward and would have fallen, had not the young man caught her in his arms. This weakness is only for an instant. She wipes away the tears that blind her, and the veterans at her side are not more calm. Again she takes the young man's hand in her's and though Tom cannot hear what is said, he knows they are words of love, hope and patriotism; for the rough men near her uncover their heads, and turn away their faces while she speaks.

The young soldier is marching slowly down the road now, with his three companions; as they reach the bend which hides them from the cottage, he turns back to wave a last good-bye. His mother answers him, and as the old home disappears from sight, he sees her standing near the gate, with her hand pointing upward.

Dark clouds roll together upon the scene, and all is obscure. As these fade away the little spirit again became visible, seated in his old place upon the blazing log.

"You know what followed," he said. "In the quiet country church-yard is a marble slab, cut with the name of William Skinner. The farm was sold; and you remember the rest."

"Remember it, Great God!" answered Tom, "with all my grinding and pinching I could not wring it from my mind. A thousand times I have waked in the night, cold with terror, imagining Will's ghost stood beside the bed to rebuke me. Still I have striven to drown such thoughts, and to steel my heart against all memories of the past, until now it is too late to make recompense. Terrible words, too late! too late!"

"It is not too late," answered the spirit, "you can yet do much to make amends for your past life. Strive to live for some one besides yourself. Gladden your own heart by making others happy. If you can smooth out a frown of disappointment or care, and place a smile in its stead you have done something that will lighten your own sorrows more than all the wealth in the universe. Remember this, Tom Skinner. And now the fire burns low, and the air is becoming chilly, so I must say farewell." As the little spirit ceased speaking, a bright flame shot up the chimney, and he went with it.

Tom sat for a long while, perfectly dazed, gazing vacantly into the fire. A fantastic maze of long forgotten scenes and figures, was whirling before him. Presently there came a sound, like a slow dignified rapping at the door. "Come in," he cried, starting to his feet. No one entered. He sighed heavily, rubbed his eyes, and was surprised to find the noise proceeded from the clock upon the mantel striking twelve. The lamp burned with a dull and smoky flame. On the hearth a few dark red embers were all that remained of the cheerful fire, and there was a lonely chill about the room.

Tom endeavored to collect his scattered senses. "I have been sleeping for a long while," he murmured, "and yet I could not have dreamed it all." No! A heavy load seemed to have fallen upon his heart; his cheeks were still wet with tears, and his lips continued to repeat: "Strive to live for some one besides yourself. Gladden your own heart by making others happy."

Another hour had nearly passed and still Tom sat musing. Many pictures besides those the Fire Spirit had shown floated before him. The clock upon the mantel struck one, and the sound awoke him from his reverie. Rising slowly from his chair, he blew out the smoky light and retired to his bed-room. It was useless, however, for him to try and sleep, the struggle going on within banished all thoughts of rest. Nervously he tossed from side to side.

There were times, when the old spirit of selfishness brooded over him, and then again his mind would be filled with regrets for the past and brighter hopes for the future. Thus in a bitter struggle with himself Tom passed the long, weary hours of the night.

He was lying wide awake when the gray light of a winters morning began to steal through the closed curtains, and as the sun grew stronger, and the shadows of the night were lifted, the gloom that had surrounded Tom's life for years went with them and was lost forever.

PART III.

After his breakfast Tom emerged from the House muffled in his chin, and walked briskly toward the railroad depot. He was going to visit his sister, who lived in a village a short distance from the city. There was not a cloud in the sky, and Tom thought he had never seen a more bright and cheerful morning. True, the air was keener than it had been the evening before, but he did not seem to feel it now, as he was chuckling to himself at the thoughts of the surprise his appearance would cause. He rather doubted that his welcome would be a very warm one, but then he would soon arrange that satisfactorily. Here he again broke out into such a hearty laugh that it set him coughing, and made several people turn round and wonder what was the cause of so much hilarity.

Tom was as delighted with the prospect of a journey as a child. Securing a seat near the window he watched attentively every object as the train flew along. Several ponds were passed crowded with merry skaters. It made him feel young again to see them skimming gaily over the ice, and his feet tingled to join in their sport. Indeed, everything was so pleasant, and time passed so quickly, that Tom was surprised when the brakeman called out the name of the station at which he was to leave the train.

It was a wonderful little village, so Tom thought. The streets were filled with sleighs, and the merry tinkling of the bells mingling with the shouts of laughter raised his spirits higher than ever. Even the stores were tastefully decorated with hemlock and holly, and presented so many attractions that Tom was obliged to stop a number of times. There was a merry twinkle in his eye as at each place he gave particular directions to the clerk as to where, and how the goods he purchased were to be sent.

In spite of the unbounded joy which Tom felt in the anticipation of seeing once more the dear ones, whom he had so long neglected, he became terribly nervous as he drew near his sister's house. There was a choking sensation in his throat which he could not get rid of, and his heart beat until it seemed as if he could hear it. Twice he passed the house before he could sufficiently control his feelings to walk up the short flight of steps and knock at the door. He waited breathlessly for an answer to his summons, but the moment he heard footsteps approaching, an almost uncontrollable desire to run away took possession of him. He might have done so had not the door been quickly opened by a little girl who was the living picture of the sweet child whom the Fire Spirit had shown him. There were the same blue eyes, gentle face, and long, curling hair. Tom knew she was his niece, and bent down to kiss her; but the child drew back with a low cry of alarm.

"She does not know me," Tom sighed to himself, and then, with the same breath, came the words, "Nor would she like me better if she did." He was an entire stranger to one who should have known and loved him, and the blame was all his own; this was a bitter thought indeed. Turning to the child, Tom asked if her father was in. With a shy manner she invited Tom into the parlor, and then hurried away as if she was afraid of him.

The room in which Tom was left standing alone though neat was very plainly furnished. But one picture relieved the bareness of the walls; but had there been a thousand there, this one only would have attracted Tom's attention. It was an old-fashioned painting of his mother, that had hung at his bed-side in the cottage years ago. Many a long-forgotten scene it brought back; memories of boyish days and early manhood. Tom was lost in reverie before it, and his eyes grew misty at the thoughts to which it gave birth. Suddenly a low and earnest conversation near at hand drew his attention aside. Turning quickly around he found the door leading to the adjoining room was partially open, and from thence the voices proceeded.

At first the tones were so low Tom could not distinguish what was said; but one of the speakers seemed to become angry, for he broke out in a loud harsh tone: "I tell you I can wait no longer; I must be paid."

The reply was indistinct, though Tom strained his ears to catch it. In a few moments the angry voice continued:

"Nonsense, that is an old excuse. You are no more sick than I am. What difference does it make to me, anyway, whether you are able to work or not? I want my money, and must have it, at once." Tom stole softly to the door and looked in. There was silence for sometime, and then the one who had spoken last continued:

"It is useless to talk about delays; I shall not wait another day. To-morrow I must either have every penny due me or you leave this house."

The answer came clearly this time:

"But to-morrow is Christmas. You can surely wait until after that; besides," and here the voice sank lower, "my wife has written to her brother for help."

"Pshaw! Another excuse to put me off. Have you any idea your brother will help you?"

"No," I have not," faltered the second speaker; "but give me one week more. I will find some way of paying you—only one week."

"One week! Wouldn't you like to live here a year for nothing," was the sneering answer. No? not a single day. Mark my words—either I receive every cent by to-morrow morning, or—" here the man clapped his hands and pointed toward the door.

With the first words that Tom heard of this conversation something seemed to whisper in his ear (and it must have been the voice of conscience): "Do you admire the character of this man? Do you not see a resemblance between your former self and him?" A mingled feeling of shame and anger sent the blood boiling through every vein in Tom's body. Several times his hand had trembled upon the knob of the door; but when he heard those last harsh words, and saw the almost fiendish motion of the man who uttered them, he could contain himself no longer. Throwing the door fiercely open, he burst into the room, and, in a voice choked with anger, exclaimed:

"I say he shall not go. How much is owing you?"

The person addressed was a little dried up, wizen-faced man, who was so astonished at Tom's sudden appearance that for some time he seemed to have lost his voice. At last he managed to stammer forth "Twenty dollars, sir."

"Sign the receipts you have there at once, and here is the money," added Tom, throwing it down upon the table.

The man did as he was bid, then picking up the notes, counted them carefully and tenderly placed them in his pocket.

"Now go!" said Tom imitating the man's motion of a few moments before by slapping his hands and pointing towards the door, "Do you understand me, go!"

"Certainly, sir, certainly! I am very sorry to have made so much trouble, sir, very sorry; but you see I am poor——"

"Miser!" interrupted Tom, turning sharply upon him.

The man seemed frightened at Tom's vehemence; at first; but assuming a disagreeable smile he answered, "Ha! Ha! You are joking, sir. No! No! I am a poor man." He continued to shake his head and to mumble to himself, long after he had reached the street.

This whole affair had taken place so quickly that Tom had scarcely noticed his brother-in-law, who was standing at the lower end of the room. He had not spoken a word since Tom entered; but now that they were alone he advanced, and, taking Tom by the hand, exclaimed, in a bewildered, questioning tone, "Thomas Skinner?"

"Yes, Jack, Thomas Skinner, but very different. I hope, from the one you have always known. You see I received the letter and have come to answer it in person. You will let me spend Christmas with you, won't you?"

Tom felt the grip tighten upon his hand as his brother-in-law answered: "Yes, Tom, bless you, yes. Your visit is like that of an angel of mercy."

The two men stood with clasped hands gazing into each other's faces; for some moments neither one spoke. Jack was the first to break the silence by saying:

"I cannot tell you, Tom, one-half the gratitude I feel. You have lifted a heavy burden from my heart."

"And from my own, too, though I have done no more than I ought. But it is cold in here," added Tom, glancing towards the empty grate, "you must not spare the wood now, Jack; let us have a bright, roaring fire; and you must cheer up; I do not like to see you looking so pale and sick. What has been the matter?"

"Anxiety more than anything else, but it does me good to see you. You are really growing younger instead of older, and have changed very much."

"I hope I have, Jack, there was room for it. But tell me," he continued, after pacing nervously up and down the room a few moments, "how are mother and sister?"

"They would both be well were it not worrying about me. I am sure they will be very happy now, and glad to see you. Wait a moment and I will tell them you are here."

While Jack was speaking, Tom heard some one coming softly down the stairs. At last the footsteps reached the hall and slowly approached the room where he was standing. Tom knew them well, though they seemed to have grown feeble since he heard them last. What strange cautious sweep over him in those few moments! His hands trembled and his breath was hurried. A form bent with years entered the room. The next instant Tom's arms were clasped around it, and a voice that sounded sweeter than all the music in the world, murmured: "My dear, dear Tom! I knew it was your voice. God bless you for coming to us!"

These words seemed a bitter rebuke to him. What had he done to deserve a blessing? Left her to want and suffer without even a kind word to cheer. He tried to speak, but something filled his throat. He could only fold her closer to his bosom and kiss her wrinkled brow. If this better change had not come upon him until after she was no more, until it was too late to obtain her forgiveness, what a void his life would have been. He did not wish to think of it.

A few moments later Tom was standing with one arm around his mother, and the other clasped by his sister. Not a word was spoken for several moments, but upon each face there was a look of thankful, peaceful joy that no words could ever have expressed.

PART IV.

If there ever was a perfectly happy family in the world, it was the one that gathered around Tom Skinner at the tea table that evening. True, there was but little to eat, though Tom declared that he had never enjoyed a meal so much before. Jack seemed to grow brighter and better every moment, and eat with a remarkable relish for sick man. Tom's fund of jokes and queer stories was unending; he kept everybody in a roar of laughter. At the very height of the merriment there came a ring at the bell. In an instant there was silence. Jack went to the door and they could hear him holding the following conversation:

"There must be some mistake, are you sure they are to be left here?"

"Yes sir, they were ordered and paid for this morning."

It was lucky for Tom that the attention of those around him was attracted by what was going on at the door. With the first tinkle of the bell his face turned scarlet. He covered it with his handkerchief under the pretense of blowing his nose, which he did, in so vigorous a manner that it bid fair to destroy that useful organ.

Presently Jack returned with both hands full; in one was a turkey, of enormous dimensions, and in the other a basket of cranberries and two large heads of celery.

Tom was intent upon his tea. Indeed, from the way in which he buried his nose in the cup, you would have thought he was trying to get his whole head in it. Remarkably warm tea it must have been, too, judging from the color of Tom's face.

No one thought anything more about eating that evening. A corner of the table was quickly cleared, and the turkey was laid out in state to be gazed at and admired. "What a monster! So fat and tender! Won't he be good, eh?" were the remarks of the delighted children; and then would arise the puzzling question, where did all these good things come from. Upon this point Tom appeared as profoundly ignorant as any one, and having now composed himself, he joined most heartily, and naturally, in the mingled expressions of praise and wonder. Before this perplexity had begun to be solved, there came another ring at the door. It was the grocer this time, and if there had been cause for wonder before, it was certainly increased tenfold now. There were packages of nuts, raisins, oranges, cans of preserved fruits and vegetables, and bundles of various kinds of crackers. Before these treasures were safely deposited, along came a boy from the bakers, bringing a fine mince pie, and a number of tempting looking tarts. Jack tried to remonstrate, and persisted there must be some mistake; but the directions were plainly written, and the goods being all paid for, he was obliged to submit.

There was no use of Tom trying to contain himself any longer. He sneezed once or twice; was attacked by a fit of coughing, and even went so far as to get into a corner and stuff his handkerchief into his mouth. But even this would not answer now. The looks of mingled joy and bewilderment, the expressions of gratitude and wonder, the dazzling anticipations of to-morrow's feast were more than he could endure, so he broke out into a loud, hearty laugh.

"Tom Skinner!" exclaimed Jack, "I believe it's you, why I'm sure of it. What nonsense that I didn't think of you before."

My! what a scene followed this explosion; it would have softened the hardest hearted person in the world to have seen it. Jack rung Tom's hand until it ached, while the children climbed upon his knees and covered his face with kisses. But there was not a more beaming face, or a lighter heart than Thomas Skinner's among them all. He never imagined he could be so happy. If he could only have run up and down stairs a few times, or have stood on his head, or, in fact, have done anything very extraordinary, he felt it would be a relief to his pent-up feelings. Tom contented himself, however, by becoming one of the jolliest, best natured, most lovable old fellows you ever beheld. His capacity for making himself agreeable seemed unbounded, and though this faculty had been unused for years, it now rose with all the more brilliancy. He played blind-man's buff with the children, and was the biggest child of them all. In his endeavors to escape he upset a kettle of hot water, stepped on the cat's tail, bumped his head a dozen times, and kept everybody crying with laughter.

At last, when they were all out of breath, and Tom had been trying for a long while without succeeding in catching any one, the game was broken off, and they gathered around the fire to pop corn. The grate was filled with two large oak logs, which roared and crackled in the most cheering way possible, as if to challenge the cowl air that rattled around the shutters. If there ever was a fire possessed of a cheerful spirit, it must have been this one.

In a short time everything was ready. Tom seized the popper, and began to shake it over a bed of hot coals. The children watched him eagerly. Before long there was a significant crackling, then came a sharp "pop," and a large white ball was seen rolling among the smaller kernels. Another report soon followed, then another and another, each one being answered by a shout. In a short time a large platter was filled with the most tempting-looking popcorn, and when Jack had sprinkled a little salt over this it was declared by all to be a dish fit for a king.

No one had thought to light a lamp, as it was much pleasanter to sit by the light of the fire and watch the weird shadows the ruddy flames cast upon the wall.

It was just the time for a story, and the children crowded around, begging Tom to tell them one, which he did. It was a Christmas tale filled with those delightful fancies which have always been so attractive to children. His mother had repeated this story to him when a boy, and though he had not thought of it since, it now came back to him as vividly as though he had only learned it yesterday.

When he had finished, the youngest of the children, looking wistfully at him, said: "I wish Santa Claus would come here; we are too poor, though. Papan says he never visits poor people." Her head hung down in a disappointed manner. The next moment her face was beaming with a comfident smile. Throwing her arms around Tom's neck, she said: "Perhaps he would come if you would ask him. Won't you, Uncle Tom?"

Tom bent over, and kissing the chubby lips, answered: "Uncle has asked him, darling. You must all hang up your stockings to-night, and Santa Claus will fill them, I am sure."

Tom made another trip to the village that evening, and, when he returned laden with bundles, there were four empty little stockings hanging from the mantle; but, throughout our broad land, I do not think the bright Christmas sun rose upon happier children, or fuller stockings.

Long after everyone else had retired, Tom and his mother sat by the fire. He seemed to be musing as he watched the embers; for his lips moved as if he was repeating something to himself. It was this: "Sure to live for someone besides yourself. Gladden your own heart by making others happy."

Suddenly the clock began striking twelve, and before it had ceased the church bells rang out their joyous greeting. Tom leaned forward, and putting one hand upon her shoulder, softly said, "Merry Christmas, mother!"

She clasped his hand in hers and answered, "God bless you, Tom;" then placing her arms around his neck, she drew him closer to her. The chimers were still ringing.

"You hear them," she whispered.

"Yes," he replied.

"They never sounded so merry as on this Christmas morn."

Lady Laura Ridding, wife of the Bishop of Southwell, England, is promoting a movement for instituting at Nottingham a number of "evening homes" for girls who are engaged all day at the factories, and at the close of their labors desire some entertainment. A feature of these evening homes will be cheerful society.

A PLEA FOR A HAPPY CHRISTMAS.

Oh, thou, restless, lonely heart,
That dread'st the sound of Christmas Day,
Can'st thou not lose thyself for once,
And learn to praise, as well as pray!

What though the joys of other days
Are seen now through a mist of fears?
Hast thou no gratitude for Him
Who came to soothe a way all fears?

Hark! list to the angelic song
That floats through Bethlehem's quiet air!
Once more behold the heavenly light
That maketh peace take place of care.

Now see outstretched a baby hand,
Tender and small, yet, oh! so long;
For lo! within its tiny grasp
It holds a whole world's shame and wrong.

Yes, then away with selfish grief!
Not e'en our sins shall bow us down,
For from the Manger that small hand
Has power to smooth the Godhead's frown.

Then peace in Heaven, and peace on earth,
And peace in every trusting heart;
No aching loss shall have the power
From Christmas joy my soul to part.

Use not this time to weep, or mourn,
Or dwell on any pain we feel,
But by the babe of Bethlehem
With lowly, grateful praise to kneel.

Then, by the love He shows us there,
To turn to all in care or grief,
And tell them of the Christ child born,
To bring to every wound relief.

Join, then, with ardent, loving praise,
In all that makes our Christmas glad,
And dare not offer Christ, the Lord,
A heart that willingly is sad.

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH TRAVEL.

BY M. MEDLICOTT.

Lichfield.

It is a long, but very pleasant, and in parts of the road a charming railway ride from Edinburgh through Carlisle, skirting rather than passing through the Westmoreland hills, to Lichfield. Leaving Edinburgh about 10 o'clock of a Monday morning in early September and speeding southward, new beauties opened up to us, though only passing glimpses, and especially would one have liked to make a stay of a few hours at Carlisle, and then to take a peep over the other side of the Langdale Pikes and Helvellyn, and visit the homes of Wordsworth and Southey. But time did not permit, for my course was marked out for the next three or four days, and not even for these lovely haunts of the poet would I forego my anticipated treat at Worcester, which might never again fall in my way, and Lichfield lay in my path thereto. But even the "other side" of the hills was suggestive, as they were lovely enough to warrant day-dreams and mental pictures.

So early evening found me alighting at Lichfield station, a little outside the city, nothing remarkable in situation or surroundings, lying in the heart of colliery regions, but without the wild picturesqueness one expects to find in such a country. Indeed, the southern part of Staffordshire, where the coal-fields abound, is merely an undulating, fertile country, producing many vegetables, but showing only that quiet, rural beauty so characteristic of the midlands of England, alternating with the smokiness of the large, busy towns.

Lichfield has had an eventful history, dating from remote times, can we say how remote? Bede calls it Licid-fleld, or "Dead Men's Field" and tradition assigns this name to a massacre of British Christians, said to have taken place near here during the reign of the Emperor Diocletian. So if this be true, not only was this part of the country peopled during the early centuries of the Christian era, but true worshippers of God were to be found here. Then the mists of the past again enshroud the picture, till in the seventh century we find missionaries from the North, of Irish teaching or training, sent from the Northumbrian Church, then under the care of Finan, a disciple of Iona. One of these early missionaries was Diutim, first (so-called) bishop of all this district included in the Kingdom of Mercia; and soon in turn followed St. Chad, revered almost as the patron saint of Lichfield as St. Cuthbert is at Durham, and it is really from this time, A.D. 669, that the diocese of Lichfield dates. He had already received consecration to Holy Orders through the Northern prelates, under the teaching more directly of the British Church, following St. Columba's rule; now he likewise received consecration to this office through Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury. Henceforth the history of St. Chad is the history of Lichfield, and under his fostering care and earnest, devoted labors, the Church rapidly spread among the people. Miraculous appearances and legends form part of his history, as of Columba's and Cuthbert's; and while making all the allowances this matter-of-fact nineteenth century claims in treating of such histories, we may fairly acknowledge him to have been a man of no common powers and abilities, one of those instruments in the Almighty's hands raised up and especially fitted to His work. The number of churches throughout this region, called after St. Chad, testify to the veneration felt for his name. In the last half of the eighth century, the King of Mercia at that time, the powerful Offa, Overlord of all England as he styled himself, jealous of the supremacy of Canterbury, obtained from the Pope of Rome the privilege of an archiepiscopal see for Lichfield. For twenty years the bishop signed documents as Archbishop of Lichfield, on equal terms with the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, old and feeble, submitted reluctantly to his loss of dignity. After the death of king and pope this right was again annulled, but still Lichfield claimed rank next to Canterbury, coming before Lincoln, Winchester, or London. At this time, and for many years previously, this was one of the largest dioceses in England, being almost parallel in extent with the Kingdom of Mercia. Eleven dioceses have been formed wholly or in part from her limits, so both age and extent warranted somewhat such assumption of power.

So time passed over our city. Britons, Romans, Saxons, even Danes, by turns masters of the country, or leaving their stamp upon it, prepared the way for future growth and development. With the advent of the Normans came fresh changes, one of which was that from this time (1066) till 1836, nearly eight hundred years, no bishop took his title from Lichfield, as this was only a village, and they (the bishops) must take their title from and reside in large towns. First Chester, then Coventry, was the seat of the bishopric, and after Chester was separated from the mother-diocese, the title was still Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, and many were the unseemly struggles for supremacy between the two towns, more especially between the monks of each place, both claiming the right of election.

The chief interest in Lichfield now is the cathedral itself, and this formed the object of my present visit, though a very enjoyable evening, passed with acquaintances living here, forms also a pleasant memory. Early morning found me exploring the town and surroundings of the cathedral, till it should be time for morning prayers. Very lovely and graceful is the cathedral, rising from its green setting of trees and grass, the three spires which form a distinguishing feature of this building, rising, one might almost say, emblematical in harmony of the Triune God. Especially from the south side, beyond the minster pool, does the beauty of design impress itself upon me, but from whatever point we view it, our admiration is called forth. One of the smallest of English cathedrals, it is yet, by its almost perfect proportions and beauty of detail, one of the most pleasing of any. The west front is beautiful, and bears much study, with its three deeply recessed doorways, the rows of statues above in niches, St. Chad in the centre, and on either hand kings of England, twenty-four in all, from Oswy of Northumberland to Richard II., the whole surmounted (rather incongruously) by a figure of Charles II., in consideration of his having supplied timber from the royal chases for the repair of the building! Many of these figures were destroyed during the Reformation, and in the early part of the present century were repaired or restored. A beautiful window crowns all, and the two symmetrical spires rise in graceful dignity on either side. But before entering, stop for a moment to look at the doorways with their rich mouldings and decorative carvings. Are they not exquisite? The deeply-recessed central doorway is a double one; in niches against the pillars are statues, in the centre the Virgin and Infant, and on the sides St. Peter and St. John, and the two Marys, while above, between the arches of the door, is a carving of our Lord attended by angels.

Now as we enter, what a lovely yet rich vista opens out to us? We must take in first with a comprehensive glance, the harmonious effect of all combined, ere trying to find out what composes this beautiful whole. Indeed, it is not easy to pick out details or to give a description. But gradually we observe the heavy pillared columns with their foliated capitals rising into the pointed Gothic arch; above, the deeply recessed double arches of the triforium, each arch again subdivided, with dog-tooth carving round all; and above, again, the clerestory windows, peculiar in their design, triangular-shaped, with rounded sides, containing three circles, in each and the same dog-tooth carving round all. A beautifully wrought brass and copper screen separates nave from choir. This, too, is lovely beyond telling, everything seeming so perfect and finished, from the same pillared columns and wide arches, to the exquisite reredos of Derbyshire marble and alabaster, containing carvings of the Crucifixion, emblems of the Evangelists, etc. The pavement of the choir gives representations of scenes in the early history of the see. Above and beyond the recess gleam the windows of the Lady Chapel, looking, with their brilliant and sparkling coloring, as though inlaid with jewels, throwing out into more gleaming contrast the whiteness of the re-redos. The choir aisles contain many monu-esting, however, perhaps most so of anything in the building, is the tomb of the late Bishop Selwyn, so loved and revered by all who know aught of the history of the English Church. It is in the Lady Chapel, east of the choir, in a niche or recess in one side, an oblong tomb, with a recumbent figure of the bishop on top, exquisitely carved in alabaster, an excellent likeness, ing the Word of God from the missionary; the other giving a scene from actual experience perhaps, in his Lichfield work—no less missionary labor—among the miners of the district. They are fit memorials of one whose life was spent for others and in the service of his Master. A fascination rests over the history and memory of Bishop Selwyn, and this indeed, was one reason for ments of men noted in the history of the cathedral and the city, but the most beautiful one is in memory of two children of the Rev. W. Robinson, the master-piece of Chantry it is said to be; and, truly, nothing more lovely or touching can be conceived than the two sleeping children, one enfolded in the other's arms, the snowdrops on the breast fit emblems of innocence and tranquility. One could stay long gazing at this sweet picture in marble. Still more inter-one thinks, even though he does not know. It is so life-like in outline, yet so still and cold; surely it is a long, sound sleep he rests in, ay! the sleep of death! But "he being dead yet speaketh," and his works do follow him. One of the rich painted windows of this chapel is directly behind this tomb, and at either end of the recess are frescoes, one representing a scene from his New Zealand episcopate, several figures on the sea-shore, one of them a native of the country receiv-

my visiting the cathedral, now more fully than ever before, associated with his name. Fitting spot, too, for his last resting-place! The shadow of her walls rests upon his grave, just outside the site of his tomb, or, more properly, monument, yet where the sun can shine upon it, and the green grass and daisies wave over it, as on the day we stood beside it.

But I meant to speak further of the Lady Chapel, especially of the rich glass in its windows, giving color to all that end of the cathedral. Two of them are filled with coats of arms of bishops and prebends of Lichfield. The seven others came from a Cistercian nunnery near Liège, and are among the finest, if not the finest, in England, beautiful specimens of Flemish glass of the early part of the sixteenth century. The arched around the sides of the chapel, under the windows, is also very beautiful. The window of the south transept contains some of the same kind of glass as in the chapel.

This cathedral, like others in England, is of various ages, and embodies different styles of building. Probably no building was raised here during the life-time of St. Chad, who built his first church at Stowe, a few miles off, where also he was buried, though now his bones lie in the R. C. Cathedral at Birmingham, the Shrine of St. Chad, which once stood between choir and Lady Chapel, having entirely disappeared. No trace remains of the Saxon building first reared here; but little of the Norman one which succeeded it. The present edifice, began about the middle of the twelfth century, rebuilt at various times and enlarged during the next century, shows signs to the antiquarian and architect of the different changes made in it, and loses no interest for us in the thought that successive generations of men have given their best and noblest work to this and similar churches. No cloisters remain, but a beautiful chapter-house opens out by a corridor from the north aisle, and above this is the valuable library, containing, among other books and MSS., St. Chad's copy of the first three Gospels.

Other associations of interest cluster about Lichfield, the birth-place of Samuel Johnson and for years his home; the father of Joseph Addison was dean here, and the early years of the afterward famous writer and poet were passed within sight of the cathedral, but we do not feel any enthusiasm over any of these. So, early in the afternoon, we say farewell to the quiet, sleepy little town, and the pleasant, old-fashioned inn that so comfortably housed us, farewell to the lovely little cathedral, henceforth so dear to memory, and turn south again, stopping an hour or so at busy Birmingham. Can there be a greater contrast than between those two towns so near each other? One reposeful even to slothfulness, or suggesting quiet study; the other bustling, energetic, pushing, full of busy, toiling men and women, of rushing, clashing machinery, smoke and noise and hurry, thoroughly wide-awake, and taking a keen interest in all the affairs and progress of the age. Only a passing glimpse did time afford me of this busy town, and night found me in comfortable lodgings in Worcester, ready for the famous "Three Choirs Festival," of which some account will follow.

THE REV. GEORGE D. WILDES, S.T.D.,
General Secretary of the Church Congress, and Rector of Christ Church, "Riverdale," New York City.

Christ church, Riverdale, is situated in the upper ward of the City of New York, its site in the midst of a beautiful section having in full view the Palisades, on the opposite side of the Hudson River. About three hundred acres of ground, owned by gentlemen of wealth who are in business in New York, are covered with the delightful homes of forty or fifty families of the same social and other charities of the Church. It was started in 1806, and the first and only rector it has had after it received formal organization, has been the Rev. George Dudley Wildes, S. T. D., of whose labors in the ministry we offer the following sketch:

Dr. Wildes is a native of Newburyport, Mass., and the oldest son of the late Hon. A. W. Wildes, a distinguished lawyer of Massachusetts. His preparation for Harvard University was made at the High School, Newburyport; Dummer Academy, Newbury, Mass., and Phillips' Academy, Exeter, N. H. On graduation, he became Usher in Mathematics at Chauncey Hall School, Boston, meanwhile awaiting a commission as lieutenant in the United States regular army. He was baptized and confirmed in Grace church, Boston, and entered upon the study of divinity under the present Bishop of Rhode Island and the Rev. Drs. J. S. Stone and A. H. Vinton.

As a candidate for Holy Orders, he had charge of Trinity chapel, afterwards St. Stephen's church, and of the Mission chapel, which is now the Church of the Messiah, Boston. He entered the senior class of the Virginia Theological Seminary, at Alexandria, and was graduated by that institution. He was then ordained deacon in Massachusetts by the Bishop of Kentucky, officiating during the illness of Bishop Eastburn. Invited to the professorship of mathematics in Shelby College, Ky., and declining, he became assistant to Bishop Eastburn in Trinity church, Boston, and afterwards rector of Grace church, New Bedford.

Resigning this charge while ill, he became assistant-minister in St. Paul's, Boston, and Supervisor of the Episcopal School for young ladies of the diocese. For three years of the same period he was one of the State examiners in mathematics, of Harvard University. These duties were terminated by his paying a visit to Europe, on his return from which he preached in Boston the Election sermon, and became associate with the Rev. Dr. J. S. Stone at St. Paul's, Brookline, Mass. Subsequently he accepted the rectorship of Grace church, Salem, Mass., where he remained nearly eight years. At this time he was appointed by the Governor and Council of Massachusetts one of the eight members of the State Board of Education, holding the position until his removal to his present charge, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Phillips Brooks, D. D.

It was during his rectorship at Salem that the civil war broke out, and in the emergencies of the hour, he engaged with spirit, being instrumental in raising the Twenty-third and Nineteenth Massachusetts regiposition, and these constitute the most part of the parish.

The church building, which is a beautiful specimen of Early English in stone, was the last parish church of which the elder Upjohn was architect. Nearly all the windows are memorial gifts, and are either of English or continental glass. The font, brasses, and other accessories of the church are also memorial. Besides this costly and tasteful house of worship, there are embraced in the beautiful grounds a rectory and other parish buildings constructed in perfect keeping with the church.

The parish, through individuals, or its offertory, is proportionately one of the largest contributors to the various missionary ments, forming also the Field Hospital Corps, and with sixty men, volunteering as its head for service with the Army of the Potomac. He was appointed the first chaplain of the Second Massachusetts Infantry, and eventually commissioned as chaplain of the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts infantry.

Soon after the war had closed and while he was still rector of Grace Church, Salem, he was elected to his present charge at Riverdale, New York City, where he has been rector for eighteen years.

From the inception of the Church Congress, he has held the office of General Secretary, being one of the original founders of the Congress. He has been exceedingly active in promoting its interests, and indeed has become most widely known through his efforts in its behalf.

Dr. Wildes has been a frequent writer on literary topics, and has edited several theological and other works. He has also contributed to Church and secular magazines and reviews. During the East Indian Mutiny, known as the Sepoy Rebellion, a series of his articles on the British rule in India was published in Boston in the Daily Evening Transcript, in whose columns his "Letters from Abroad" had previously appeared. Several of his orations and addresses, together with occasional sermons, have been printed in public journals. Among these may be mentioned orations at Newburyport and Salem, an Historical Address at Newbury, a sermon before the Ancient and Honorable Artillery of Massachusetts at its 234th anniversary, an oration delivered in the Old South Church, Boston, at the fiftieth anniversary of the New England Guards, a treatise on "Unity through the Papacy," Price Lectures at Trinity, Boston, on "Popular Infidelity, Colenso and Renan," and addresses and speeches at the several sessions of the Church Congress. Dr. Wildes has received the degree of honorary A.M. from Harvard, also that of Doctor in Divinity from the College of Kansas, and that of S.T.D. ad eundem from Hobart College.

CHRISTMAS DAY THOUGHTS.

A PECULIAR LESSON OF THE NATIVITY.—The Nativity especially honors infancy and womanhood. Manhood had been glorified. War was a profession; muscular sport, a glory. But tenderness and weakness had had no spokesman till our religion came as such. And, now, with the voice at once of pity and piety, infancy and womanhood found it a friend and advocate. What higher ideal of each than the pure mother and the lowly Child? Henceforth, too, a nobler idea of Deity than Jove and brute force, flashed upon the minds of men, and though later theology has not remained wholly true to this last, a better sky prevails to-day, and love and the salvation which comes of it, are preached as never before, and men adore, and adoring, believe.

THE TRUE ISRAEL.—The "Israel of God," like the Church of God, is meant to be inclusive. Not less comprehensive must we regard it than the terms under which it is proclaimed. Mary and Joseph, Zacharias and Elizabeth, Simeon and Anna, shepherds and angels, converts and disciples of to-day, all who love the Saviour, born as at this time, the faithful baptized, yea, even though with a baptism ecclesiastically irregular, behold the Israel of God; would God all were Israelites, indeed, in whom is no guile; still, an "Israel" are they, a visible body and Church of whom the Divine Son of human Mary is Head.

THE BIRTH OF THE SAVIOUR AT BETHLEHEM.—Ordinary expectation would, of course, have located the birth of the Saviour at the home and city of Joseph and Mary; but the stroke of an imperial stylus determined it at a distant village. Though only enrolment, and not for several years yet, taxation, was intended, this must be at the family district, the ancestral home of the head of the tribe. And so it was that Bethlehem, and not Nazareth, became the honored birthplace of the Son of David. Augustus wrote better than he knew; the methods of man aided on the methods of God, as to-day, in thousands of instances, they still do.

A NEW DATE.—Late in the 749th year of Rome, the parents of Jesus rejoiced in the birth of a Son; and all Jews and kinsmen and kinswomen the little land of Palestine over rejoined with them. Since then, all mankind, made one tribe and family in Christ, rejoice also. Rome, with her dates and annals, has passed away; and a new timetable has marked the new era, the era of peace and good will. Little as the shepherds who were watching the watches of the night, dreamed of it, a new sun rose on that day, and Time as it were began anew. Helena, mother of Constantine, need not have built a memorial church, the event was cut and carved upon the very dial of time itself, for the "good tidings" were to "all people" even unto the end of the world.

A DISTINCTION WITH A DIFFERENCE.—The Bible is wonderfully simple: what book more so? Though the birth of the Saviour was the greatest event in all human history, how plainly and how devoid of all ornamentation, it is told in that volume. If ever there was a temptation to the sacred penmen to indulge in rhetorical elegance, it was in this case, yet, though capable of yielding to it, being only men, they either restrained themselves, or were restrained, from it. Between human works and this work is, then, this characteristic difference, a difference, too, which strikingly exists between the canonical and the apocryphal gospels; a difference, furthermore, which at once endears and authenticates the sacred volume.

AN ANNUAL JOURNEY.—Leaving Nazareth, making the Plain of Esdras, with Taber on the left and Dothan on the right; passing Samaria, then called Sebaste, Greek for Augusta, a delicate flattery of Herod's to the reigning emperor, to whom he was a sycophantie underling; then Sychar, half way between Judea and Galilee, Ebal and Gerizim in full view; thence over the hills of Akrahbim, the frontier between Samaria and Judea; thence by Shiloh, Gilgal, the Valley of Baca, Gophna, Bethel, Ramah, Gibson, Mizpeh, Jerusalem itself, thence to Bethlehem by the way of Rachel's tomb and an hundred other sacred spots—this was the way of Joseph and Mary to the little town of Ruth and Boaz, the ancestral home of the greatest of the kings of their native land; though changed to-day, not changed, nor ever can be, the solemnity and sacredness of this journey marked by these great milestones, and at this season of the Nativity, one loves to dwell upon it, and as it were, travel it in their company, as spot by spot it annually recurs.

CHRISTMAS CAROL.

BY THE REV. HENRY V. SATTERLEE, D.D.

Sleep, holy Babe, upon Thy mother's breast, Lured down by love from mansions of the blest,
This home alone is found on earth for Thee,
Who left the skies to save mankind and me.

Sleep, holy Babe, while angel voices sigh,
All soft and low, do chant thy lullaby.
Oh, may our hearts Thy hallowed birthday greet
With joy like theirs, and songs as pure and sweet.

Sleep, holy Babe, while shepherds round Thee bend:
Their flocks they leave, the Lamb of God to lead;
So, while this sinful world is plunged in sleep,
At Thy dear side may we fond watches keep.

Sleep, holy Babe; in lowly childhood's shrine
The God of Heaven reveals his life divine;
The pure in heart alone Thy halo see:
Oh, make me, Lord, a little child like Thee.

UNDER WHICH PRONOUN?

BY REV. R. W. LOWRIE.

VII.

My Dear, I again thank you for your letter, and none the less for your criticisms. If I do not answer all your questions, it may be either that I cannot, or that I do not try; sometimes silence is gold. Then again, in a correspondence like this, much must be implied, and some matters left for future writing—possibly a personal "chat." I try not to be deep. I have lately had some manuscript editorially rejected because "too learned." Since then I have not dared to write as wise as I could.

You ask me, under which king, in your playful way; I reply, under which pronoun? If your friend is a disciple of the God Force, or Energy, he will rally to the standard of It. We have a better Deity; worship thou Him. The philosopher has his god, I admit. By night the devout astronomer, said Young, is mad; and by day it is only the fool who cordially says, there is no God. "One day telleth another, and one night certifieth another." And so loudly do the heavens declare the glory of God, and does the firmament show His handiwork, that read downright atheism, like parricide to the Roman law, is simply out of the question. You say I write with philosophic coolness; I trust you meant with more than philosophic. "I fear God, dear Abner, and have no other fear," you remember. When the wind blows, I let it. In fact, er there any atheists? Deists—agnostics—et id omne genus (excuse the learning) there are; but even Voltaire was no atheist—he had too much sense! Yes, philosophy has its deity, though it may call it General Law. It has its creed, too, a painted ship upon a painted sea. Beautiful, as glittering as a bit of bright tin, and as unsatisfying as a bath of saw-dust. Trust it not; put not your trust in the princes of philosophy. All that they can say is, obedience to law brought you into this world; by obedience to law, you may be measurably happy while here; when you go hence, it will be in obedience to the natural law of your being; and the same great law, which, without your consent, brought you into one world, will, quite undoubtedly, take care of you when it shall be pleased to carry you into another.

The god of deistic philosophy, thus, would seem to be the pronoun "It"—spelled with a capital I. Cowper said:

"There is a pleasure in poetic pains Which none but poets know."

There must be in philosophic pains which none but philosophers do, if we may judge by the way in which this pronoun receives its apotheosis at their hands. For one, I cannot sit at their feet, nor kneel at those of their demi-god. Not so, unto mine ears, has the sound of the spheres gone out into all lands, their words into the end of the world. But take law, this abstraction, give it a heart, make it love and throb, attribute with the reverent spiritual imagination, a thousand glorious things to it; take the best thoughts and things of earth, the holiest donations from time and sense, and refer all these to it; then call it by a higher name; clothe this august Being, as with a mantle, in all the best that thought can bring, and then, even, confess that it is no robe fit for His more than imperial shoulders, and you begin to have some due conception of Him whose throne is Heaven; and the earth, with all its seas and lands, is His footstool. Said a member of the French Academy: "Is all this chance? Perhaps. But, to me, it seems to deserve a better name." And so—Is all this only Law? Nay; let us call it better. It is God.

I know your friend . . . is "pur et sans reproche" among men;—

"Of manners, gentle; of affections, mild;
In wit, a man; in simplicity a child."

and I would rather see a man moral and not "religious," than "religious," yet not moral. Still, beware of his deistic philosophy. One prayer, one good act will teach you more of heavenly things than all his theories and hypotheses. I fault him not. Judge nothing before the time. Only lean not on his staff, and put not on the armor of this would-be Saul. Remember David and his smooth-stones from the book.

I know that there are times when our faith and trust in God seem to experience a temporary check. And it is discouraging, while disheartening, and a cause of despair, it were wicked to allow it to become. And thousands misunderstand such an one as . . . has misunderstood you. Then the officious friend appears. He presents us with counsellances. If we sorrow deeply, he calls it unbelief, and virtually asks us kindly to try to be just so many stones. He tells us to go home and be resigned, in perhaps somewhat such a tone as that in which he would advise us to try a pill or a jalap. As if the Christian graces and virtues were commodities in the marketplace, and resignation could be had for the asking. Patience, and love, and faith, and submission, are not weighed and sold by scales of brass. They might be, if "It" were king, and dead laws its subjects and servants. Out upon such. "God is love." Hearts cry "Our Father." Though our trust be chilled, yet may it not be frozen, like ice, merely because we grieve deeply and suffer keenly. Wounds will bleed. The blow may have knocked us, for the moment, from the highest platform of the scaffold, yet we may have lodged on the next below, and, by God's grace, may soon be back where we stood before. Your friend might carve you into a Stoic, but a mere Stoic he would leave you, and nothing more.

Nay, friend, this "It" will never comfort you or . . . Tell them so. Their social meetings are foregone conclusions—wastes, and worse than wastes of Lord's Days. I grant all I can to the defendant, but I cannot betray my case for him. Our trust in God does not always shine as brightly as at times. Our way is not always lit with stars. The cup is not always full. Doubt comes, but shake it off as St. Paul did the viper from his hand; do not play with it; do not, about all things, misunderstand it, as the barbarians of Melita did that which befell the apostle when on their island; the poor, stupid folk thought it was a sure sign that though he had escaped the sea, the anger of the gods was on him for something, and that he was forsaken of heaven. Doubts are often like sparks, they look dangerous, but if let alone will often go out of themselves. Don't fan them, at any rate, by paying too much attention to them. As for those who are "all the time" suggesting them, let them go on displaying their ingenuity, and they may end as the Chinese coopers, who can make excellent hogheads but only by heading themselves in at the last!

I am glad you feel that the ship of your faith is righting itself. Give her all the sail, now, that she can carry, and the haven (heaven spelled short) will take care of itself. . .

Furthermore, do not disdain the aid of good reading—our best religious journals; even a poor crutch is better than none, and though books, and sermons even, may not satisfy you, they may help. A chunk is very apt to smoulder by itself, and go out in ashes. Nor will God forsake you; forsake not Him. Are not the ten thousand living beings which strut over the acres of a rose-leaf, clad in robes of as brilliant lues as the birds that cleave the air, and as perfectly formed as the leviathan of the deep. Your own science rebukes you. Behold the lilies of the field; was ever Solomon in all his glory arrayed like one of them?

One temptation of minds like yours is to imagine that God does not need you! What am I in the midst of all this cosmos? True, He does not in certain senses, which are too obvious to need mentioning to you; but, in other senses, He does. You are a part of His plan; you have a destiny; you cannot evade it; you should not shirk it. And it touches this life, as well as the other. Do your duty, and you do help God ("the idea!" you say); yes, he needs you in this reverent sense; He needs the animalcule even, or He had not created it.

"Be not cast down," a great phrase among Methodists, and one which, with "backslide," I think very strong; yet, if though cast down, still not destroyed! We may be just as truly, and just as fully, crying after God from amid the darkness, as in the broad sunshine. . . . Only all this "It" will never aid us. Trust it not. Not so wrote your favorite Whittier ("These," "Thou," and "His,"—never "It."):

"And so, beside the Silent Sea,
I wait the muffled oar:
No harm from Him can come to me,
On ocean, or on shore;
I know not where His islands lift
Their fringed pinnacles in air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.

Oh, brothers, if my faith is vain,
If hopes like these be betrayed,
Pray for me that my feet may gain
The sure and safer way;
And Thou, oh Lord, by Whom are seen
Thy creatures as they be,
Forget me if too close I lean
My human heart on Thee."

PUZZLED.

You ask me whether I'm High Church,
You ask me whether I'm Low,
I wish you'd tell the difference,
For I'm sure that I don't know.
I'm just a plain old body,
And my brain works pretty slow;
So I don't know whether I'm High Church,
And I don't know whether I'm Low.

I'm trying to be a Christian
In the plain, old-fashioned way
Laid down in my father's Bible,
And I read it every day;
Our blessed Lord's life in the Gospels,
Or a comforting Psalm of old,
Or a bit from the Revelations
Of the city whose streets are gold.

Then I pray, why I'm generally praying,
Though I don't always kneel or speak out,
But I ask the dear Lord, and keep asking
Till I fear He is all tired out;
A piece of the Litany sometimes,
The Collect, perhaps, for the day,
Or a scrap of a prayer that my mother
So long ago learned me to say.

But now my poor memory's failing,
And often and often I find
That never a prayer from the prayer-book
Will seem to come into my mind.
But I know what I want, and I ask it,
And I make up the words as I go;
Do you think that shows I ain't High Church?
Do you think that means I ain't Low?

My blessed old husband has left me,
Thirteen years since God took him away.
I know he is safe, well and happy,
And yet when I kneel down to pray,
Perhaps it is wrong, but I never Leave the old man's name out of my prayer,
But I ask the dear lord to do for him
What I would do if I was there.

Of course He can do it much better,
But He knows, and He surely won't mind
The worry about her old husband
Of the old woman left here behind,
So I pray, and I pray, for the old man,
And I'm sure that I shall till I die;
So may be that proves I ain't Low Church,
And may be it shows I am High.

My old father was never a Churchman,
But a Scotch Presbyterian saint;
Still, his white head is shining in Heaven,
I don't care who says that it ain't;
To one of our blessed Lord's mansions
That old man was certain to go,
And now do you think I am High Church?
Are you sure that I ain't pretty Low?

I tell you it's all just a muddle,
To me touch for a body like me,
I'll wait till I join my old husband,
And then we shall see what we'll see.
Don't ask me again, if you please, sir,
For really it worries me so;
And I don't know whether I'm High Church,
And I don't know whether I'm Low.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE STORY OF LITTLE VIGG: A CHRISTMAS FAIRY-TALE FROM THE SWEDISH.

BY ELIZABETH ABERCROMBIE.

As far as eye could reach up and down the moor, now glistening under its thick cover of hardly frozen snow, there was but one house to be seen—a tiny cottage, old and gray. It was a very good little cottage of its kind, and had on one side a bit of a vegetable garden, but it must have been lonely to live in, for no one will deny that except in summer-time the moor looked desolate enough.

The house and the land belonged to Mother Gertrude. She lived here with her little boy, and his name was Vigg.

Early, early that morning Mother Gertrude had gone out, far across the moor to the distant village. The sun was going down now, and still she had not come home.

Vigg was all alone in the house. Deep silence reigned over the moor far and wide. The whole day long there had not been the tinkle of a single sleigh-bell to be heard; there had not been so much as a carter by.

Vigg, with his elbows on the table, was kneeling before the window gazing out. There were four panes in the window; three of them were covered with beautiful frost-flowers, but against the fourth he had been breathing so long that the frost had quite melted off. He was waiting for Mother Gertrude, who had promised to bring home some fine wheat bread, a piece of ginger-bread, and a little Christmas-tree, for it was Christmas Eve. But as yet there was nothing to be seen of her.

By and by the sun went down, and the clouds took on a beautiful rose tint. A pink flush was reflected up and down the snowy moor, then the rich glow faded into a cold reddish blue, and it was quite dark.

Within the cottage it was even darker than outside. Vigg went to the hearth, where a few sparks were still glowing in the ashes. It was so still, it seemed to him that the sound of his wooden shoes clattering over the floor could be heard across the whole moor. He sat down by the hearth and fell to wondering whether the piece of ginger-bread he was expecting would have a head with gilded horns and four legs. He wished, too, he could know how the sparrows were faring this Christmas Eve.

It would be hard to say how long Vigg had been sitting there when he heard the sound of sleigh-bells. Springing to the window, he flattened his nose against the pane to see who it could be, for Mother Gertrude never came home in a sleigh. All the stars of heaven were aglow, gleaming and twinkling in the darkness. Far across the snow something black was moving.

It kept coming nearer and nearer, louder and louder sounded the cheerful clang of the bells.

Who could it be? Whoever it was, he did not trouble himself to keep in the road, but seemed to be coming straight on across the moor. "Oh, dear!" Vigg thought, "if I could only have a ride behind such jolly bells as those, and could drive all myself!" This wish had scarcely passed through his mind when the sleigh drove up under the window and stopped.

It was a sleigh drawn by four tiny little ponies. They stood still, for their driver kept a firm hold upon the reins; but they seemed in no wise anxious to take breath, for they neighed and snorted, shook their manes and pawed the snow.

"Ah now, don't you be impatient, Rapp! Be still, Schnapp! Whitefoot, quiet there! Lightfoot, don't jump out of your skin, I say!" cried the little old gentleman who was sitting in the sleigh. Then springing out he came up to the window.

Vigg had never seen anything like him before, but then Vigg certainly had never seen many people of any kind. He was a tiny little man, just the right size however for such steeds as these. His face was covered all over with wrinkles, and his long beard looked like the moss on the roof of the cottage. From his head to his feet he was enveloped in fur, and in one corner of his mouth he carried a pipe, while the smoke came curling out of the other.

"Good evening, little stumpy-nose," said he.

Vigg covered his nose with his hand and answered, "Good evening."

"Is anybody at home?" asked the little old gentleman.

"You can see that I'm at home."

"Yes, you're right there. It was rather a silly question I asked, but you see you are all so dark in there. I wonder at that on a Christmas Eve."

"I'm going to have some candles to light on my tree as soon as mother comes home. Only think of it! she's going to bring three!"

"Mother Gertrude hasn't got home yet then? You are all alone, and may be perhaps for another good hour to come. Aren't you afraid?"

"A Swedish boy afraid!" answered Vigg. He had learned that from Mother Gertrude.

"A Swedish boy afraid!" repeated the old gentleman, rubbing his leather-gloved hands together, and taking his pipe out of his mouth. "See here, little fellow, do you know who I am?"

"No, I don't," answered Vigg, "but then do you know who I am?"

The little old gentleman took off his hat, and making a low bow, said:

"I have the honor of addressing Vigg, the proud and doughty champion of the moor, who has lately become the happy possessor of his first pair of trousers; Vigg, that hero in whose breast not even the longest beard can strike terror. You are Vigg, and I am Santa Claus. Have I the honor of being known to you?"

"So you are Santa Claus, are you? Then you're a very good man. Mother has often told me about you."

"Many thanks for the compliment, sir. However that's neither here nor there. Vigg, will you come and take a ride with me in the sleigh?"

"I'd like to, but I can't very well, for suppose'n mother should come home and find me gone? What would happen then?"

"But I promise you shall be back before your mother gets home. A man keeps his word, and an old man his purse, says the proverb. Come now!"

Vigg sprang out. Whew! but how cold it was! and how thin Vigg's clothing felt! His jacket had grown so small that it would hardly meet round him, and his wooden shoes had made holes again in that pair of stockings that Mother Gertrude had mended so often before. But Santa Claus shut the door, put Vigg into the sleigh, drew the robes up round him, puffed such a cloud of smoke up his nose that he couldn't help giving a big sneeze, and hurrah! they were off!

Rapp and Schnapp, Whitefoot and Lightfoot flew over the snow like the wind, and the silver bells rang merrily out in the frosty air.

"Shall I drive?" asked Vigg.

"No, you are still a great deal too little for that," said Santa Claus.

"May be I am," said Vigg.

Before long they had left the moor and had entered the dark forest, of which Mother Gertrude had often told Vigg, where the trees were so tall that it almost seemed as if the stars might rest in their tops. From time to time the light from some houses could be seen glimmering through the trees.

They had not been gone very long when Santa Claus drove his little companion through the doorway of a small barn.

Between the stones of the floor there appeared a head with two glittering eyes that fixed themselves on Santa Claus' face. This was the head of the house-snake,* which it crooked into a kind of bow. Santa Claus raised his fur cap in return and said,

"Oh, kind Ring-snake from the earth. Tell me what this house is worth!"

The house-snake answered:

"Its owners spare neither strength nor pains. Yet these cows and one horse make up all their gains."

"That's not much," said Santa Claus. "However it will be more by-and-by if the husband and wife go on being so saving and prudent. They began with nothing, and they still have the old people to support. But Scheunck Ring-snake, one word more if you please. What have you got to say about the children on this farm?"

"A fine little lad, mayhap a bit wild. A sweet little lass, a good gentle child."

"Good! they must have some presents," said Santa Claus. "Now good-night Scheunck Ring-snake and pleasant Christmas dreams to you!"

"Good night Rapp, good night Schnapp, good night Whitefoot, good night Lightfoot. And now old friend, so kind and true, Santa Claus, good-night to you!"

said the Ring-snake, and drew in his head.

Behind the sleigh was a box. Santa Claus opening this took out several things. There was something for every member of the family—an A, B, C-book and a knife for the boy, a thimble and a Prayer Book for the girl, for the mother some netting-cotton and a shuttle, for the father, a calendar and a clock, and for the grandparents each a pair of spectacles. Besides these, he took out a handful of something that Vigg could not see. "Those are Christmas cards," said Santa Claus. Thus loaded he slipped with Vigg into the sitting-room. A quiet group was there gathered around the crackling fire, listening to the story of the Child Jesus, which the father was reading aloud. Santa Claus softly laid down his presents near the door, and quite unnoticed went back to the

* In several of the European countries house-snakes are cherished by the superstitious, who believe them to bring "good-luck." It was once conversing with a German tradesman, when he suddenly stopped saying, "Hark! don't you hear my house-snake singing?" It had lived in the walls of her house for many years, coming out from time to time to be fed with milk. It always made her feel happy, she told me, to hear its voice. A. E.

sleigh, followed by Vigg, whom he whisked off into the dark wood again.

"I think a great deal of children like those we saw just now," said Santa Claus.

"You must be a good boy too, Vigg."

"Of course," said Vigg.

By-and-by Santa Claus drew up before another barn. Within could be heard the Claws opened his box once more, and hurried off to the farm-house to leave an awful of presents for the children.

And so it went on from house to house. But the one that looked pleasant to Vigg, as he went peeping through all the different windows, was the minister's.

The minister Vigg could easily recognize,

"Going somewhere," muttered the gnome, "for I can't bear it here another day."

"Why is that?" inquired Santa Claus.

"The frau's a slattern, she's also a shrew, her children unneat, and quarrelsome too."

"Oh now, do try to stay just one year with the poor things," said Santa Claus in a tone of entreaty. "You know if you muffled, regular stroke of a descending flail. Santa Claus having knocked on the window-shutter, it sprang open, showing two merry little fellows with bushy eyebrows, and cheeks as round as a baby's, red caps, and gray jackets. They were thrusting by the light of a lantern so vigorously that the dust rose up around them in clouds. Santa Claus bowed and said,

"Dwarfing, dwarfing, tell me this I pray,
Tell me why it is you work so hard to-day?"

The dwarfs still swinging their flails answered,

"The sheafs they are many the workers but two, Working, and working will make the sheafs few."

"But everybody ought to rest on Christmas Eve," said Santa Claus.

The dwarfs however only shook their heads and went on with their work.

"But you haven't forgotten, I hope, where we shall meet again to-night?"

"No, no," was the answer. Then Santa for had not the good old man been ever so many times to the cottage on the moor? Hadn't he laid his hand on his head and heard what progress he made with his A, B, C's? His wife and pretty daughter he knew too, because they had always been so kind to Mother Gertrude.

Santa Claus, also, was very fond of this house, for all the inmates were kind to one another as well as to the animals under their care, making every living creature to lead a free and happy life.

They had just set off on their way again when they met a dwarf. His under lip hung down, and he looked surley and cross. "Where are you going, friend?" said Santa Claus.

go, all their chances of happiness go, too, forever. Perhaps they'll improve a little, then next year I can come and bring them some presents."

"Well, then, since you ask me," said the dwarf, turning about.

Next they drove to the castle.

"I've only got to leave some things for the king's son," said Santa Claus, "and that'll have to be done in the shortest possible time too, for we've got to be off for a visit to my own king—the mountain king—and after that, ho! for Mother Gertrude on the moor."

Once more he opened the big box, and what Vigg saw now surpassed all that had been taken out before. On a silver stand of immense size were drawn up several regiments of miniature horse and foot soldiers. A spring being touched, the men would shoulder arms, and turn to the right or left, while the horses reared and the riders brandished their swords. Upon a second stand, made to represent a sea, there was a fleet of war-ships, the guns beginning to fire into a fortress on one side, and the fortress returning the cannonade, when the proper manipulation took place.

With these costly toys Santa Claus went dashing into the palace, but he was soon back again, for the atmosphere of the court oppressed him, he said. Rapp and Schnapp, Whitefoot and Lightfoot, meanwhile, were snorting and neighing with impatience, and started off at a brisk trot the moment their master returned. "Now we will go to the mountain king," said Santa Claus, as he jumped into the sleigh.

Vigg looked grave. After a short silence he said, "Is the box empty now?"

"Nearly," said Santa Claus, putting his pipe into his mouth.

"Everybody else has had a Christmas present, haven't you got one for me?" asked Vigg.

"I haven't forgotten you, Vigg, by any means. Your present is still lying there in the bottom of the box."

"Show it to me, that's a good man."

"You can wait till you get home to your mother."

"Oh, no, Santa Claus, let me see it now," cried Vigg, impatiently.

"Well, then, see here," said Santa Claus, turning round and taking out of the box a thick pair of woollen stockings.

"Wasn't there anything more?" murmured Vigg.

"Won't they be welcome? You've got a good many holes in those you have on, haven't you?"

"Mother could have mended those. When you've given the king's son and all those other children so many beautiful presents you might have given me something as nice."

Santa Claus made no answer to this, but laid the stockings back in the box, and puffed harder than ever at his pipe. He also looked grave—very grave.

The rest of the drive continued in silence. Vigg had not a word to say. He drew down his mouth, and was cross about his woollen stockings, envying the king's son his magnificent presents. Santa Claus, too, was silent, smoking out of both corners of his mouth at once.

But the pine-trees sighed, the streams murmured, and the snow crunched under the ponies' hoofs, and thus they came, at last, to the steep mountain-side. Here they got out of the sleigh, and Santa Claus having given Rapp and Schnapp, Whitefoot, and Lightfoot, each an oil-cake, knocked against the rock. It opened, then Santa Claus took Vigg by the hand and led him into the cleft; but they had not gone many steps before Vigg began to feel afraid. It was indeed a horrible place. The utter darkness that reigned was only relieved here and there by the light which shone from the glittering eyes of poisonous snakes, and toads creeping about in the damp projections of the rocks.

"I want to go home to mother," cried Vigg.

"What! a Swedish boy afraid!" said Santa Claus.

Vigg was silent.

"What have you got to say about that toad?" asked Santa Claus after they had gone on for a while without speaking, pointing to a green monster that was perched upon a stone, its great eyes fixed upon the boy.

"It's horrible!" said Vigg, with a shudder.

"You created that," said Santa Claus.

"Don't you see how big and swollen it is? That's for envy and discontent."

"I created it, did you say?"

"Yes, certainly. You envied the king's son all his fine presents, and the things that I would have given you out of the kindness of my heart, you despised. For every wicked thought born within the breast of any man living in these regions, a snake or a toad comes into this mountain cleft."

"That's dreadful," said Vigg, now feeling heartily ashamed of himself.

Making many turns they penetrated deeper and deeper into the mountain.

By and by it began gradually to grow lighter, and as they turned a final corner, Vigg with astonishment saw before him a large shining chamber. The walls were of crystal. Around three sides of the room stood rows of little grinning dwarfs, holding torches in their hands, the light from which fell on the crystal, giving back a mass of rainbow color. On the fourth side sat the mountain-king on his golden throne. He was dressed in a mantle of asbestos, thickly studded over with jewels; but he was looking deeply sorrowful. By his side, on a throne somewhat lower, arrayed in a dress of silver cloth, his daughter was seated, looking, alas! even more grief-stricken still—almost like one who was dying, in fact. Although wonderfully beautiful, she was as white as the snow. In the middle of the room hung an immense pair of scales, while gathered around these were the mountain-sprites, busied in laying various articles in one side or the other.

And directly in front of the king was standing a great crowd of gnomes from all the farm-houses and cottages for miles around, each telling in turn what the people of his household had said or done in the course of a year. For every good deed the mountain-sprites laid golden weights in one side of the scales, and for every evil thought or wicked action they laid a poisonous snake or toad in the other.

"Do you know, Vigg," whispered Santa Claus, "how much all this means? The princess is ill. She will die; unless she can soon go out from this cleft. She longs to breathe the pure air of heaven, and to behold the golden light of the sun and stars; for she has received a promise that when she shall have done this she shall win an immortal soul, and, when she dies, she will be with the angels in heaven. She is pining and wasting away; but she can only go out from the mountain on that Christmas-eve on which the scale of the good sinks to the ground, and the scale of the bad flies up to the ceiling; but now, you see, they are almost even."

Santa Claus had hardly finished speaking when he was called upon to make his report. It was not a little that he had to tell, but this, as it happened, was nearly all good, for his watch only extended over Christmas Eve and over the day which is hallowed in all Christian lands in remembrance of the birth of that Child, Who, by His purity and innocence while on earth, taught men to be kinder one to another, and Who gave up His life to become our King of Kings throughout all eternity.

And the more Santa Claus told, the more golden weights the mountain sprites laid in the scale, so that the side of the good sunk lower and lower.

But during this time Vigg was on thorns lest his name should be mentioned, and when at last Santa Claus spoke it out, he gave a great start, turning first red and then white. Now, what Santa Claus said about this little boy and the woollen stockings, for Vigg's sake I am not going to tell, but I cannot help saying that one of the mountain sprites laid in the scale of the bad that great ugly green toad Vigg had seen when he first entered the cleft, and it weighed very heavily.

Meanwhile, all the eyes except those of good old Santa Claus, who considerably turned his away, were directed toward Vigg—the king's, his daughter's, the house-gnome's, the mountain sprites', and the dwarf's; and they all looked either very stern or very sorrowful, those of the princess in especial being so filled with tender compassion that Vigg covered his face with both hands and could not look up.

Santa Claus now told how poor Mother Gertrude had taken this little fatherless and motherless Vigg, how she made mats and brooms and sold them at the shop in the distant village to get food for the boy, how she sewed for him and kept his clothes in order, joyfully and lovingly working for him day after day, how for his sake she endured all manner of privations for herself without a word of complaint. Then he told of what comfort she took in Vigg's brave little manly heart, in his ruddy cheeks and honest eyes, and how willingly she pardoned all his childish faults—yes, and how she prayed for him every night after he went to sleep, and last of all, how this very morning even she had walked all the long way across the moor through the bitter cold just to get candles for his Christmas-tree and some other little things to give him pleasure.

While Santa Claus was telling his story the mountain sprites kept laying heavy golden weights in the good side of the scale. The fat green toad hopped out and vanished down the cleft, the eyes of the kind-hearted princess grew strangely moist, while as for Vigg, he just sobbed aloud.

Yes, he cried so hard that he waked up, and beheld! the beautiful chamber of the mountain-king, with all it contained, had quite disappeared, and he was lying in his own little bed in the cottage on the moor. The brightest Christmas fire was burning on the hearth, and Mother Gertrude was bending over him, and saying:

"Poor little Vigg had to wait so long in the dark! I couldn't get back any sooner, dear, it was so far. But now I've brought the Christmas-tree, and some fine white bread, and a gingerbread stag, and a cake besides for you to give to the sparrows tomorrow morning,* And see here," continued Mother Gertrude, "Here's a pair of woolen stockings that I've knit for your Christmas present. You needed them badly enough, you little rogue! And here's a pair of stout leather shoes that I've bought for you too, so you won't have to be running round in your wooden ones all the holidays."

Vigg had long wished for a pair of leather shoes. It was with glistering eyes that he now turned them round and round, examining them in every part. But at the woolen stockings he gazed almost longer still, so that Mother Gertrude thought he was pretending more admiration for them than he could really feel. The reason of this was, however, that to Vigg they seemed to be the very same pair he had seen in Santa Claus' box. At last he threw his arms round Mother Gertrude's neck, and said:

"Oh, Mother Gertrude, I've learned such a lesson. Santa Claus took me to ride, and I saw so many things. Christmas means love, I know it. You love me, and I'm going to show you how much I love you, mother dear."

THE ANDOVER REVIEW.

On the whole the Andover Review is demonstrating its reasons of life, and deserves to be, as it is, the most popular religious review in America to-day.—The Religious Herald (Cock).

The Andover Review well maintains the reputation generally accorded to it amongst our neighbors: the most valuable theological magazine published on this continent.—The Week (Toronto, Canada).

The Andover Review, an American religious and theological monthly which deserves attention and welcome on this side of the Atlantic.—The Christian World (London).

THE ANDOVER REVIEW FOR 1886.

The success which has attended the publication of the ANDOVER REVIEW for the past two years has led to its establishment upon a permanent financial basis. Commencing the year 1886 with increased resources, the Review will be enlarged with each monthly issue to 112 pages, making an aggregate for the year of 1344 pages, and the annual price of subscription will be $4.00, single copies, 35 cents. Until January 1, subscriptions will be received at the present rate, $3.00.

N. B. THE JANUARY number will be sent FREE to any address, if requested for examination.

N. B. After Jan. 1, 1886, the price of the Review will be $4.00. Until that date subscriptions will be received at the present rate, $3.00 from old and new subscribers.

WHAT WE REALLY KNOW ABOUT SHAKESPEARE.

By MRS. CAROLINE HEALEY DALL. 16mo. cloth. Price, $1.25.

There is no life of Shakespeare accessible to the public at a moderate cost and of a convenient size which gives any of the last results of the inquiry into his life and circumstances. A very great addition to our knowledge of these has accrued from the labors of Mr. Halliwell-Phillips and others. It has been Mrs. Dall's intention to put these results into an entertaining narrative, accompanied by references to documents and authorities which will sustain it, and in a shape useful to the library as well as to the use of colleges and universities, and private classes in English Literature.

TIME FLIES.

A Reading Diary for Every Day in the Year. By CHRISTINA G. ROBERTS. 16mo, cloth, red edge. Price, $1.00.

A new and entirely original book by this popular author, a mingling of book, poem, and poetry; the latter of a very high order of merit.

Sold everywhere by all booksellers. Mailed, post-paid, by the publishers.

Littell's Living Age.

Jan. 1, 1886, THE LIVING AGE enters upon its TENTH VOLUME, having met with most successful continuation and success.

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE, it is now more than Three and a Quarter Thousand double-column octavo pages of reading-matter yearly. It proceeds in an impressive, progressive, and interesting manner, presenting its great amount of material with freshness and vigor in its weekly issue, and with a completeness nowhere else attempted.

The best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Serial and Short Stories, Sketches of Travel and Discovery, Poetry, Scientific, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, from the entire body of foreign Periodical Literature.

It is therefore invaluable to every American reader, as the only satisfactorily fresh and COMPLETE compilation of an individual character—undoubtedly because it embraces the productions of the

A BLEST LIVING WRITERS

In all branches of Literature, Science, Politics, and Art. "It is not too much to say that with THE LIVING AGE are presented the whole field of current literature, as it is called, and it has never been so bright, so comprehensive, so diversified in its contents, as it is to-day."—Boston Transcript. "It has now for many years held the first place of all our serial publications. There is nothing more complete, more up-to-date, more interesting, philosophical, or eloquent, that can be found in it."—The Christianian, New York. "Nearly the whole world of authors and writers appear in it in their most beautiful and complete form."—Boston Herald. "It is the only one of its kind in the world, and it never offers any one subject page."—New York Tribune. "It enables its readers to keep fully abreast of the best thought and literature of civilization."—Christian Advocate, Philadelphia. "Through its pages alone, it is possible to be so well informed in every department of our contemporary literature as to feel one's own self abreast of English periodical literature."—Philadelphia Inquirer. "In fact, a reader needs no more than this one publication to keep him well abreast of English periodical literature."—Boston Herald. "It is a superb work, and it is a great pleasure to read it."—Boston Herald. "It is a superb work, and it is a great pleasure to read it."—Boston Herald. "It is a superb work, and it is a great pleasure to read it."—Boston Herald.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage, which may save us many heavy doctor's bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us, ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure food, and a properly nourished frame." - Civil Service Gazette.
